Imerican eview

Cuk- H02400-52-025 March, 1965

Vol. LIX

No. 1

The Changing Shape of the American Political Universe	Walter Dean Burnham	7
Political Science and Prevision	Bertrand de Jouvenel	29
Politics and Pseudopolitics: A Critical Evaluation of Some Behavioral Literature	Christian Bay	39
Conditions for Party Leadership: The Case of the House Democrats		52
Deeds Under a Doctrine: Civil Liberties in the 1963 Term	Walter F. Murphy	64
Mao Tse-tung's Revolutionary Strategy and Peking's International Behavior		80
Research Notes	. •
The Illusion of Judicial Consensus: Zoning Decisions in the Maryland Court of Appeals	Robert J. Sickels	100
Does a "Divisive" Primary Harm a Candidate's Election Chances?	Andrew Hackey	105
Contested Elections and Voter Turnout in a Local Community: A Problem in Spurious Correlation		111
Types of Primary and Party Responsibility		117
Communication	•••••	119
Bibliographical Contribution	,
Foreign Local Government: A Bibliography	Robert L. Morlan	120
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography	Austin Ranney (ed.)	137
News and Notes	Leo B. Lott (ed.)	236

(For list of book reviews, see page 137)

= Published quarterly by =

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

NEW AND FORTHCOMING

PAN-AFRICANISM A Short Political Guide REVISED EDITION

By COLIN LEGUM. "Tightly knit, highly accurate . . . eloquent essay on Pan-Africanism viewed as thought-style and a politico-cultural movement."—Africa Report. With a new chapter, "Fusion and Fission," and new appendixes pertaining to the Organization for African Unity. April/$2.50

THE COMMUNIST STATES AT THE CROSSROADS Between Moscow and Peking

Edited by ADAM BROMKE. Introduction by Philip E. Mosely. Taking into account the fall of Khrushchev, this timely work analyzes in detail the political and economic effects of the Sino-Soviet conflict on the individual Communist countries of Eastern Europe and Asia. April $2.25

THE ELEPHANTS AND THE GRASS A Study of Nonalignment

By CECIL V. CRABB, Jr. An analysis of the diplomatic philosophy of the majority of nations in the Afro-Arab-Asian world. The author, Chairman of the Department of Political Science at Vassar, deals with all aspects of neutralist policy and theory. April/$1.95

COMMUNIST CHINA'S CRUSADE Mao's Road to Power and the New Campaign for World Revolution

By GUY WINT. Based in part on Mr. Wint's highly regarded Dragon and Sickle, but largely rewritten and much expanded, this book explains how Mao Tse-tung adapted Communism to China's unique political and social circumstances. April/$1.75

MACHIAVELLISM The Doctrine of Raison Its Place in Modern Hi

By FRIEDRICH MEINECK Douglas Scott. "An invalual comes back again and again problems of political life—reconciling theory and practic ards of public and private m tion between internal and for—The Times Literary Supple March/$2.95

THE REPRESENTATION O UNITED STATES ABROAD REVISED EDITION

Edited by VINCENT M. Bawell-known basic study has no by its original authors to prhensive description and analy problems in the field. Put American Assembly, Columl June/$1.95

CASTROISM: THEORY AND PRACTICE

By THEODORE DRAPER. ( the analysis of Castro's Re and Realities, Mr. Draper roots of Castroism as an ided doctrine, a political system an expression of Castro's pro
May/$1.95

DEMOCRATIC THEORY

By GIOVANNI SARTORI. A nation of democracy—as pr—in the grand tradition of Bryce. The author is Profes Science at the University of June/$2.95

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publishers

111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10003

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advert

Ċ,

Modern Public Administration FELIX A. NIGRO

A thorough, realistic introduction to public administration which reflects the fundamental changes in this field by emphasizing the policy-making role of administration and the analysis of human behavior in governmental organizations. Cultural influences are discussed; examples from national, international, state, and local levels are given; and staff and line organization is explained by developing the administrative framework of a hypothetical municipal government. Brief case studies illustrate the politics of organization. Selected bibliographies at chapter ends. 531 pp. $6.75.

Government and Politics of the United States WILLIAM C. HAVARD

Brief yet sophisticated description of the government of the United States, critically evaluating governmental organization, functions, and policies, and comprehensively treating the working system of American politics at all levels (showing the interrelationships of these levels). Study questions; brief bibliography. For use as the basic text where the instructor wishes to use a considerable number of paperbacks. Paper. 245 pp. $2.95.

backs. Paper. 245 pp. $2.95. The Metropolis: Its People, Politics, and Economic Life JOHN C. BOLLENS · HENRY J. SCHMANDT

A comprehensive and multidimensional analysis grounded on the conception of the metropolis as a dynamic system of interacting relationships among people, organizations, and institutions. Deals with many phases of the metropolitan community: social characteristics and trends, economic developments, physical and land use considerations, and government and politics. Utilizes a broad range of empirical investigations into metropolitan and urban phenomena and the relevant theory that has emerged. Analyzes problems of metropolitan growth and efforts being made to solve them; discusses the power structure and decision-making process; described the roles of citizens; appraises the complex whole of metropolitan life and its future. Footnote references; bibliographical essay on the literature in the field; maps, graphs, and cartoons. Coming in July.

Statistical Concepts: A Basic Program JIMMY AMOS · FOSTER LLOYD BROWN OSCAR MINK

A constructed-response, field-tested program covering the statistics necessary for the introductory student's comprehension of material in various political science courses. Paper. 125 pp. $1.75.

Harper & Row, Publishers
49 East 33d St. • New York 10016

1965 REGIONAL TOUR-SEMINAR PROGRAMS

Africa—11 countries—31 days—August 12-September 13

Latin America—7 countries—24 days—

August 7-September 1

Because of our success with the 1963 World Tour-Seminar Program, which took more than 60 members to 11 countries, the Association is offering two regional travel-study opportunities—in Africa and in Latin America—in 1965.

Ġ

In addition to direct conversations with governmental leaders of the countries on the itinerary, tour-seminar participants will meet with members of the faculties of local universities, U.S. Foreign Service Personnel, foreign press representatives, etc. Opportunity will be provided for a limited amount of personal research and sight-seeing. The entire trip is being planned with the cooperation and support of the U.S. Department of State and the U.S. Information Service.

TRANSPORTATION

Both Tour-Seminars will be carried out on regularly scheduled jet flights of reputable International carriers.

The African Tour-Seminar is based on the group fare, requiring a minimum of 25 participants. The Latin America Tour-Seminar is not restricted as to a minimum number of participants.

EXPENSES

The cost of the APSA African Tour-Seminar will be approximately $1698.00 per person and the Latin American Tour-Seminar approximately $1092.00. The fares will include round-trip tourist air transportation, first-class hotel accommodations, numerous meal functions, baggage handling, airport transfers, entire schedule of meetings, interviews, briefings, and appropriate sightseeing activities.

On the basis of past experience, participants can expect that the cost of this educational activity will be accepted as a deductible expense on Federal income tax returns.

For further information concerning this unique educational, research, and travel opportunity, write immediately to: APSA 1965 Regional Tour-Seminars, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. A brochure giving full details and reservation information will be mailed to you.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University

OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University

ANDREW HACKER, Cornell University

ġ

J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College

HAROLD STEIN, Princeton University
ROWLAND EGGER, University of Virginia
STANLEY HOFFMANN, Harvard University
ROBERT E. LANE, Yale University

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES.

Austin Ranney, Book Review Editor, University of Wisconsin

Leo B. Lott, News and Notes Editor, Ohio State University

Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland

S. Sidney Ulmer, University of Kentucky

Judith Shklar, Harvard University
Richard L. Mereitt, Yale University
Corinne Silverman, Philadelphia
Nimrod Raphaeli, University of Michigan
Hiram M. Stout, George Washington University

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus, Ohio 43210

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy. Prices of other issues are furnished on request.

Applications for membership, orders for the Review, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the Review to Harvey C. Mansfield, 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus, Ohio 43210; books intended for review, to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.; News and Notes items, to Leo B. Lott, Department of Political Science, Ohio State University, 216 N. Oval Drive, Columbus, Ohio 43210; advertising, reprint and circulation correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the Review before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the Review, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan. A Cumulative Index of the Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963, may be obtained from Northwestern University Press, 816 University Place, Evanston, Illinois.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1965, by The American Political Science Association.

from the college department of

RAND M°NALLY & COMPANY

History of Political Philosophy

Edited by LEO STRAUSS and JOSEPH CROPSEY

University of Chicago

Main elements of political philosophy from Plato to John Dewey are woven into a comprehensive, scholarly, and highly readable survey text. Carefully selected political theories are objectively treated not only as history but as factors which lead to an understanding of present society. Christian, Jewish and Muslim contributions to political theory are examined along with work of authors not generally recognized as political philosophers. The text guides the student through the readings of the tradition and encourages him to seek additional sources.

1963 • 790 pages • 6 x 9 inches • $8.50

New Perspectives on the House of Representatives

Edited by ROBERT L. PEABODY

The Johns Hopkins University

and NELSON W. POLSBY

Weslevan University

The intricate, ritualistic traditions and policies of the House of Representatives are exposed and explained in thirteen essays. Grouped into four areas of House influence, the essays portray the politics of the House as well as its variety and diversity. The essays, four of which have never before been published, will be particularly useful for courses on legislative process, behavior, and political parties.

1963 • 392 pages • 5½ x 8½ inches • $3.50 paper • $6.50 cloth

Political Parties: A Behavioral Analysis

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD

University of Michigan

A functional theory of political parties developed from a thorough investigation of party systems in a large metropolitan area. Interviews with leaders from three different echelons of the parties analyze their personal characteristics, ideologies, motivations and perspectives. Four critical theories about party structures are developed and tested; both sociological and psychological factors are used in explaining party leadership and organization. The book concentrates on the environmental conditions to which the party must adapt and emphasizes the motivational basis of leadership.

1964 • c. 624 pages • 5½ x 8½ inches • $8.00

Information, Analysis, Opinions, Conclusions

Rand McNally Public Affairs Series

Edited by ROBERT A. GOLDWIN

University of Chicago

The most important political issues of the times are discussed in depth. Varied approaches and opposing points of view from government, industry, and the academic world provide thought-provoking questions and offer possible solutions for such problems as political parties, emancipation, and foreign aid. The essays in the 5 books of the series were originally presented to the Public Affairs Conference Center of the University of Chicago.

America Armed:

Essays on United States Military Policy

Six essays treat the "unthinkable"—thermonuclear war. 1964 • 140 pages • 5½ x 8½ inches • $1.50 paper

A Nation of States:

Essays on the American Federal System

An examination of the federal system as it appears in civil rights, the farm program and welfare programs.

1964 • 148 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $1.50 paper

Why Foreign Aid?

Facts, theories, pros, cons of foreign aid programs presented through eight essays.

1964 • 140 pages • 5½ x 8½ inches • $1.50 paper

Political Parties, U.S.A.

Seven essays describe the sense of confusion and dissatisfaction shared by observers of the American political process.

1964 • 158 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $1.50 paper

100 Years of Emancipation

Treats primarily the question of why slavery problems exist 100 years after the Emancipation Proclamation.

1964 • 217 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $1.50 paper

to order, write: Room 200 The College Department; Rand McNally & Company, Box 7600, Chicago, 60680

"The treatment is elaborate and the discussion is rich . . . the work is eminently worthwhile, and is likely to have extensive use over a considerable period of years."

POLITICAL SCIENCE QUARTERLY

The Rights of Property

A Commentary on the Constitution of The United States, Part II

BY BERNARD SCHWARTZ

Part II of an already established standard work, the most comprehensive commentary on the American Constitution in existence. The second part, (but third volume) is concerned with the rights of the individual which serve as basic limitations on governmental power. The theme of the book is the burgeoning of government power, and the diminution of private rights. $12.50

* of Part I

A major literary event—the first full presentation in English of the works of one of the most profound and provocative political thinkers of modern times.

The Works of Joseph de Maistre

Edited, translated, and with an Introduction by Jack Lively

The main parts or whole texts of all the major works of this formidable and rigorously logical defender of political absolutism, who believed in the absolute necessity of order and obedience, and saw anarchy as the most cardinal of sins. $8.95

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

60 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

The American Political Science Review

BOARD OF EDITORS

Harvey C. Mansfield, Managing Editor, Harold Stein, Princeton University Columbia University Rowland Egger, University of Virginia Otto Kirchheimer, Columbia University Stanley Hoffmann, Harvard University Andrew Hacker, Cornell University J. Roland Pennock, Swarthmore College Robert E. Lane, Yale University

VOLUME LIX
1965

Copyright, 1966, by
THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

GEORGE BANTA COMPANY, INC.
MENASHA, WISCONSIN

CONTENTS

Number 1-March, 1965

The Changing Shape of the American Political Universe. Walter Dean Burnham Political Science and Prevision. Bertrand de Jouvenel	7 29 39
Randall B. Ripley Deeds Under a Doctrine: Civil Liberties in the 1963 Term. Walter F. Murphy Mao Tse-tung's Revolutionary Strategy and Peking's International Behavior. Morton H. Hal-	52 64
perin	80
Robert J. Sickels	100 105
Correlation. Thad L. Beyle	111 117 119
BIBLIOGRAPHICAL CONTRIBUTION Foreign Local Government: A Bibliography. Robert L. Morlan Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Austin Ranney (ed.) News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.)	120 137 236
Number 2—June, 1965
Electoral Myth and Reality: The 1964 Election. Philip E. Converse, Aage R. Clausen and Warren
E. Miller	321 337
plete Disarmament, Charles Burton Marshall	350
The 1914 Case. Ole R. Holsti	365 379 391
Scientists and the Policy Process. Avery Leiserson. Democracy, Organization, Michels. John D. May. Christian Thomasius: Enlightenment and Bureaucracy. Frederick M. Barnard.	408 417 430
Communications Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Austin Ranney (ed.) News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.)	439 448 543
	010
Number 3—September, 1965 The Transformation of Alliance Systems. Herbert S. Dinerstein	589
Dimensions of Political Systems: Factor Analysis of A Cross-Polity Survey. Phillip M. Gregg and Arthur S. Banks	602
A Scale Analysis of the Voting Records of Senators Kennedy, Johnson and Goldwater, 1957–1960. Charles H. Gray	615
Control. Ira Sharkansky	622 629
John A. Armstrong Ideological Correlates of Right Wing Political Alienation in Mexico. Kenneth F. Johnson Making the Inneres Constitution: A Further Look Justin Williams	643 656 665
Making the Japanese Constitution: A Further Look. Justin Williams	680
Communications	691
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Austin Ranney (ed.)	694 771
News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.)	797

Number 4—December, 1965

The Politics of Consensus in an Age of Affluence. Robert E. Lane	Disillusion and Regeneration: The Quest for a Discipline. David B. Truman	865
A Method for Identifying Issues and Factions from Legislative Votes. Duncan MacRae, Jr	The Politics of Consensus in an Age of Affluence. Robert E. Lane	874
The House Committee on Ways and Means: Conflict Management in a Congressional Committee. John F. Manley	The Development and Persistence of Ethnic Voting. Raymond E. Wolfinger	896
tee. John F. Manley	A Method for Identifying Issues and Factions from Legislative Votes. Duncan MacRae, Jr	909
Jackson's Judicial Philosophy: An Exploration in Value Analysis. Glendon Schubert.940Confining Conditions and Revolutionary Breakthroughs. Otto Kirchheimer.964The Modernity of Tradition: The Democratic Incarnation of Caste in India. Lloyd I, Rudolph975Obligation and Consent—I. Hanna Pitkin.990Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Austin Ranney (ed.)1001News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.)1104	The House Committee on Ways and Means: Conflict Management in a Congressional Commit-
Confining Conditions and Revolutionary Breakthroughs. Otto Kirchheimer	tee. John F. Manley	927
The Modernity of Tradition: The Democratic Incarnation of Caste in India. Lloyd I, Rudolph Obligation and Consent—I. Hanna Pitkin	Jackson's Judicial Philosophy: An Exploration in Value Analysis. Glendon Schubert	940
Obligation and Consent—I. Hanna Pitkin.990Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Austin Ranney (ed.)1001News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.)1104	Confining Conditions and Revolutionary Breakthroughs. Otto Kirchheimer	964
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography. Austin Ranney (ed.). 1001 News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.). 1104	The Modernity of Tradition: The Democratic Incarnation of Caste in India. Lloyd I, Rudolph	975
News and Notes, Leo B. Lott (ed.)	Obligation and Consent—I. Hanna Pitkin	990
News and Notes. Leo B. Lott (ed.)		1001
Index to Volume LIX. Corinne Silverman	News and Notes, Leo B. Lott (ed.)	1104
	Index to Volume LIX. Corinne Silverman	1119

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

GABRIEL A. ALMOND Stanford University President-Elect ROBERT A. DAHL Yale University

Vice Presidents

Manning J. Dauer University of Florida WILLIAM T. R. Fox Columbia University

RUPERT EMERSON Harvard University

Secretary

John H. Kautsky Washington University, St. Louis Treasurer
Max M. Kampelman
Washington, D.C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK 1726 Massachusetts Ave., N.W. Washington, D.C., 20036 Associate Director
Don G. TACHERON

Managing Editor, APSR
HARVEY C. MENSFIELD
Columbia University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officiis

MARVER H. BERNSTEIN
Princeton University
JAMES S. COLEMAN
University of California, Los Angeles
DAVID EASTON
University of Chicago
CHARLES D. FARRIS
University of Florida
ERNST B. HAAS
University of California, Berkeley
WARREN E. MILLER
University of Michigan
JOSEPH TANENHAUS
New York University

State University of New York, Buffalo

JAMES C. DAVIES University of Oregon ALEX N. DRAGNICH ()Vanderbilt University HEINZ EULAU Stanford University SAMUEL HENDEL City College of the City University of New York WALLACE MENDELSON University of Texas LAURENCE I. RADWAY Dartmouth College WILLIAM H. RIKER University of Rochester VICTOR G. ROSENBLUM Northwestern University

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW ALBERT SHAW FREDERIC N. JUDSON JAMES BRYCE A. LAWRENCE LOWELL WOODROW WILSON SIMEON E. BALDWIN ALBERT BUSHNELL HART W. W. WILLOUGHBY JOHN BASSETT MOORE ERNST FREUND JESSE MACY MUNROE SMITH HENRY JONES FORD PAUL S. REINSCH LEO S. ROWE WILLIAM A. DUNNING HARRY A. GARFIELD JAMES W. GARNER CHARLES E. MERRIAM

JOHN C. WAHLKE

CHARLES A. BEARD WILLIAM B. MUNRO JESSE S. REEVES JOHN A. FAIRLIE BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH EDWARD S. CORWIN WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY ISIDOR LOEB Walter J. Shepard Francis W. Coker ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE THOMAS REED POWELL CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA CHARLES GROVE HAINES ROBERT C. BROOKS FREDERIC A. OGG WILLIAM ANDERSON ROBERT E. CUSHMAN LEONARD D. WHITE JOHN M. GAUS

WALTER F. DODD ARTHUR W. MACMAHON HENRY R. SPENCER QUINCY WRIGHT JAMES K. POLLOCK PETER H. ODEGARD LUTHER H. GULICK PENDLETON HERRING RALPH J. BUNCHE CHARLES McKINLEY HAROLD D. LASSWELL E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER V. O. KEY, JR. R. TAYLOR COLE CARL B. SWISHER EMMETTE S. REDFORD CHARLES S. HYNEMAN CARL J. FRIEDRICH C. HERMAN PRITCHETT DAVID B. TRUMAN

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LIX

MARCH, 1965

NO. 1

THE CHANGING SHAPE OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL UNIVERSE

WALTER DEAN BURNHAM
Haverford College

In the infancy of a science the use even of fairly crude methods of analysis and description can produce surprisingly large increments of knowledge if new perspectives are brought to bear upon available data. Such perspectives not infrequently require both a combination of methodologies and a critical appraisal of the limitations of each. The emergence of American voting-behavior studies over the last two decades constitutes a good case in point. Studies based on aggregate election statistics have given us invaluable insights into the nature of secular trends in the distribution of the party vote, and have also provided us with useful theory concerning such major phenomena as critical elections.1 Survey research has made significant contributions to the understanding of motivational forces at work upon the individual voter. As it matures, it is now reaching out to grapple with problems which involve the political system as a whole.2

Not at all surprisingly, a good deal of well publicized conflict has arisen between aggregationists and survey researchers. The former attack the latter for their failure to recognize the limitations of an ahistorical and episodic method, and for their failure to focus their attention upon matters of genuine concern to students of politics.3 The latter insist, on the other hand, that survey research alone can study the primary psychological and motivational building blocks out of which the political system itself is ultimately constructed. Not only are both parties to the controversy partly right, but each now seems to be becoming quite sensitive to the contributions which the other can make. As survey scholars increasingly discover that even such supposedly well established characteristics of the American voter as his notoriously low awareness of issues can be replaced almost instantaneously under the right circumstances by an extremely pronounced sensitivity to an issue, the importance of the time dimension and factors of social context so viewed become manifest.4 Students of aggregate voting behavior, on the other hand, are turning to the data and methods of survey research to explore the structure and characteristics of contemporary public opinion. A convergence is clearly underway. One further sign of it is the construction of the first national election-data archive, now underway at the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan. The completion of this archive and the conversion of its basic data into a form suitable for machine processing should provide the material basis for a massive breakthrough in the behavioral analysis of American political history over the last century and a half.

¹ The leading work of this sort thus far has been done by the late V. O. Key, Jr. See, e.g., his "A Theory of Critical Elections," Journal of Politics, Vol. 17, pp. 3–18 (1955), and his American State Politics (New York, 1956). See also such quantitatively oriented monographs as Perry Howard, Political Tendencies in Louisiana, 1812–1952 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1957).

² The most notable survey-research effort to date to develop politically relevant theory regarding American voting behavior is Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes, The American Voter (New York, 1960), especially ch. 20.

³ V. O. Key, Jr., "The Politically Relevant in Surveys," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 24, pp. 54-61 (1960); V. O. Key, Jr., and Frank Munger, "Social Determinism and Electoral Decision: The Case of Indiana," in Eugene Burdick and Arthur J. Brodbeck, eds., American Voting Behavior (Glencoe, Ill., 1959), pp. 281-99.

⁴ Warren E. Miller and Donald E. Stokes, "Constituency Influence in Congress," this Review, Vol. 57, pp. 45–56 (1963). The authors observe that in the 1958 Hays-Alford congressional race in Arkansas, the normally potential nature of constituency sanctions against representatives was transferred under the overriding pressure of the race issue into an actuality which resulted in Hays' defeat by a write-in vote for his opponent. The normally low issue- and candidate-consciousness among the electorate was abruptly replaced by a most untypically intense awareness of the candidates and their relative postions on this issue.

If controversies over method accompany the development of disciplines, so too does the strong tendency of the research mainstream to bypass significant areas of potential inquiry, thus leaving many "lost worlds" in its wake. One such realm so far left very largely unexplored in the literature of American politics centers around changes and continuities in the gross size and shape of this country's active voting universe over the past century. Key, to be sure, made contributions of the greatest significance to our understanding of the changing patterns of party linkage between voters and government. Moreover, he called attention to the need for quantitative analysis of political data other than the partisan division of the vote for leading offices. 7 E. E. Schattschneider's discussion of the struggle over the scope of political conflict and his functional analysis of the American party system remain a stimulus

For an excellent cross-polity study of voting behavior based on comparative survey analysis, see Robert R. Alford, Party and Society (Chicago, Rand McNally, 1963).

⁶ V. O. Key, Jr., Public Opinion and American Democracy (New York, 1961), based largely on survey-research data at the University of Michigan.

⁶ This effort, to which the author was enabled to contribute, thanks to a Social Science Research Council grant for 1963-64, has been supported by the Council and by the National Science Foundation. This article is in no sense an integral part of that larger project. But it is proper to acknowledge gratefully here that the S.S.R.C., by making it possible for me to spend a year at the Survey Research Center, has helped to provide conditions favorable to writing it. Thanks are also due to Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Donald E. Stokes and Warren E. Miller for their comments and criticisms. They bear no responsibility for the defects of the final product.

⁷ V. O. Key, Jr., American State Politics, op. cit., pp. 71-73, 197-216.

to further research—not least in the direction of examining the aggregate characteristics of the American electorate over time. Other recent studies, for example of the turnout of voters in Canada and Indiana, have added to our knowledge of contemporary patterns of mass political involvement. The fact remains, however, that no systematic analysis over lengthy time periods has yet been made of the massive changes of relative size and characteristics in the American voting universe, despite their obvious relevance to an understanding of the evolving political system as a whole.

This article does not purpost to be that systematic study. It is, rather, a tentative reconnaissance into the untapped wealth of a whole range of political data, undertaken in the hope of showing concretely some of the potentialities of their study. The primary objective here is the preliminary exploration of the scope of changes since the mid-19th century in turnout and other criteria of voting participation, and the possible substantive implications of such changes.

There is also a second objective. The day is not far distant when a major effort will be undertaken to relate the findings of survey research to contemporary aggregate data and then to examine the aggregate data of past generations in the light of these derived relationships. Before such inquiry is undertaken, it will be a matter of some importance to ascertain whether and to what extent the basic findings of survey research about the present American electorate are actually relevant to earlier periods of our political history. Firm conclusions here as elsewhere must await much more comprehensive and detailed study. Even so, enough can be learned from the contours of the grosser data to warrant posting a few warning signs.

⁸ E. E. Schattschneider, Party Government (New York, 1942) and The Semi-Sovereign People (New York, 1960), pp. 78-96.

⁹ Howard A. Scarrow, "Patterns of Voter Turnout in Canada," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 5, pp. 351-64 (1961); James A. Robinson and William Standing, "Some Correlates of Voter Participation: The Case of Indiana," Journal of Politics, Vol. 22, pp. 96-111 (1960). Both articles—one involving a political system outside of but adjacent to the United States-indicate patterns of contemporary participation which seem at variance with the conclusions of survey studies regarding the behavior of the American electorate. In Canada rural turnout is higher than urban, and no clear-cut pattern of drop-off between federal and provincial elections exists. Voter participation in Indiana apparently does not increase with the competitiveness of the electoral situation, and does increase with the rurality of the election jurisdiction. With the possible exception of the relationship between competitiveness and turnout, all of these are characteristics associated with 19thcentury voting behavior in the United States; see below.

T

Several criteria of voting participation have been employed in this analysis: (1) estimated turnout; (2) drop-off; (3) roll-off; (4) splitticket voting; (5) mean partisan swing. Turnout, the most indispensable of these criteria, is also unfortunately the "softest." A number of errors of estimate can arise from the necessary use of census data. For example, interpolations of estimates for intercensal years can produce significant error when abnormally large increases or decreases in population are bunched together within a few years. Estimates of the alien component in the total adult male population must also necessarily remain quite speculative for the censuses from 1880 through 1900, and are impossible to secure from published census data prior to 1870. No doubt this helps explain why students of voting-behavior research have avoided this area. But we need not reject these admittedly imprecise data altogether, because of their imperfections, when secular changes in turnout levels and variabilities from election to election are of far too great a magnitude to be reasonably discounted on the basis of estimate error.10

Moreover, the other criteria employed in this study not only share a very similar directional flow over time, but are directly derived from the voting statistics themselves. Free from the estimate-error problem, they are ordinarily quite consistent with the turnout data.¹¹ What 10 In computing turnout data, note that until approximately 1920 the criteria for eligibility to vote differed far more widely from state to state than they do now. In a number of states west of the original thirteen—for example, in Michigan until 1894 and in Wisconsin until 1908—aliens who had merely declared their intention to become citizens were permitted to vote. Woman suffrage was also extended piecemeal for several decades prior to the general enfranchisement of 1920. The turnout estimates derived here have been adjusted, so far as the census data permit, to take account of such variations.

¹¹ If one computes the off-year total vote of the years 1950-62 as a percentage of the total vote cast in the preceding presidential election, a is called "drop-off" here is the familiar pattern of decline in the total vote between presidential and succeeding off-year elections. The drop-off figures usually presented below are reciprocals of the percentage of the presidential-year total vote which is cast in the immediately following off-year election. If the total vote for the two successive elections is the same, drop-off is zero: if the total vote in the off-year election exceeds that cast in the immediately preceding presidential election, drop-off is negative. Secular increases in the amplitude of drop-off could be associated with such factors as a declining relative visibility or salience of off-year elections, or with an increasing component of active voters who are only marginally involved with the voting process as such.

"Roll-off" measures the tendency of the electorate to vote for "prestige" offices but not for lower offices on the same ballot and at the same election. If only 90 per cent of those voting for the top office on the ticket also vote for the lesser statewide office receiving fewest votes at the same election, for example, the roll-off figure stands at 10 per cent. Secular increases in this criterion of voting participation could be associated with such variables as a growing public indifference to elections for administrative offices which might well be made appointive, or with a growing proportion of peripheral voters in the active electorate; or with changes in the form of ballots. Split-ticket voting has been measured rather crudely here as the difference between the highest and lowest percentages of the two-party vote cast for either party among the array of statewide offices in any given election. Zero on this scale would correspond to absolute uniformity in the partisan division of the vote for all offices at the same election. The amplitude of partisan swing is computed in this study without reference to the specific partisan direction of the swing, and is derived from the mean percentage of the twoparty vote cast for either party among all statewide races in the same election. Both of these latter criteria are more directly related to virtually identical correspondence is reached with estimated off-year turnout as a percentage of turnout in the immediately preceding presidential year:

	Total Off-Year	Estimated Off-
37	Vote as % of Vote	Year Turnout as
Year	in Last Presidential	% of Turnout in
	Year	Last Pres. Year
1950	82.9	80.4
1954	69.2	67.5
1958	73.9	72.1
1962	74.4	73.6

changes in the strength of partisan linkage between voters and government than are the others employed in this study.

Two major assumptions underlie the use of these criteria. (1) If a secular decline in turnout occurs, and especially if it is associated with increases in drop-off and roll-off, we may infer that the active voting universe: (a) is shrinking in size relative to the potential voting universe; and (b) is also decomposing as a relative increase in its component of peripherally involved voters occurs. Opposite implications, of course, would be drawn from increases in turnout accompanied by decreases in these rough indices of voter peripherality. (2) If split-ticket voting and the amplitude of partisan swings are also increasing over time, we may infer that a decline in party-oriented voting is taking place among a growing minority of voters. Reductions in these criteria would suggest a resurgence of party-oriented voting.

A recent study by Angus Campbell tends to support the view that the above criteria are actually related to the component of marginal voters and voters with relatively weak partisan attachments in today's active electorate.12 Campbell argues that surge and decline in voting participation and in partisan distribution of the vote result from two major factors: the entrance into the active electorate of peripherally involved voters who tend to vote disproportionately for such beneficiaries of partisan surges as President Eisenhower, and then abstain from the polls in subsequent lowstimulus elections; and the temporary movement of core voters with relatively low levels of party identification away from their nominal party allegiance, followed by their return to that allegiance in subsequent low-stimulus elections. Campbell's study reveals that splitticket voting in the 1956 election tended to be heavily concentrated among two groups of voters: those who voted Republican for President in 1956 and did not vote in 1958, and those who voted Republican in 1956 but Democratic in 1958—in other words, among those with peripheral involvement in the political process itself and those with borderline partisan commitments. Moreover, roll-offthe failure to vote a complete ticket in 1956was heavily concentrated among the non-voters of 1958. It is also suggestive that the level of drop-off in Campbell's panel from 1956 to 1958, 23 per cent, very closely approximates the level of drop-off as measured by the aggregate voting data 13

II

Even the crudest form of statistical analysis makes it abundantly clear that the changes which have occurred in the relative size and shape of the active electorate in this country have not only been quantitatively enormous but have followed a directional course which seems to be unique in the contemporary universe of democratic polities. In the United States these transformations over the past century have involved devolution, a dissociation from politics as such among a growing segment of the eligible electorate and an apparent deterioration of the bonds of party linkage between electorate and government. More precisely, these trends were overwhelmingly prominent between about 1900 and 1930, were only very moderately reversed following the political realignment of 1928-1936, and now seem to be increasing once again along several dimensions of analysis. Such a pattern of development is pronouncedly retrograde compared with those which have obtained almost everywhere else in the Western world during the past century.

Probably the best-known aspect of the changing American political universe has been the long-term trend in national voter turnout: a steep decline from 1900 to about 1930, followed by a moderate resurgence since that time. ¹⁴ As the figures in Table I indicate, nationwide turnout down through 1900 was quite high by contemporary standards—comparing favorably in presidential years with recent levels of par-

TABLE I. DECLINE AND PARTIAL RESURGENCE:
MEAN LEVELS OF NATIONAL TURNOUT AND DROP-OFF BY PERIODS, 1848–1962*

Period (Presidential Years)	Mean Estimated Turnout	Period (Off-Years)	Mean Estimated Turnout	Mean Drop-Off
	(%)	, , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , , ,	(%)	(%)
1848-1872	75.1	1850-1874	65.2	7.0
1876-1896	78.5	1878-1898	62.8	15.2
1900-1916	64.8	1902-1918	47.9	22.4
1920-1928	51.7	1922-1930	35.2	28.7
1932-1944	59.1	1934-1946	41.0	27.8
1948-1960	60.3	1950-1962	44.1	24.9

^{*} Off-year turnout data based on total vote for congressional candidates in off years.

¹² Angus Campbell, "Surge and Decline: A Study of Electoral Change," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 24, pp. 397–418 (1960).

¹³ Ibid., p. 413. The percentage of drop-off from 1956 to 1958, as computed from aggregate voting data, was 25.6%.

¹⁴ See, e.g., Robert E. Lane, Political Life (Glencoe, Ill., 1959), pp. 18-26.

ticipation in Western Europe—and was also marked by very low levels of drop-off. A good deal of the precipitate decline in turnout after 1896 can, of course, be attributed to the disfranchisement of Negroes in the South and the consolidation of its one-party regime. But as Table II and Fig. 1 both reveal, non-Southern states not only shared this decline but also have current turnout rates which remain substantially below 19th-century levels. 15

The persistence of mediocre rates of American voting turnout into the present political era is scarcely news. It forms so obvious and continuing a problem of our democracy that a special presidential commission has recently ¹⁵ There are, of course, very wide divergences in turnout rates even among non-Southern states. Some of them, like Idaho, New Hampshire and Utah, have presidential-year turnouts which compare very favorably with European levels of participation. A detailed analysis of these differences remains to be made. It should prove of the utmost importance in casting light upon the relevance of current forms of political organization and partisan alignments to differing kinds of electorates and political subsystems in the United States.

TABLE II. SECTIONALISM AND PARTICIPATION: MEAN TURNOUT IN SOUTHERN AND NONSOUTHERN STATES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, 1868–1960

Period	Mean Turnout: 11 Southern States	Period	Mean Turnout: Non- Southern States
	(%)		(%)
1868-1880	69.4	1868-1880	82.6
1884-1896	61.1	1884-1896	85.4
1900 (transit	ion) 43.4	1900	84.1
1904-1916	29.8	1904-1916	73.6
1920-1948	24.7	1920-1932	60.6
1952-1960	38.8	1936-1960	68.0
1884–1896 1900 (transit 1904–1916 1920–1948	69.4 61.1 ion) 43.4 29.8 24.7	1884–1896 1900 1904–1916 1920–1932	82.6 85.4 84.1 73.6 60.6

given it intensive study.¹⁶ Two additional aspects of the problem, however, emerge from a perusal of the foregoing data. In the first place, ¹⁶ Report of the President's Commission on Registration and Voting Participation (Washington, 1963), esp. pp. 5-9. Hereafter cited as Report.

FIGURE 1. Patterns of Turnout: United States, 1860–1964, by Region, and Selected Western European Nations, 1948–1961.

it is quite apparent that the political realignment of the 1930s, while it restored two-party competition to many states outside the South. did not stimulate turnout to return in most areas to 19th-century levels. Even if the mere existence of competitiveness precludes such low levels of turnout as are found in the South today, or as once prevailed in the northern industrial states, it falls far short of compelling a substantially full turnout under present-day conditions. Second, drop-off on the national level has shown markedly little tendency to recede in the face of increases in presidential-year turnout over the last thirty years. The component of peripheral voters in the active electorate has apparently undergone a permanent expansion from about one-sixth in the late 19th century to more than one-quarter in recent decades. If, as seems more than likely, the political regime established after 1896 was largely responsible for the marked relative decline in the active voting universe and the marked increase in peripherality among those who still occasionally voted, it is all the more remarkable that the dramatic political realignment of the 1930s has had such little effect in reversing these trends.

At least two major features of our contemporary polity, to be sure, are obviously related to the presently apparent ceiling on turnout. First, the American electoral system creates a major "double hurdle" for prospective voters which does not exist in Western Europe: the requirements associated with residence and registration, usually entailing periodic reregistration at frequent intervals, and the fact that elections are held on a normal working day in this employee society rather than on Sundays or holidays.¹⁷ Second, it is very probably true that 19th-century elections were major sources of entertainment in an age unblessed by modern mass communications, so that it is more difficult for politicians to gain and keep public attention today than it was then.18 Yet if American voters labor under the most cumbersome sets of procedural requirements in the Western world, this in itself is a datum which tends to support Schattschneider's thesis that the struggle for democracy is still being waged in the United States and that there are profound resistances within the political system itself to the adoption of needed procedural reforms.19

Moreover, there are certain areas—such as all of Ohio outside the metropolitan counties and cities of at least 15,000 population—where no registration procedures have ever been established, but where no significant deviation from the patterns outlined here appears to exist. Finally, while it may well be true that the partial displacement by TV and other means of entertainment has inhibited expansion of the active voting universe during the past generation, it is equally true that the structure of the American voting universe—i.e., the adult population—as it exists today was substantially formed in the period 1900-1920, prior to the development of such major media as the movies, radio and television.

III

As we move below the gross national level, the voting patterns discussed above stand out with far greater clarity and detail. Their divergences suggest something of the individual differences which distinguish each state subsystem from its fellows, as their uniformities indicate the universality of the broader secular trends. Five states have been selected for analysis here. During the latter part of the 19th century two of these, Michigan and Pennsylvania, were originally competitive states which tended to favor the Republican Party. They developed solidly one-party regimes after the realignment of 1896. These regimes were overthrown in their turn and vigorous party competition was restored in the wake of the New Deal realignment. In two other states, Ohio and New York, the 1896 alignment had no such dire consequences for two-party competition on the state level. These states have also shown a somewhat different pattern of development since the 1930s than Michigan and Pennsylvania. Our fifth state is Oklahoma, where a modified one-party system is structured heavily along sectional lines and operates in a socioeconomic context unfavorable to the classic New Deal articulation of politics along ethnicclass lines of cleavage.

Michigan politics was marked from 1894 through 1930 by the virtual eclipse of a state Democratic Party which had formerly contested elections on nearly equal terms with the Republicans. The inverse relationships developing between this emergent one-partyism on the one hand, and both the relative size of the active voting universe and the strength of party linkage on the other, stand out in especially bold relief.

A decisive shift away from the stable and substantially fully mobilized voting patterns of the 19th century occurred in Michigan after ¹⁷ Ibid., pp. 11-14, 31-42.

¹⁸ See, e.g., Stanley Kelley, "Elections and the Mass Media," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 27, pp. 307-26 (1962).

¹⁹ E. E. Schattschneider, The Semi-Sovereign People, op. cit., pp. 102-3.

Period	Mean turnout		34	2.5	Mean	Mean	Mean % D
	Pres.	Off- years	Mean drop-off	Mean roll-off	split- ticket voting	partisan swing	of 2-party vote
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1854-1872	84.8	78.1	7.8	0.9	0.8	3.2	43.9
1878-1892	84.9	74.9	10.7	0.8	1.6	2.2	48.0
1894-1908	84.8	68.2	22.3	1.5	5.9	4.7	39.6
1910-1918	71.4	53.0	27.2	3.0	9.8	4.1	40.4*
1920-1930	55.0	31.5	42.9	6.0	10.0	7.3	29.8
1932-1946	63.6	47.3	25.9	6.7	6.0	7.4	47.9
1948-1962	66.9	53.6	19.1	4.1	5.8	4.9	51.0

TABLE III. MICHIGAN, 1854-1962: DECAY AND RESURGENCE?

the realignment of 1896, with a lag of about a decade between that election and the onset of disruption in those patterns. The first major breakthrough of characteristics associated with 20th-century American electorates occurred in the presidential year 1904, when the mean percentage Democratic for all statewide offices reached an unprecedented low of 35.6 and the rate of split-ticket voting jumped from almost zero to 17.1 per cent. A steady progression of decline in turnout and party competition, accompanied by heavy increases in the other criteria of peripherality, continued down through 1930.

The scope of this transformation was virtually revolutionary. During the civil-war era scarcely 15 per cent of Michigan's potential electorate appears to have been altogether outside the voting universe. About 7 per cent could be classified as peripheral voters by Campbell's definition, and the remainder-more than three-quarters of the total—were core voters. Moreover, as the extremely low 19th-century level of split-ticket voting indicates, these active voters overwhelmingly cast party-line ballots. By the 1920s, less than one-third of the potential electorate were still core voters, while nearly one-quarter were peripheral and nearly one-half remained outside the political system altogether. Drop-off and roll-off increased sixfold during this period, while the amplitude of partisan swing approximately doubled and the split-ticket-voting rate increased by a factor of approximately eight to twelve.

For the most part these trends underwent a sharp reversal as party competition in Michigan was abruptly restored during the 1930s and organized in its contemporary mode in 1948. As the mean Democratic percentage of the two-party vote increased and turnout—especially in off-year elections—showed a marked relative upswing, such characteristics of marginality as drop-off, roll-off, split-ticket voting and partisan swing declined in magnitude. Yet, as the means for the 1948-1962 period demonstrate, a large gap remains to be closed before anything like the status quo ante can be restored. Our criteria except, of course, for the mean percentage Democratic of the two-party vote-have returned only to the levels of the transitional period 1900-1918. As is well known, exceptionally disciplined and issue-oriented party organizations have emerged in Michigan since 1948, and elections have been intensely competitive throughout this period.20 In view of this, the failure of turnout in recent years to return to something approaching 19th-century levels is all the more impressive, as is the continuing persistence of fairly high levels of dropoff, roll-off and split-ticket voting.21

The Michigan data have still more suggestive implications. Campbell's discussion of surge and decline in the modern context points to a cyclical process in which peripheral voters, drawn into the active voting universe only under unusual short-term stimuli, withdraw from it again when the stimuli are removed. It follows that declines in turnout are accompanied by a marked relative increase in the component of core voters in the electorate and by a closer approximation in off years to a "normal" partisan division of the vote.22 This presumably includes a reduction in the level of split-ticket voting as well. But the precise opposite occurred as a secular process—not only in Michigan but, it would seem, universallyduring the 1900-1930 era. Declines in turnout were accompanied by substantial, continuous increases in the indices of party and voter peripherality among those elements of the adult population which remained in the political universe at all. The lower the turnout during this period, the fewer of the voters still remaining who bothered to vote for the entire slate of officers in any given election. The lower the turnout in presidential years, the greater was the drop-off gap between the total vote cast in presidential and succeeding off-year elections. The lower the turnout, the greater were the incidence of split-ticket voting and the amplitude of partisan swing. Under the enormous impact of the forces which produced these declines in turnout and party competitiveness after 1896, the component of highly involved and party-oriented core voters in the active electorate fell off at a rate which more than kept pace with the progressive shrinking of that electorate's relative size. These developments necessarily imply a limitation upon the usefulness of the surge-decline model as it relates to secular movements prior to about 1934. They suggest, moreover, that the effects of the forces at work after 1896 to depress voter participation and to dislocate party linkage between voters and government were even more crushingly severe than a superficial perusal of the data would indicate.

²⁰ Joseph La Palombara, Guide to Michigan Politics (East Lansing, Mich., Michigan State University Press, 1960), pp. 22-35.

²¹ This recalls Robinson and Standing's conclusion that voter participation in Indiana does not necessarily increase with increasing party competition. Of the eight Michigan gubernatorial elections from 1948 to 1962 only one was decided by a margin of 55% or more, while three were decided by margins of less than 51.5% of the two-party vote. Despite this intensely competitive situation, turnout—while of course much higher than in the 1920s—remains significantly below normal pre-1920 levels.

^{*} Democratic percentage of three-party vote in 1912 and 1914.

²² Angus Campbell, "Surge and Decline," op. cit., pp. 401-4.

Pennsylvania provides us with variations on the same theme. As in Michigan, the political realignment centering on 1896 eventually converted an industrializing state with a relatively slight but usually decisive Republican bias into a solidly one-party G.O.P. bastion. To a much greater extent than in Michigan, this disintegration of the state Democratic Party was accompanied by periodic outbursts of third-party ventures and plural party nominations of major candidates, down to the First World War. Thereafter, as in Michigan, the real contest between competing candidates and political tendencies passed into the Republican primary, where it usually remained until the advent of the New Deal. In both states relatively extreme declines in the rate of turnout were associated with the disappearance of effective two-party competition, and in both states these declines were closely paralleled by sharp increases in the indices of peripherality.

As Table IV demonstrates, the parallel behavior of the Michigan and Pennsylvania electorates has also extended into the present; the now-familiar pattern of increasing turnout and party competition accompanied by marked declines in our other indices has been quite visible in the Keystone State since the advent of the New Deal. On the whole, indeed, a better approximation to the status quo ante has been reached in Pennsylvania than in Michigan or perhaps in most other states. But despite the intense competitiveness of its present party system, this restoration remains far from complete.

A more detailed examination of turnout and variability in turnout below the statewide level raises some questions about the direct role of immigration and woman suffrage in de-

TABLE IV. VOTING PATTERNS IN PENNSYLVANIA, 1876-1962: DECLINE AND RESURGENCE?

Period	Mean turnout		3.6	3.6	Mean	Mean	Mean % D
	Pres.	Off- years	Mean drop-off	Mean roll-off	split- ticket voting	partisan swing	of 2-party vote
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1876-1892	78.5	69.3	9.4	0.6	0.6	1.4	47.7
1894-1908	75.7	64.7	12.2	5.2	1.3	6.3	38.5
1910-1918	64.0	51.4	20.0	4.3	4.7	5.8	43.6*
1920-1930	50.4	39.5	28.0	5.2	8.9	7.1	32.8
19321948	61.5	51.9	14.9	2.2	1.4	6.1	49.0
1950-1962	67.5	56.3	12.2	1.8	3.1	3.3	49.3

^{*} Combined major anti-Republican vote (Democrat, Keystone, Lincoln, Washington).

G	%		1876-1896		1900-1916		1920–1932		1936-1960
County and Type	N	Foreign stock, 1920	Mean turnout	Coef.	Mean turnout	Coef.	Mean turnout	Coef.	Mean turnout	Coef.
		(%)	(%)		(%)		(%)		(%)
Urban:		,	*		.,,,		,		(, 0 ,
Allegheny	1	56.6	71.8	6.75	56.7	2.45	43.8	10.11	68.9	5.82
Philadelphia	1	54.3	85.2	4.61	72.9	6.42	50.5	12.57	68.8	4.40
Industrial-
Mining:	4	49.0	88.1	4.48	72.8	4.41	54.2	11.63	64.7	10.88
Rural:	8	13.5	88.5	3.12	76.4	3.63	56.0	8.09	65.2	13.20

Table v. differentials in aggregate turnout and variations of turnout in selected pennsylvania counties: presidential elections, 1876-1960*

pressing voter participation. It also uncovers a significant transposition of relative voter involvement in rural areas and urban centers since about 1930.

It is frequently argued that declines in participation after the turn of the century were largely the product of massive immigration from Europe and of the advent of woman suffrage, both of which added very large and initially poorly socialized elements to the potential electorate.²³ There is no question that these were influential factors. The data in Table V indicate, for example, that down until the Great Depression turnout was consistently higher and much less subject to variation in rural counties with relatively insignificant foreign-stock populations than in either the industrial-mining or metropolitan counties.

Yet two other aspects of these data should also be noted. First, the pattern of turnout decline from the 1876–1896 period to the 1900–1916 period was quite uniform among all categories of counties, though the rank order of their turnouts remained largely unchanged. It can be inferred from this that, while immigration probably played a major role in the evolution of Pennsylvania's political system as a whole, it had no visible direct effect upon the secular decline in rural voting participation. Broader systemic factors, including but transcending the factor of immigration, seem clearly to have been at work. Second, a very substantial fraction of the total decline in turnout from the 1870s to the 1920s-in some rural native-stock counties more than half-occurred before women were given the vote. Moreover, post-1950 turnout levels in Pennsylvania, and apparently in most other non-Southern states, have been at least as high as in the decade immediately preceding the general enfranchisement of women. If even today a higher percentage of American than European women fail to come to the polls, the same can also be said of such population groups as the poorly educated, farmers, the lower-income classes, Negroes and other deprived elements in the potential electorate.24 In such a context woman suffrage, as important a variable as it ²⁴ Survey-research estimates place current turnout among American women at 10% below male turnout. Angus Campbell et al., The American Voter, op. cit., pp. 484–85. This sexrelated difference in participation is apparently universal, but is significantly smaller in European countries which provide election data by sex, despite the far higher European level of participation by both sexes. The postwar differential has been 5.8% in Norway (1945–57 mean), 3.3% in Sweden (1948–60 mean), and 1.9% in Finland (1962 general election). While in 1956 only about 55% of American women went to the polls, the mean turnout among women in postwar elections was 76.1% in Norway and 79.4% in Sweden.

²³ Herbert Tingsten, Political Behavior (Stockholm, Stockholm Economic Studies, No. 7, 1937), pp. 10–36. See also Charles E. Merriam and Harold F. Gosnell, Non-Voting (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1924), pp. 26, 109–22, for a useful discussion of the effect of woman suffrage on turnout in a metropolitan area immediately following the general enfranchisement of 1920.

^{*} The coefficient of variability is a standard statistical measure; see V. O. Key, Jr., A Primer of Statistics for Political Scientists (New York, 1954), pp. 44-52. Since secular trends, where present, had to be taken into account, this coefficient appears abnormally low in the period 1900-1916. During this period many counties registered a straight-line decline in turnout from one election to the next.

TABLE VI. URBAN-RURAL DIFFERENCES IN STABILITY OF POLITICAL INVOLVEMENT: 1936–60 MEAN turnout and variability of turnout as percentages of 1876–96
MEAN TURNOUT AND VARIABILITY OF TURNOUT, PENNSYLVANIA

O	NT	1936-60 Turnout	1936-60 Variability
County and Type	N	1876-96 Turnout	1876-96 Variability
Urban:		(%)	(%)
Allegheny	1	95.9	86.2
Philadelphia	1	80.8	95.4
Industrial-Mining:	4	73.4	249.6
Rural:	8	73.7	447.4

certainly has been in our recent political history, seems to raise more analytical problems than it solves.

Particularly suggestive for our hypothesis of basic changes in the nature of American voting behavior over time is the quite recent transposition of aggregate turnout and variations in turnout as between our rural sample and the two metropolitan centers. In sharp contrast to the situation prevailing before 1900, turnout in these rural counties has tended during the past generation not only to be slightly lower than in the large cities but also subject to far wider oscillations from election to election. In Bedford County, for example, turnout stood at 82.5 per cent in 1936, but sagged to an all-time low of 41.2 per cent in 1948. The comparable figures in Philadelphia were 74.3 and 64.8 per cent, and in Allegheny County 72.5 per cent (in 1940) and 60.6 per cent.

A major finding revealed by survey research is that the "farm vote" is currently one of the most unstable and poorly articulated elements in the American electorate.25 It is said that since rural voters lack the solid network of group identifications and easy access to masscommunication media enjoyed by their city cousins, they tend to be both unusually apathetic and exceptionally volatile in their partisan commitments. As rural voting turnout was abnormally low in 1948, its rate of increase from 1948 to 1952 was exceptionally large and-fully consistent with Campbell's surge-decline model—was associated with a one-sided surge toward Eisenhower. A restatement of the data in Table V lends strong support to this evaluation of the relative position of the rural vote as a description of the current American voting universe.

But the data strongly imply that virtually the opposite of present conditions prevailed during the 19th century. Such variables as education level, communications and nonfamily-group interaction were probably much more poorly developed in rural areas before 1900 than they are today. Not only did this leave no visible mark on agrarian turnout; it seems extremely likely that the 19th-century farmer was at least as well integrated into the political system of that day as any other element in the American electorate. The awesome rates of turnout which can be found in states like Indiana, Iowa and Kentucky prior to 1900 indicate that this extremely high level of rural political involvement was not limited to Pennsylvania.26 As a recent study of Indiana politics demonstrates, the primarily rural "traditional vote" in that state was marked prior to 1900 by an overwhelming partisan stability as well.27

Perhaps, following the arguments of C. Wright Mills and others, we can regard this extraordinary change in rural voting behavior as a function of the conversion of a crackerbarrel society into a subordinate element in a larger mass society.²⁸ In any event, this rural movement toward relatively low and widely fluctuating levels of turnout may well be

²⁶ The estimated rates of turnout in presidential elections from 1876 through 1896, mean turnout in the period 1936–60 and estimated turnout in 1964 were as follows in these states:

State	1876	1880	1884	1888	1892	1896	1936-60	1964
							(Mean)	(Prelim.)
Indiana	94.6	94.4	92.2	93.3	89.0	95.1	75.0	73.3
Iowa	89.6	91.5	90.0	87.9	88.5	96.2	71.7	72.0
Kentucky	76.1	71.0	68.0	79.1	72.6	88.0	57.6	52.6

²⁷ V. O. Key, Jr., and Frank Munger, "Social Determinism and Electoral Decision," op. cit., pp. 282-88.

²⁸ C. Wright Mills, The Power Elite (New York, Oxford University Press, 1956), pp. 298-324. See also Arthur J. Vidich and Joseph Bensman, Small Town in Mass Society (New York, 1960), pp. 5-15, 202-27, 297-320.

²⁵ Ibid., pp. 402-40.

indicative of an emergent political alienation in such areas. It is suggestive that these movements have been accompanied generally in Pennsylvania as in states like West Virginia by a strongly positive Republican trend in these agrarian bailiwicks during the last thirty years.²⁹ The impression arises that the political realignment of the 1930s, which only imperfectly mobilized and integrated urban populations into the political system, had not even these limited positive effects in more isolated communities.

The behavior of the Ohio electorate down to about 1930 closely paralleled the patterns displayed in its neighbor states, Michigan and Pennsylvania. Since then a marked divergence has been manifest.

Two-party competition here was far less seriously affected by the sectional political alignment of 1896–1932 than in most other northern industrial states. Of the eighteen gubernatorial elections held in Ohio from 1895 to 1930, for example, Democrats won ten. But here as elsewhere are to be found the same patterns of decline in turnout and sharp increases in indices of voter peripherality after 1900. Indeed, while turnout bottomed out during the 1920s at a point considerably higher than in Michigan or Pennsylvania, it had also been considerably higher than in either of ²⁹ John H. Fenton, Politics in the Border States (New Orleans, Hauser Press, 1957), pp. 117-20.

TABLE VII. PATTERNS OF VOTER PARTICIPATION IN OHIO, 1857–1962: DECLINE WITHOUT RESURGENCE?

Period	Mean	turnout	Mean drop- off	Mean roll- off	Mean split- ticket voting
	Pres.	Off~ years
	(%)	(%)
1857-1879	89.0	78.4	9.7	0.6	0.5
1880-1903	92.2	80.5	11.2	0.8	0.6
1904–1918	80.4	71.2	9.2	2.5	3.3
1920-1930	62.4	45.8	24.1	7.9	9.9
1932-1946	69.9	49.1	27.2	7.6	6.5
1948-1962	66.5	53.3	19.0	8.2	11.1

them during the 19th century. Here too such variables as woman suffrage seem to have played a smaller role as causal agents—at least so far as they affected the growing tendencies toward peripherality among active voters—than is commonly supposed. Drop-off from presidential to off-year elections began to assume its modern shape in Ohio between 1898 and 1910. As Figure 2 shows, roll-off—an especially prominent feature in contemporary Ohio voting behavior—emerged in modern form in the election of 1914.

Ohio, unlike either Michigan or Pennsylvania, has demonstrated only an extremely limited resurgence since the realignment of the 1930s. Presidential-year voting turnout in the period 1948-60 actually declined from the mean level of 1932-44, and was not appreciably higher than it had been in the trough of the 1920s. If mean drop-off has declined somewhat in recent years, it still stands at a level twice as high as in any period before 1920. Moreover, roll-off and the rate of split-ticket voting have actually increased to unprecedented highs since 1948. By 1962 the latter ratio touched an all-time high of 21.3% (except for the threeparty election of 1924), suggesting that Ohio politics may be becoming an "every-man-forhimself" affair. This pattern of behavior stands in the sharpest possible contrast to 19thcentury norms. In that period turnout had reached substantially full proportions, drop-off was minimal and well over 99 per cent of the voters cast both complete ballots and straight party tickets—an achievement that may have been partly an artifact of the party ballots then in use.30 The political reintegration which the New Deal realignment brought in its wake elsewhere has scarcely become visible in Ohio.

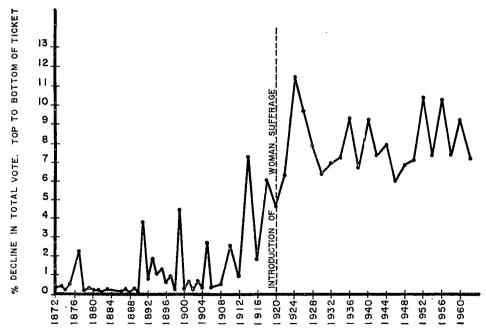

FIGURE 2. Increases in Roll-Off: The Case of Ohio, 1872-1962.

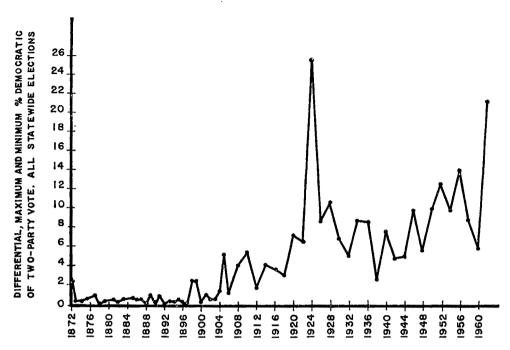

FIGURE 3. Increases in Split-Ticket Voting: The Case of Ohio, 1872-1962.

Two recent discussions of Ohio politics may shed some light upon these characteristics. Thomas A. Flinn, examining changes over the past century in the partisan alignments of Ohio counties, concludes that until the first decade of the 20th century the state had a set of political alignments based largely on sectionalism within Ohio-a product of the diverse regional backgrounds of its settlers and their descendants. This older political system broke down under the impact of industrialization and a national class-ethnic partisan realignment, but no new political order of similar coherence or partisan stability has yet emerged to take its place.31 Flinn's findings and the conclusions which Lee Benson has drawn from his study of New York voting behavior in the 1840s are remarkably similar.32 In this earlier voting universe the durability of partisan commitment and the extremely high levels of turnout appear to have had their roots in a cohesive and persistent set of positive and negative group referents. These, as Flinn notes, provided "no clear-cut class basis for statewide party following from the time of Jackson to that of Wilson."33

³⁰ However, Ohio's modern pattern of splitticket voting, formed several decades ago, seems to have been little (if at all) affected by the 1950 change from party-column to office-block ballot forms. See Figure 3.

John H. Fenton, discussing the 1962 gubernatorial campaign, carries the argument one step further.34 Basic to Ohio's social structure. he argues, is an unusually wide diffusion of its working-class population among a large number of middle-sized cities and even smaller towns. The weakness of the labor unions and the chaotic disorganization of the state Democratic Party seem to rest upon this diffusion. Ohio also lacks agencies which report on the activities of politicians from a working-class point of view, such as have been set up by the United Automobile Workers in Detroit or the United Mine Workers in Pennsylvania or West Virginia. The result of this is that to a much greater extent than in other industrial states, potential recruits for a cohesive and reasonably well-organized Democratic Party in Ohio live in an isolated, atomized social milieu. Consequently they tend to vote in a heavily personalist, issueless way, as the middle and upper classes do not. Such a state of affairs may provide clues not only for the relative failure of voter turnout to increase during the past generation, but for the persistent and growing indications of voter peripherality in Ohio's active electorate as well.

³¹ Thomas A. Flinn, "Continuity and Change in Ohio Politics," Journal of Politics, Vol. 24, pp. 521-44 (1962).

³² Lee Benson, The Concept of Jacksonian Democracy (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1961), pp. 123–207, 288–328.

33 Flinn, op. cit., p. 542.

The development of the voting universe in New York is more analogous to the situation in Ohio than in either Michigan or Pennsylvania. In New York, as in Ohio, two-party competition was not as dislocated by the 1896–1930 alignment as a hasty survey of the presidential-election percentages during that period might suggest. Democrats remained firmly in control of New York City, and this control helped them to capture the governorship eight out of eighteen times from 1896 through 1930. There were other parallels with Ohio as well, for here too this persistence of party competition did not prevent the normal post-1896 voting syndrome from appearing in New York. Nor has there been any pronounced resurgence in turnout levels or convincing declines in the other variables since the 1930s. Drop-off, rolloff, split-ticket voting and partisan swing are not only quite high in New York by 19thcentury standards, but have been twice as great as in neighboring Pennsylvania during the past decade. This relative failure of political reintegration is revealed not only by the data presented in Table VIII but—in much more dramatic fashion—by the rise and persistence of labor-oriented third parties which are centered in New York City and have enjoyed a balance-of-power position between the two major party establishments. The existence of the American Labor and Liberal Parties, as well as the continuing vitality of anti-Tammany "reform" factions, are vocal testimony to the failure of the old-line New York Democratic Party to adapt itself successfully to the political style and goals of a substantial portion of the urban electorate.

³⁴ John H. Fenton, "Ohio's Unpredictable Voters," Harper's Magazine, Vol. 225, pp. 61-65 (1962).

Curiously enough, examination of the data thus far presented raises some doubt that the direct primary has contributed quite as much to the erosion of party linkages as has been often supposed. There seems to be little doubt that it has indeed been a major eroding element in some of the states where it has taken root—especially in states with partially or ³⁵ This would seem to suggest a limitation on Key's findings, American State Politics, op. cit., pp. 169-96.

TABLE VIII. NEW YORK VOTING PATTERNS, 1834-1962: DECLINE WITHOUT RESURGENCE?

Period	Mean turnout (Pres. years)	Mean drop-off	Mean roll-off	Mean split-ticket voting	Mean partisan swing	Mean % D of 2-party vote
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1834-1858	84.8	3.3	1.6	1.2	1.7	50.9*
1860-1879	89.3	7.9	0.4	0.6	2.6	50.1
1880-1898	87.9	10.4	1.2	1.6	5.0	50.5
1900-1908	82.5	8.3	1.1	2.2	3.7	47.2
1910-1918	71.9	10.9	5.1	3.3	3.8	46.2
1920-1930	60.4	17.3	5.5	9.5	8.3	49.6
1932-1946	71.3	22.5	4.9	3.4	3.2	53.2†
1948-1962	67.8	20.6	3.6	6.5	5.8	47.3

^{*} Elections from 1854 to 1858 excluded because of major third-party vote.

[†] The American Labor Party, 1936-46, and the Liberal Party, 1944-62, are included in Democratic vote when their candidates and Democratic candidates were the same.

fully one-party systems where the primary has sapped the minority party's monopoly of opposition. But comparison of New York with our other states suggests the need of further concentrated work on this problem. After a brief flirtation with the direct primary between 1912 and 1921, New York resumed its place as one of the very few states relying on party conventions to select nominees for statewide offices, as it does to this day. Despite this fact, the post-1896 pattern of shrinkage in turnout and increases in our other indices of political dissociation was virtually the same in New York as elsewhere. To take a more recent example, New York's split-ticketvoting ratio was 16.1 per cent in 1962, compared with 21.3 in Ohio, 7.1 in Michigan and 6.8 per cent in Pennsylvania. The overall pattern of the data suggests that since 1932 the latter two states may have developed a more cohesive party politics and a more integrated voting universe with the direct primary than New York has without it.

If the data thus far indicate some link between the relative magnitude of voter non-participation and marginality with the cohesiveness of the local party system, even greater secular trends of the same sort should occur where one of the parties has continued to enjoy a perennially dominant position in state politics. Oklahoma, a border state with a modified one-party regime, tends to support such an assumption.³⁶ The relatively recent admission of this state to the union naturally precludes analysis of its pre-1896 voting behavior. Even so, it is quite clear that the further back one goes toward the date of admission, the closer one comes to an approximation to a 19th-century voting universe. In Oklahoma, curiously enough, the secular decline in turnout and increases in the other indices continued into the New Deal era itself, measured by the off-year elections when—as in a growing number of states³⁷—a full slate of statewide officers is elected. Since 1946 very little solid evidence of a substantial resurgence in turnout or of major declines in drop-off, roll-off or splitticket voting has appeared, but there is some evidence that the minority Republican Party is atrophying.

³⁶ This designation is given the state's political system in Oliver Benson, Harry Holloway, George Mauer, Joseph Pray and Wayne Young, Oklahoma Votes: 1907-1962 (Norman, Okla., Bureau of Government Research, University of Oklahoma, 1964), pp. 44-52. For an extensive discussion of the sectional basis of Oklahoma politics, see ibid., pp. 32-43, and V. O. Key, Jr., American State Politics, op. cit., pp. 220-22.

The magnitude of drop-off and roll-off has become relatively enormous in Oklahoma since the 1920s, with a very slight reduction in both during the 1950–1962 period. While turnout has correspondingly increased somewhat since its trough in the 1934–1946 period, at no time since 1914 have as many as one-half of the state's potential voters come to the polls in these locally decisive off-year elections. Still more impressive is the almost vertical increase in the proportion of uncontested elections since the end of World War II. The 1958 and 1962 elections, moreover, indicate that the trend toward decomposition in the Republican party organization and its linkage with its mass base ³⁷ In 1936, 34 states (71%) elected governors for either two- or four-year terms in presidential years, and the three-year term in New Jersey caused major state elections to coincide with every fourth presidential election. By 1964, only 25 of 50 states (50%) still held some of their gubernatorial elections in presidential years. Two of these, Florida and Michigan, are scheduled to begin off-year gubernatorial elections for four-year terms in 1966.

TABLE IX. VOTER PERIPHERALITY AND PARTY DECAY? OKLAHOMA, 1907-1962

Period	Mean turnout (Off-years)	Mean drop-off	Mean roll-off*	Mean split-ticket voting*	% of State and Congres sional elections uncon- tested by Republicans
					Per cent	Mean N†
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1907–1918	52.9	12.1	6.1	3.6	2.1	32
1922-1930	40.1	13.0	13.9	9.7	2.1	31
1934-1946	37.1	32.2	16.4	8.1	14.8	32
1950-1962	44.5	26.3	14.0	10.5	41.3	29

^{*} Roll-off and split-ticket voting are computed for contested elections only.

[†] Mean number of state and congressional races in each off-year election.

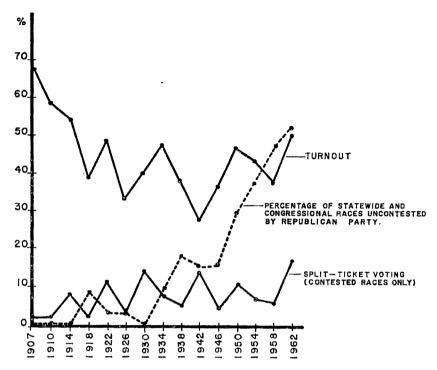

FIGURE 4. Patterns of Political Evolution: The Case of Oklahoma, 1907-1962.

is continuing. In 1958 the party virtually collapsed, its gubernatorial candidate winning only 21.3 per cent of the two-party vote. Four years later the Republican candidate won 55.5 per cent of the two-party vote. The resultant partisan swings of 34.2 per cent for this office and 22.0 for all contested statewide offices was the largest in the state's history and one of the largest on record anywhere. But while 1962 marked the first Republican gubernatorial victory in the state's history, it was also the first election in which the Republican Party yielded more than half of the statewide and congressional offices to its opposition without any contest at all. Even among contested offices, the Oklahoma electorate followed a national trend in 1962 by splitting its tickets at the unprecedented rate of 17.3 per cent.

As Key has suggested, the direct primary has almost certainly had cumulatively destructive effects on the cohesion of both parties in such modified one-party states as Oklahoma.³⁸ The rapidly spreading device of "insulating" state politics from national trends by holding the major state elections in off years has also probably played a significant role. Yet it seems more than likely that these are variables which ultimately depend for their effectiveness upon the nature of the local political culture and the socio-economic forces which underlie it. Pennsylvania, for example, also has a direct-primary. Since 1875, it has also insulated state from national politics by holding its major state elections in off years. Yet since the realignment of the 1930s, both parties have contested every statewide office in Pennsylvania as a matter of course. Indeed, only very infrequently have elections for seats in the state legislature gone by default to one of the parties, even in bailiwicks which it utterly dominates.³⁹

²⁸ American State Politics, op. cit., pp. 169-96.

These five statewide variations on our general theme suggest, as do the tentative explorations below the statewide level in Pennsylvania, that an extremely important factor in the recent evolution of the voting universe has been the extent to which the imperatives of the class-ethnic New Deal realignment have been relevant to the local social structure and political culture. In the absence of an effectively integrating set of state political organizations, issues and candidates around which a relatively intense polarization of voters can develop, politics is likely to have so little salience that very substantial portions of the potential electorate either exclude themselves altogether from the political system or enter it in an erratic and occasional way. As organized and articulated in political terms, the contest between "business" and "government" which has tended to be the linchpin of our national politics since the 1930s has obviously made no impression upon many in the lowest income strata of the urban population. It has also failed to demonstrate sustained organizing power in areas of rural poverty or among local political cultures which remain largely pre-industrial in outlook and social structure.

³⁹ In the period 1956-62 there have been 840 general-election contests for the Pennsylvania House of Representatives. Of these all but six, or 0.7%, have been contested by both major political parties. No Pennslvania state Senate seat has been uncontested during this period. Despite the 1962 Republican upsurge in Oklahoma, however, there were no contests between the parties in 11 of 22 Senate seats (50.0%) and in 73 of 120 House seats (60.9%). All the uncontested Senate seats and all but two of the uncontested House seats were won by Democrats.

IV

The conclusions which arise directly out of this survey of aggregate data and indices of participation seem clear enough. On both the national and state levels they point to the existence and eventual collapse of an earlier political universe in the United States—a universe in many ways so sharply different from the one we all take for granted today that many of our contemporary frames of analytical reference seem irrelevant or misleading in studying it. The late 19th-century voting universe was marked by a more complete and intensely party-oriented voting participation among the American electorate than ever before or since. Approximately two-thirds of the potential national electorate were then "core" voters, one-tenth fell into the peripheral category, and about one-quarter remained outside. In the four northern states examined in this survey the component of core elements in the potential electorate was even larger: about three-quarters core voters, one-tenth peripherals and about 15 per cent non-voters.

In other ways too this 19th-century system differed markedly from its successors. Class antagonisms as such appear to have had extremely low salience by comparison with today's voting behavior. Perhaps differentials in the level of formal education among various groups in the population contributed to differentials in 19th-century turnout as they clearly do now. But the unquestionably far lower general level of formal education in America during the last century did not preclude a much more intense and uniform mass political participation than any which has prevailed in recent decades. Though the evidence is still scanty, it strongly implies that the influence of rurality upon the intensity and uniformity of voting participation appears to have been precisely the opposite of what survey-research findings hold it to be today. This was essentially a pre-industrial democratic system, resting heavily upon a rural and smalltown base. Apparently, it was quite adequate, both in partisan organization and dissemination of political information, to the task of mobilizing voters on a scale which compares favorably with recent European levels of participation.

There is little doubt that the model of surge and decline discussed above casts significant light upon the behavior of today's American electorate as it responds to the stimuli of successive elections. But the model depends for its validity upon the demonstrated existence of very large numbers both of peripheral voters and of core voters whose attachment to party is relatively feeble. Since these were not pronounced characteristics of the 19th-century voting universe, it might be expected that abnormal increases in the percentage of the vote won by either party would be associated with very different kinds of movements in the electorate, and that such increases would be relatively unusual by present-day standards.

Even a cursory inspection of the partisan dimensions of voting behavior in the 19th century tends to confirm this expectation. Not only did the amplitude of partisan swing generally tend to be much smaller then than now, 40 but nationwide landslides of the 20th-century type were almost non-existent. 41 Moreover, when one party did win an unusually heavy majority, this increase was usually associated with a pronounced and one-sided decline in turnout. Comparison of the 1848 and 1852 elections in Georgia and of the October gubernatorial and November presidential elections of 1872 in Pennsylvania, for example, makes it clear that the "landslides" won by one of the presidential contenders in 1852 and 1872 were the direct consequence of mass abstentions by voters who normally supported the other party. Under 19th-century conditions, marked as they were by substantially full mobilization of the eligible electorate, the only play in the system which could provide extraordinary majorities had to come from a reversal of the modern pattern of surge and decline—a depression in turnout which was overwhelmingly confined to adherents of one of the parties. 43

⁴⁰ Mean national partisan swings in presidential elections since 1872 have been as follows: 1872–92, 2.3%; 1896–1916, 5.0%; 1920–32, 10.3%; 1936–64, 5.4%.

⁴¹ If a presidential landslide is arbitrarily defined as a contest in which the winning candidate received 55% or more of the two-party vote, only the election of 1872 would qualify among the 16 presidential elections held from 1836 to 1896. Of 17 presidential elections held from 1900 through 1964, at least eight were landslide elections by this definition, and a ninth—the 1924 election, in which the Republican candidate received 54.3% and the Democratic candidate 29.0% of a three-party total—could plausibly be included.

This earlier political order, as we have seen, was eroded away very rapidly after 1900. Turnout fell precipitately from 19th-century levels even before the advent of woman suffrage, and even in areas where immigrant elements in the electorates were almost nonexistent. As turnout declined, a larger and larger component of the still-active electorate moved from a core to a peripheral position, and the hold of the parties over their mass base appreciably deteriorated.

⁴² The total vote in Georgia declined from 92,203 in 1848 to 62,333 in 1852. Estimated turnout declined from about 88% to about 55% of the eligible electorate, while the Democratic share of the two-party vote increased from 48.5% in 1848 to 64.8% in 1852. The pattern of participation in the Pennsylvania gubernatorial and presidential elections of 1872 is also revealing:

Raw Vote	Governor, Oct. 1872	President, Nov. 1872	Absolute Decline
Total	671,147	562,276	-108,871
Democratic	317,760	213,027	-104,733
Republican	353.387	349,249	- 4.138

Estimated turnout in October was 82.0%, in November 68.6%. The Democratic percentage of the two-party vote was 47.3% in October and 37.9% in November.

43 The only apparent exception to this generalization in the 19th century was the election of 1840. But this was the first election in which substantially full mobilization of the eligible electorate occurred. The rate of increase in the total vote from 1836 to 1860 was 60.0%, the largest in American history. Estimated turnout increased from about 58% in 1836 to about 80% in 1840. This election, with its relatively onesided mobilization of hitherto apolitical elements in the potential electorate, not unnaturally bears some resemblance to the elections of the 1950s. But the increase in the Whig share of the twoparty vote from 49.2% in 1836 to only 53.0% in 1840 suggests that that surge was considerably smaller than those of the 1950s.

This revolutionary contraction in the size and diffusion in the shape of the voting universe was almost certainly the fruit of the heavily sectional party realignment which was inaugurated in 1896. This "system of 1896," as Schattschneider calls it,44 led to the destruction of party competition throughout much of the United States, and thus paved the way for the rise of the direct primary. It also gave immense impetus to the strains of anti-partisan and anti-majoritarian theory and practice which have always been significant elements in the American political tradition. By the decade of the 1920s this new regime and business control over public policy in this country were consolidated. During that decade hardly more than one-third of the eligible adults were still core voters. Another one-sixth were peripheral voters and fully one-half remained outside the active voting universe altogether. It is difficult to avoid the impression that while all the forms of political democracy were more or less scrupulously preserved, the functional result of the "system of 1896" was the conversion of a fairly democratic regime into a rather broadly based oligarchy.

The present shape and size of the American voting universe are, of course, largely the product of the 1928-1936 political realignment. Survey-research findings most closely approximate political reality as they relate to this next broad phase of American political evolution. But the characteristics of the present voting universe suggest rather forcefully that the New Deal realignment has been both incomplete and transitional. At present, about 44 per cent of the national electorate are core voters, another 16 or so are peripheral, and about 40 per cent are still outside the political system altogether. By 19th-century standards, indices of voter peripherality stand at very high levels. Party organizations remain at best only indifferently successful at mobilizing a stable, predictable mass base of support.

The data which have been presented here, though they constitute only a small fraction of the materials which must eventually be examined, tend by and large to support Schattschneider's functional thesis of American party politics. We still need to know a great deal more than we do about the specific linkages between party and voter in the 19th century.

⁴⁴ The Semi-Sovereign People, op. cit., p. 81.

⁴⁶ Ibid., esp. pp. 78-113. See also his "United States: The Functional Approach to Party Government," in Sigmund Neumann, ed., Modern Political Parties (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1956), pp. 194-215.

Systematic research remains also to be done on the causes and effects of the great post-1896 transition in American political behavior. Even so, it seems useful to propose an hypothesis of transition in extension of Schattschneider's argument.

The 19th-century American political system, for its day, was incomparably the most thoroughly democratized of any in the world. The development of vigorous party competition extended from individual localities to the nation itself. It involved the invention of the first organizational machinery—the caucus, the convention and the widely disseminated party press-which was designed to deal with large numbers of citizens rather than with semiaristocratic parliamentary cliques. Sooner than the British, and at a time when Prussia protected its elites through its three-class electoral system, when each new change of regime in France brought with it a change in the size of the electorate and the nature of le pays légal, and when the basis of representation in Sweden was still the estate, Americans had elaborated not only the machinery and media of mass politics but a franchise which remarkably closely approached universal suffrage. Like the larger political culture of which it was an integral part, this system rested upon both broad consensual acceptance of middle-class social norms as ground rules and majoritarian settlement (in "critical" elections from time to time), once and for all, of deeply divisive substantive issues on which neither consensus nor further postponement of a showdown was possible. Within the limits so imposed it was apparently capable of coherent and decisive action. It especially permitted the explicit formulation of sectional issues and—though admittedly at the price of civil war-arrived at a clear-cut decision as to which of two incompatible sectional modes of social and economic organization was henceforth to prevail.

But after several decades of intensive industrialization a new dilemma of power, in many respects as grave as that which had eventuated in civil war, moved toward the stage of overt crisis. Prior to the closing years of the century the middle-class character of the political culture and the party system, coupled with the afterglow of the civil-war trauma, had permitted the penetration and control of the cadres of both major parties by the heavily concentrated power of our industrializing elites. But this control was inherently unstable, for if and when the social dislocations produced by the industrial revolution should in turn produce a grassroots counterrevolution, the party whose clienteles were more vulnerable to the appeals of the counterrevolutionaries might be captured by

The take-off phase of industrialization has been a brutal and exploitative process everywhere, whether managed by capitalists or commissars.46 A vital functional political need during this phase is to provide adequate insulation of the industrializing elites from mass pressures, and to prevent their displacement by a coalition of those who are damaged by the processes of capital accumulation. This problem was effectively resolved in the Soviet Union under Lenin and Stalin by vesting a totalitarian monopoly of political power in the hands of Communist industrializing elites. In recent years developing nations have tended to rely upon less coercive devices such as non-totalitarian single-party systems or personalist dictatorship to meet that need, among others. The 19th-century European elites were provided a good deal of insulation by the persistence of feudal patterns of social deference and especially by the restriction of the right to vote to the middle and upper classes.

But in the United States the institutions of mass democratic politics and universal suffrage uniquely came into being before the onset of fullscale industrialization. The struggle for democracy in Europe was explicitly linked from the outset with the struggle for universal suffrage. The eventual success of this movement permitted the development in relatively sequential fashion of the forms of party organization which Duverger has described in detail.47 In the United States—ostensibly at least—the struggle for democracy had already been won, and remarkably painlessly, by the mid-19th century. In consequence, the American industrializing elites were, and felt themselves to be, uniquely vulnerable to an anti-industrialist assault which could be carried out peacefully and in the absence of effective legal or customary sanctions by a citizenry possessing at least two generations' experience with political democracy.

This crisis of vulnerability reached its peak in the 1890s. Two major elements in the population bore the brunt of the exceptionally severe deprivations felt during this depression decade:

⁴⁶ Clark Kerr, John T. Dunlop, Frederick S. Harbison and Charles A. Myers, Industrialism and Industrial Man (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1960), pp. 47–76, 98–126, 193, 233. Walt W. Rostow, The Stages of Economic Growth (Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1960), pp. 17–58.

⁴⁷ Maurice Duverger, Political Parties (New York, 2d. ed., 1959), pp. 1-60.

the smaller cash-crop farmers of the Southern and Western "colonial" regions and the ethnically fragmented urban working class. The cash-crop farmers, typically overextended and undercapitalized, had undergone a thirtyyears' decline in the prices for their commodities in the face of intense international competition. With the onset of depression in 1893, what had been acute discomfort for them became disaster. The workers, already cruelly exploited in many instances during this "take-off" phase of large-scale industrialization, were also devastated by the worst depression the country had thus far known. Characteristically, the farmers resorted to political organization while the workers sporadically resorted to often bloody strikes. The industrializers and their intellectual and legal spokesmen were acutely conscious that these two profoundly alienated groups might coalesce. Their alarm was apparently given quite tangible form when the agrarian insurgents captured control of the Democratic Party in 1896.

But the results of that great referendum revealed that the conservatives' fears and the anti-industrialists' hopes of putting together a winning coalition on a Jacksonian base were alike groundless. Not only did urban labor not flock to William Jennings Bryan, it repudiated the Democratic Party on an unprecedented scale throughout the industrialized Northeast. The intensity and permanence of this urban realignment was paralleled by the Democrats' failure to make significant inroads into Republican strength in the more diversified and depression-resistant farm areas east of the Missouri River, and by their nearly total collapse in rural New England. The Democratic-Populist effort to create a coalition of the dispossessed created instead the most enduringly sectional political alignment in American history-an alignment which eventually separated the Southern and Western agrarians and transformed the most industrially advanced region of the country into a bulwark of industrialist Republicanism.

This realignment brought victory beyond expectation to those who had sought to find some way of insulating American elites from mass pressures without formally disrupting the pre-existing democratic-pluralist political structure, without violence and without conspiracy. Of the factors involved in this victory three stand out as of particular importance. (1) The depression of 1893 began and deepened during a Democratic administration. Of course there is no way of ascertaining directly what part of the decisive minority which shifted its allegiance to the Republican Party reacted viscerally to the then incumbent party and failed to perceive that Cleveland and Bryan were diametrically opposed on the central policy issues of the day. But contemporary survey findings would tend to suggest that such a component in a realigning electorate might not be small. In this context it is especially worth noting that the process of profound break with traditional voting patterns began in the fall of 1893, not in 1896. In a number of major states like Ohio and Pennsylvania the voting pattern of 1896 bears far more resemblance to those of 1893-1895 than the latter did to pre-1893 voting patterns. Assuming that such visceral responses to the Democrats as the "party of depression" did play a major role in the realignment, it would follow that the strong economic upswing after 1897 would tend to strengthen this identification and its cognate. the identification of the Republicans as the "party of prosperity."

(2) The Democratic platform and campaign were heavily weighted toward the interests and needs of an essentially rural and semi-colonial clientele. Considerably narrowed in its programmatic base from the farmer-labor Populist platform of 1892, the Democratic Party focussed most of its campaign upon monetary inflation as a means of redressing the economic balance. Bryan's viewpoint was essentially that of the smallholder who wished to give the term "businessman" a broader definition than the Easterners meant by it, and of an agrarian whose remarks about the relative importance of farms and cities bespoke his profound misunderstanding of the revolution of his time. Silver mine owners and depressed cash-crop farmers could greet the prospect of inflation with enthusiasm, but it meant much less to adequately capitalized and diversified farmers in the Northeast, and less than nothing to the depression-ridden wage-earners in that region's shops, mines and factories. Bryan's appeal at base was essentially Jacksonian—a call for a return to the simpler and more virtuous economic and political arrangements which he identified with that bygone era. Such nostalgia could evoke a positive response among the native-stock rural elements whose political style and economic expectations had been shaped in the far-away past. But it could hardly seem a realistic political choice for the ethnically pluralist urban populations, large numbers of whom found such nostalgia meaningless since it related to nothing in their past or current experience. Programmatically, at least, these urbanites were presented with a two-way choice only one part of which seemed at all functionally related to the realities of an emergent industrial society. With the Democrats actually cast in the role of reactionaries despite the apparent radicalism of their platform and leader, and with no socialist alternative even thinkable in the context of the American political culture of the 1890s, the Republican Party alone retained some relevance to the urban setting. In this context, its massive triumph there was a foregone conclusion.

(3) An extremely important aspect of any political realignment is the unusually intense mobilization of negative-reference-group sentiments during the course of the campaign, 1896 was typical in this respect. Profound antagonisms in culture and political style between the cosmopolitan, immigrant, wet, largely non-Protestant components of American urban populations and the parochial, dry, Anglo-Saxon Protestant inhabitants of rural areas can be traced back at least to the 1840s. Bryan was virtually the archetype of the latter culture, and it would have been surprising had he not been the target of intense ethnocultural hostility from those who identified with the former. He could hardly have appeared as other than an alien to those who heard him in New York in 1896, or to those who booed him off the stage at the Democratic Convention—also in New York -in 1924. Moreover, his remarks about the Northeast as "the enemy's country"— anticipating Senator Goldwater's views about that region in 1964—could only intensify a broadly sectional hostility to his candidacy and deepen the impression that he was attacking not only the Northeast's industrializing elites but the Northeast itself. Both in 1896 and 1964 this region gave every visible evidence of replying in kind.

As Schattschneider has perceptively observed, the "system of 1896" was admirably suited to its primary function. One of its major working parts was a judiciary which proceeded first to manufacture the needed constitutional restraints on democratic political action—a development presaged by such decisions as the Minnesota railroad rate case of 1890⁴⁸ and the income tax cases of 1894–1895⁴⁹—and then to apply these restraints against certain sensitive categories of national and state economic legislation.⁵⁰ Another of the new system's basic components was the control which the sectional alignment itself gave to the Republican Party. and through it the corporate business community, over the scope and direction of national public policy. Democracy was not only placed in judicial leading-strings, it was effectively placed out of commission—at least so far as two-party competition was concerned-in more than half of the states. Yet it was one of the greatest, if unacknowledged, contributions of the "system of 1896" that democratic forms, procedures and traditions continued to survive. 51 Confronted with a narrowed scope of effective democratic options, an increasingly large proportion of the eligible adult population either left, failed to enter or-as was the case with Southern Negroes after the completion of the 1890-1904 disfranchisement movement in the Old Confederacy—was systematically excluded from the American voting universe. The results of this on the exercise of the franchise have already been examined here in some detail. It was during this 1896-1932 era that the basic characteristics associated with today's mass electorate were formed.

These characteristics, as we have seen, have already far outlived the 1896 alignment itself. There seems to be no convincing evidence that they are being progressively liquidated at the present time. If the re-emergence of a competitive party politics and its at least partial orientation toward the broader needs of an urban, industrialized society were welcome fruits of the New Deal revolution, that revolution has apparently exhausted most of its potential for stimulating turnout or party-oriented voting in America. The present state of affairs, to be sure, is not without its defenders. The civicsminded have tended to argue that the visible drift away from party-oriented voting among a growing minority of voters is a sign of increasing maturity in the electorate.52 Others have argued that mediocre rates of turnout in the United States, paralleled by the normally low salience of issues in our political campaigns, are indicative of a "politics of happiness." It is ⁴⁸ Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418 (1890).

⁴⁹ Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S. 429 (1895); (rehearing) 158 U. S. 601 (1895).

⁶⁰ The literature on this process of judicial concept-formulation from its roots in the 1870s through its formal penetration into the structure of constitutional law in the 1890s is extremely voluminous. Two especially enlightening accounts are: Benjamin Twiss, Lawyers and the Constitution (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1942), and Arnold M. Paul, Conservative Crises and the Rule of Law (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1960).

⁵¹ Paul, ibid., pp. 131–58.

⁵² See, among many other examples, Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, Vol. 22 (May 1, 1964), p. 801.

⁵³ Heinz Eulau, "The Politics of Happiness," further contended that any sudden injection of large numbers of poorly socialized adults into the active voting universe could constitute a danger to the Republic.⁵⁴

But there is another side to this coin. The ultimate democratic purpose of issue-formulation in a campaign is to give the people at large the power to choose their and their agents' options. Moreover, so far as is known, the blunt alternative to party government is the concentration of political power, locally or nationally, in the hands of those who already possess concentrated economic power.55 If no adequate substitute for party as a means for mobilizing non-elite influence on the governing process has yet been discovered, the obvious growth of "image" and "personality" voting in recent decades should be a matter of some concern to those who would like to see a more complete restoration of the democratic process in the United States.

Moreover, recent studies—such as Murray Levin's examinations of the attitudes of the Boston and Massachusetts electorate—reveal that such phenomena as widespread ticket splitting may be associated quite readily with pervasive and remarkably intense feelings of political alienation.⁵⁸ Convinced that both party organizations are hopelessly corrupt and out of reach of popular control, a minority which is large enough to hold the balance of power between Republicans and Democrats tends rather consistently to vote for the lesser, or lesser-known, of two evils. It takes a mordant variety of humor to find a kind of emergent voter maturity in this alienation. For Levin's data are difficult to square with the facile optimism underlying the civics approach to independent voting. So, for that matter, are the conclusions of survey research about the behavior of many so-called "independent" voters.⁵⁷

Findings such as these seem little more comforting to the proponents of the "politics of happiness" thesis. Granted the proposition that most people who have been immersed from birth in a given political system are apt to be unaware of alternatives whose explicit formulation that system inhibits, it is of course difficult to ascertain whether their issueless and apathetic political style is an outward sign of "real" happiness. We can surmise, however, that the kind of political alienation which Levin describes is incompatible with political happiness, whether real or fancied. A great many American voters, it would seem, are quite intelligent enough to perceive the deep contradiction which exists between the ideals of rhetorical democracy as preached in school and on the stump, and the actual day-to-day reality as that reality intrudes on his own milieu. Alienation arises from perception of that contradiction, and from the consequent feelings of individual political futility arising when the voter confronts an organization of politics which seems unable to produce minimally gratifying results. The concentration of socially deprived characteristics among the more than forty million adult Americans who today are altogether outside the voting universe suggests active alienation-or its passive equivalent, political apathy—on a scale quite unknown anywhere else in the Western world. Unless it is assumed as a kind of universal law that problems of existence which can be organized in political terms must fade out below a certain socio-economic level, this state of affairs is not inevitable. And if it is not inevitable, one may infer that the political system itself is responsible for its continued existence.

Yet such an assumption of fade-out is clearly untenable in view of what is known about patterns of voting participation in other democratic systems. Nor need it be assumed that substantial and rapid increases in American voting participation would necessarily, or even probably, involve the emergence of totalitarian mass movements. The possibility of such movements is a constant danger, to be sure, in any polity containing so high a proportion of apolitical elements in its potential electorate. But it would be unwise to respond to this possibility by merely expressing the comfortable hope that the apoliticals will remain apolitical, and by

Antioch Review, Vol. 16, pp. 259-64 (1956); Seymour M. Lipset, Political Man (New York, 1960), pp. 179-219.

⁵⁴ Ibid., pp. 216-19; Herbert Tingsten, Political Behavior, op. cit., pp. 225-26.

⁵⁵ V. O. Key, Jr., Southern Politics (New York, 1949), pp. 526-28; E. E. Schattschneider, The Semi-Sovereign People, op. cit., pp. 114-28.

⁵⁶ Murray B. Levin, The Alienated Voter (New York, 1960), pp. 58-75, and his The Compleat Politician (Indianapolis, 1962), esp. pp. 133-78. While one may hope that Boston and Massachusetts are extreme case studies in the pathology of democratic politics in the United States, it appears improbable that the pattern of conflict between the individual's expectations and reality is entirely unique to the Bay State.

⁵⁷ Angus Campbell et al., The American Voter, op. cit., pp. 143-45.

doing nothing to engage them in the system in a timely and orderly way. It is much more to the point to seek a way, if one can be found, to integrate the apolitical half of the American electorate into the political system before crisis arises. Such integration need not be out of the question. The United States, after all, enjoyed intense mass political involvement without totalitarian movements during the last part of the 19th century, as do other Western democracies today.

No integration of the apoliticals can be carried out without a price to be paid. Underlying the failure of political organizations more advanced than the 19th-century middle-class cadre party to develop in this country has been the deeper failure of any except middle-class social and political values to achieve full legitimacy in the American political culture. It may not now be possible for our polity to make so great a leap as to admit non-middle-class values 58 The line of reasoning developed in this article-especially that part of it which deals with the possible development of political alienation in the United States-seems not entirely consistent with the findings of Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1963), pp. 402-69, 472-505. Of course there is no question that relatively high levels of individual satisfaction with political institutions and acceptance of democratic norms may exist in a political system with abnormally low rates of actual voting participation, just as extremely high turnout may-as in Italybe associated with intense and activist modes of political alienation. At the same time, the gap between American norms and the actual political activity of American individuals does exist, as Almond and Verba point out on pp. 479-87. This may represent the afterglow of a Lockean value consensus in an inappropriate socio-economic setting, but in a polity quite lacking in the disruptive discontinuities of historical development which have occurred during this century in Germany, Italy and Mexico. Or it may represent something much more positive.

to political legitimacy and thus provide the preconditions for a more coherent and responsible mode of party organization. But such a leap may have to be made if full mobilization of the apolitical elements is to be achieved without the simultaneous emergence of manipulative radicalism of the left or the right. The heart of our contemporary political dilemma appears to lie in the conflict between this emergent need and the ideological individualism which continues so deeply to pervade our political culture. Yet the present situation perpetuates a standing danger that the half of the American electorate which is now more or less entirely outside the universe of active politics may someday be mobilized in substantial degree by totalitarian or quasi-totalitarian appeals. As the late President Kennedy seemed to intimate in his executive order establishing the Commission on Registration and Voting Participation, it also raises some questions about the legitimacy of the regime itself.59

⁵⁹ "Whereas less than sixty-five percent of the United States population of voting age cast ballots for Presidential electors in 1960; and

"Whereas popular participation in Government through elections is essential to a democratic form of Government; and

"Whereas the causes of nonvoting are not fully understood and more effective corrective action will be possible on the basis of a better understanding of the causes of the failure of many citizens to register and vote . . . " (emphasis supplied) The full text of the executive order is in Report, pp. 63-64. Compare with Schattschneider's comment in The Semi-Sovereign People, op. cit., p. 112: "A greatly expanded popular base of political participation is the essential condition for public support of the government. This is the modern problem of democratic government. The price of support is participation. The choice is between participation and propaganda, between democratic and dictatorial ways of changing consent into support, because consent is no longer enough." (Author's emphasis)

POLITICAL SCIENCE AND PREVISION*

BERTRAND DE JOUVENEL SEDEIS—FUTURIBLES, Paris

The political scientist is a teacher of public men in the making, and an adviser of public men in activity; "public men," that is, men who are taught, invited or assumed to feel some responsibility for the exercise of political power; "political power," that is, concentrated means of affecting the future.

Ι

Obviously we can not affect the past, or that present moment which is now passing away, but only what is not yet: the future alone is sensitive to our actions, voluntary if aimed at a pictured outcome, rational if apt to cause it, prudently conceived if we take into account circumstances outside our control (known to decision theorists as "states of nature"), and the conflicting moves of others (known in game theory as opponents' play). A result placed in the future, conditions intervening in the future, need we say more to stress that decisions are taken "with an eye to the future," in other terms, with foresight?

Thucydides puts this utterance in the mouth of Archidamos, addressing the Assembly of Lacaedemonians on the eve of the Peloponnesian War: "For we that must be thought the causers of all events, good or bad, have reason also to take some leisure in part to foresee them."

This can serve as our text: the greatest of hist rians warns us that we are the authors of our fate. It is levity in an individual to make a decision fraught with serious consequences to himself without forethought; but such levity turns to guilt in the case of the magistrate or citizen participating in a public decision the consequences of which will fall upon a great many. The political scientist then must recognize in foresight a moral obligation, to be felt and taught.

But saying that public decisions ought to be taken with foresight is a precept: how can we follow this precept unless we develop the corresponding skill? Knowing that foresight is required, the political scientist must therefore seek to develop that skill in himself, and in his

- * A paper presented at the Congress of the International Political Science Association, Geneva, Switzerland, September 1964.
- ¹ Thucydides I, 83. From Hobbes' version, republished by the University of Michigan Press (Ann Arbor, 1959), vol. I, p. 48.

pupils, and offer it to statesmen he has to advise. Foresight is an expertise required in the political scientist: that is my first point.²

Need I stress that expertise does not mean infallibility? A political scientist will often misread the course of events or miscalculate the consequences of a decision, but the frequency of his successful forecasts should be higher than that of the average politician or lay citizen; this is not a great deal to ask, and whoever denies that it can be achieved, thereby denies any practical value to political research. The moral philosopher who deems it his function to teach discrimination of what is best in an absolute sense, does not need to prove himself a good forecaster. But it is otherwise for one who presents himself as a student of behavior. Such a study must be called idle or unsuccessful unless it results in an increasing ability to state what is to be expected.

There is in every science a well known relationship between factual investigation and marshalling hypotheses, meant to account for the facts and assumed to have some predictive worth. It is true that there can be no certain knowledge but of the past: indeed the past is the realm of the "true or false," with which the future contrasts as the realm of "possibles," which are neither true nor false. Therefore only probable statements can be uttered regarding the future, but it is solely through such utterances that the sciences are of practical utility. As I shall stress, it pertains to the nature of the object that such statements should be least reliable in matters political. But if they are not to be attempted, the term "science" should be rejected: nor can we then think of the discipline as conferring positive boons upon the body politic.

 Π

Since probable statements concerning the future are an outcome of factual investigations, they can, of course, concern only the realm of those phenomena which the student investigates. It is a verbal convention of our time that of two once synonymous terms, one of Latin, the other of Greek origin, both designations.

² For a more extended discussion of the general topic see my L'Art de la Conjecture (Editions du Rocher, Monaco, 1964); eight of the SEDEIS studies in conjecture have been collected, in English, in Futuribles (Droz, Geneva, 1963).

nating originally the whole of human relations, the word "social" has been retained to mean the whole, while the usage of the word "political" has been narrowed down to a part of these relations. In the meantime, however, the functions of government have grown more embracing: therefrom a non-congruence between the field of studies of the political scientist, and the field of concerns of the political magistrate. It follows that the kind of foresight which the political scientist may provide refers to but part of the phenomena the political magistrate has to deal with. This immediately suggests that it falls to other departments of the social sciences to provide complementary varieties of foresight, arising from their specific investigations, and relevant to some kinds of public decisions. It is indeed the practice of governments to consult experts other than political scientists, for the preparation of decisions concerning what Cournot very aptly called "the social economy." When it is future "traffic in towns" which forms the subject-matter of the decision, forecasts regarding the automobile population, the location of industry, the grouping of people, etc., are required of specialists quite other than political scientists.

This need not be labored and forms my second point. Public decisions require a variety of foresights other than that of the political scientist. We may well think of these diverse foresights being brought into play as each occasion demands. But there is a problem here, of no mean importance.

III

I shall introduce this problem by means of a concrete instance: the quotations here are from the Survey of International Affairs for the year 1930.3

Dr. Brüning became Chancellor of the German Reich in March 1930: "the Budget problem was by far the most untractable of all the problems with which Germany had to deal. . . up to the time of writing [the Summer of 1931] it was only under the Chancellorship of Dr. Brüning that measures were taken of such a character as to promise real improvement. . . . The cumulative deficit was . . . the prospective deficit was. . . . Action was therefore urgent. Dr. Brüning met his immediate necessities by an emergency decree promulgated in July 1930, and, as the situation was not righted by this measure, it was succeeded by two further emergency decrees issued respectively in December 1930 and in June 1931." While drastically cutting down expenditure, these decrees also raised taxes. "Such were the draconian measures to which Dr. Brüning was obliged to resort. Their effectiveness in practice remained to be seen: their value as proof of the changed attitude of responsible German statesmen in the matter of public finance was beyond question or cavil."

³ Royal Institute of International Affairs (London, 1931), pp. 531-6.

Let me add that, on taking office, Dr. Brüning found three million unemployed: after two years of "draconian measures," he had six million; that he found 12 Nazis sitting in the Reichstag: after six months in office he saw their number raised to 107 (Sept. 30 elections), and soon after he left office (May 1932) the Nazis obtained 230 seats (July 31, 1932).

Now let us imagine a political scientist addressing Dr. Brüning in April 1930: "Ignorant as I am of public finance. I must assume that the measures which have been recommended to you by financial experts are the best for balancing the budget (which in fact they were not); ignorant as I am of economics, I cannot tell you what measures would effectively reduce unemployment: these are matters for different specialists. But it is my office to tell you that unemployment is a more serious evil than budgetary deficit, constitutes a more pressing problem, and that you should give it priority. Further it is my office to warn you that you will put the country in great political peril if you fail to address yourself to the major problem."

There is indeed a very heavy bill to be paid for the misinvestment of public attention, which is a very common fault of politicians. Consider the sad case of Dr. Brüning, an earnest and honorable man, who conscientiously and courageously addressed himself to what he deemed the major problem: but his ranking was quite mistaken, so that his virtuous efforts led to political disaster. This brings out the utility of properly ranking problems. Here I am not thinking of a lasting hierarchy in terms of values (however important that is) but of a here-and-now order of priorities, in terms of the costs of letting various problems fester and come to a crisis.

Politicians having proved remarkably poor judges of such priorities, a better judge is needed to redress their assessments: and this is a role for the political scientist, who to this end must operate as a "generalist," not only as a "specialist" among others. No matter that he is competent to deal only with certain problems, he must also be competent to appraise them all. And this role of "generalist" is logically linked with his role as specialist:

3

because any social problem which is left inadequately attended will ultimately land in that court of passions and conflict which is his particular concern. He can be compared to a suzerain of the social field, who runs but a small part of the realm, but must oversee the whole, as any trouble arising in any other part must seep into his own. He is competent to request attention for a problem, and demand that experts competent therein be called. More than that, he is competent to state what questions they should answer, because he must be aware of interrelations between problems.

Another instance will serve to stress that aspect. Left alone after World War I to maintain the new map of Europe which Woodrow Wilson and Lloyd George had taken so large a part in drawing, France formed alliances with four Eastern Europe states, of which two, Poland and Czechoslovakia, were immediate neighbors of Germany. These alliances committed France to military intervention should Germany attack Poland or Czechoslovakia. Military intervention in what form? A mere glance at the map made it clear that effective intervention could occur in no other form than the invasion of Germany. Therefore these alliances required that the French army be shaped as an offensive instrument: exactly the reverse was explicitly decided, and a purely defensive apparatus was set up. So it was quite easy to foresee a good ten years in advance what happened in 1939: while practically the whole of the German forces was thrown against Poland, the French army sat uselessly on its defensive positions, having been designed for nothing else.4 Not only was it easy to foresee but it was foretold behind closed doors by certain military leaders, and openly by some young civilians without authority. Now is this not again a clear case for the political scientist? Was it not proper for him to point out the discrepancy between the diplomatic policy and the military policy?5

And not well designed even for that, as commandant Souchon noted in 1929, uttering this prophecy: "our future army will be dissociated, pushed around and cut to pieces before having struck the least blow." In Feu l'Armée Française, published without signature (Paris, 1929).

⁵ One might elaborate upon the consequences of this inconsistency. First, the discovery of the impotence of the French army was a major cause of the French government's attitude at the time of Munich; but as they could not believe this impotence, the Soviet leaders quite understandably interpreted our shameful desertion of Czechoslovakia as inspired by a machiavellian

I have chosen two instances of fatal mistakes, of which I can bear witness that they were perceptible at the time. Mistakes, one of which proceeded from a wrong priority of policies, the other from an incoherence of policies. Is it not the political scientist's role to take a view sufficiently panoramic to call attention to such blunders? That is my third point. The political scientist is competent to appreciate priorities and consistency in policies the details of which he is incompetent to judge.

IV

The foregoing statement means that the political scientist has to keep track of current and impending changes in non-political fields. and for this purpose to achieve a continual exchange of forward looking views with experts in these other fields. To take a simple instance, suppose that the balance-of-payments specialist foresees the necessity of slowing up the rate of wage increases. Some economists feel that this cannot be achieved otherwise than by a "squeeze," diminishing, as they put it, the pressure on the labor market—in more common parlance, maintaining a certain percentage of unemployment. Others, shocked by this prospect, reject that method and advocate an "incomes policy." Now the political scientist, informed of these views, foresees from the one procedure unpleasant political consequences; while the second poses a problem of political feasibility. Therefore such views are very germane to his concerns: indeed it may be the case that one policy seems to him inadvisable and the other impracticable, which may cause him to ask the economists for some other way: would a flexible exchange rate achieve the object?

As every change assumed to occur has repercussions in many fields, as every change devised has a variety of implications and calls for a variety of adjustments, it is clear that in a society characterized by rapid transformation, there is need for what I have called elsewhere a Surmising Forum where anticipations are desire to orient Germany toward an attack upon Russia, which was thought of by no responsible Frenchman. Second, as the Poles trusted the French army—as I found while attending them in the 1939 campaign—they thought it quite unnecessary to agree in the previous Anglo-Franco-Russian negotiations to the entry of Russian troops upon their soil, which the Soviets quite understandably made a condition of their military support. And this increased the Soviet suspicion of our good faith, which may have determined the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact.

confronted, and where incoherences discerned indicate measures to be taken, or alternatives to be considered. I do not propose to restate here the case for the Surmising Forum; all I need is to make the fourth point: the political scientist must seek to coordinate anticipations.

This attempt to overlook the whole field is useful for the long term, but it also meets a pressing need of the political scientist.

V

This overall watching allows him to detect sources of future political perturbances. The political scientist should be a detector of trouble to come: that is my fifth point.

Trouble is indeed his business. Who would deny that he is at his most useful if he warns of war or advises how to avoid it? That the foresight of the foreign policy expert revolves around the possibility of war, will be readily granted; but not so easily that the domestic equivalent of war must play the same central role in the speculations of the domestic expert. The contrast is understandable enough: the international system is thought of as a system of antagonism, the national system as one of cooperation. The very accent of words changes as we move from one system to the other. If we speak of a system of Powers (international), we use the capital to denote independent actors by their factual resources, their means; while if we speak of the system of powers (national), the powers we now refer to are rights to be exercised functionally in the service of the national whole.

"Home affairs," as the British tellingly put it, are supposed to be altogether quieter than foreign affairs. It is assumed that the institutions set up to take care of home affairs are and will remain adequate to cope with any problems arising: there is a political division whenever people strongly disagree as to what should be done, but this division is thought of as overcome when the matter has been settled by an established procedure of decision (such as a parliamentary "division").

The political scientist should be keenly aware that things are not so simple, but his function as teacher of institutions leads him to convey and therefore to adopt an optimistic vision. His first and foremost function is to address future citizens and potential magistrates, and fit them for participation in the management of public affairs, a management organized according to a certain system. This system must be described and explained to them, so that they shall feel "at home" in it, in the two senses of knowledge and acceptance; and it is surely of great importance to a republic that its citizens should have confidence in and respect: for the form of its government. Political institutions, inherently precarious, are made solid and stable by belief, which must therefore be fostered; but, in the process of so doing, it is easy to become overconfident. It improves mores to think that what may not be done can not be done, but it deteriorates prudence. It is good that actions should run between the banks of established procedures, but it is dangerous that the imagination of the expert should be confined between these banks. To cite an admittedly extreme and caricatural instance of such confinement, it was apparently believed by those who called Hitler to the Chancellorship at the end of January 1933, that he would find himself quite paralyzed in this position by article 58 of the Weimar constitution, which stated that all government decisions should be taken by a majority of the members of the cabinet, wherein he was placed in a minority, having only two ministers of his own party! As I warned, this is an extreme and caricatural instance; it is not suggested that political scientists are prone to such mistakes. But it is true, surely, that, not only as teachers of good civic behavior, but also as law-abiding and reasonable men, they are not inclined to lend any great likelihood to strong departures from regular courses.

They are not prone to foresee dramatic events. Surely the United States is the country far the best endowed in political scientists—indeed possibly as many as nineteen out of twenty political scientists operating in the world today are Americans. It would be interesting to know what proportion of these political scientists foresaw—and how early—the sensational rise of McCarthy and his no less sensational collapse. Or again, what proportion foresaw the capture of the Republican Party by the Goldwater group.

This is not meant as a criticism: first, it is in any realm difficult to be a good forecaster; second, the difficulty is at its greatest in politics; last, and chiefly, political scientists have not, in general, deemed it their function to forecast, and when so doing they are apt to stress that they do so as citizens, not as scientists. The only purpose of my remark, therefore, is to note a psychological disposition, which I think would still be operative if political scientists were willing to adopt the view here advanced, that they should regard it as pertaining to their function to forecast, and should indeed regard such forecasting as a practical end-product of their science. Under such conditions, they would still, I think, be reluctant to foresee perturbation, disturbance, trouble. So, if this foresight of trouble is, as I think, the most important, a psychological effort will be required to overcome the tendency to project a relatively smooth course.⁶

That tendency is to be found also in other fields of social science: everywhere prevision resorts to projection of current trends and to reproduction of periodic changes. Economic prevision, to whatever degree of complexity it may be worked out, ultimately rests upon the assumption that certain structural relations are relatively invariant over time. It is natural enough that prevision should assume continuity and recurrence. Therefore it takes an effort to predict discontinuity, a break—in short, trouble.

VI

Political foresight requires study of political behavior: this sixth point is self-evident; every science studies the behavior of those objects about which it proposes to make statements of general and lasting validity, and therefore capable of being used for prediction, or anticipation. Nor is it necessary to advocate study of political behavior: this is presently the most esteemed compartment of political science. Nonetheless something is to be said on this point.

"Behavioral studies," as they are called, are apt to deal with ordinary behavior: the word "ordinary" denotes at the same time, and very properly, what is not uncommon, and what fits into an order. Now times of trouble are characterized by extraordinary conducts: the behavior of the "force publique," when the independence of the Congo was proclaimed, came as a great surprise; no better, and no less surprising, was the behavior of the "gardesfrançaises" on the Fourteenth of July, 1789. Quite recently, some meticulous and respected German bureaucrats have been found out, to the shocked surprise of their colleagues, as the authors of most abominable actions in the days of the concentration camps: but for these historic events they might have lived irreproachable lives and no one would ever have imagined them capable of what they have done. Of course, saying that people would not have been criminal but for the occasion is not, as it is all too commonly taken to be, an excuse: the actions are their own and their features then made manifest were potentially there before. But it is a warning that the behavior we presently observe is not the only behavior of which the subjects observed are capable.

⁶ In his masterly treatment of economic forecasting, H. Theil, Economic Forecasts and Policy (Amsterdam, 1961), Pt. V, notes that changes to come are generally underestimated. If our mind tends to underestimate shifts in a continuous course, breaks in this continuity are even less acceptable to it.

⁷ See the ranking of the different compartments of political science given by Albert Somit and Joseph Tanenhaus, "Trends in American Political Science," this Review, Vol. 57 (Dec. 1963), pp. 933, 941. The authors asked political scientists in what compartment of the science the most significant work was being done and "behavioralism" came an easy first.

The instability of behavior is a great difficulty for political prevision. We know of course that a man's behavior is variable but in no realm is it as variable as in the political. And we get no inkling of behavior under "heated" conditions if we merely observe people under "cold" conditions, when they vote this way or that, attend meetings or not, move resolutions or raise their hands. Under heating, we observe that the same people are not then behaving in the same way; and further we must note that it is not the same people who then claim most of our attention. At all times, if people are ranked according to their degree of political activity, we find that such activity is high only in a limited number and falls off very rapidly as we consider greater numbers. "Heated" conditions are apt to increase the total surface included under such a curve, but they also substitute, for the most active minority under cold conditions, a minority made up of quite different persons.

Whatever the equality of political rights, so small is the share of total political activity performed by the great majority and so great that performed by a small minority, that the total hue and character of national political activity reflects that of the active minority. If that leading company then changes, the whole character of politics changes. And though the heat which changes behavior in the same people does pass away, the change in the people who impart their character to the total system may endure.

The great merit of an effective two-party system is that no man can rise to political importance otherwise than by a slow progress within one or the other party, a progress in the course of which he finds himself subject to screening by monitors at different stages of his rise. It is a major contribution to stability that the two parties conspire to persuade the public that between themselves they exhaust the possibilities. But the political scientist must be aware that, however salutary this belief, it does not correspond to reality: there are people floating in outer darkness who can, if the occasion arises, irrupt upon the scene, casting out both of the small armies that have been engaged in a civilized duel. The heads carried away in the baskets attending the French guillotine represented the whole spectrum of opinions preceding the Revolution (also those which appeared in its course); the same has been true in the concentration camps of Soviet Russia and of Nazi Germany.

All this pertains to the process of "heating." To this, political scientists have given, if I may say so, quite inadequate attention; they have been very prone to regard this as inevitable when it has happened and unthinkable where it has not. That where it has happened it had sufficient cause, is of course true, but uninteresting; what is useful is to pin-point, if we can, what would have made a difference. It is now out of fashion for historians to stop their relation of events when they come to what seems to them a cross-roads, and to note that, from a different decision or action at this point, a different course of things might have followed. It may be that such exercises are unbecoming to historical science; they are surely in the highest degree suitable to political science.

Our science stands in great need of a systematic study bearing upon the occurrence of these "changes of state" here called "heating." Unless I am much mistaken, such a factual study would not confirm the breezy theory that they occur when necessary to allow the coming forth of a predetermined new order—that is, if and only if they serve a providential purpose; strange indeed is the unquestioned providentialism of agnostic philosophers of history.

I have noted that studies of behavior tend to disregard changes in behavior which attend "heating," and that too little attention is paid in them to what leads up to such "heating." Another remark is now called for, relative to normal conditions.

Political phenomena have by nature a tempo different from that of social phenomena. Let us take, for instance, people's attitudes toward the consumption of alcohol. Let us suppose that over time the proportion of teetotalers increases from a small minority to a majority. As a social phenomenon this can be continuous and carried to any degree without a break. But now consider teetotalism as politically militant. Then, as soon as the teetotalers have reached a majority, they will forbid drinking to the minority: a discontinuity, a break, and an occasion of "heating." Thus the diffusion of a political attitude gives rise to distinct events, as it does not in the case of a social attitude.

But the above illustration assumes a perfect democracy, where decisions are made by a popular majority; such is not the practice of any modern state. Indeed, the present trend is to entrust the major decisions to a single person: thus in the United States, while the Congress decides on the President's proposal how much financial aid should be given to South Vietnam, a military operation on North Vietnam can be decided upon by the President alone.

It follows therefrom that the political scientist, operating as "predictor," must pay to individual character an attention which is not called for in the case of the social scientist. A social phenomenon is the outcome of a very great number of individual decisions, an aggregate which reflects individual attitudes in proportion to their frequency. Social prediction can therefore safely neglect attitudes of a small minority—thus, for instance, Amish rejection of the motor-car is insignificant for estimates of future automobile sales-and the social predictor need not (as, indeed, he cannot) pay attention to idiosyncrasies. If interested in estimating the number of divorces next year, he will wave aside as irrelevant a tidbit of information regarding John's disposition to quarrel with Mary. It is not so in politics: an attitude relatively infrequent, such as rabid antisemitism, acquires momentous importance if it pertains to a man who rises to the highest place. More generally, in the absence of any such extreme peculiarity, every little trait of the Prince's individuality acquires great importance, due to the "multiplier" of great power.

This has ever been recognized. We have centuries-old records of political forecasts in the form of diplomatic dispatches. While the ambassador owes his public character to his being the empowered spokesman of his sovereign, as soon as permanent missions abroad were established, they functioned mainly as listening posts, whence information was sent home, concerning political developments occurring or impending in the country of residence. These are the earliest "political surveys," of enormous value for the historian in that each describes a state of affairs, but also a source as yet untapped for the study of political surmising. The message of the political reporter is the more valuable the more it foretells; therefore, while conveying accomplished facts, the writer must also use them as raw material to convey a "transformed product," his surmise. The abundant diplomatic sources in existence are still to be used for the analysis of the surmising procedures they reveal. But it needs only the barest familiarity with them to remark the place occupied in such dispatches by the description of personal characteristics: the character of the Prince, those of his ministers and favorites, those also of possible successors.

What a change the simplest substitution of persons can make. Consider Frederick the Great in January 1762: he writes to the marquis d'Argens: "If Fortune continues to pursue me, doubtless I shall sink," and suggests that unless a turn for the better occurs, he may next month, take Cato's course: "Cato, and the little glass tube I have." But as he writes the turn has already occurred: Czarina Elisabeth has died, her nephew Peter has become Czar; a fanatical admirer of Frederick, he immediately relieves the pressure upon him by recalling the Russian troops. Peter's bare six months on the throne suffice to turn the tide.

Can we confidently say that personalities matter less in our own day? Why then did a shudder run through the West when the false news of Mr. Khrushchev's death was flashed? Even in the case of a liberal democracy, did we not find the very same men who interpret politics as a working-out of impersonal forces, expressing the utmost alarm at the prospect of a Goldwater presidency?

Personalities always matter in politics, and never have they counted for more than in our century, which has, at one and the same time, tended to collectivize the individual and to individualize collective power. From this has come, as it seems to me, an improved predictability in matters pertaining to the social economy, and a deteriorated predictability in matters specifically political. Far be it from me to exaggerate the freedom of action of the man who sits at the top of a nation. He is always "riding a tiger," but the way he rides it makes a very great difference indeed.

From these remarks it seems to follow that the methods which serve us well in the prevision of social change, which is continuous and insensitive to idiosyncrasies, cannot be suitable for political phenomena, which have different properties.

\mathbf{v} II

It is a great ambition of modern social science to study phenomena without "insight"; an understandable ambition, this being the way which has led the human mind to phenomenal success in the physical sciences, which serve as the model and basis of all others. Standing in the way of such progress was the "pathetic fallacy," our apparently innate propensity to lend quasi-human personalities to objects. It is not helpful toward the control of floods to regard them as fits of anger in the river genius, who should therefore be appeased by gifts, perhaps human sacrifices. Our knowledge and mastery of nature have progressed as we have ceased to regard natural objects as whimsical persons, who behave according to their mood, and have come instead to regard them as "things" which behave as they are made to by circumstances. Containing as it does a most vigorous repudiation of animism, a depersonalization of objects, the Bible can be said to have helped open the way for Western science.

We find the eviction of "genii" historically associated with a procedure of inquiry which seeks to ascertain how the object behaves under varying conditions, and to derive from observed regularities assertions of predictive value. The procedure has its utmost practical value when it leads us to foretell with certainty how the object will behave under certain future conditions as they occur, and therefore also, what conditions we must create in order to make it behave as suits us. These great practical rewards of the method are fully attained when the object studied is a "thing" which must perforce "behave" in perfectly passive compliance to the conditions wherein it is placed. This being so, it is understandable that the method was extended to animals in consequence of Descartes's assertion concerning their "machine" character, and that Condillac and La Mettrie should have, by their views of man, encouraged its extension to him.

Whatever historical role the inclination to regard man as also a "mere thing" may have played in the extension to him of this method of inquiry, it is surely a mistake to regard the validity of the method, applied to his case, as dependent upon this ontological assumption. In fact the very first finding from such an application is that men do not display that uniformity of behavior which we expect from "things." Thus an application, scandalous to some who regard it as debasing man to the status of "mere thing," in fact demonstrates that he is not such. But the method is not, in consequence, valueless: though we find in a number of men different conducts in the same circumstances, if we note the distribution of such conducts and its mode, and if we can find that over time this distribution and its mode change but little or shift but slowly, we have therefrom a predictive tool, as stressed by Quételet.¹⁰

⁸ It is here beside the point that "the death of the Great Pan" or depersonalization of natural objects, has implied a great loss of reverence and sensitive enjoyment of them.

⁹ This mistake gives rise to heated quarrels between those who, being revolted that man should be thought of as a "mere thing," therefore needlessly repudiate the scientific method and those who, addicted to this method, therefore needlessly champion the "mere thing" notion. Justification or condemnation of the method does not rest thereupon but depends upon its efficiency. Here I would like to digress to say that the true danger of a scientific approach, but shared with any other form of intellectual outlook, is that excessive enthusiasm for general statements, however useful, should impair our appreciation of the particular and unique.

Now a few words about "outwardness." The scientific method in respect to things has substituted for interpretations of their "genius" the examination of their performances. We attempt no sympathetic "understanding" of the thing's spirit but proceed by watchful "overstanding." In the metaphysical squabbles of social science, there is much argument for and against such "outwardness."

I can see no harm in observing a nation as one would an ant-heap; this just happens to be a hampering method. Were it the best, ethnologists who go out to investigate so-called "primitive peoples" should be strictly forbidden to learn the language of their hosts; for conversation conveys some insight into people's feelings, intentions, values. Thereby you lose the outwardness which some deem so essential.

Outwardness has indeed been used as a literary artifice by eighteenth-century wits, foremost among them Voltaire, to ridicule social behavior. If you look at conducts from an angle which annuls the values inspiring them and thus robs them of meaning, it is easy enough to make them appear nonsensical; thereby also they are made unpredictable. This is a clear warning not to press outwardness too far. The social scientist has to set the tangible behaviors he observes within the framework of prevailing beliefs and interests. An economist may dislike motor cars, he may, as a joke in the common room, describe weekends as an aimless buzzing of urbanites out of the hive, arising from a periodic perturbation of the regular courses therein: his forecasts must nonetheless rest upon men's known desires for cars. No forecasting is possible unless data about what people do are complemented with data about their feelings, wants, aspirations, judgments. These data may figure but implicitly in a model, which then assumes either their invariance over time, or that their changes will follow a certain ascertainable course.

But it is quite otherwise for the political forecaster: he has to focus upon feelings, attitudes, judgments, because these, in his field, undergo swift and vast changes, with major factual consequences. How soon, how very soon it was after Hitler's last stand in Berlin, that I heard an ADA group in New York acclaim Mayor Reuther's formula: "Berlin is the outpost and symbol of freedom!" What a reversal of significance! Did it occur because the national interest of the United States demanded it? I have no patience with those who explain the emotional attitudes of actual people by the rational interest of collective entities: it is rather the other way round. Is it credible that the anti-Soviet revulsion of the United States soon after the end of hostilities was inspired by the national interest? If so, surely, in the last weeks of the war, the American troops should have been urged to gain as much ground in Germany and in Czechoslovakia as was possible, and to keep it. But no, the policy of containment came as an aftermath of a change in the affective valuation of Stalinist Russia.

History would be different-indeed there would be very much less of History as commonly understood—if policies corresponded to a relatively stable conception of the national interest. For instance, consider Britain's "war or peace" relations with Hitler over a period of less than five years. March 1936: Hitler's troops march into the Rhineland, demilitarized under the Locarno treaty, to which Britain is a party; all that Britain needs to do is to give backing and encouragement to the wavering French, who then can easily reoccupy the Rhineland, thus dealing to Hitler's prestige a possibly decisive blow. The British choose the opposite attitude. Summer of 1938: after the Anschluss, Czechoslovakia is threatened, the French make ready to march on its behalf, the British government invents the Runciman mission which leads to Munich, "peace in our time." The strategic situation is now much deteriorated, but the takeover of Czechoslovakia, which was made helpless by amputation, scandalizes British opinion and Britain waxes militant. No matter that the hoped-for alliance with Russia falls through, it is war; the now reluctant French follow unwillingly, and, as it proves, ineffectively. October 1940: France has been utterly overcome; the only Power left standing in Europe, the Soviet Union, is presently Germany's ally; Hitler offers peace to England, at no cost to her—let her attend to her Empire, which Hitler admires. The offer is not even considered; by now the hearts of the British have been so turned against Hitler that, regardless of relative resources and chances, he must be fought, come what may.

¹⁰ A. Quételet, Sur l'homme et le développement de ses facultés ou essai de physique sociale, 2 vols. (Paris, 1835).

The terrible ordeal was unnecessary; such mistakes will not be repeated: nonsense! Of course they are repeated all the time-though let us hope with no such dramatic consequences-and naturally so: because, at any moment, "the present situation" is appreciated in terms of the present feelings and evaluations. It is not like a chessboard problem which different onlookers can be unequally competent to solve but which they must all see alike; it is a different situation according to the onlooker, not the same to Baldwin or to Chamberlain as to Churchill. Nor are the policies of a nation the outcome of one man's reading of the situation but of an aggregate of visions. Doubtless the United States could have prevented the Munich capitulation, and Roosevelt saw it should be prevented; but if he expressed it as a private opinion instead of throwing the weight of his nation in the balance, it is presumably because he felt that the nation's mood did not allow him to do so.

What appears as a glaring mistake in a game of strategy may be a natural outcome of a psychological context which "gaming" ignores, and vice versa. The last war would have been won by Germany and Japan had the latter Power attacked Russia instead of making the capital blunder of outright aggression against the United States fleet. It was so obviously good strategy for Japan to make sure that Russia was counted out, and so obviously a bad move to bring in the United States, that the unravelling of the psychological motives for such conduct should be very instructive.

There is a political context to strategic situations; situations which are much the same in strategic terms are very different in political terms. An instance is afforded by very recent news. Taking it as a datum that, throughout the period considered, the United States has been interested in precluding the spread of communism in the Indo-Chinese peninsula, we note that, a little more than ten years ago, American aircraft carriers were in the Gulf of Tonkin, available to the American President for an air-strike. In the spring of 1954, great results could be hoped for from an air-strike at Dien-Bien-Phu. Results then likely (not of course certain) were: the French army saved, Giap's army (then offering a concentrated target) crippled, the State of Vietnam (not then partitioned) relieved for a time from communist pressure and communist infiltration in Laos and Cambodia precluded. President Eisenhower decided against making the air-strike which might have had such consequences; an air-strike was made in early August 1964 when it held out no such promises. In terms of strategy, it cannot be explained that it was done in 1964 rather than 1954. It has to be explained in political terms; not of course in terms of formal politics, for an airstrike in 1954 would have been made at the request of a formally sovereign state on its own territory against those who were formally rebels, while the air-strike of 1964 was made against the territory of a sovereign state. The explanation is not then to be sought in "politics" understood as "public law." The explanation is to be sought rather in terms of a far different emotional context.

Explanation and a fortiori prediction are impossible in politics without understanding of affective attitudes. "The springs of politics are the passionate movements of the human heart," says Cournot.11 Tragedy is meant to display the swiftness and amplitude of such movements, a lesson which statesmen forget to their undoing. It so happens that France in early 1848 had for Prime Minister an eminent political scientist, indeed the restorer of our Academy of Political and Moral Sciences, Guizot. A rare feature in France, the parliamentary opposition acknowledged a leader, Thiers, who was a distinguished historian. Neither of these men had an inkling of the revolution which was to sweep away the regime in a few days of February. What is more, neither of them took seriously the massing of a crowd on February 22d-a crowd which indeed, according to students of those fateful days, showed as yet no signs of violent excitement.

Up to the last moment these eminent men did not foresee the revolution, and had they been told that within a few years Louis Bonaparte would be Emperor, they would have taken it as a joke. Now let me add that the history Thiers had written was that of the Revolution and Empire. He was familiar with such events as were to be repeated, but he must have felt, "It can't happen now"—another version of "It can't happen here." This instance stresses that the political forecaster must guess how people will come to feel (my seventh point) and also that this is no easy thing.

¹¹ A. Cournot, Traité de l'enchaînement des idées fondamentales dans les sciences et dans l'histoire, para. 460, p. 525 of the 1911 edition.

To this concern the study of public opinion corresponds, but it may be asked whether adequate attention has been paid to the dynamic of moods.

$\mathbf{v}\mathbf{III}$

Consider "the body politic" as a vast army "making its way" in a literal sense; this raises a variety of problems, to be foreseen by a variety of social scouts, the political scientist a coordinator, wary of mix-ups which would generate excitement and anger. Such is the rough sketch of the picture which has been presented in the preceding sections. This so emphasizes policy expertise as to be possibly shocking, relatively to the established idea that the political scientist is an expert on institutions. But far from there being a conflict between the two conceptions, on the contrary the role of the political scientist as detector of problems breathes life into his role as student and designer of institutions.

Institutions are of instrumental value, good in so far as they efficiently cope with problems arising, and operate toward the achievement of social goods. If the machinery of government proves such that no timely action can be taken to ward off some visibly impending harm, a vice in the institutions can be presumed. Of course I do not mean that any bad policy is proof of bad institutions; none are so excellent as to exclude the possibility of foolish decisions. What I do mean is that frequency of failure to cope or achieve is a judgment upon what is in essence a coping-and-achieving machinery and nothing else.

Now this is precisely where institutional expertise is needed. Left to itself, public opinion will be apt to reject the whole system, throwing away what is good therein-and thus, for instance, turn from a "government by discussion" regime which is not working well, to a more efficient tyranny. It is for the institutions expert to indicate the more modest adjustments required. But, as a forecaster on how people will come to feel (point seven), he must be aware also that by the time public opinion has been aroused against the inefficiency of the system, its disposition will be to repudiate it altogether, so that minor adjustments, however well they might serve, will not be acceptable to it. These therefore must be made before the public has been aroused; and this is no easy thing, as the public does not then demand it and the wielders of the government machinery bask in complacency.

Indeed the political scientist should foresee the deficiencies of the institutional system not only before these have excited popular discontent and brought it into discredit, but even before these deficiencies have been made manifest by faulty performance. For this purpose he will rely to a considerable degree upon the assumed stability of social trends, ask himself how their estimated course will alter the demands made upon the "coping machinery," seek to assess its adequacy to such different demands, and thereupon look for the adjustments which can improve such adequacy.

To be sure, social change by itself has a direct impact upon the institutional machinery and tends to weaken or atrophy some institutions, to strengthen or hypertrophy others. Such direct impact may happen to work toward an improvement of the machinery: but it would be most unwise to take this as a postulate. Quite the reverse can be the case.

I do not propose to develop here my eighth point: the political scientist should foretell the adjustments suitable to improve the adequacy of the institutional system to cope with changing circumstances. Of the different points made here, this is the only one which is sure to be accepted by all; therefore the case for it need not be argued. If it comes here as the last point, it is because the institutional preoccupation is made most meaningful when derived from more immediate and concrete preoccupations. The future inflow of public business, its increasing volume, its new varieties, must be vividly pictured by the expert: only thus can he recommend adjustments in the public machinery, adequate to a liberal democratic handling of heavier and shifting burdens.

Any maladjustment enhances attitudes which amount to regarding political and private freedoms as conflicting with progress. It is for rulers who alone are far seeing, to lead their people in the way of progress, untrammelled in their decisions by lengthy discussions, and riding rough-shod over individuals: such is the immanent doctrine sugar-coated in different ideological colors. This nefarious doctrine is rendered plausible thanks to the fact that the ancient bulwarks of liberty are often used as defensive fortifications by the very people who would in previous times have opposed their erection, and the character of such defenders provides an argument for the flattening out of these bulwarks. It seems a most urgent preoccupation for people committed to political forecasting to see what can be done for the progress of liberty in a materially progressing society, the features of which could not be imagined in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

POLITICS AND PSEUDOPOLITICS: A CRITICAL EVALUATION OF SOME BEHAVIORAL LITERATURE

CHRISTIAN BAY*
Stanford University

A curious state of affairs has developed within the academic discipline that bravely calls itself Political Science—the discipline that in a much-quoted phrase has been called "a device, invented by university teachers, for avoiding that dangerous subject politics, without achieving science." A growing and now indeed a predominant proportion of leading American political scientists, the behavioralists, have become determined to achieve science. Yet in the process many of them remain open to the charge of strenuously avoiding that dangerous subject, politics.

Consider a recent essay on the behavioral persuasion in politics. The conclusion stresses the purpose of political inquiry: "The Goal is Man." There is to be a commitment to some humane purpose after all. But what kind of man? A democratic kind of man, a just man, or perhaps a power-seeking man? The answer follows: "These are philosophical questions better left to the philosophers."2 Behavioral students of politics should, as scientists, engage in no value judgments concerning the kind of man or society their researches ought to serve. This is the general inference to be drawn, not only from this particular essay, but from much of the contemporary literature on political behavior.

As Heinz Eulau, the author, points out in the same essay, the area of behavioral political science includes a particular domain called policy science, in which empirical inquiry is geared to explicitly stated goal formulations; within this domain "political science, as all science, should be put in the service of whatever goals men pursue in politics." Any goals? Not quite; in this context Eulau points out that the choice of what goals to serve is a matter of personal ethics, and incidentally reminds us that behavioral research can be readily utilized also for purposes conflicting with the original ones. "In this sense, at least, science is value-free. I don't think the scientist can escape this dilemma of having his work misused without giving up his calling." And the author concludes with these words: "Only if he places himself at the service of those whose values he disagrees with does he commit intellectual treason."

* I am indebted to my friend Herbert H. Hyman, who has been generous with advice for improvements on an earlier draft. It should not be inferred that he is in agreement with opinions expressed in this paper, or that he might not once again find much to criticize in it. At a later stage I have received helpful suggestions also from Sidney Verba and Andrew Hacker.

¹ Alfred Cobban, "The Decline of Political Theory," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 48 (1953), p. 335.

² Heinz Eulau, The Behavioral Persuasion in Politics (New York, 1963), p. 133 and pp. 133-37.

In these pages I am concerned with sins less serious than intellectual treason; perhaps intellectual indolence is a more accurate term. My argument will be that much of the current work on political behavior generally fails to articulate its very real value biases, and that the political impact of this supposedly neutral literature is generally conservative and in a special sense anti-political. In conclusion I propose to develop a perspective on political inquiry that would relate it more meaningfully to problems of human needs and values; in that context I will suggest some important but neglected problems lending themselves to empirical research.

Î am not about to argue that our investments in political behavior research have been too large; on the contrary, we need much more work in this area. But my principal concern is to argue for a more pressing need: an intellectually more defensible and a politically more responsible theoretical framework for guiding and interpreting our empirical work; a theory that would give more meaning to our research, even at the expense of reducing its conceptual and operational neatness.

T

It is necessary first to clarify some basic terms in which my concern is stated.

The prevailing concepts of "politics" in the literature under consideration are surely an important source of the difficulty. Definitions gravitate toward the most conspicuous facts and shy away from all reference to more normladen and less easily measurable aspects of social life. For the sake of brevity, let us consider only the most recent formulation by one of the unquestionably most influential political scientists of the present generation: "A political system is any persistent pattern of human relationships that involves, to a significant extent, power, rule, or authority." My objection is not primarily to the extension of the reference of "political" to private as well as to public associations, and even to clans and families as well; rather, it is to the absence of any reference to a public purpose. Research work on power, rule, or authority can contribute significantly to our political knowlege, even if the data come from contexts not ordinarily thought of as political. But its significance must be gauged in relation to some criteria; until these are articulated and justified, or at any rate chosen, we can only intuit whether our researches on, say, power behavior are tackling significant or trivial issues.

"Politics" should refer to power, but the term should also refer to some conception of human welfare or the public good. The achievement of Plato and Aristotle is in part a result of their starting out by asking some of the right questions; above all, what is politics for? Their limitations were logical and methodological or, if you prefer, conceptual: they had not learned to distinguish between verifiable descriptive statements, statements of normative positions, and (empirically empty and normatively neutral) analytical statements, including definitions and other equations.

Once these distinctions had been developed, a process that began with David Hume, it became easy and fashionable to expose fallacies in Plato and Aristotle; but instead of attacking the ancient and perennial problems of politics with our new and sharper conceptual tools, recent generations of political scientists appear to have sought safety in seeking to exclude the normative realm altogether from the scope of their scientific inquiry. "Politics" has consequently been defined in a simple institutional or behavioral manner, unrelated to normative conceptions of any sort. Ironically, most modern behavioralists are back with the Greeks again in their assumption that political inquiry can be pursued by much the same methods as natural science inquiry; they have adjusted to David Hume and the modern logical positivists by the neat device of definitions that limit the scope of their inquiry to observable behavior.

This surely is a stance of premature closure. The alternative proposed here is to insist on the need for a political theory that deals with basic human needs as well as overt desires and other observable aspects of behavior. The task of improving concepts and methods toward establishing a stricter science of politics is formidable; but let us avoid establishing an orthodoxy that would have the whole profession contract for a fainthearted purchase of rigor at the price of excluding much of the meat and spirit of politics.

As a modest and fragmentary beginning toward a more appropriate theory, let me suggest a distinction between "politics" and ✓ 'pseudopolitics.' I would define as political all activity aimed at improving or protecting conditions for the satisfaction of human needs and demands in a given society or community. according to some universalistic scheme of priorities, implicit or explicit. Pseudopolitical in this paper refers to activity that resembles political activity but is exclusively concerned with either the alleviation of personal neuroses or with promoting private or private interestgroup advantage, deterred by no articulate or disinterested conception of what would be just or fair to other groups.

Pseudopolitics is the counterfeit of politics. The relative prevalence of the counterfeit variety of democratic politics presumably depends on many ascertainable factors, including a society's degree of commercialization and the degree of socio-economic mobility (or the size of the stakes in the competitive struggle); on the other hand, the proportion of pseudopolitical activity would correlate negatively with the amount of psychological security, the amount of social welfare-type security, and the amount of political education effectively taught.

For present purposes it is not necessary to demonstrate in detail how the distinction between politics in the narrower sense and pseudopolitics can be made operationally useful. Suffice it to say that only a saint is pure from the taint of pseudopolitics and that hardly any pseudopolitician would be wholly without concern for the public welfare; mixed motives, in proportions varying from one person to the next and from one situation to the next, pervade all actions. It is a difficult but surely not an impossible task to develop indices for assessing the relative prevalence of political versus pseudopolitical incentives in voters and other political actors; the only essential prerequisite is to decide that the task must be tackled.

✓ 4 "Priorities" here refers to norms for guiding the choice among conflicting needs and demands. Political ideals and visions of the good life enter in here, and would do so even if our knowledge of needs and of human nature were as extensive as our knowledge of demands and of social determinants of "public opinion."

³ Robert Dahl, Modern Political Analysis (Englewood Cliffs, 1963), p. 6.

Without attempting to make this kind of distinction, untidy as it may at first appear to many a behavioralist, I dont see how we can begin to approach a condition of tidiness in our discussions of the political significance of research, or of the political responsibility of political scientists. But what should we mean by these two highly eulogistic terms; might we not be better advised to shun them altogether? The bulk of this paper seeks to demonstrate some sorry consequences of the latter course. We cannot avoid the realm of normative issues unless we really wish to disclaim all political significance for our work. Probably very few in our profession would adopt this position.

Although explicit cognizance of normative assumptions in his theoretical frame of reference is likely to entail some inconvenience for the researcher, he will by no means be blocked from continuing much of his present work. It should be clear that all competent research on pseudopolitical behavior illuminates political behavior as well, as the relative presence of one signals the relative absence of the other. In the real world the two aspects of behavior always coexist. My quarrel is not with research on pseudopolitics per se, but with the way findings are usually reported and interpreted. I object to the tendency in much of the behavior literature to deal with the pseudopolitical aspects of behavior almost exclusively, and to imply that the prevalence of pseudopolitics is and always will be the natural or even the desirable state of affairs in a democracy. Consequently, I object also to the absence of interest in research that could reveal some of the determinants of the relative prevalence of pseudopolitical behavior on our political arena, by which we might learn more about how we may advance toward a more strictly politically consciousness, in the sense of concern for the public interest and for the future, in our population.

Now, how should we define political significance and political responsibility? In my conceptual world the two terms are tied together; I would judge degrees of political significance of research studies in the same way that I would judge degrees of political responsibility of political scientists (in the role of theorist-researcher, as distinct from the role of citizen). A research report is politically significant to the extent that it contributes to the kinds of knowledge most needed by politically responsible political scientists.

"Political responsibility" in this paper refers to the extent to which the social scientist observes the canons of rationality on two levels, which I shall call formal and substantive.^{4A} Formal rationality refers to the familiar notion of clarifying the objectives first and then paying heed to the best available knowledge when seeking ways and means to implement them. Competent behavioral research in political science is highly rational in this formal sense; this is what the extensive work in theory and methodology is for.

The lack of political responsibility that I ascribe to much political behavior literature relates to the other level of rationality, the substantive level, which involves articulate attention to questions of fundamental commitment in social and political research literature. Problems of human welfare (including justice, liberty, security, etc.), the objects of political research and of politics, can be adequately studied, and dealt with, only if their oughtside is investigated as carefully as their is-side. Ought-side inquiry must pertain to wants (or desires or, if insisted on, demands) as well as needs. Political communication must be analysed carefully so that we may learn what aspects of wants are most salient and could be frustrated only at the cost of resentment. alienation, or upheaval. Yet, only analysis of data on wants in terms of a theory of needs will permit us to evaluate wants and aspects of wants with a view to longer-term consequences of their relative satisfaction or frustration.

There will be more to say about wants and needs in the concluding section. At this point it should only be added that the student of politics, once he has adopted a conception of human needs, should proceed from there to make explicit his inferences about political objectives and his choice of commitments with the utmost care. If this kind of inquiry is neglected, as it certainly is in the political science curricula in most of our universities, the danger is that the political scientist unwittingly becomes the tool of other people's commitments. And theirs may be even less responsibly arrived at; conceivably, the expertise of the political scientist may come to serve the irrational purposes of genteel bigotry in domestic policies or of paranoid jingoism and reckless gambling with our chances of survival in foreign policies. If advice-giving social scientists dont feel called on to invest their best intellectual energies in studying the ultimate ends of our national policies, it is unlikely that anyone else of influence will; most active politicians have, after all, more immediately pressing worries, and these are anyway the kinds of concerns they are best trained to handle.

^{4A} Karl Mannheim employs a similar dichotomy of terms, though with different concepts, in his Man and Society in an Age of Reconstruction (New York, 1954), pp. 51-60.

Intellectual treason, to return to Eulau's phrase, is probably a remote hazard in our profession. For, rather than placing himself in the service "of those whose values he disagrees with," the political scientist usually will by natural, uninvestigated processes come to agree with the prevailing values of his profession, of the major foundations and of his government, at least on the more basic public policy objectives and assumptions. His training and career incentives focus on formal rationality. It is fortunate that many social scientists for other reasons tend to be humane and liberal individuals. We will be far better off, however, if we can make it respectable or even mandatory for many more of our researchers to be guided in their choice of theory and problems by their own articulated values, instead of acting willy-nilly on the supposedly neutral values impressed on them by the conventional wisdom of their profession.

 Π

In the contemporary political science literature it is by no means unusual to see the articulation of political norms begin and end with a commitment to "democracy" in some unspecified sense. Fifteen years ago a respected political scientist suggested a more critical orientation: "The democratic myth is that the people are inherently wise and just, and that they are the real rulers of the republic. These propositions do have meaning; but if they become, as they do even among scholars, matters of faith, then scientific progress has been sacrificed in the interest of a morally satisfying demagogy."5 This advice has not been generally heeded. Even today many political scientists are writing as if democracy unquestionably is a good thing, from which unquestionably good things will flow, while at the same time they profess a disinterest in settling value issues. "The only cure for the ills of democracy is more democracy," is still the implicit slogan of quite a few social scientists, who seem unaware of even the conceptual difficulties involved in developing generally useful criteria, let alone a rationale, for "more democracy." To put it bluntly, it appears that a good number of otherwise able political scientists confuse a vaguely stated conventional "democratism" with scientific objectivity.

⁵ Gabriel A. Almond, The American People and Foreign Policy (New York, 1950), p. 4.

That behavioral research not explicitly related to problems of democracy tends to be vague in its implications for normative democratic theory is perhaps to be expected. It is paradoxical that some of the leading behavioral writers on democracy continue to write as if they want to have it both ways: to be rigorously value-neutral and at the same time be impeccable champions of conventional pluralist democracy. To straddle on a sharp issue would not be comfortable; if we want to write as good democrats and as logical positivists, too, it is perhaps necessary to be obtuse on issues like "why democracy?" or "what is democracy for?" and, indeed, "what is democracy?"

For a first example, take the late V. O. Key's most recent book on Public Opinion and American Democracy.7 Here we are presented with an admirably organized survey of what is now known of the characteristics of contemporary public opinion and of the extent of its bearing on American governmental decision processes. Yet for all these facts about public opinion. there is hardly a hint of their implications, in the author's judgment, for any of the relevant normative issues of democracy; what little is said on this score is uninformative indeed. For example, the point is made toward the end that political deviants "play a critical role in the preservation of the vitality of a democratic order as they urge alterations and modifications better to achieve the aspirations of men. Hence the fundamental significance of freedom of speech and agitation" (p. 555). There is no elaboration of this point, which one might take to be an important issue, considering the book's title and general subject. And there is no other discussion of what purpose all this political knowledge should serve. Is it the "preservation of the vitality of a democratic order" as far as we can articulate the criteria for the best possible government, or for trends in the best direction? What does "vitality" mean here, and what aspects of our democracy are most in need of it? Is free speech valuable solely as a means to this rather obscurely conceived end?

Or take the volume on Voting, by a team of ⁶ The term is from Leo Strauss. See his "Epilogue" in Herbert J. Storing, ed., Essays on the Scientific Study of Politics (New York, 1962), p. 326.

⁷ New York, 1961.

top-notch political sociologists. One of the book's two themes, we are told (p. x), is the social problem of how political preferences are formed, while the "confrontation of democratic theory with democratic practice is the second implied theme that runs throughout the book." There is much about certain kinds of practices, yes; but democratic theory is limited to a few examples of "impossible" demands of "traditional normative theory" on the role of the citizen: that he should be politically interested, knowledgeable and rational. These investigators find that most voters are indeed politically apathetic, ignorant and far from rational in their political behavior.

Given the second theme one might have expected the authors to raise some pertinent questions concerning the sense, if any, in which we nevertheless do have a democracy, or possibly the sense in which we nevertheless ought to be able to have a democracy, if what we have now does not fit this concept. Or perhaps an attempt toward reformulating democratic norms in better accord with political realities, if the term "democracy" should be saved for new uses.

Nothing of the sort happens. Instead, the authors make the happy discovery that the system of democracy that we have "does meet certain requirements for a going political organization"; indeed, as it is said just before, "it often works with distinction" (p. 312). What is good and bad about the system is left in the dark, as is the question of criteria for "distinction." Instead, we are given a list of dimensions of citizen behavior, and are told that the fact that individuals differ on these various dimensions (e.g., involvement-indifference) somehow is exactly what the modern democratic system requires. It all ends well, then; and in parting the authors leave us with this comforting if question-begging assurance: "Twentiethcentury political theory—both analytic and normative-will arise only from hard and long observation of the actual world of politics, closely identified with the deeper problems of practical politics." (p. 323. Italics supplied.) Only?

Turn now to a widely and deservedly praised book with the promising title, A Preface to Democratic Theory. Robert Dahl explains his choice of title by asserting that "there is no democratic theory—only democratic theories. This fact suggests that we had better proceed by considering some representative theories in order to discover what kinds of problems they raise . . . "9 And in the landscape of behavioral literature this work does stand out as an impressive exercise in logical analysis. Excellent critical evaluations of the Madisonian and the populist-type democratic theories are offered; but subsequently Dahl changes his tack to what he calls (p. 63) the descriptive method: under "polyarchal democracy" he seeks to develop empirical criteria for a concept of democracy based on our knowledge of existing species. As we would expect of a competent behavioralist, the author develops some enlightening perspectives on how "the American hybrid" in fact appears to be functioning.

Penetrating as this account of the basic operating procedures of the American democracy is, the author's criteria for evaluating the result are surprisingly inarticulate and ad hoc. He will not try to determine whether it is a desirable system of government, he assures us toward the end of the book; and then proceeds to do just that, but vaguely:

it appears to be a relatively efficient system for reinforcing agreement, encouraging moderation, and maintaining social peace in a restless and immoderate people operating a gigantic, powerful, diversified, and incredibly complex society. This is no negligible contribution, then, that Americans have made to the arts of government—and to that branch, which of all the arts of politics is the most difficult, the art of democratic government.

These are Dahl's parting words.

Having subjected the assumptions, hypotheses, implied definitions, and even the presumed value axioms of two theories of democracy to painstaking analysis, the author's ambition not to discuss the desirability of the American system of government would be difficult to understand for someone unacquainted with the currently prevailing fashions among behavioralists. To study the definitional characteristics of this hybrid species of government and of the genus, "polyarchal democracy," is a worthwhile endeavor, to be sure, but would in my opinion assume far greater significance if pursued within a framework of value assumptions, however tentatively presented, from which could be derived operational criteria for judging what aspects of a functioning democracy ought to be valued and strengthened, as against other aspects that should be deplored and, if possible, counteracted. Why does the author never say clearly whether in his view democracy is something to be valued in itself, and maximized (as he takes Madisonian theory to assert), or as valuable for some specified ends (for example, for maximizing political equality, after the fashion of populists)?

⁸ Bernard R. Berelson, Paul F. Lazarsfeld and William N. McPhee, Voting: A Study of Opinion Formation in a Presidential Campaign (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954).

⁹ Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1956, p. 1.

In a Preface to democratic theory, and one which demonstrates a high order of rigor in analyzing other theories of democracy, the author's reluctance even to begin to develop operating criteria toward making meaningful the present system, or to provide pointers toward its more meaningful further development, is as astounding as it is disappointing. Reluctantly one concludes that Dahl in this particular context behaves like most political behavioralists: he feels he can permit himself to write normatively about political purposes, it would seem, only if they are stated in terms of "democracy" and are reasonably indeterminate, lest the suspicion should arise that he is pleading for some politically partisan position. Thus, a demeanor of scientific objectivity is maintained, and so is a persistently implied commitment to a certain political bias, which favors democracy roughly as it now exists in the West, or in this country.

III

Leo Strauss charges the behavioralists with a bias toward liberal democracy, and rightly so, in comparison to his position. Yet in some respects the bias of much behavioralist political literature is profoundly conservative, although this is a species of conservatism rather different from Strauss's. Philosophically speaking, this behaviorally oriented conservatism frequently includes an anti-political dimension which is not found in Strauss's work. 10 What is anti-political is the assumption, explicit or implicit, that politics, or at any rate American politics, is and must always remain primarily a system of rules for peaceful battles between competing private interests, and not an arena for the struggle toward a more humane and more rationally organized society.

Consider S. M. Lipset's recent suggestion that the age-old search for the good society can be terminated, for we have got it now. Democracy as we know it "is the good society itself in operation." Not that our democracy cannot still be improved upon, but roughly speaking, it appears, "the give-and-take of a free society's internal struggles" is the best that men can hope for. Our society is so good that Lipset welcomes, at least for the West, what he sees as a trend toward replacing political ideology with sociological analysis.¹¹

10 This is not to deny that the Straussian position is more authoritarian and far less respectful of the right to radical dissent, as is to be expected when a corner on objective truth is being claimed. Cf. especially Leo Strauss, What is Political Philosophy and Other Studies (Glencoe, 1959); and his "Epilogue" in Herbert J. Storing, ed., op. cit. See also Walter Berns, "The Behavioral Sciences and the Study of Political Things: The Case of Christian Bay's The Structure of Freedom," this Review, Vol. 55 (1961), pp. 550-59.

This is an extreme statement, although by a leading and deservedly famous political sociologist. We cannot saddle behavioralists in general with responsibility for such phrasing. But in substance, as we shall see, the same tendency toward affirming the status quo and, what is worse, toward disclaiming the importance and even the legitimacy of political ideology, and ideals, is discernible in other leading behaviorally oriented works as well.

Let us note incidentally that all the behavioral works referred to so far wind up affirming that American democracy on the whole works well, while failing to articulate the criteria on which this judgment is based. In fairness it should be added that probably all these writers would make an exception for the place of the Negro and certain other underprivileged groups or categories for whom our democracy admittedly does not work so well; there are flaws, then, but fundamentally all is well or else will become well without any basic changes.

What is more troublesome than this somewhat conservative commitment to a somewhat liberal conception of democracy¹³—whether ac-

¹¹ Seymour Martin Lipset, Political Man: The Social Bases of Politics (Garden City, 1960), esp. pp. 403 and 415.

¹² An interesting attempt to evaluate the 1952 Presidential election in terms of five criteria of democratic consent (as opposed to non-rational responses to manipulated processes) is reported in Morris Janowitz and Dwaine Marvick, Competitive Pressure and Democratic Consent (Ann Arbor, Bureau of Government, University of Michigan, 1956). The five criteria are chosen somewhat haphazardly, but they are carefully and ingeniously operationalized and brought to bear on available data. The study shows what could just as well be done, in years to come, within a more carefully and systematically stated framework of political objectives and norms.

¹³ Though perhaps paradoxical, the statement is not self-contradictory. A democracy that guarantees many liberties to people of most persuasions, and in theory to everybody, may well be considered a liberal democracy. Freedom of speech and related freedoms have a strong appeal to most intellectuals, many of whom may be-knowledged or surreptitious—is the antipolitical orientation referred to a moment ago; the failure to see politics as potentially, at least, an instrument of reason, legitimately dedicated to the improvement of social conditions.

Within a brief space that allows no extensive documentation perhaps the next best thing to do is to consider for a moment a recent example of a behavioralist approach in which, for a change, the underlying assumptions are spelled out with commendable clarity, and then let the reader judge to what extent other literature referred to above may not implicitly rest on similar starkly anti-political premises.

James M. Buchanan and Gordon Tullock have called their book The Calculus of Consent, with subtitle Logical Foundations of Constitutional Democracy. The task set for the book, we are told in the Preface, is "to analyze the calculus of the rational individual when he is faced with questions of constitutional choice"; the authors, both of whom have most of their training in economics, intend to develop what they take to be the rationale for group action in the public sector in a free society—i.e., for political action.

The authors take pains to assert the value-free nature of their approach to the science of politics. True, they choose to go along with "the Western philosophical tradition" in so far as they consider the human individual "the primary philosophical entity" (p. 11). From here on, supposedly, we are dealing with the political processes that flow from the desire of all individuals to try to maximize whatever they may value. "The grail-like search for some 'public interest' apart from, and independent of, the separate interests of the individual participants in social choice" (p. 12) is not the concern of these authors.

Only in one limited sense do the authors recognize a sort of collective interest in a free society: "it is rational to have a constitution" (p. 21), or a set of rules for deciding how decisions in the public sector are to be arrived at; constitutional issues are in principle to be settled by unanimity, while operational issues—all other political issues—must be settled according to constitutional provisions. The authors see no rationale for majoritarianism as a way of deciding, unless a constitution happens to come staunch conservatives because they believe in preserving their liberal democracy. Some, indeed, will become fixated on the need for defense of the social order to the point of ignoring the plight of poverty-stricken fellow-citizens whose formal liberty may seem worthless to themselves. require it in given contexts; consequently, constitutions can be changed only by unanimity, according to this 'individualistic theory of political process," as one of the authors has lately named the theory. 15

In his more recent statement, Buchanan recognizes as an "entirely reasonable interpretation" (p. 7) that this approach to political processes can be seen as a model for the defense of the status quo. His most important rejoinder is that "analysis must start from somewhere, and the existing set of rules and institutions is the only place from which it is possible to start" (p. 7).

The previously cited writings of leading behavioralists have been less explicit and also less bold in showing the way from assertedly value-free premises toward a conservative and in my sense anti-political orientation. Yet, in all the works given critical attention above, there are normative ambiguities wide enough to make room for a theory such as the one offered by Buchanan and Tullock. This is not to say that Eulau, Key, Berelson et al., Dahl, or Lipset would concur with Buchanan and Tullock in their normative position. But their approach to politics is philosophically similar in its emphasis on prevailing behavior patterns here and now as the thing to study and in its rejection of the legitimacy of normative positions as frameworks for research (except in a normatively ad hoc policy science context). Buchanan and Tullock have been able to explicate in considerable detail one rationale for an implicit stance that appears to be widely shared by students of politics today.

If a similar orientation were to be adopted in medical literature, its scope would in the main be confined to studying how patients choose to cope or at any rate do cope with their pathologies, while omitting or neglecting fundamental study of conditions for possible treatment and prevention.

IV

Unlike other behavioral literature, modern works in comparative politics almost always focus on real political problems; when political institutions are compared cross-nationally or cross-culturally, pseudopolitical behavior can more readily be seen as dysfunctional in terms of some conception or other of the public good; usually such conceptions are couched in terms of "modernization" or "development," at least ¹⁵ James M. Buchanan, "An Individualistic Theory of Political Process." Paper prepared for delivery at the 1963 Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association in Commodore Hotel, New York City.

¹⁴ Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1962.

if comparisons are cross-cultural as well as cross-national. The point is that developmental perspectives and therefore political purposes are ever-present in this literature, even if they are not often well articulated. Yet, what is particularly impressive in some of this literature is its conceptual and theoretical scope, including the stress on psychological as well as social component explanations of political behavior, and on the need for integrating microanalyses of personalities and small groups with macro-analyses of large collectivities. 16

Concerned as the modern students of comparative politics have been with substantive problems, they have resisted temptations to pursue their inquiries according to immediately practical considerations such as the availability of operational indices and techniques of measurement.17 On the contrary, insistent efforts have been made to innovate concepts that would take account of variables which are not as yet accessible to observation and quantification—concepts such as political culture, political socialization, political identity, and political style, for example. The long-term strategy appears to be to start out with concepts broad enough to encompass all significant aspects of political reality, and then work toward parcelling out component concepts which come closer to corresponding to variables that can be observed, perhaps indirectly and by tentative indices at first. Thus the theoretical working hypotheses can gradually, it is hoped, be subjected to increasingly direct and stringent tests. This is a far cry from the piecemeal approach to political (or pseudopolitical) reality in many other works, which almost exclusively pays attention to disparate empirical relationships while neglecting to consider the possible systematic-theoretical reasons we might have for taking an interest in them.

¹⁶ Some of the milestones in this literature are Gabriel A. Almond, "Comparative Political Systems," Journal of Politics, Vol. 18 (1956), pp. 391-409; Almond and James S. Coleman, eds., The Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1960); Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1963).

¹⁷ For contrast, consider this statement on the ways of other behavioralists: "The focus of the political behaviorist, however, does not seem to be a result of the state of political theory. Elections have been intensively studied because they lend themselves to the methodology of empirical research into politics." Morris Janowitz, Deil Wright, and William Delany, Public Administration and the Public—Perspectives Toward Government in a Metropolitan Community (Ann Arbor, Bureau of Government, University of Michigan, 1958), p. 2.

There is also this to be said about the modern comparative politics literature, however, that its conceptual and theoretical innovations have as yet failed to make a significant dent in the same democratic myth that Almond himselfthe leader in this field—has warned us against years ago (above, p. 42). The dilemma already discussed, of desiring to support democracy and adopt a stance of value neutrality, too, has not as yet been satisfactorily resolved in this literature, either. And this failure is paradoxical in this particular context, in part because the ostensible chief concern is with "development" or "modernization" as the dependent variable, so that the question of development toward what immediately suggests itself. The failure is paradoxical also because these scholars have coined bold new concepts on the independent side of the ledger, and some have written extensively about concepts as far removed from realms of observation as "political culture" and "political identity." Yet a concept such as "human need" has not been touched, and discussions of key terms like "political development" or "modernization" have been hampered, it would seem, by an unwillingness to question whether democratic ways or what kinds of democratic ways are most conductive to satisfying human needs.19

In the most extensive recent discussion of these concepts La Palombara begins well with a warning that what many scholars appear to have in mind "when they speak of a modern or developed system is one that approximates the institutional and structural configuration that we associate with the Anglo-American (in any event, the Western) democratic systems" (p. 10). He calls this conceptualization culture-bound; yet in the same and the following chapter he goes to considerable lengths himself in arguing for the use of the same kinds of culture-bound criteria to evaluate development or modernity abroad. While he contributes a useful discussion of different dimensions along which political change can be measured, he never inquires whether in other countries there might be other criteria of development of equal or greater significance than his own essentially Anglo-Saxon criteria. "One of the great dilemmas of many of the developing countries," he writes, "is that they seem to want economic development more than freedom" (p. 41), and the last term he takes as a matter of course to refer to pluralist institutions. "Why should it not be possible to raise a belief in and desire for democracy to the same level?" (p. 58). And in conclusion La Palombara asserts that we Americans must expand our efforts to export not only technical know-how "but our political ideology and reasonable facsimiles of our political institutions and practices as well." Without such an effort, he adds, he is reasonably confident that "the probability of attaining democratic configuration in most of the newer states is very low indeed" (pp. 60-61).

¹⁸ Cf. Almond and Verba, op. cit., and Lucian W. Pye, Politics, Personality, and Nation Building: Burma's Search for Identity (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1962).

19 Concepts of modernization or development are discussed by James S. Coleman in Almond and Coleman, eds., op. cit., pp. 532-36; by Lucian W. Pye, ed., Communication and Political Development (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1963), pp. 14-20; and by Joseph La Palombara in his (ed.) Bureaucracy and Political Development (Princeton University Press, 1963), chs. 1 and 2.

The main difficulty with this reasoning is that men are motivated, also politically, by their immediate needs and wants, and not by foreign orthodoxies. La Palombara speculates "whether it would not be possible to manipulate demands so that goals of political development enjoy a status equal to that of economic change" (p. 30), and suggests the encouragement of private as against collectively oriented enterprise for this end. The answer is surely a flat no: it is not possible, in most countries in which most people are economically underprivileged, to create a broad popular interest in pluralist democratic institutions. "Acceptance of the norms of democracy requires a high level of sophistication and ego security," writes Lipset, on the basis of a variety of loosely connected empirical data.20 An active concern for the public welfare presupposes a liberation both from anxiety neuroses and from realistic fears concerning one's own and one's family's physical sustenance, welfare and security. To put it more succinctly, needs for food and safety take precedence over political interest; no amount of political manipulation could be expected to alter such priorities.

To be sure, individuals can be lured into "the game of politics" as advantageous careers under the right circumstances; but is this the kind of political development that the West should desire? If budding western-democracy-type pluralist institutions turn out to benefit only the middle and upper classes—as in many Latin American countries—then we should not be surprised if idealistic students and others with a passion for social justice, or for politics as distinct from pseudopolitics, may become disposed to reject the forms of pluralist democracy altogether.²¹

Nevertheless, the trend among political behavioralists, including students of comparative politics, appears to be toward a clean break not only with Plato's concern with justice as something above democracy, for the true philosopher; also, it seems that the classical conception of democracy as a system of rational deliberation for settling issues of justice and welfare is on its way out, even as a political ideal. Reference has been made to the ad hoc attempts of Berelson et al. to bring the norms of democracy in better accord with the facts of what I have termed pseudopolitical behavior. In The Civic Culture Almond and Verba present and discuss a variety of usefully differentiated survey data collected in five countries (United States, Britain, West Germany, Italy and Mexico). "What we have done in this book," they conclude, "is to spell out methodically the mixture of attitudes that support a democratic system. If it can create a more sober and informed appreciation of the nature and complexity of the problems of democratization, it will have served its purpose."22 But what kind of democracy? The theoretical point of departure is neither in a conception of human needs nor in the classical theories of democracy, but in such literature as has been discussed above—notably Dahl's Preface to Democratic Theory and the last chapter in Berelson's Voting. In fact, Almond and Verba emphatically reject the classical "rationality-activist" ideal of democratic citizenship in favor of a more balanced "parochial-subject-participant" orientation; in a healthy, stable democracy as they conceive it (and American political culture comes close even though it does not quite embody this ideal), "the democratic citizen is called on to pursue contradictory goals; he must be active, yet passive; involved, yet not too involved; influential, yet deferential."23

Perhaps so, if the ultimate goal is democratic stability. And there is no denying, from mynormative position, that democratic stability is valuable, and that many nations ought to have more of it. But is it the most important goal for political development; is it the goal that should serve as the basis for evaluating all other goals (whether wholly, in terms of instrumentality, or partially, in terms of compati-

²¹ Fidel Castro's wide following in Latin America can be plausibly explained in these terms.

²² Op. cit., p. 505 and ch. 15.

²³ Ibid., pp. 478-79 and 440-41.

²⁰ Political Man, op. cit., p. 115 and ch. 4.

bility)? Should we not instead hold, in Eulau's phrase, that "The Goal is Man?"

v

In the study of political behavior, "analysis must start from somewhere, and the existing set of rules and institutions is the only place from which it is possible to start," according to Buchanan. Students of comparative politics have nevertheless demonstrated the feasibility of analysing political developments in some countries in terms of valuable outcomes achieved in others.²⁴ It remains to be shown that political behavior and institutions can be analysed also in terms of normative assumptions to the effect that the purpose of politics is to meet human needs and facilitate human development.

Contrary to an apparently prevailing assumption among political behavioralists, psychological phenomena are just as real as economic and voting behavior phenomena, even though admittedly less accessible to observation and measurement. Some more of the same conceptual boldness displayed in the recent literature on comparative politics is required if political inquiry is to become related to important human wants and needs. For one thing, we need to distinguish more clearly between pseudopolitical and more strictly political behavior, if we want to learn how to encourage the latter at the expense of the former.²⁵

A major conceptual and theoretical task is to develop a satisfactory theory of human needs and of the relationships between needs and wants—here referring to perceived or felt needs. Wants (or, synonymously, desires) and demands can be observed and measured by way of asking people or observing their behavior. Needs, on the other hand, can only be inferred from their hypothetical consequences for behavior or, more manifestly, from the actual consequences of their frustration. Whenever superficial wants are fulfilled but underlying needs remain frustrated, pathological behavior is likely to ensue.

Prior to the development of a viable theory of political development is at least a beginning toward a theory of individual human development. Such a beginning exists in psychological literature, but it has so far been inadequately drawn on by students of political behavior. Let me very briefly suggest the direction of this theorizing, and some of its implications for the study of political behavior.

²⁴ See especially Robert E. Ward and Dankwart A. Rustow, The Political Modernization of Japan and Turkey (Princeton University Press, 1964).

²⁵ However, we should not assume without inquiry that all pseudopolitical behavior is dysfunctional for all high-priority human wants and needs; not, of course, that all varieties of political behavior are to be preferred to pseudopolitical self-seeking or neurotic striving.

Basic human needs are characteristics of the human organism, and they are presumably less subject to change than the social or even the physical conditions under which men live. Wants are sometimes manifestations of real needs, but, as Plato and many other wise men since have insisted, we cannot always infer the existence of needs from wants. Wants are often artificially induced by outside manipulation, or they may be neurotically based desires whose satisfaction fails to satisfy needs, or both. Emphasis on a civic-culture type of democracy as the goal for political development may well perpetuate a state of affairs in which human needs as seen by the political-minded (in my strict sense of "political") will remain in the shadow of much-advertised human wants as promoted by pseudo-politicians and other enterprisers whose horizons do not extend beyond their own occupational or career interests and status anxieties.26

I say may, for I am raising a question rather than adopting a position. In order to investigate the relationship between needs and wants as they pertain to political functions we must start out with a tentative conception of priorities among human needs. The best available point of departure, in my opinion, is in A. H. Maslow's theory of a hierarchy of human needs; this theorizing ought to be drawn on until a more plausible and useful theory becomes available.

Maslow lists five categories of needs in the order of their assumed priority: (1) physical needs (air, water, food, etc.); (2) safety needs (assurance of survival and of continuing satisfaction of basic needs); (3) needs to love and be loved; (4) need for esteem (by self and others); and (5) need for self-actualization and growth. This list presents a hierarchy, according to Maslow, in the sense that the "less prepotent needs are minimized, even forgotten or denied. But when a need is fairly well satisfied, the next prepotent ('higher') need emerges, in turn to dominate the conscious life and to serve as the center of organization of behavior, since gratified needs are not active motivators."27 Note, however, that whenever in the course of a human life the "higher" needs have become activated, they are not necessarily extinguished as a result of later deprivation of "lower" or more basic needs. For example, some individuals, provided they have once known physical safety, will unhesitatingly sacrifice all of it for love, or for standards of right conduct tied in with their selfesteem, etc.

²⁶ Joseph Tussman also stresses the danger of destroying the integrity of political communication when the modern bargaining approach to politics enters the "forum or tribunal" that a democratic electorate ought to constitute, according to classical theories of democracy. "We teach men to compete and bargain. Are we to be surprised, then, at the corruption of the tribunal into its marketplace parody?" Obligation and the Body Politic (New York, Oxford University Press, 1960), p. 109 and pp. 104–21.

In a recent volume, James C. Davies has suggested the utility of Maslow's theory as a generator of propositions regarding political behavior, and he illustrates the plausibility (without demonstrating the validity) of such propositions with a wealth of historical and contemporary political behavior data. For example, according to Davies's theorizing it is impractical to suggest, with La Palombara, that it might be "possible to manipulate demands" in economically underdeveloped countries so that widespread loyalties to democratic institutions could emerge: "Long before there can be responsible or irresponsible popular government, long before the question of dictatorship or democracy can be taken up, the problem of survival must be solved so that a political community itself can develop, so that people can direct some of their attention to politics."28 In another context he says, "Propaganda cannot paint a picture which conflicts with reality as it is seen by individuals in the light of their basic needs" (p. 134); the picture can be painted all right, but it will be a wasted effort. And Davies quotes Kwame Nkrumah, whose implicit rejoinder to La Palombara's argument is hard to improve on: "We cannot tell our peoples that material benefits in growth and modern progress are not for them. If we do, they will throw us out and seek other leaders who promise more... We have to modernize. Either we shall do so with the interest and support of the West or we shall be compelled to turn elsewhere. This is not a warning or a threat, but a straight statement of political reality" (p. 135).

One shortcoming in Davies's as well as Maslow's work, in my judgment, is that both authors seek to relate events and behavior directly to the elusive concept of "need," without the use of an intermediate and more manageable concept such as "want." Both concepts are badly needed, and their interrelations and their application in hypotheses must be developed if we want to move toward a more adequate knowledge of political behavior. It must be granted that manifest wants are important aspects of our political reality, especially in democracies; what matters is that we also keep remembering, unlike many behavioralists, that there also are genuine needs to worry about, elusive though they may be to the researcher's conventional tools. The volume of competing loudspeakers, if I may use a metaphor, is in a pluralist democracy perhaps more likely to depend on the power of the purse than on the urgency of the need. Even the most democratic governments are likely to come to a bad end-to say nothing of the individuals living under them—unless they learn to become at least as responsive to the basic needs of all their citizens as they are to the most insistent wants of the various articulate and influential interest groups and parties.

Most of Maslow's as well as Davies's discussion is highly speculative; only a beginning has been made. But their theory does lend itself to the production of testable hypotheses. For example, Almond's theory of political "input functions" (political socialization and recruitment; interest articulation; interest aggregation; political communication) and "output functions" (rule making; rule application; rule adjudication),29 would seem to provide a fertile field for exploring what the participation in or other ego-involvement with each type of function can mean, in satisfying individual personality needs as well as wants. Moving in this direction we can perhaps get away from the customary clichés about the value of democracy, toward research-based knowledge on what (aspects of) democratic institutions have what kinds of value for human development.

I have argued elsewhere that the human goals of politics should be conceived in terms of maximizing individual freedom—psychological, social and potential. Democracy and indeed every law and constitutional clause should be judged as a means to this end. A comprehensive treatment of norms of liberty with interrela-

²⁷ Abraham H. Maslow, "A Theory of Human Motivation," Psychological Review, Vol. 50 (1943), p. 394 and pp. 370-96. See also his Motivation and Personality (New York, 1954).

²⁸ Human Nature in Politics (New York, 1963), p. 28. Davies does not refer to La Palombara.

²⁹ Cf. his introduction to Almond and Coleman, eds., op. cit.

³⁰ The Structure of Freedom (Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1958, and New York, 1965).

tionships and empirical consequences is necessary for this purpose, and so is a theory of human needs such as Maslow's, which in effect predicts that with increasing satisfaction of sustenance and security needs men's tendency will be to become less anti-social, more capable of respecting and eventually perhaps insisting on respect for the basic needs and liberties of others.

The normative research³¹ to be recommended can be done with far more precision than was attempted or achieved in the work on freedom just referred to. Perhaps philosophers working with political scientists can be expected to be active on this research frontier in future years. One good example of normative research of this kind, even though its reference to empirical data is for purposes of normative interpretation only, is Naess's study of Gandhi's ethics of conflict resolution.³²

The burden of this paper, then, is to plead for an expansion and a more systematic articulation of the psychological and the normative perspectives of political behavior research. I propose as a normative basis the proposition that politics exists for the purpose of progressively removing the most stultifying obstacles to a free human development, with priority for the worst obstacles, whether they hit many or few-in other words, with priority for those individuals who are most severely oppressed; as Harrington points out with respect to the poverty-stricken in the United States, they are also the least articulate, and the least likely to achieve redress by way of the ordinary democratic processes.33 It is argued in this paper that

In the term "normative research" may be puzzling to some, who think of research exclusively as systematically re(peated) search for empirical data, in the real world or in contrived experimental worlds. And "research" has been one of the empirical social scientist's proud banners in his uphill fight against the sometime supremacy of armchair speculators. In our time a less parochial use of "research" is called for, as a way of recognizing the close interplay between the empirical, normative and logical aspects of inquiry that, as the present paper argues, is necessary for the further development of our knowledge of political as of other human behavior.

² Arne Naess, "A systematization of Gandhian ethics of conflict resolution," Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 2 (1958), pp. 140-55; and also Johan Galtung and Arne Naess, Gandhis politiske etikk (Oslo, Tanum, 1955).

³³ Michael Harrington, The Other America: Poverty in the United States (Baltimore, Penguin Books, 1963; New York, 1962).

the current preoccupation with pseudopolitical behavior carries conservative and anti-political implications, and that the best hope for a more politically useful reorientation of behavioral research—in addition to and beyond the comparative politics perspective—is to study how the various functions of government bear, and could bear, on the satisfaction of basic needs as well as conscious wants.

Among the questions to ask are these: What kinds of enduring satisfactions tend to be associated, for example, with particular participant and subject roles established by alternate forms of centralized or decentralized decision processes? Under what socio-cultural and socio-economic circumstances are majoritarian decision processes, of given types, likely to produce substantive satisfaction of the basic needs of, in Harrington's phrase, society's "rejects"?

As so often in our human condition, the dimensions of our ignorance appear to grow larger the closer we come to the most enduringly important issues of our social life. Much conceptual as well as basic psychological work remains to be done before our technical proficiency in the study of the relation of political forms to basic needs and to liberty can come to match the current work on analysis of voting patterns. But in this work political scientists should participate; our stakes in its progress are as high as anyone else's.

One particular type of research that should be pushed, as a much needed complement to the large supply of data on pseudopolitical behavior, is work that would focus on just how some citizens "graduate" from the role of pseudopolitical actor to that of political actor. Or, more accurately—for surely there are more pseudopolitical actors in the older age groups, "hardened in the school of life"—how it is that some categories of individuals (or individuals in some categories of situations) manage to remain concerned with ideals and with politics, i.e., with the welfare of their fellow men, all their lives?

A theory of human development is implied in the research approaches here recommended. It asserts that man is likely to become increasingly capable of being rational, or intellectual,³⁴ to the extent that he no longer needs the services of his beliefs and attitudes for the purpose of keeping his various anxieties in check. Deepseated neurotic anxieties about one's worth as a human being predispose to right-wing or occasionally leftwing extremism, with glorification of ingroups or individuals, living or dead, along with hatreds against outgroups and deviants. Neurotic status anxieties predispose to eager adherence to whatever views appear expected in one's reference groups. Realistic fears about employment or future career prospects predispose against maintaining the luxury of political opinions at all, unless they are "safe." Only for individuals whose main anxiety problems have been faced and in some way resolved is it generally possible to think of and care about problems of politics in terms of standards of justice or the public interest, independently of personal worries.

²⁴ Cf. my "A Social Theory of Intellectual Development," in Nevitt Sanford, ed., The American College (New York, 1961), pp. 972-1005, esp. pp. 978 and 1000-1005.

The development of strictly political incentives in the individual, then, depends on a gradual process of liberation from a preoccupation with personal anxieties and worries. Stages in this process can be identified by research, although our concepts and instruments need some improvement before we can with confidence relate specific categories of political irrationality to (repressed or acknowledged) anxieties associated with specific levels in a hierarchy of human needs. Human nature being complex, so is the task of fully comprehending the dynamics of political behavior. My essential argument here is that we must face up to but not complacently accept, as the pseudopolitical outlook does, the fact that most of our citizens live too harassed lives or lack the education or opportunities for reflection to permit them the real satisfactions and the full dignity of democratic citizenship. We must pose the empirical problem of how the more stultifying pressures on adults and pre-adults can be reduced. A premature ruling out of the classic democratic citizenship ideal, with its stress on reason as a crucial factor in politics, would seem particularly inappropriate in our age of rapid technological change; never was the need for politics in the strict sense greater.

It is conceivable that our prospects for developing much larger proportions of political-minded citizens will improve substantially if or when the "cybernetics revolution" does away with our omnipresent worries about making a living. 5 On the other hand, unless educational and cultural resources can be expanded as rapidly, so that more people may be enabled to base their sense of identity and self-esteem on their own attributes or ideals rather than on their occupational roles, status anxieties and despair about lack of purpose in life might remain at present levels, and become aggravated for some. But the over-all prospects surely would be brighter, to the extent that more of the principal real worries on which our current anxieties feed were removed.

35 W. H. Ferry and 25 associates have recently

In any event, let us not as political scientists rule out the possibility that a real polity may emerge eventually-a community of people capable of giving some of their energies to political as distinct from pseudopolitical reflection and activity. A less utopian first step that may be hoped for is that many more political scientists will adopt a more political (or a less pseudopolitical) perspective in their theorizing and research. As the horizons of behavior research expand to encompass latent need-behavior as well as manifest want-behavior, our political science will not only produce a new order of intellectual challenge; it may also become a potent instrument for promoting political development in the service of human development.

issued a statement that received front-page attention in the New York Times and other newspapers, under the title "The Triple Revolution: An Appraisal of the Major U.S. Crises and Proposals for Action" (Washington: Maurer, Fleischer, Zon and Associates, 1120 Connecticut Ave., 1964). Referring to the revolutions in cybernetics, in weaponry, and in human rights, but particularly to the first of the three, Ferry et al. argue that there "is an urgent need for a fundamental change in the mechanisms employed to insure consumer rights" (p. 9), now that the problem of production has been solved and the problem of full employment has become impossible to solve with our present system. "We urge, therefore, that society, through its appropriate legal and governmental institutions, undertake an unqualified commitment to provide every individual and every family with an adequate income as a matter of right. This undertaking we consider to be essential to the emerging economic, social, and political order in this country" (p. 16).

CONDITIONS FOR PARTY LEADERSHIP: THE CASE OF THE HOUSE DEMOCRATS

LEWIS A. FROMAN, JR.*
University of Wisconsin

RANDALL B. RIPLEY*
The Brookings Institution

Political power in Congress, all observers agree, is highly decentralized. The factors chiefly responsible for this are also well known: weak national parties (in the Congress this results in strong constituency ties and weak leadership sanctions over members) and a highly developed division of labor through the committee system. A leadership endowed with few opportunities to punish and reward, coupled with specialization by policy area, inevitably produces an institution with numerous and disparate centers of power. Just as inevitably the politics of such an institution is compounded of persuasion, bargaining, and log-rolling.¹

As weak as the legislative parties are, however, they still provide the major organizing force in Congress. Roll-call vote analyses have demonstrated this,² and a recent study of the

- * This is, in every sense, a joint endeavor. Both authors served as interns in the Office of the House Democratic Whip at different times during the 88th Congress, and thereby had access to the House floor. Lewis A. Froman, Jr., wishes to thank the Congressional Fellowship Program of the American Political Science Association and the Graduate Research Committee of the University of Wisconsin for making a year in Washington possible. The authors jointly wish to thank Robert Peabody, Raymond Wolfinger, Leroy Rieselbach, Charles Jones, Theodore Lowi. Nelson Polsby and Richard Fenno for criticisms of an earlier draft. The findings and conclusions are those of the authors and do not purport to represent the views of the Brookings Institution, its trustees, officers, or other staff members.
- ¹ See Ralph K. Huitt, "Democratic Party Leadership in the Senate," this Review, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp. 333-344, and Lewis A. Froman, Jr., People and Politics: An Analysis of the American Political System (Englewood Cliffs, 1962), ch. 6.
- ² Julius Turner, Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress (Baltimore, The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1951); Duncan MacRae, Jr., Dimensions of Congressional Voting (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1958), I, 203-390; David B. Truman, The Congressional Party (New York, 1959), and Lewis A. Froman, Jr., Congress-

House Whip organizations also bears it out.³ Generally speaking, the single most important variable explaining legislative outcomes is party organization.

The extent of party leadership on the thousands of bills and resolutions which come before Congress each year, nevertheless, is itself variable. Julius Turner has provided us with documentation of this point for the inter-war years. We still sense this variability in leadership control over issues when contrasting the legislative process surrounding such bills as civil rights and poverty.

An appropriate question to ask, therefore, and one heretofore left mostly unanswered, is: under what conditions is party leadership likely to be relatively strong, or relatively weak? Turner has taught us a part of the answer: party control is likely to vary with issues. Class issues generate the sharpest differences between the parties; moral and "neutral" (in the sense of not redistributing wealth) issues cut across them. But the nature of the issue is only part of the story. Even within certain classes of issues party control is likely to vary from one specific issue to the next. Even on the same issue, leadership control is likely to vary from stage to stage in the legislative process. To these considerations this paper is addressed.

BACKGROUND FOR THE STUDY

The data which will be brought to bear upon the question of variability of party leadership control will be a mixture of objective measures (such as roll-call votes) and more casual empiricism. All the data, however, will refer to the Democrats in the United States House of Representatives when in the majority and with a Democratic President.

The identity of the leaders in the House is for the most part institutionally established. Among House Democrats the Speaker, Major-men and Their Constituencies (Chicago, Rand McNally, 1963).

- ³ Randall B. Ripley, "The Party Whip Organizations in the United States House of Representatives," this Review, Vol. 58 (September, 1964), pp. 561-576.
 - ⁴ Turner, op. cit., pp. 14-15, 69-70.

ity Leader, and, to a lesser extent, the Whip are undeniably leaders in virtually all that goes on legislatively in the House. On specific pieces of legislation relevant committee and subcommittee chairmen and senior members of committees and subcommittees may also become leaders.

Conditions are sets of circumstances of two major types: those which promote and those which hinder outcomes desired by the House Democratic leaders. Six conditions have been selected for analysis. A few obvious ones, however, were purposely excluded. One is the relationship of committee chairmen to the leadership. Another is the character and personality of the leaders themselves. Most students of Congress would argue, for example, that even though any set of leaders operates within rather definite institutional boundaries, it makes a difference in legislative outcomes whether there is a forceful and dynamic personality (such as Lyndon Johnson) at the helm, or a more mild, less aggressive personality (such as Mike Mansfield). One of the differences in styles, for example, seems to be that Mansfield has an uncanny knack of cooperating with the enemy and being firm and unyielding with his friends. Hence, when trouble is brewing in the Senate it is often between Mansfield and those with whose position he is usually sympathetic. Lyndon Johnson's style, on the other hand, was to be cooperative when it paid to be cooperative, and firm when it paid to be firm, regarding almost everyone as antagonists (and hence almost everyone as friends).

The conditions we will discuss, then, will not be exhaustive. But they are important and help to provide a picture of the institutional restraints under which leaders operate. Although the conditions are not, themselves, entirely outside the control of the leaders, they are, for the most part, "givens" in the political system of Congress. This paper is an exploration of the limits on leadership in the majority party in the House of Representatives.

FIRST CONDITION: LEADERSHIP COMMITMENT, KNOWLEDGE, AND ACTIVITY

First, success in leadership is likely to vary with the extent to which the leaders themselves are in agreement. It is a rare occasion when the Speaker, Majority Leader, and Whip are not one-hundred percent behind a presidential program, but it happens more often that an important committee member, even the chairman, does not support the President's request. A number of instances come to mind. It was long and widely felt, for example, that until Wilbur Mills, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, supported some version of the President's medicare bill, no program of the type the President sought would be enacted. So influential is Mills in his own committee that he was able effectively to shunt aside this top-priority program until after the 1964 election returns transformed the situation. Otto Passman provides another example. A consistent opponent of foreign aid legislation. this chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee handling funds for that purpose succeeded in cutting the Administration's program drastically, until early 1964 when he encountered a new full committee chairman who was more sympathetic with the President's wishes. We can say, then, that the more united the leadership behind a program, the greater the likelihood the program will win.

⁶ See, for example, the stir caused when Hale Boggs, the Democratic Whip, attacked one title of the 1964 Civil Rights Bill during floor debate. Cong. Rec., vol. 110, no. 23 (daily ed.), Feb. 7, 1964, pp. 2406–2408.

Beyond this rather obvious point, however, leadership commitment is crucial in other ways. Leaders, like other members, have a limited number of resources which they can devote to any given bill. In the 88th Congress two of the most complete commitments were made on the cotton bill in December, 1963, and on the wheat-cotton bill in April, 1964. On these bills the leaders worked long and hard and won narrow victories both times. We may contrast with these the role of the leadership in the defeat suffered by the Administration in March, 1964, on a bill to authorize a United States contribution to the International Development Association. The bill was scheduled in a haphazard fashion at the last minute. No whip poll was started until it was too late to be useful. The Treasury, a partner in this venture with AID. was not even brought in to help lobby for the bill. These factors, along with the unpopularity of the chairman of the committee from which the bill came, helped defeat it. The latter element, however, was not decisive, as was shown two months later when the same bill was brought up again and passed by a comfortable margin, after a careful whip poll and considerably more work by the leadership. We can say, then, that the greater the leadership's commitment of its scarce resources, the greater the chances of success.

Even when the leadership is fully committed to a bill, however, there are limits on what it can do. This problem can be explored in part by reference to data stemming from the polls conducted by the Office of the Democratic Whip in the House. The bills on which these polls are conducted represent nearly all of the legislation on which the leadership is fully committed. The polls sought to ascertain how every Democrat would cast his vote on the pending legislation.

An effective limit on the results which the leadership can produce even when fully committed is the pattern of reliability among the membership as revealed by the whip polls. This determines, in part, the knowledge of the leaders about the members. That is, if the members report honestly through the whip organization then the leadership can quickly identify weak spots and concentrate their persuasive efforts on those spots. On the other hand, if reporting is not accurate, a good deal of effort can be wasted on members who are either hopelessly lost or already won. An analysis of the 1963 whip polls, compared with the final rollcalls on the issues on which the polls had been taken, offers some evidence on patterns of reliability among House Democrats.

Ten polls were taken during 1963.8 The leadership won nine of the roll-calls that followed, losing only on the Area Redevelopment Act amendments in June. On each of these ten votes the Democratic Whip's Office attempted to ascertain how 256 Democratic members (excluding the Speaker) would vote.

⁶ The exceptions include bills that are complex and subject to numerous amendments—like foreign aid authorization and appropriation bills. In these cases it is difficult to frame a question for polling. Another exception was the civil rights bill in February, 1964. This was a complex issue, subject to many amendments, and it was impossible to forecast how the bill would be amended. Furthermore, unlike all of the other issues polled in the 87th and 88th Congresses, this bill could not be won by Democratic votes alone. Republican votes were absolutely indispensable.

⁷ See Ripley, op. cit., for a discussion of the role of the polling process in the work of the Democratic Whip organization.

8 Members were polled on the following issues: (1) the permanent enlargement of the Rules Committee, (2) an amendment adding $450 million to the public works program, (3) a recommittal motion deleting student loan provisions from a Health Professions Assistance Bill, (4) final passage of the Feed Grains Bill, (5) final passage of an increase in the amount of the national debt limit, (6) final passage of a bill giving more money to the Area Redevelopment program, (7) final passage of an extension in time of the debt limit, (8) a recommittal motion on the tax bill tying it to a cut in governmental spending, (9) final passage of another increase in the amount of the debt limit, and (10) final passage of the cotton bill.

The Whip's Office was successful 90.5 percent of the time in ascertaining exactly whether a member would be present and, if so, how he would vote. In 242 cases, 9.5 percent of all votes, the Whip's Office did not have the correct information on the individual's behavior before he actually voted. These 242 cases deserve further analysis, for clues to patterns of reliability.

The leadership in 1963 always knew how 123 Democrats would vote. One hundred thirty-three (52 percent) of the Democratic members surprised the leadership one or more times. Table I shows the distribution of these surprises.

TABLE I. FREQUENCY DISTRIBUTION OF HOUSE DEMOCRATIC VOTING CONTRARY TO WHIP POLL REPORT AND LEADERSHIP EXPECTATIONS ON 10 ISSUES, 1963

Number of times voting contrary to report	Number of members
6	2
5	1
4	7
3	19
2	36
1	68
0	123

	256*

* Total Democratic membership, except the Speaker.

Who were more reliable and who were less? Table II shows the average Presidential Support and Presidential Opposition Scores of the members, according to their degrees of reliability, as well as their Leadership Support and Leadership Opposition Scores.¹⁰

Evidently, members who were reported inaccurately two times or more exhibited little difference in average support and opposition scores. Those inaccurately reported only once were considerably more consistent in their party support and those who were never re-

⁹ "Surprises" can come for a number of reasons, including faulty work by the Assistant Whips. But the vast majority of these surprises occurred because the individual member had changed his mind, without prior notice.

¹⁰ The first index is that used by Congressional Quarterly. The second is of our own devising and is based on pro-leadership votes on the ten issues which were the subject of whip polls in 1963.

TABLE II. PRESIDENTIAL AND LEADERSHIP SUPPORT AND OPPOSITION SCORES FOR HOUSE DEMOCRATS
BY CATEGORY OF RELIABILITY ON 10 WHIP POLLS, 1963

Number of times reported in- accurately on whip poll	Pres. Support score	Pres. Opposition score	Leadership Support score	Leadership Opposition score
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
6	59.0	36.5	65.0	35.0
5	63.0	31.0	70.0	30.0
4	59.1	26.0	58.6	32.9
3	53.8	29.5	50.5	35.8
2	57.8	26.3	58.3	31.1
1	71.3	15.2	75.7	17.1
0	82.2	5.1	94.4	1.8
Average	72	14	80	14

ported inaccurately were the most loyal of all.

Table III shows the regional breakdown by category of reliability. Southern Democrats were over-represented increasingly in categories containing larger numbers of inaccurate reports. Except for the few members in the most unreliable categories, Western Democrats were represented roughly in accordance with their numbers in all of the other categories. Northern Democrats were relatively under-represented in all categories except the one reflecting complete accuracy and reliability.¹¹

Table IV demonstrates that the members

¹¹ For our purposes the South includes all the States of the Confederacy; the West includes all States west of the Mississippi River except Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas; the North includes the rest.

TABLE III. REGIONAL DISTRIBUTION OF HOUSE DEMOCRATS BY CATEGORY OF RELIABILITY ON 10 WHIP POLLS, 1963

Number of times re-	Per cent of all House Democrats
ported inac- curately on whip poll	Southern (N = 95) 37%	Western (N = 59) 23%	Northern (N = 102) 40%
	(%)	(%)	(%)
6	100.0	0	0
5	100.0	0	0
4	71.4	14.3	14.3
3	79.0	21.0	0
2	58.4	19.4	22.2
1	44.1	26.5	29.4
0	17.1	22.7	60.2

TABLE IV. DISTRIBUTION OF STRONG HOUSE DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL OPPONENTS BY CATEGORY OF RELIABILITY ON WHIP POLLS, 1963

Number of times re- ported in- accurately on whip polls	No. of all Democrats	No. of strong opponents	Per cent of strong opponents in category	Av. Pres. opp. score of strong opponents
6	2	2	100.0	36.5
5	1	1	100.0	31.0
4	7	5	71.4	30.2
3	19	13	68.5	38.2
2	36	14	39.0	47.2
1	68	14	20.6	49.5
0	123	2	1.6	26.0

most consistently opposing the leadership were more predictable and were reported more reliably and more accurately than the members who had a moderate record of support and opposition. That is, those most difficult to report prior to an actual vote tended to be ideologically uncommitted members who wavered from vote to vote with their perceptions of how much loyalty to the Democratic program their constituencies would tolerate. Table IV shows the average Presidential Opposition Score of the 51 Democrats (one in five) who in 1963 had an Opposition score higher than 25.12 The concentration of the most consistent Democratic opponents of the President came in categories of fairly great reliability-especially among those where only one or two mistakes were made.

Perhaps the most important conclusion to be drawn from this table is that the strongest opponents of the leadership can be identified and reported accurately, if the leadership wishes it. The most consistent opponents' reports can be taken at face value, if time is limited and can be devoted to only a few members. Identifying the unreliables is an economical first step for the leadership in efforts to persuade them to vote in the desired direction.

We can say, then, that the activity of leadership is limited by a ten percent unreliability in the whip polls on bills to which the leadership is fully committed, and that the unreliables in 1963 consisted predominantly of uncommitted Southern Democrats.

Once the waverers are known, how successful is the leadership in lining up votes? This question is difficult to answer by more than speculation. Data obtained on four issues in 1963, however, support some tentative conclusions. These data are of two kinds—lists of doubtful Democrats whose support for specific legislation was earnestly solicited by the Speaker and lists of those Democrats who were willing to give the Speaker a pledge to vote with him if he absolutely needed them. The four bills were those enlarging the Rules Committee permanently, in January 1963, and those involving the national debt limit in May, August and November, 1963.¹³

¹² This comes from Congressional Quarterly. An opposition score of 25% means that the members opposed the President on a quarter of the issues on which the latter took a position.

These data show that the Speaker seriously endeavored to change the votes of about twenty Democrats on each of the roll calls. He received varying answers from them, ranging from flat refusals to all-out promises of support. On each of the debt-limit bills he was successful in getting about eight to ten "pocket" or reserve votes, which he could call upon if absolutely needed. The members he approached were generally from the South or from the Border States, with a few lukewarm Administration supporters from the North included. They were not bitter opponents of the Administration but rather members who wanted to support the Administration when they felt their consciences and their constituencies would allow it. The Speaker did not always approach the same men. Between 35 and 40 percent of those contacted on any one impending vote were also contacted on at least one of the other four votes; or putting it the other way around, the majority on each vote was approached directly by the Speaker only on that one vote of the four.

Nor did the Speaker seem to press the same people too often for "pocket" vote commitments. Only three members gave more than one pocket vote to the Speaker on these four roll calls. These men, two Southerners and one from a border state, were among the most unreliable on the whip polls and had records of somewhat greater than average opposition to the Administration. But, apparently their feelings of party loyalty prompted them to cooperate with the party leadership when possible, or else they hoped for some future favor from the Speaker in exchange.

The polls help to identify waverers, then; and when the leadership so desires it can probably change, at the minimum, ten votes. On the cotton bill in December, 1963, for example—a bill which engendered more than a usual amount of opposition—the Speaker seems to have changed as many as 40 votes in the effort to pass the bill. The cotton bill was the first major piece of legislation to come to the House under President Johnson, and the leadership was exceptionally anxious to win.

¹³ Note that the debt limit bills all came from the Committee on Ways and Means. Chairman Wilbur Mills of this Committee is an unusually powerful and influential House member and helped the Speaker contact the doubtful members. On the Rules Committee issue Majority Leader Albert also helped make some of the contacts.

SECOND CONDITION: PROCEDURAL VS. SUBSTANTIVE ISSUES

We have already seen that party cleavages are likely to vary with issues. From the data now to be reported, it appears that party cohesion on roll-call votes depends also on whether the issue is procedural or substantive.

Most votes, of course, involve both procedural and substantive questions. Even a motion to adjourn can sometimes be partly a substantive issue, if the motion is directed at postponing action on a bill. For example, a few months before House consideration of the Civil Rights Bill in 1964 the Republicans attempted to bring the bill up for floor consideration under the procedure of Calendar Wednesday. Carl Albert immediately moved to adjourn, a motion that carried along party lines. This was a procedural motion contaminated by substantive considerations. Only at the extremes are issues either purely procedural or purely and identifiably substantive. Other motions may be viewed as on a continuum between the extremes.

The hypothesis offered here is that the Democratic leadership can count on total cohesion among Democrats in the House on the most procedural issue—the election of the Speaker—and relatively low cohesion on the votes that are most specifically and narrowly substantive—those on conference reports and on specific amendments to legislation. But in between these three categories lie at least four other types of votes which present various "mixes" of substance and procedure.

The first of the four mixed categories we have labeled "miscellaneous procedure." This includes maneuvers by the majority leader, minority leader, leaders of disgruntled blocs, and even unhappy individuals, to stall in order to prevent certain substantive actions from being taken or to affect their timing. Some of these procedural motions result merely from pique. Others can be important in determining the fate of legislation, as the Calendar ¹⁴ For example, on April 9, 1964, after the Democratic leadership had kept the House in session until almost 1:00 A.M. the preceding day, the Republicans stalled the House for four hours, using various procedural delays.

Wednesday adjournment example has already suggested. The second of the mixed categories comprises roll calls on rules granted by the Rules Committee for the consideration of legislation. The third category is recommittal motions—procedural motions that are almost wholly substantive in intent. Finally, there are roll calls on final passage.

The data on these seven categories of roll-call votes for the years 1961, 1962 and 1963 are presented in Table V. Similar data for the Republicans are also included for contrast. All roll calls taken during these three sessions are included in this analysis except those on which there were less than ten dissenters. Thus, "hurrah" roll calls on matters involving defense and communism—which are taken merely for the purpose of establishing an almost unanimous record of support—are excluded because they involve no party leadership. These few exclusions leave about 100 roll-call votes per session to be examined for these three years. 15

Analysis of the data in Table V yields both findings and problems—problems because the rank order of party cohesion varied somewhat from year to year. This in itself, however, is a finding of some consequence. For the House Democrats, for example, we find cohesion on the election of the Speaker and on final passage remaining about constant, while on more nearly procedural questions of the "mixed" varieties (miscellaneous procedure, adoption of rules and conference reports) it was increasing, on recommittal motions decreasing, and on amendments low but somewhat variable. In a post hoc fashion we can interpret this to mean that over the course of the first three years of the new Democratic Administration the Democrats were able to increase cohesion on procedural questions.

¹⁶ In 1961 there were 101 votes to be examined, not counting 15 "hurrah" votes. In 1962 there were 100 to be examined and 24 of the hurrah variety. In 1963 there were 105 to be examined and 14 hurrah votes.

Generally, however, the data bear out our expectations. Taking the average for the three years, as one moves from procedural to narrowly substantive questions, cohesion decreases. Election of the Speaker, adoption of rules, and miscellaneous procedures are generally the highest in cohesion, with final passage, recommittal motions, conference reports, and amendments following in descending order.

Contrasts with the Republicans are also instructive. Generally speaking, substantive alternatives proposed by the Democrats enlist higher degrees of Democratic cohesion. Thus on adoption of rules, final passage, and conference reports, Democrats obtain higher cohesion than Republicans. On the other hand, on

TABLE V. PARTY COHESION ON ALL CONTESTED HOUSE ROLL CALLS, BY CATEGORY, 1961-1963*

Category	Democrats
	1961	Rank.	1962	Rank	1963	Rank	Average	Rank
	(%)		(%)		(%)		(%)
Election of Speaker	100.0	1	100.0	1	100.0	1	100.0	1
Rules	83.7	4	90.2	2	94.0	2	90.6	2
Misc. Procedure	81.2	5	83.3	5	89.2	3	84.5	4
Final Passage	84.3	3	85.9	3	85.6	5	85.2	3
Recommittal Motions	86.9	2	85.6	4	80.9	6	84.1	5
Conference Reports	77.2	7	82.2	6	89.2	4	82.6	6
Amendments	77.4	6	73.6	7	79.8	7	76.6	7
	Republicans
Election of Speaker	100.0	1	100.0	1	100.0	1	100.0	1
Rules	80.0	4	75.7	7	79.0	6	77.9	6
Misc. Procedure	91.8	2	87.2	2	97.6	• 2	91.9	2
Final Passage	77.9	5	77.1	4	78.8	7	78.0	5
Recommittal Motions	87.7	3	85.4	3	89.9	3	87.8	3
Conference Reports	76.1	6	77.0	5	81.8	5	78.1	4
Amendments	72.5	7	75.9	6	89.0	4	77.7	7

^{* &}quot;Contested roll calls" are those with more than ten dissenting votes. The figures in this table represent the percentage of Democrats and the percentage of Republicans voting alike on the roll calls analyzed.

Republican proposals of substantive alternatives to Democratic measures, and on miscellaneous procedures, we find Republicans cohering better than Democrats. Thus on recommittal motions (almost always proposed by Republicans, often with instructions incorporating a different program), and amendments (usually making the bill more "conservative") Republicans have higher rates of cohesion. This can be partly explained very simply, we feel, by looking at which party is leading at the particular time. Rules, final passage. and conference reports are motions of the majority party. Recommittal motions and, to a lesser extent, amendments, are motions of the minority party. Generally we can conclude that defections in either party are more likely to occur on motions sponsored by the opposition. On motions sponsored by their own party, defections are less likely to occur. These results may also be partly explained by a selective bias underlying the cohesion scores in roll calls demanded by the minority. The minority leadership may not press for a record vote on motions it offers or sponsors unless the prospects are good that the minority members will make a respectable showing of cohesion, or that the majority forces will be vulnerable to a split, or both.

Successes by the Democratic leadership, then, vary with the substantive nature of the issue. The more substantive the issue, the harder the leadership must work to be successful.

THIRD CONDITION: VISIBILITY OF THE ISSUE

The effects of party leadership may also vary with the visibility of the specific matter under consideration. In general we hypothesize that as an issue becomes more visible to the general public, the chances decrease that the leadership will have its way with the members of the party. This is grounded on the proposition that the influence of party can be relatively great in the absence of contrary pressures. Most members want to support the party. It is only when party pressures run contrary to other pressures that defections are likely to occur. We would expect other pressures to increase as the visibility of the issue increases.

The major qualification that needs to be made is that the President obviously chooses to make some issues more visible than others by including them in his legislative program. He hopes that public opinion will eventually be mobilized behind these proposals and make Congressional passage easier. Whether an issue is part of the President's program or not is probably the single most important factor in determining visibility. The tax cut, civil rights, poverty, education, and other such major bills are visible because the President makes them visible. We are suggesting, however, that inside the House the popular opinion factor does not generally work to the leadership's advantage. Unless there is an overwhelming national consensus on some important proposal (and this is rare) members of the House tend to be timid about voting for something that is both controversial and highly visible. Thus the difficulty of the leadership's task is increased by greater visibility.

A second important factor in determining visibility of issues, a factor which may be independent of Presidential support, is press coverage. For example, although the proposed prayer amendment and the attempts to restrict the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in apportionment cases were not part of the President's program, nor on the list of things that he talked about, they gained wide currency as important issues, primarily because of their nature, but also because of extended press coverage. It is worth remarking, in this respect, the way in which newspapers attempt to foment conflict. Numerous times during both the prayer amendment hearings and the reapportionment question newspapermen would gather around the important figures (such as Emanuel Celler, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Judge Howard W. Smith, chairman of the Committee on Rules, and others), and attempt to get them to take positions, state them strongly, and then carry these statements to opposing leaders and so "manufacture" a personal as well as an issue

Another factor affecting the visibility of an issue is its complexity. Generally speaking, simple issues are more visible than complex ones. One of the strategies, therefore, of those opposed to a bill is to oversimplify the issue, or dramatise a single feature of it that will be understandable to the general public. A good example of this was the recent passage of a pay raise for appointed executive officials, civil servants, judges, congressional staff, and congressmen. Only a very small portion of the pay raise bill involved congressional salaries. Yet press coverage and public understanding of the issue tended to focus on this one item to the exclusion of all others. This tended to make that aspect of the bill quite visible and aided the opponents of a pay raise. Of course, the tactic of oversimplification may on occasion be available to a bill's sponsors, too; but ordinarily they carry the broader burden of explaining and justifying it in all its complexity. It is enough for the opponents to find and exploit one visible objection.

¹⁶ See Bernard C. Cohen, The Press and Foreign Policy (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1963), pp. 54-104.

Another good example of a superficially simple and visible issue is that of keeping a limit on the national debt. This issue was voted on five times in 1962, 1963, and 1964, three times in 1963 alone. Although the issue is often characterized as "phony," the Democratic leadership had to labor very hard for passage. Making the issue simple and visible tends to work against the leadership and for the opponents.

The leadership can usually do little to control the visibility of an issue. If it strongly wants a bill, that will automatically make it visible. If the bill is part of the President's program it will by its very nature become visible. The leadership can then attempt to make the issue seem complex. In general, however, increasing the visibility of an issue is a potent weapon in the arsenal of those who oppose the leadership.¹⁷

FOURTH CONDITION: VISIBILITY OF THE ACTION

House procedures guarantee that every major piece of legislation will pass through numerous stages which vary in their visibility to the voting public, the press, the political leaders at home, and even to other members of the House. The hypothesis here is that the Democratic leadership will ordinarily have a greater chance of convincing the "followership" to act in the desired manner on matters that require less visible rather than more visible actions.

The rationale for this hypothesis is similar to the preceding one. Generally speaking, party loyalty is a strong bond. Members prefer, when possible, to go along with the party rather than court the disapproval of leadership. This is not simply a reward and punishment mechanism, primarily because the leadership has few rewards and punishments. It is also a state of mind. To invoke loyalty to the party is a strong sanction in itself.

Although party loyalty is a strong bond, in any given situation it is not necessarily the strongest. For most Southerners, for example, to vote for the civil rights bill is courting disaster at home. However, during the Judiciary Committee's deliberations on the civil rights bill in 1963 one Southerner found himself able to vote with the party leadership in committee at a crucial stage, although he later opposed the bill on the floor. What we are suggesting here is that party loyalty will vary with the visibility of the action which the party leadership expects.

The types of action about which the leaders might make specific requests are numerous. The most visible type of action is voting. But the only fully visible kind of voting is roll-call voting on final passage of measures. Roll calls on most recommittal motions are somewhat less visible because the electorate, at least, is likely to have difficulty in understanding what is involved in such a vote. Roll-calls on specific amendments and on procedural questions usually attract much less attention, being interim moves. The other types of voting (usually in Committee of the Whole)—teller, division, and voice—are still less visible. The possible options for a member who does not wish to vote at all-giving a live pair, giving a regular pair on a legislative question, or purposely absenting himself with no indication of position, as well as promising the Speaker to change a vote if needed—have very low degrees of visibility. Voting in Committee, which often goes unreported, is another largely invisible activity open to leadership requests. Finally, speaking and not speaking on the floor, as well as the general line of argument to be taken there, are less visible activities subject to the requests of the leadership.

The Democratic leaders have to worry most consistently about losing substantial numbers of Democrats on the roll-call votes on recommittal motions and final passage of fairly major pieces of legislation. The reason why recommittal motions may rank relatively high in visibility is that they often carry instructions to the Committee to report back immediately a lesser bill. Conservative Democrats can thereby get credit for voting for legislation, but for a more modest program than desired by the leadership. Occasionally, the recommittal vote will become the most important House vote on a bill. The two most recent notable examples came in 1962 on the Republican motion to recommit the Trade Expansion bill with instructions simply to continue the existing reciprocal trade program for another year, and in 1963 on the Republican motion to recommit the tax bill and tie the $11 billion tax cut to reduced governmental spending.18

¹⁸ The votes on both recommittal motions were substantially closer than on final passage, although the Democratic leadership position was successful on all four roll calls.

¹⁷ For a similar point, see E. E. Schattschneider, The Semi-Sovereign People (New York, 1960), ch. 1.

On some important votes Democratic leaders can count on a higher level of party support on the recommittal motion than on final passage. This was true, for example, of the 1964 votes on the poverty program. Even members unwilling to vote for final passage will try to retain the good will of the leadership on some recommittal motions.

Division and voice voting, because they happen so quickly, and because few members may be on the floor, or know the nature of the choice being made, are very often simply party votes. Many members scurry from the cloakrooms to the floor to vote in support of their party's side, as defined at the moment by the majority and minority floor managers from the substantive committee in charge of the bill. In informal discussions on the floor overheard by both authors, all that many members wanted to know was the position which the floor manager (usually the committee or subcommittee chairman) was taking.

Teller voting, because it takes longer (and makes it easier therefore to identify members as they queue up to vote), and because members are notified by the bell system, is subject to more strenuous efforts by the leadership to keep members in line. More members are likely to vote on teller votes, and a surprisingly large number of reversals of voice and division votes occurs because the leadership has the time to call members to the floor. These exertions are rewarded by a substantial amount of party unity on most teller votes even by members who, if forced to a roll call, would vote against the Democratic leadership.

In August, 1963, the leadership lost two relatively important teller votes on the foreign aid authorization bill. Rather than risk a rout, the leadership adjourned the House and worked much of the evening and next morning in making sure that sufficient numbers of Democrats willing to vote with the leadership would be present for the resumption of the amending process. The leadership also persuaded many Southern members who did not like the aid programs at least to avoid voting on the teller votes.19 Similarly, on the Food Surplus bill in August, 1964, the House actually reversed itself on a number of teller votes after an intervening day in which a highly influential member was requested to, and did, change his vote. Again, in early April, 1964, the Democratic leadership held a solid party front against Republican efforts to amend by tellers a bill establishing a permanent food-stamp plan. Even when the Republicans attempted to inject the race question into the amending process the Southerners held firm. They could act with the party if they so chose because their votes would not be known at home.²⁰

¹⁹ See the Washington Post, August 22, 1963, A1:1, and the Wall Street Journal, August 26, 1963, 2:3.

At times the teller votes of specific members can serve as the cues for the voting of other members. In April, 1963, for example, when the Republicans tried to insert a "Powell-type amendment" requiring non-discrimination as a prerequisite for participating in a program of loans and grants for medical and dental education, the Democratic leaders were successful in getting four of the five Negro Democrats in the House (all except Powell) to vote against the amendment on a teller vote. This made it much easier to keep other Northern, liberal Democrats with the leadership.

The success of the leadership in getting members purposely to absent themselves from the House floor varies with visibility of the action. It is rare when more than two or three Democrats can be persuaded deliberately to miss a final roll call. (Although it did happen, for example, on the second pay bill in 1964—in this case a whole committee, made up largely of opponents of the pay bill, was convinced of the wisdom of taking a trip at that particular time.) But it is not unusual for four to eight members to be so persuaded on a recommittal motion, and for many more to disappear during teller votes.

In the relatively less visible activity of speaking (or not speaking) on legislation on the floor, the leadership can control in part even some of the most recalcitrant members, as well as more moderate "mavericks" from the party position. In December, 1963, the leadership was instrumental in persuading one of the senior Southern Democrats on the Agriculture Committee (and an ultra-conservative) to keep quiet during the debate on the cotton bill because they feared his personal unpopularity in the House would jeopardize the bill (he had planned to speak in favor of the bill). In the fight to defeat the Republican recommittal motion on the 1963 tax bill the leadership was able to persuade George Mahon, then secondranking on the Appropriations Committee and a highly respected Southerner with a moderateto-conservative voting record, to speak against the Republican motion. This occurred shortly shortly after the then chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Clarence Cannon, had double-crossed the leadership and spoken for the Republican motion despite an earlier commitment to Wilbur Mills to speak against it. The fact that Mahon spoke, and made such an effective argument, is credited with convincing a sufficient number of wavering Democrats to help carry the vote.

²⁰ See the Washington Post, April 9, 1964, A3:5, and the Baltimore Sun, April 9, 1964, 8:3.

In summary, then, the less visible the action, the better the leadership's chances of holding the line against defectors. More visible actions can more easily become contaminated by other pressures which reduce the chances for leadership success.

FIFTH CONDITION: CONSTITUENCY PRESSURES

Perhaps the most important single factor which helps to explain why a member deviates from positions taken by the party leadership is the kind of constituency he represents. Members like to vote with the party, to be sure, but they also wish to be re-elected. For some members, on some issues, voting against the party leadership is perceived as a necessary step to re-election.

For a general measure of the extent of party bolting on roll-call votes, we may start with the 58 roll-calls in the House in 1963 in which a majority of Democrats opposed a majority of Republicans. On these votes, the average Democrat in the House supported his party 73 percent of the time, and opposed the party leadership 13 percent of the time; absenteeism, in its various forms, accounts for the remaining 14 percent. The average, however, does not tell the story; individual members varied widely in the degree of support they gave their party. For example, eight Democrats (mostly from the North) supported the party leadership at least 98 percent of the time, while five Democrats (all from the South) opposed the party leadership at least 65 percent of the time.21

Constituency influences show up in characteristic regional and ideological cleavages that result in many departures from the party leadership's line. For example, in 1961 Northern Democrats supported the party 92.7 percent of the time on a series of ten roll-call votes having to do with extending a larger federal role, while Southern Democrats supported these same issues, on the average, only 56.4 percent of the time.²² A number of demographic factors, more specific to each constituency, such as percentage of owner-occupied dwelling units, percentage of non-white population, and percentage of urban population, also relate to roll-call votes and help to explain deviations from party voting.23 The well known affinity among conservatives on both sides of the aisle is a further manifestation of constituency influences working against party leadership. For example, of the 58 rollcall votes in 1963 mentioned above, notwithstanding that a majority of Democrats voted against a majority of Republicans, the Democrats won only 47 and lost 11. Out of the eleven lost, eight were lost to the so-called "conservative coalition" (a majority of Republicans and a majority of Southern Democrats voting against a majority of Northern Democrats).

Although the Southern wing of the Democratic party is the most troublesome area for the leadership (and is, as we saw in discussing the Whip polls earlier, well represented among those whom the leadership must aggressively pursue), a significant number of Northern Democrats also, from time to time, bolt the party position. Sometimes this is because they see their constituents as overwhelmingly opposed to the party position. Sometimes they are probably right in this, and sometimes, to their own peril, they are probably incorrect. For example, Congressman John Lesinski, from a relatively blue-collar district in Wayne County, Michigan, was the only Northern Democrat to vote against the Civil Rights Bill; he apprehended that the so-called "white-backlash" might be severe in his district. Congressman Dingell, also a Democrat from the same area, voted for the Civil Rights Bill. As it turned out, the Republican legislature in Michigan reapportioned the state's congressional districts in such a way as to throw Lesinski and Dingell into the same district in the succeeding Democratic primary. Ninety percent of the new district, however, came from Lesinski's former district. In the primary Dingell won handily. Although it is hazardous to attribute defeat to a single issue, a plausible argument can certainly be made that Lesinski seriously overestimated the amount of white-backlash in his district.

We can say, then, that constituency factors, however useful they may be in accounting for inter-party differences, also help to differentiate among members within the Democratic party, and so to explain deviations from party leadership positions. And, since party representation in the House stems from state and local organizations, whenever a member pleads that his district will not allow him to go along with the leadership, the argument is usually understood and accepted. Constituency factors, therefore, are a powerful force in conditioning the extent of party leadership among the House Democrats.

²¹ Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, No. 14 (April 3, 1964), pp. 649-653.

²² Froman, Congressmen and Their Constituencies, op. cit., p. 91.

²³ Ibid., chs. 7 and 9; see also Turner, op. cit., and MacRae, op. cit.

SIXTH CONDITION: THE ACTIVITY OF STATE DELEGATIONS

We have lately begun to learn more about the function of state delegations as informal groups in Congressional politics—and hence legislation. Alan Fiellin and John Kessel, for example, sketch out the informal relationships among members of the New York and Washington congressional delegations respectively.²⁴ Fiellin suggests that informal groups such as state delegations are the principal socializing agencies for the members and provide them with important cues. David Truman, on the basis of an investigation of 23 state delegations, concluded that the delegation thus tends to constitute a communication structure whose repeated use results in a heightened consensus and similarity of voting among its members. In short, the state party delegation in the House may be a significant alternative cue-giving mechanism within the legislative party, especially on matters whose political implications are ambiguous. Uncertainty is misery and misery loves company.²⁵

One of the implications of this generalization is that state delegations provide important protective mechanisms whereby members of the same state delegation, when voting on an issue ambiguously related to their districts, can partially explain their vote, especially if they perceive their district sentiment incorrectly, as a matter important for the state. "After all," a member might say, "every congressman from this state voted that way."

The support or opposition of state delegations can be of significant help or a hindrance to the leadership. A number of examples will help to illustrate this point.

The first pay bill in 1964 contained a provision for a $10,000 increase in congressional salaries. This bill, on a roll-call vote, went down to defeat in March. The pay bill was again brought up in June with only slight changes, the most significant of which cut the increase to congressmen to $7,500. The California Democratic delegation caucused three times during this interim and voted, in each case unanimously, to oppose the bill unless it retained the original $10,000 raise. Since the California delegation is so large, and since the bill was defeated even with its support in March, to lose the California Democrats on the second bill would be a serious blow to the leadership. A compromise was worked out. however, assuring the delegation that every effort would be made to get the Senate to support a $10,000 pay increase: then the conference might accept the Senate figure. A good deal of time and effort on the part of the leadership was expended in these sets of negotiations.

²⁴ Alan Fiellin, "The Functions of Informal Groups: A State Delegation," in Robert L. Peabody and Nelson W. Polsby, eds., New Perspectives on the House of Representatives (Chicago, 1963), pp. 59-78, and John H. Kessel, "The Washington Congressional Delegation," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 8 (February, 1964), pp. 1-21.

²⁵ Truman, op. cit., p. 250.

Another example of the crucial activity of a state delegation occurred just before the voting on the poverty bill, early in 1964. The North Carolina delegation exacted as its price for support of the program a promise from the Administration that Adam Yarmolinsky would not be appointed to help run it. Yarmolinsky, an able and liberal-minded lawyer who had been borrowed from the Defense Department for the purpose, had been one of the President's main lieutenants in working out the details of the program. For a number of reasons, however-mainly having to do with his activity in helping to integrate southern military installations—he was not acceptable to a number of Southerners in general, and to the North Carolina delegation in particular. After the leadership promised that Yarmolinsky would not be appointed, the delegation gave its support to the program.

Much of the discussion within state delegations does not take place in formal caucus. Members from the same state tend to sit near one another on the floor, to travel together, eat together, etc. Moreover, in a situation where the natural inclination of the majority of a delegation would be to oppose the leadership on a particular piece of legislation, the delegation will not generally caucus unless its leaders think there is a chance that they will derive an advantage by voting with the House leadership after exacting some concession. On the 1962 tax bill, for instance, activity within three southern delegations was crucial in changing a possible Administration defeat into victory. One of these same delegations caucused on the farm bills (feed grains) in both 1962 and 1963 and as a result gave the leadership 75 percent of its votes, whereas the normal pattern was for only 12 percent to 50 percent of the delegation to support the leadership on most important issues.

At the other end of the spectrum are delegations that almost always support the leadership. They generally do not caucus unless they suspect a substantial feeling among them against the leadership position. The activity of the California delegation on the pay bill just discussed is a good example.

Aside, then, from the usual informal communication and cue-giving which state delegations provide for their members, they are also important as bargainers because in numbers lies strength. If the members of a large delegation can all agree on a position, and all agree on what they are willing to settle for, they may be able to get their price from the leadership in return for their support.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

We have attempted to explore six factors which are likely to influence the success of the House Democratic Party leadership: (1) leadership commitment, knowledge, and activity; (2) the nature of issues (procedural vs. substantive); (3) visibility of the issue; (4) visibility of the action; (5) constituency pressures; and (6) the activity of state delegations.

Generally, we have concluded that leadership victories are more likely to occur when (1) leadership activity is high; (2) the issue is more procedural and less substantive; (3) the visibility of the issue is low; (4) the visibility of the action is low; (5) there is little counter pressure from the constituencies; and (6) state delegations are not engaged in collective bargaining for specific demands. Each of these conditions may range widely from high to low. The number of combinations, therefore, is potentially quite large. And as one moves along the continuum from high to low (or low to high as the case may be), it becomes increasingly more difficult for the leadership to prevail.

For analytical purposes we have considered each factor in isolation. It is not to be supposed, however, that each operates independently of the others. It is appropriate to conclude, therefore, with a few observations about their interrelationships.

The most important of these is that leadership activity is a counter-weight to the other five factors: it is integrative, while the rest are divisive. Accordingly, it will be most needed, and is likely to be evoked most strongly, when one to all of the other five are actively operating against the leadership. This situation obtains when most major bills reach the floor, and continues until the vote on final passage. The leadership intervenes only intermittently prior to floor action on legislation, but floor business is leadership business and it rises to its highest intensity at the stage of recommittal and final passage.

Next, since the leadership is at the greatest advantage in dealing with procedural issues, it can afford to relax when only these are at stake: and if it runs into trouble on one of them, otherwise than from carelessness or ineptitude, the likelihood is that one or more of the countervailing factors is strongly in evidence. If it wins, that will be because fewer factors are working against the leadership than on a substantive issue. Correspondingly, when the visibility of an issue is high, it is likely to be more substantive then procedural, and to entail high activity by state delegations, constituents, and the leadership. Under this condition, the leadership is more likely to win when the visibility of the action is low. When the visibility of the action is high (on a roll-call vote), and is combined with a highly visible, substantive issue (as a major proposal of the Administration's usually is), then it will also be combined with high leadership, constituency, and state delegation activity.

Constituency influences operate irregularly, depending upon the nature and visibility of the issue and of the action. Because constituencies also vary a good deal across the country, few issues will arouse interest in every district. Hence, defections from party leadership on that account will vary considerably from one issue or action to the next. We can say, however, that widespread and intense constituency reactions are symptomatic of high visibility, and with visibility go a number of other problems for the leadership.

Finally, the bargaining power of state delegations—and hence the likelihood of their intervention—is low unless other factors in our review are high. State delegations may be quite active in gaining projects for their states, but on more general bills their appearance is a good deal less predictable. This condition seems genuinely independent of the others.

DEEDS UNDER A DOCTRINE: CIVIL LIBERTIES IN THE 1963 TERM*

WALTER F. MURPHY Princeton University

Judged by any standards the 1963 term of the United States Supreme Court was one of momentous importance to the future of the American political system. Most immediately, the Justices once again found themselves embroiled in political controversy, their decisions attacked by the Republican party platform, by the Republican presidential candidate and by many members of Congress.

Among the more notable deeds of the 1963 term were decisions writing into the margins of the Constitution the formula "one man, one vote" as the proper rule for apportioning electoral districts for the House of Representatives and for both houses of state legislatures. The Court also invalidated two acts of Congress, and in the field of criminal justice introduced several new principles while overturning supposedly settled law. In addition the Court again struck down officially sanctioned prayers in public schools.

For its part, Congress seriously considered constitutional amendments to reverse the school prayer decisions of this and previous terms, and to modify the doctrine of the reapportionment cases.¹ The House went so far as to pass a bill to remove from federal courts jurisdiction to hear apportionment suits. After a quasi-filibuster by liberal senators had beaten down a stronger measure, the Senate then adopted a resolution urging federal judges to allow state legislators ample time to redistrict their states. This resolution was adopted as an amendment to the foreign aid bill, but was deleted in conference.

The most personal and perhaps the most

* I am indebted to my colleagues, William M. Beaney and Robert K. Faulkner, and my research assistant, Irving Faber, for reading the manuscript and making many helpful suggestions.

1 For the school prayer amendments see Edward Beiser and William Beaney, "Prayers and Politics: The Impact of Engel and Schempp on the Governmental Process," 13 Journal of Public Law (1965). Among the more important of the proposed amendments to modify the reapportionment decisions were: H. J. Res. 1055 (McCulloch), S. J. Res. 181 (Stennis), and S. J. Res. 185 (Dirksen), all 88th Cong., 2d sess. Within a few weeks of the term's reapportionment decisions, at least 51 modifying constitutional amendments were introduced in Congress.

stinging congressional rebuke to the Justices came on a money matter. In June 1964 the House passed a general pay raise for federal employees, including $7500 for the Justices. Four days later the Court handed down the bulk of the term's state legislative districting cases. During floor debate in the Senate, Gordon Allott, Republican of Colorado-and Colorado was one of the states whose districting had just been declared unconstitutionalproposed cutting the Justices' raise to $2500. While Senator Allott disclaimed any effort "to slap them in the face, or anything of that sort,"2 some of his colleagues were more candid about their intention to punish judicial law-making. In any event, the Senate adopted Allott's amendment, 46-40. The conference settled on a $4500 increase, and much to the disgust of some Court foes both houses agreed to the compromise. Three thousand dollars a year poorer because of their work in recent terms, the Justices were reminded of one use for congressional control of the purse strings.

This paper will first summarize the more important deeds of the Court's 1963 term in the field of civil liberties. The second section analyzes the divisions among the Justices on these issues, and the third section examines some of the larger doctrinal implications of recent decisions as well as their possible political effects.

I. DEEDS

As has typically occurred in the last quarter century, questions of civil liberties formed the most significant part of the business of the 1963 term of the Court. These decisions will be analyzed here under three sub-headings, Criminal Justice, Freedom of Political Expression and Association, and Discrimination against Insular Minorities. Reasons for the choice of these categories will be fully explained in Section III of this paper.

Criminal Justice. A large number of cases related to procedural and substantive guarantees in criminal trials, and these were generally decided in favor of the rights of the accused.³ Two cases reversed convictions because of systematic exclusion of Negroes from juries; another overruled Stein v. New York and held that, in a state court, the voluntariness of a confession must be determined by the trial judge and may not be submitted to the jury along with the question of guilt or innocence. Malloy v. Hogan buried the 56-year-old doctrine of Twining v. New Jersey and applied to the states the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against self-incrimination. On the other hand, six Justices held that protection against double jeopardy does not bar the federal government from retrying a defendant who was earlier coerced into entering a guilty plea.

² 110 Cong. Rec. 15312 (daily ed.).

³ The major exceptions were: Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528 (1964); Ungar v. Sarafite, 376 U. S. 575 (1964); United States v. Barnett, 376 U.S. 681 (1964); United States v.

The Court also rejected Governor Ross Barnett's request for protection of his asserted civil rights. A five-judge majority, over dissents from Warren, Black, Douglas, and Goldberg, reaffirmed the old rule that a defendant accused of contempt may be tried without a jury. However, some of the majority Justices undermined much of the effect of this traditional rule by adding the Delphic qualification that the punishment imposed under such circumstances could not exceed that usually accorded to "petty" offenses. In another Healy, 376 U.S. 75 (1964); United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463 (1964); United States v. Welden, 377 U.S. 95 (1964).

In this article I have not tried to summarize every civil liberties decision of the 1963 term. Tables I, II, and III below list all of these decisions, at least those decided by full opinion. For a more complete discussion see Note, "The Supreme Court, 1963 Term," 78 Harvard Law Review 177 (1964).

⁴ Arnold v. North Carolina, 376 U.S. 773 (1964); Coleman v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 129 (1964).

⁶ Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964). Except for two sentences in White's majority opinion, one might have said that constitutional standards would be met if a state required a jury to return a special verdict regarding the voluntariness of a confession. The two sentences read: "Jackson's position before the District Court, and here, is that the issue of his confession should not have been decided by the convicting jury but should have been determined in a proceeding separate and apart from the body trying guilt and innocence. So far we agree and hold that he is now entitled to such a hearing in the state court." Ibid., at p. 394.

⁶ 378 U.S. 1 (1964). See also Murphy v. Waterfront Commission, 378 U.S. 52 (1964).

- 7 211 U.S. 78 (1908).
- ⁸ United States v. Tateo, supra note 3.
- 9 So Justice Clark said in his opinion for the contempt case, six Justices found no violation of due process where the judge who presided at the contempt trial was the same judge who had presided over the main trial at which the defendant had been cited for contempt. A third contempt decision held that before trial in a federal court, a defendant was entitled to a hearing on his attorney's allegation that he had been mentally ill during the period in which the contemptuous acts were committed. In

In three state search-and-seizure cases, the Justices tried to make it clear that Mapp v. Ohio¹² imposed on state courts an obligation to follow the same rules as federal courts in denying admission of unconstitutionally obtained evidence.¹³ A fourth search-and-seizure decision reversed a conviction obtained in a federal court on the basis of evidence secured by state officials in a search without a warrant.¹⁴

Two right-to-counsel cases established new protections for defendants. Massiah v. United States¹⁵ held inadmissible in a federal court incriminating statements voluntarily made by a man under indictment. Federal officers, the majority said, could question a defendant under such circumstances, but they could not use evidence so obtained against him unless his lawyer had been present at the interrogation. Escobedo v. Illinois tried to begin to solve one of the problems raised by Gideon v. Wainwright:16 at what stage of a criminal prosecution does the right to counsel begin? In essaying an answer, the majority reverted to a "special circumstances" rule. After stressing that in this case the accused was a young man of Mexican descent with no previous record of experience with the police, the Court said: "We hold only that when the process shifts from investigatory to accusatory—when its focus is on the accused and its purpose is to elicit a confession—our adversary system begins to operate, and, under the circumstances here, the accused must be permitted to consult with his lawver."17

In reversing a series of sit-in convictions,

Court. United States v. Barnett, supra note 3 at 695 n.

- 10 Ungar v. Sarafite, supra note 3.
- ¹¹ Panico v. United States, 375 U.S. 29 (1963).
- 12 367 U.S. 643 (1961).
- ¹³ Fahy v. Connecticut, 375 U.S. 85 (1963);
 Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964);
 Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 39 (1964).
 - ¹⁴ Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964).
 - 15 377 U.S. 201 (1964).
 - 16 372 U.S. 335 (1963).
 - 17 378 U.S. 478, 492 (1964).

three Justices (Clark, Brennan and Stewart) demonstrated considerable virtuosity not only in avoiding basic constitutional issues themselves, but also in preventing any official Court pronouncement on those issues, even though six of their colleagues wanted the Court to rule on the fundamental questions of constitutional law. In two cases the Court found state action in the form of official encouragement of segregation policies by merchants;18 in another the Court applied the ex post facto prohibition to judicial interpretations of law and set aside the convictions because South Carolina courts had changed their interpretations of South Carolina's criminal trespass law.19 In still another case from South Carolina the Court again used the ex post facto rationale to reverse criminal trespass convictions and found there was insufficient evidence to justify charges of breach of peace.20 In Bell v. Maryland the Court reversed other sit-in convictions to permit the Maryland courts to reconsider the cases in the light of subsequent state passage of an equal accommodations law.21

Avoidance of fundamental issues did not appeal to the Chief Justice or to Justices Douglas and Goldberg. They joined in the Court's opinion, but in concurring opinions written by Goldberg and Douglas these three put forth an argument that, if ever successful in commanding a majority of the Court, would render redundant the controversial public accommodations title of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Reasoning along lines similar to the first Justice Harlan's dissent in the old Civil Rights Cases,²² Goldberg and Douglas concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment forbids innkeepers to discriminate on the basis of race.

Black, Harlan, and White would also have reached the basic constitutional issues. These Justices dissented in four of the five sit-in cases; three of their dissents were written by Black, one by Harlan. They rejected the theory of the elder Harlan's dissent in the Civil Rights Cases, denied that anyone could have been misled by previous state court interpretations of state law, and found no state action ¹⁸ Robinson v. Florida, 378 U.S. 153 (1964); Griffin v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 130 (1964). The ability of three Justices to impose their will on the other six may be the result of the so-called paradox of voting. See my Elements of Judicial Strategy (University of Chicago Press, 1964), pp. 85-7.

- 19 Bouie v. Columbia, 378 U.S. 347 (1964).
- ²⁰ Barr v. Columbia, 378 U.S. 146 (1964).
- ²¹ 378 U.S. 226 (1964).
- 22 109 U.S. 3 (1883).

in a merchant's obtaining police assistance—absent an official policy commanding or actively encouraging segregation—in removing unwanted persons from his property.

Freedom of Expression and Association. The 1963 term had more than its annual share of voting and speech cases. In the 1962 term, a majority of the Court had held in NAACP v. Button that an interest group had a First Amendment right to use—and to urge its members to use the judicial process to accomplish its policy aims.23 Brotherhood v. Virginia24 extended the Button doctrine by ruling that a union had a constitutionally protected right to advise its members to seek, in employer liability cases, the counsel of particular lawyers. Three decisions sustained the right of unions to picket in labor disputes;25 two other decisions, based largely on Edwards v. South Carolina,26 upheld the right of Negro demonstrators to protest publicly against state-sanctioned segregation policies.27 Two cases involving allegations of obscenity and counter-allegations of police censorship found the Justices coming down once more in favor of freedom of expression.28 But on neither occasion could a majority agree on an opinion for the Court, and one of these cases produced the odd result of Warren and Clark joining in protest against a libertarian decision.29

In a series of decisions more directly related to political expression, a unanimous Court once again affirmed the right of NAACP members to freedom of association and for the fourth time reversed Alabama's efforts to prevent the NAACP from doing business in the state.³⁰ The Court also held that provisions

- ²³ 371 U.S. 415 (1963). For a full analysis of this case, see Robert Birkby and Walter Murphy, "Interest Group Conflict in the Judicial Arena," 42 Texas Law Review 1018 (1964).
 - ²⁴ 377 U.S. 1 (1964).
- Liner v. Jafco, 375 U.S. 301 (1964); NLRB
 Fruit & Veg. Local, 377 U.S. 58 (1964);
 United Steelworkers v. NLRB, 376 U.S. 492 (1964).
- 26 372 U.S. 229 (1963).
- ²⁷ Henry v. Rock Hill, 375 U.S. 6 (1963); Fields v. South Carolina, 375 U.S. 44 (1963).
- ²⁸ A Quantity of Books v. Kansas, 378 U.S. 205 (1964); Jacobellis v. Ohio, 378 U.S. 184 (1964).
 - ²⁹ Jacobellis v. Ohio, supra note 28.
- ³⁰ NAACP v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288 (1964). This time the Court's decision stuck and the injunction was lifted. Southern School News (October 1964), p. 7. For a discussion of the background of this litigation see Birkby and Murphy, of Washington loyalty oaths were void for vagueness. Where the "sensitive" field of dissemination of ideas was involved, so White wrote for a seven-judge majority, restrictive regulations must meet high standards of definiteness.³¹

New York Times v. Sullivan reversed a libel judgment against the Times for publishing an advertisement that accused Montgomery, Alabama, officials of interfering with the civil rights of Negroes. The Times, though claiming the advertisement was generally accurate, admitted it contained some false information. Black, Douglas, and Goldberg would have conferred absolute immunity on newspapers to criticize public officials, but the other six Justices would not go so far. In an opinion written by Justice Brennan, the majority held that in order to be outside the protection of the First and Fourteenth Amendments a newspaper's criticism of a public official had to be malicious as well as false. "The constitutional guarantees require," Brennan said, "a federal rule that prohibits a public official from recovering damages for defamatory falsehood relating to his official conduct unless he proves that the statement was made with 'actual malice'-that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."32

In a democratic society, one of the principal uses of freedom of expression and association is to influence electoral behavior, and the Court made the most significant decisions of its 1963 term in this area. The Justices decided eleven districting cases, nine involving apportionment of state legislatures and two congressional districting. Felix Frankfurter had earlier warned that to enter the reapportionment controversy was to throw the Court into a political thicket. His brethren, however, accepted that risk, realizing perhaps that like nine Br'er Rabbits they have historically thrived in that briar patch.

In all nine of the state cases³³ and the one congressional case³⁴ where the proper apportioning formula was at issue, a six-judge majority-Warren, Black, Douglas, Brennan, White, and Goldberg-firmly endorsed the principle of "one man, one vote." These Justices also interpreted that principle to require substantially equal populations in electoral districts for the national House of Representatives and for both houses of state legislatures. Stewart and Clark preferred a more flexible approach than the one man, one vote formula, but both agreed in four of the nine state cases35 that the legislatures were sufficiently malapportioned to warrant correction by judicial action. Clark came to this conclusion in two of the other cases.36 Only Harlan adhered to the view that legislative districting is a political rather than a justiciable

The eleventh apportionment case, Wright v. Rockefeller, 37 revolved around the question whether New York had gerrymandered some congressional districts. Over dissents from Douglas and Goldberg, the Court held that the plaintiffs had failed to prove deliberate rigging of district lines for forbidden purposes. In a relatively minor decision, Anderson v. Martin, 38 a unanimous Court ruled that it was a denial of equal protection for Lousiana to require that a candidate's race be indicated on the ballot.

Discrimination against Insular Minorities. The term "insular minority," discussed in Section III below, is not easily defined. Whatever criteria one might use, however, would probably bring under this rubric cases involving Indians, aliens, denaturalized citizens, members of relatively small religious sects holding to controversial beliefs or practices, conscientious objectors to prayers in public schools, procedural rights of alleged security risks, rights of Communists (at least other than those in the First Amendment), and possibly school integration in the Deep South. The 1963 term settled no cases involving the civil rights of Indians, but representatives of each of these other beleaguered minority groups op. cit. supra note 23 and my "The South Counter-Attacks," 12 Western Political Quarterly, 371 (1959).

³¹ Baggett v. Bullitt, 377 U.S. 360 (1964).

³² 376 U.S. 254, 279-80 (1964). See also Garrison v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 64 (1964), and Harry Kalven, Jr., "The New York Times Case: A Note on 'The Central Meaning of the First Amendment,' " 1964 Supreme Court Review 191.

Davis v. Mann, 377 U.S. 678 (1964); Lucas v. Colorado, 377 U.S. 713 (1964); Maryland Commission v. Tawes, 377 U.S. 656 (1964); Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964); Roman v.

Sincock, 377 U.S. 695 (1964); WMCA v. Lomenzo, 377 U.S. 633 (1964); Swann v. Adams, 378 U.S. 553 (1964); Meyers v. Thigpen, 378 U.S. 554 (1964); Williams v. Moss, 378 U.S. 558 (1964).

³⁴ Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1 (1964).

²⁵ Davis v. Mann, Reynolds v. Sims, Roman v. Sincock, Williams v. Moss, all supra note 33.

³⁶ Maryland Commission v. Tawes and Meyers v. Thigpen, both supra note 33.

³⁷ 376 U.S. 52 (1964).

^{38 375} U.S. 399 (1964).

had their day—and with only one exception³⁹ a successful day—in court.

Even when they did not have a day before the Supreme Court, these minorities sometimes won. United States v. Communist Party, for instance, denied review of a Court of Appeals decision that communist party officers could not be required to register under the Internal Security Act of 1950 because the government had failed to prove that any party official could carry out the registration procedure without incriminating himself under the clause of the Smith Act that makes knowing party membership a crime. 40

Chamberlin v. Dade County upheld the claim of those offended by public prayers, by invalidating Florida's Bible-reading requirements for public schools. Schneider v. Rusk42 reversed a denaturalization order, and in so doing held unconstitutional as an unreasonable discrimination against naturalized citizens that section of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 providing for denaturalization of a naturalized citizen who resides in his former country for seven years. In another denaturalization case, a six-judge majority halted the deportation of the notorious Frank Costello. The Court interpreted the congressional statute authorizing deportation of an alien twice convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude as not applying to a denaturalized alien when the criminal acts had been committed while he was a citizen. 43 On a more technical but less obscure point, Foti v. Immigration Service ruled that Courts of Appeals have jurisdiction to review administrative denials of suspensions of deportation proceedings.44

A third deportation case brought back to the Court the troublesome question of when an American national can be held to have lost his citizenship. At issue was the constitutionality of that portion of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 which provides that an American national loses his citizenship by serving in the armed forces of a foreign nation

- ³⁹ Mrvica v. Esperdy, 376 U.S. 560 (1964), held that an alien had interrupted his residence in the United States and did not qualify as a permanent resident.
- ⁴⁰ Communist Party v. United States, 331 F. 2d 807 (1964); cert. den., 377 U.S. 968 (1964). Cf. Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 367 U.S. 1 (1961).
 - 41 377 U.S. 402 (1964).
 - 42 377 U.S. 163 (1964).
- ⁴³ Costello v. Immigration and Naturalization Service, 376 U.S. 120 (1964).
 - 4 375 U.S. 217 (1963).

without obtaining authorization from the Secretaries of State and Defense. The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit had reluctantly ruled that Herman Marks was a deportable alien because he had lost his citizenship by serving as a captain in Castro's army after the revolutionaries had taken over the Cuban government. With Brennan not participating, the Justices divided 4–4 and thereby affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals. 46

The alleged security risk seeking judicial protection was William L. Greene, whose earlier litigation had been the occasion for a 1959 Supreme Court decision that neither Congress nor the President had authorized in the Industrial Security Program a denial of the right of confrontation of hostile witnesses. This time Greene asked that the government be ordered to give him monetary restitution under the regulations in effect when he began his initial action rather than under later and more restrictive regulations. Seven Justices, over dissents by Harlan and White, agreed that Greene was entitled to collect under the earlier regulations.

On the final day of the term, a group of Communist Party officers succeeded in their efforts to strike down the passport provisions of the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950. Justice Black would have held the entire act unconstitutional, but the majority invalidated only the passport section. For the Court, Goldberg wrote that in excluding members of communist-dominated organizations from passports and in making it a crime for them even to apply for passports, the statute "too broadly and indiscriminantly restricts the right to travel and thereby abridges the liberty guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment." Clark, Harlan, and White dissented.

Earlier in the term the Justices in a unanimous per curiam opinion again emphasized their growing impatience with the slow progress of school desegregation. And in what promises to be one of the last stages of the Prince Edward County case—one of the original school suits brought in 1951—seven members of the Court held that a federal district judge could: (1) enjoin state officials from paying tuition grants to parents of children attending "pri-

- ⁴⁵ 315 F. 2d 673 (1963). See John P. Roche, "The Expatriation Cases," 1963 Supreme Court Review 325.
 - 46 Marks v. Esperdy, 377 U.S. 214 (1964).
 - ⁴⁷ Greene v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474 (1959).
 - 48 Greene v. United States, 376 U.S. 149 (1964).
 - 49 Aptheker v. Rusk, 378 U.S. 500, 514 (1964).
 - 50 Calhoun v. Latimer, 377 U.S. 263 (1964).

vate" schools established to avoid integration; and (2) order those officials to reopen the county's public schools, closed since 1959. Justices Clark and Harlan dissented against the latter part of the ruling but otherwise agreed with the majority that Virginia was denying Negro children equal protection. ⁵¹

In Cooper v. Pate a Black Muslim in the Illinois state penitentiary tried to sue the warden for denying him his civil rights. The Muslim claimed that he was in effect segregated from the rest of the prisoners, and while they were allowed religious literature he was not permitted to obtain a copy of the "Quran." Illinois replied that the Muslims were more than a religious group: they were also a political organization dedicated to "Black Supremacy." More particularly their record in instigating prison riots justified special treatment. The district court and the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit agreed with state officials and dismissed the case as not stating a cause of action. In ruling that there had been no abridgment of civil rights, both courts relied heavily on what they described as sociological evidence—a study by the Chicago police department linking Muslims to prison disorders. 52 In a terse and unanimous per curiam opinion the Supreme Court reversed and sent the case back for a trial on the merits.53

II. DIVISIONS

The decisions of the 1963 term were overwhelmingly libertarian. Whatever the number and range of factors the Justices weighed in making their decisions, they usually managed to tip the scales in favor of the claim of civil liberties, as the data in Tables I, II, and III demonstrate. Of the 64 cases⁵⁴ involving civil liberties claims, 56 (over 87 per cent) were decided in favor of the claimant, and 21 of these 56 decisions (37 per cent), were unanimous.

In recent years Black, Douglas, Warren, and Brennan have tended to vote together. In 1962 Arthur Goldberg came to the Court and immediately joined the libertarian wing. Even on the more difficult cases, this group of five Justices was often able to pick up an additional vote from Stewart or White and not infrequently from Clark. Thus in more than half of the decisions that divided the Court, there were six or more votes for a libertarian result.

No matter what the specific nature of the case, Justice Douglas voted for the civil liberties claim in all but two instances and Justice Goldberg in all but three. In contrast, in all but two of the cases that divided the Court, Justice Harlan found a compelling reason—considerations of federalism or the doctrine of political questions, for example—for voting against a libertarian result.

The data in Tables I, II, and III also qualify any characterization of Justice White as being relatively unsympathetic to civil liberties. In criminal justice and insular minority cases only Harlan was less apt to decide for the claimant; but in cases involving freedom of expression or association, White voted for a libertarian result as often as Black or Brennan and more often than Warren.

One of the more interesting sidelights of these voting records is Hugo Black's relatively frequent votes for what is here classified as a non-libertarian result. Part of the problem, of course, as with all schemes of classification, lies in categorizing a particular vote as for or against civil liberties. In many instances a vote may clearly fall within one or the other category; but in other instances the choice is not so obvious. The issue may not be for or against civil liberties, but rather for or against one of two competing claims to personal freedom. The most salient examples of the latter situation were the sit-in cases. There Black several times voted against Negroes' claims to freedom 55 In Jackson v. Denno, supra note 5, for example, I have counted Black as voting for the civil liberties claim even though he filed a dissenting opinion. I did so because Black said he would have ruled the confession inadmissible because it was obtained under inherently coercive circumstances. Black also dissented from the majority view that a judge would be a better protector than a jury, in such cases, of the civil rights of a defendant. He took a similar position on the question of whether the judge or the jury should determine the existence of a clear and present danger. Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

⁵¹ Griffin v. Prince Edward County, 377 U.S. 218 (1964).

⁵² Cooper v. Pate, 324 F. 2d. 165 (1963).

^{53 378} U.S. 546 (1964).

⁶⁴ Marks v. Esperdy, supra note 45, is not counted here since it was a 4-4 decision, nor is Dresner v. Tallahassee, 378 U.S. 539 (1964), because it was not a decision on the merits, only a determination that there had not been a final decision by the highest state court. The cases in these three tables may be found in volumes 375-378 of the U.S. Reports. I have not listed here those decisions listed under "Memorandum Cases" by the Lawyers Cooperative Publishing Co. This classification does not always coincide with that used by the official reporter of the Supreme Court.

TABLE I. CRIMINAL JUSTICE CASES

Case	Vote	Do	Go	Wa	Br	Bl	St	Cl	Wh	На
Coleman v. Alabama	9–0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Arnold v. No. Car.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Preston v. U.S.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Smith v. Pa.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+-	+	+	+
Leonard v. U.S.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Nagelberg v. U.S.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Michaels v. U.S.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
U.S. v. Behrens	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Murphy v. Commission	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Robinson v. Florida	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Fallen v. U.S.	90	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Stoner v. California	8-1	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Corey v. U.S.	8-1	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Hardy v. U.S.	8-1	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Panico v. U.S.	7-2	+	+	+	+	+	+		+
Aguilar v. Texas	6-3	+	+	+	+	-	_	_	+	+
Massiah v. U.S.	6-3	+	+	+	+	+	+	_	_
Bartone v. U.S.	6-3	+	+	+	+	+	+		_
Bouie v. Columbia	6-3	+	+	+	+	******	+	+	-
Barr v. Columbia	6–3	+	+	+	+	-	+	+	_
Bell v. Maryland	6-3	+	+	+	+	*****	+	+
Griffin v. Maryland	6-3	+	+	÷	+		+	+
Jackson v. Denno	6-3	+	+	+	+	+			+
Fahy v. Connecticut	5-4	+	+	+	+	+			_
Malloy v. Hogan	5-4	÷	+	+	÷	+		_	_
Escobedo v. Illinois	5-4	+	+	÷	÷	+	_	_
Rugendorf v. U.S.	4-5	+	+	+	+			-	_	_
Barnett v. U.S.	4-5	+	.	+		+		_	_
Ungar v. Sarafite	3-6	+	+	.	-	+		_	_	_
U.S. v. Tateo	36	+	+			 		_
U.S. v. Welden	2-7	+	.	_		÷		_	_
U.S. v. Healy	0-9	.	_	_			_	_	_

Pro civil liberties in nonunanimous decisions:

 $20-0 \quad 19-1 \quad 17-3 \quad 16-4 \quad 14-6 \quad 10-10 \quad 7-13 \quad 6-14 \quad 1-19$ from discrimination in eating places open to the public and in favor of the freedom of restaurant owners—in the absence of statutory prohibitions—to select their own clientele.

There is room for reasonable men to differ about which result in the sit-in cases was truly libertarian. Through Black's dissents in these cases, however, runs a theme of deep concern for the effect on public order if a state could not enforce criminal trespass laws against civil rights demonstrators who remain on private property after being told by the owner to leave. Usually when demands of public order have clashed with demands of freedom of expression—and basically these sit-ins are political expression cases, though the majority of the Court did not choose to treat them as such—Black has finally voted in favor of freedom of expression. 56 Moreover, Black's insistence on the primacy of private control 56 See his position in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U.S. 250 (1952); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940); Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951); and Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949). See also "Justice Black and First Amendment 'Absolutes': A Public Interview," 37 New York University Law Review 549 (1962).

⁺⁼ Vote for civil liberties claim.

^{- =} Vote against civil liberties claim.

^{0 =} Took no part in decision.

TABLE II. POLITICAL FREEDOM CASES

Cases	Vote	Go	Do	Bl	\mathbf{Br}	$\mathbf{W}\mathbf{h}$	Wa	$\operatorname{\mathbf{St}}$	Cl ·	Ha
Liner v. Jafco	9–0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	, +
Anderson v. Martin	9-0	+	+	+ .	+	+	+	+	+	+
N.Y.T. v. Sullivan	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Henry v. Rock Hill	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
NAACP v. Alabama	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Steelworkers v. NLRB	8-0	0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Roman v. Sincock	8-1	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Davis v. Mann	8-1	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Williams v. Moss	8-1	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Reynolds v. Sims	8-1	+	+	+	. +	+	+	+	+
Md. Comm. v. Tawes	7-2	+	+	+	+	+	+		+	-
Meyers v. Thigpen	7-2	+	+ .	+	+	+	+		+
Baggett v. Bullitt	7-2	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	-
Books v. Kansas	7-2	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	_
NLRB v. Packers	6-2	+	0	+	+	+	+	_	+
Trainmen v. Virginia	6-2	+	+	+	+	+	+	0
Wesberry v. Sanders	6-3	+	+	+	+	+	+	_	_ `
WMCA v. Lomenzo	6-3	+	+	+	+	+	+	-	_
Lucas v. Colorado	6-3	+	+	+	+	+	+	_
Jacobellis v. Ohio	6-3	+	+	+	+	+		+	-
Wright v. Rockefeller	2-7	+	+						_
Rabinowitz v. Kennedy	0-9		-
Pro civil liberties in non- unanimous decisions:		15-0	14-0	14-1	14-1	14–1	13-2	7–7	7-8	. 0–15

diminions deconstants.

TABLE III. INSULAR MINORITY CASES

Case	Vote	Do	Bl	Go	Wa	\mathbf{Br}	St	Cl	$\mathbf{W}\mathbf{h}$	На
Calhoun v. Latimer	9–0	+	+	+	+	+	****	+	+	+
Cooper v. Pate	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Foti v. Immigration	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+	+
Griffin v. Pr. Edw.	9-0	+	+	+	+	+	÷	+	+	+
Chamberlin v. Dade	8-1	+	+	+	+	+		+	+	+
Greene v. U.S.	7-2	÷	+	+	4	+	+	+
Costello v. Immigrat'n	6-2	+	+	+	+	+	+	_	_	0
Aptheker v. Rusk	6-3	+	+	+	 	+	+	_
Schneider v. Rusk	5-3	+	· +	÷	+	. 0	+	_		-
Mrvica v. Esperdy	3-6	+	+	+			.	_	_
Pro civil liberties in non- unanimous decisions:		6-0	6-0	6-0	5-1	4-1	4-2	2–4	1–5	1-5

⁺⁼Vote for civil liberties claim.

^{+ =} Vote for civil liberties claim.
- = Vote against civil liberties claim.

^{0 =} Took no part in decision.

^{- =} Vote against civil liberties claim.

^{0 =} Took no part in decision.

over property open to the public does not evidence the same sort of value hierarchy as did his opinion for the Court in Marsh v. Alabama.⁵⁷

Black's votes in earlier cases tell a story of a consistent preference, one that makes his sit-in votes seem somewhat strange. But Black's votes do not reveal the entire man; nor do his published opinions. Apparently there has been for some time a strong tension within his jurisprudence. For instance, in Martin v. Struthers, 58 the 1943 Jehovah's Witness case involving the constitutionality of an anti-doorbell ringing ordinance, Black originally voted to sustain the ordinance. At conference and in the opinion he first circulated—as senior majority Justice, Black had assigned to himself the task of writing the opinion of the Court-he stressed that the case involved a conflict of rights, and that the ordinance was a valid means of protecting the privacy of the home. At conference he had emphasized the necessity of guarding the integrity of private property and had expressed fear that the Witnesses would soon be invading Catholic churches to distribute their literature—with predictable results. Black later had second thoughts, withdrew his opinion, and switched his vote. Stone then graciously allowed him to write a new opinion for the Court, this one vindicating Stone's position at conference that the ordinance was an abridgment of freedom of speech. 59

III. DOCTRINES

Protesting against what he felt was too rigid a solution to problems of legislative districting, Potter Stewart charged that the majority Justices were pursuing a particular political theory. Ondoubtedly Stewart was correct, though candor should have required him to add that he, too, was following a political theory, albeit a different one from the majority's. The great difficulty, given the vagueness of many Supreme Court opinions on fundamental principles of jurisprudence and political theory, is to discover the precise nature and implications of doctrines currently dominant within the Court.

Thus it should be said at the outset that problems of evidence require a cautious approach to any jurisprudential interpretation of Supreme Court decisions. The student of judicial behavior is at least as apt to impose his own categories, substitute his personal judgments, and construct subjectively attractive causal links between concepts when he is analyzing opinions as when he is classifying votes. Determining the significance of a pattern of dicta is no less difficult than categorizing, for example, the reapportionment decisions as basically involving questions of protection of "minority" rights or of free access to the political processes. The willingness of the Justices to compromise their views-and occasionally to change their votes of to gain in intra-Court bargaining or to cope with matters of power politics complicates both kinds of analysis, as do problems of literary style and the pragmatic approach to legal issues that American judges so often take.

One might even go so far as to question whether Supreme Court Justices have a jurisprudence in the academic sense of that term. Perhaps "doctrine" would be less pretentious as well as more descriptive, but as Cardozo once observed, each judge is subject to "a stream of tendency, whether you choose to call it philosophy or not, which gives coherence and direction in thought and action." ¹⁶²

Insofar as the majority Justices of the Warren Court, more particularly Black, Douglas, Warren, Brennan and Goldberg, can be said to have accepted any jurisprudential doctrine, it is a revision of that of Harlan F. Stone. ⁶³ Widely known as the Preferred Position Theory, Stone's ideas were first articulated in a footnote to the Carolene Products case in 1938. ⁶⁴ The doctrine was originally drafted by Stone's clerk, Louis Lusky, and edited and amended by Charles Evans Hughes. ⁶⁵ In later cases Stone elaborated his ideas; and after his death, his biographer, Alpheus T. Mason, brought the Justice's thoughts together into a more coherent theory than Stone had had an

^{57 326} U.S. 501 (1946).

^{58 319} U.S. 141 (1943)...

⁵⁹ The Frank Murphy Papers, Michigan Historical Collections, University of Michigan.

⁶⁰ Lucas v. Colorado, supra note 33 at p. 748.

⁶¹ See my Elements of Judicial Strategy, supra note 18.

⁶² The Nature of the Judicial Process (Yale University Press, 1921), p. 12.

⁶³ Arthur Miller contends that it is the political theory of Thomas Hill Green that is now triumphant on the Court. "An Affirmative Thrust to Due Process of Law," 30 George Washington Law Review 399, 416–19 (1962). While I do not agree with Miller on this point, I would like to express my general intellectual debt to this very suggestive article.

⁶⁴ United States v. Carolene Products, 304 U.S. 144 (1938).

⁶⁵ The details are given in Alpheus T. Mason, Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law (New York, 1956), ch. 31.

opportunity—or an inclination—to do during his own life. 65

As published in 1938, Stone's doctrine listed three kinds of cases in which the Court would relax its usual presumption that challenged legislation is constitutional: (1) where a statute appears to fall within the specific prohibitions of the Bill of Rights itself or as made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment; (2) where a statute restricts access to the political processes; (3) where a statute is directed against specific religious, national, or racial groups, or against any "insular" minority so subject to prejudice that it could not have a meaningful voice in the political process.

The civil liberties decisions of the 1963 term can be viewed as falling under these three categories, and they were so arranged in the first section of this paper, though the titles of the categories were somewhat changed. Not only can the decisions be placed in the pattern prescribed by Stone, but much of the language of recent opinions is reminiscent of the Roosevelt Court in its libertarian prime. In the 1962 term NAACP v. Button spoke of First Amendment freedoms as "supremely precious" as well as "delicate and vulnerable" and therefore demanding and deserving the most careful judicial protection.67 In the 1963 term Baggett v. Bullitt, 68 in striking down Washington's loyalty oaths, emphasized the sensitivity of "basic First Amendment freedoms." In Wesberry v. Sanders, Black paraphrased his earlier panegyric69 of the First Amendment to describe the right to vote: "No right is more precious in a free country than that of having a voice in the election of those who make the laws. . . . Other rights, even the most basic, are illusory if the right to vote is undermined." In Schneider v. Rusk, Douglas quoted with approval the statement by a lower court judge—who in turn was quoting Justice Goldberg speaking for the Court—that citizenship is "a most precious right."71

There appears to be either some confusion

⁶⁶ See especially Alpheus T. Mason, The Supreme Court from Taft to Warren (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1958), chs. 5-6, and The Supreme Court: Palladium of Freedom (University of Michigan Press, 1962).

- 67 Supra note 23.
- 68 Supra note 31.
- 69 Milk Wagon Drivers Union v. Meadowmoor Dairies, 317 U.S. 287, 302 (1941).
 - ⁷⁰ Supra note 34 at p. 17.
- ⁷¹ 377 U.S. 163, 167 (1964). Goldberg had made this statement in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 159 (1963).

about which rights are most precious or overgenerous use of the superlative. Moreover it is difficult to distinguish rights under the first eight amendments (category 1 of Stone's doctrine) from First Amendment rights under freedom of access to the political process (category 2). The Perhaps the Justices could reduce the problems if they never again used the misleading title "Preferred Freedoms" (to my knowledge the Warren Court Justices have not used it in recent years) and if they restated Stone's doctrine along the following lines:

First, as the highest tribunal in the nation the Supreme Court must be alert to maintain the integrity of the judicial process, to insure that, where officials from other branches of government undertake to use the judicial process to achieve policy aims, judges will proceed with a scrupulous regard for procedural fairness.

Second, if judges are to presume constitutional legislation affecting economic arrangements, they have a heavy obligation to insure the truly democratic nature of the political process by which such laws are enacted. Courts must thus play a special role in guarding the right to vote and more broadly ensuring that freedom of communication—speech and press—as well as freedom of association are available equally to dissidents as to those espousing currently popular causes.

This rephrasing eases rather than eliminates problems.⁷³ Stone's third category, for instance, is the vaguest of the three. How does a judge determine that a group in a highly pluralistic society is an insular minority? Numbers alone would hardly constitute an adequate criterion of insularity. The du Ponts, Harrimans, Rockefellers, and Kennedys taken together form only the tiniest fraction of the population; yet from time to time they give evidence of being able to stand on their own feet politically.

Race may not be a very useful criterion either. At one time it might have made sense to put most of the Negro cases under this third rubric. Since 1954, however, much racial litigation could just as logically be classed under the Court's role of protecting the democratic nature of the political process. Indeed, one authoritative commentator has suggested that the basic justification for judicial action to end publicly sanctioned segregation can be found under Stone's second category: free access to political process can have no real meaning in a society where government authority imposes caste lines among citizens.⁷⁴

⁷² The reason for this overlap is explained in Mason, Harlan Fiske Stone, ch. 31.

⁷³ For a perceptive critique of Stone's doctrine, see George Braden, "The Search for Objectivity in Constitutional Law," 57 Yale Law Journal 571 (1948).

Some of the difficulties of this third category could be lessened if it were rephrased to read:

Courts have a third special obligation, that of making sure that regulations affecting social or political freedom, particularly where the freedom of specific groups is immediately involved, meet the highest standards of equal protection of the law. In applying these standards the Court will be obliged to look carefully at the actual impact of a regulation, as Yick Wo v. Hopkins 15 so eloquently promised.

There are still other problems inherent in any rejuvenation of Stone's doctrine. First, it does not provide a set of objective standards to guide decision-making. Even those who accept the doctrine may differ fundamentally about important kinds of decisions it requires. Stone, for instance, was adamant in insisting that courts should keep out of the apportionment controversy. At the conference discussion of Colegrove v. Green, 78 so Justice Murphy recorded in his notes, Stone said that judicial intervention in legislative districting "would create confusion in each state. It isn't court business." Again according to Murphy's notes, Justices Black and Rutledge at first agreed with Stone. The original vote on Colegrove was 6-1, with Murphy "passing," Jackson not participating and Douglas dissenting alone.77 Black and to some extent Rutledge later changed their minds. Stone did not live to do

A jurisprudence is not, to be sure, a rigid set of formulae designed to supply quick answers to specific and complex social conflicts. It is to a large extent a means of ordering values—and hopefully shaping attitudes and behavior—in terms of ends that are justified by relatively abstract, morally desirable, and intellec-

⁷⁴ Mason, The Supreme Court from Taft to Warren, chs. 5-6.

75 118 U.S. 356, 373-74 (1886).

76 328 U.S. 549 (1946).

⁷⁷ Murphy Papers and the Harold H. Burton Papers, the Library of Congress, Washington, D. C. I am indebted to Mr. Edward Beiser of Princeton for this latter reference. My interpretation of Murphy's notes was that he first voted with Stone; but Burton's docket book records Murphy as passing and Burton's conference notes report Murphy voted with Douglas. These discrepancies indicate the difficulties the Justices must face in determining their colleagues' views, and serve also as a warning about the historical value of notes jotted down during a lively debate.

tually defensible principles. Nevertheless one may charge that, even as restated here, Stone's doctrine is still defective: insofar as it orders values it does so more in terms of desired procedures than of general goals. If this is a defect, it is one shared by much of American political thought.⁷⁸

A more practical difficulty is that Stone's doctrine offers a role for the Court in only one part, although an important part, of its work. The doctrine offers no help at all in fields where the questions do not involve basic constitutional issues, where for example Congress has formulated only vague general statements of policy and left it to judges or administrators to fill in the wide policy gaps. Does deference to Congress require the Court to make such policy, or does self-restraint require the Justices to override congressional judgment? A complete role theory would have to offer guidelines here, for this kind of problem arises rather often, and it goes to the heart of the function of the Court in the political system.79

Whatever the shortcomings of Stone's doctrine, if the Justices have decided to accept it, scholars can do little beyond writing critical articles and books in an effort to steer the Court onto more promising jurisprudential paths. Other public officials, however, may make the Justices pay a high price for following Stone's doctrine, for it prescribes a very controversial role for the Court, one beset with political no less than with intellectual pitfalls.

Most responsible people would concede that protecting the integrity of the judicial process is a proper task for an appellate tribunal, though there might be—and with the Supreme Court there often is—deep and widespread doubt that a particular court is playing that role properly. On the other hand, there is more widespread and far deeper doubt that protecting the democratic character of the political process is a proper role for the judiciary. Moreover, protection of unpopular and insular minorities—however insular is defined—is by definition likely to be itself an unpopular task. By embarking on a libertarian course that to many people appears to be unduly technical 78 Yves Simon, The Philosophy of Democratic Government (University of Chicago Press, 1951), p. 123, says that in a democratic society "deliberation is about means and presupposes that the problem of ends has been settled."

79 See Martin Shapiro, Law and Politics in the Supreme Court (New York, 1964); and my "Congressional Reliance on Judicial Law-Making," a paper delivered at the 1963 meetings of the American Political Science Association.

in protecting the rights of persons accused of crime, by being solicitous of the political rights of "radicals" and "subversives," and by being acutely sensitive to the civil rights of minorities who wish to rise above their "place" in society, the Justices may invite, as they did in 1954–58, the formation of a powerful coalition determined to overturn a number of individual decisions if not to curb the very authority of the Court. ⁸⁰

One might speculate, therefore, that a libertarian Justice or group of Justices might recognize the dangers confronting their doctrine and might decide that the most prudent course would be to alter the political climate within which the Court operates. In a sense every judicial opinion is an effort to create or maintain a favorable climate of opinion by offering a reasoned explanation for a given decision. The Justices have open to them other means of influencing public opinion, 81 but they might also decide to strike directly at their opponents. Thus a brash observer might see the reapportionment cases as both a part of the Court's general libertarian orientation and as a means to translate that orientation into viable public policy. The majority Justices, this observer might reason, have decided to alter in a drastic way the power of the people most likely to oppose the Court's policies. That is, by their reapportionment decisions, the Justices may have deliberately set out to revamp the political processes and to change the character of the interests and segments of opinion that a majority of legislators are likely to represent.

First of all it must be said that the direct evidence in support of this power-politics interpretation is just about nonexistent. It is true that the reapportionment decisions endorsing the one man, one vote formula occurred only after Warren, Black, Douglas, and Brennan had experienced severe difficulties with Congress and state legislatures and had seen their majority within the Court on some civil liberties issues temporarily wither away. It is also true that as men of considerable political experience—and acumen—the majority Justices must have been aware of the hostile attitudes of many other public officials toward recent libertarian decisions and aware as well of the potential effect of the reapportionment decisions on the structure of political power in this country.

Nevertheless, experience and awareness are not sufficient of themselves to prove or even strongly indicate intent. There is also a time problem here. For years before the Warren Court's problems with other public officials, Black and Douglas had been urging the Court to decide reapportionment cases on their merits.82 And for some time the Chief Justice and Justice Brennan had been indicating that they, too, thought the Court should be hearing such cases.83 Furthermore, Justice White, who joined in the reapportionment decisions and in most of the other political freedom rulings, was much more often than not opposed to a libertarian result in non-unanimous criminal justice and insular minority cases. One would not, therefore, expect him to be anxious to join in an effort to weaken the chances of some of his own views becoming viable public policy, unless of course those particular views were relatively unimportant to him.84

While this power interpretation has no direct evidential support at this time, it is worth pursuing because considerations of political power can never be very far removed from analysis of Supreme Court decisions. This explanation has at least the merit of directing attention to the impact of judicial decisions on public policy and more particularly to the ability of a court to change the nature of the political system within which it operates. That change may be no less significant because the judges did not think through the implications of their decisions and did not deliberately plot a revolution by judicial fiat. No serious student of public law has ever doubted the immense power of the Justices. but this power has usually been viewed in terms of a capacity to limit the authority of other public officials or, less frequently, of increasing their authority by validating controversial courses of action.85 These are significant exer-

⁸² For example: Colegrove v. Green, supra note 76; MacDougal v. Green, 325 U.S. 281 (1948); and South v. Peters, 339 U.S. 276 (1950). The other decisions are summarized in Jo Desha Lucas, "Dragon in the Thicket," 1961 Supreme Court Review 194.

83 Hartsfield v. Sloan, 357 U.S. 916 (1958).

⁸⁴ It is very possible that in the sit-in cases White's values in the criminal justice field clashed with his values in the political freedom field. White voted to affirm the sit-in convictions in each decision that divided the Court.

⁸⁵ See Robert Dahl, "Decision-Making in a Democracy: The Supreme Court as a National Policy-Maker," 6 Journal of Public Law 279 (1957); and Charles Black, The People and the Court (New York, 1960).

⁸⁰ See my Congress and the Court (University of Chicago Press, 1962).

⁸¹ See my Elements of Judicial Strategy.

cises of power, but hardly as significant as the capacity of the Court to change the character of our entire system of representation.

Without denying the potentially revolutionary effect of the reapportionment decisions-again whether intended or not-one might question whether that effect may not be so gradual as to be evolutionary rather than revolutionary. At the outset, one cannot say with any degree of certainty what immediate impact these cases will have. No doubt urban and suburban areas currently are badly underrepresented in Congress as well as in most state legislatures. But how much and exactly how these areas will gain politically depends on how electoral lines are redrawn. Linking of suburban and rural areas in the same districts could have a very different effect from linking suburban and urban areas, or from carving new districts from within urban or suburban regions.

It must also be remembered that new electoral lines will be drawn by legislators chosen under the old-and unfair-system. And it is possible to gerrymander districts of equal population. Indeed, given a pluralistic society, it is probably impossible to construct any representation lines that do not give advantages to one party or to one kind of interest over another. How judges can distinguish inevitable advantage from subtle deliberate rigging, and what they will be able to do about gerrymandering if they detect it, remain to be seen. Here, certainly, is an area in which there are few established judicial standards of judgment.86 Gomillion v. Lightfoot87 did invalidate a crude effort by Alabama officials to gerrymander Tuskegee, but in that situation race was the sole criterion for districting used by the state. When legislators are less crass, judicial difficulties will increase, as indicated by the Court's refusal to grapple with gerrymandering in Wright v. Rockefeller.88

Second, insofar as the Justices have increased urban political power, they may have

. 86 State courts have applied such standards as contiguity and compactness to districting, but these would hardly seem to make gerrymandering very difficult. See Anthony Lewis, "Legislative Apportionment and the Federal Courts," 71 Harvard Law Review 1057, 1066-70 (1958). For an analysis of some of the more commonly used apportioning formulae and suggestions for improvement, see: Alan L. Clem, "Measuring Legislative Malapportionment: In Search of a Better Yardstick," 7 Midwest Journal of Political Science 125 (1963).

weakened or at best have done nothing to increase political support for civil rights. Put quite simply, support for the welfare state does not automatically carry with it respect for the rights of dissenters or tolerance toward other minorities. Available evidence, while hardly conclusive, indicates that although urban working classes may be economically liberal, they are hardly libertarian. 89 They may be somewhat more so than farmers; but by being more exposed to political communication, blue collar workers may also be more vulnerable to rabble-rousing and may choose representatives who are less sympathetic to civil liberties than rural conservatives would be. Cries like "Wipe out crime in the streets!" may strike closer to home in the cities and are not likely to generate support for libertarian decisions in the criminal justice field. The Court's decision in New York Times v. Sullivan,90 while it did free the Times from what was clearly political oppression, formulated a general doctrine of constitutional law that will make it more difficult to control political smears and reckless campaign charges. In fact one of the first uses of the Times decision was to reverse a libel judgment growing out of an irresponsible campaign slur. Washington state representative John Goldmark had obtained a $40,000 verdict against a group who had called him a subversive during the 1962 campaign, but the superior court judge ordered a new trial on the ground that the instructions to the jury had not conformed to the standards laid down in the Times opinion.91

On the other hand, it is probable that the reapportionment decisions will also increase the political influence of the suburbs, perhaps more so than that of the old urban centers. In the middle and upper income groups that ⁸⁹ Much of the available evidence is summarized in Seymour M. Lipset, Political Man (New York, 1960), ch. 4.

90 Supra note 32.

⁹¹ New York Times, December 10, 1964, 23: 1. See also Talley v. California, 362 U.S. 60 (1960), invalidating a Los Angeles ordinance requiring that handbills disclose the name of the publisher and the distributor. For discussions of the serious nature of the problem of securing intelligent and thoughtful political debate, consult the two books by Stanley Kelley, Jr., Professional Public Relations and Political Power (The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1956), and Political Campaigning (Washington, D.C., The Brookings Institution, 1960); and Frank Jonas, "The Art of Political Dynamiting," 10 Western Political Quarterly 374 (1957).

^{87 364} U.S. 339 (1960).

⁸⁸ Supra note 37.

populate the suburbs, the Justices may well find greater support for libertarian decisions, especially for those whose impact does not immediately occur next door. But the Justices are also children of the New Deal-in one or two cases the relationship is avuncular-and economic liberalism is almost as much a part of their background as is devotion to civil liberties. Insofar as the reapportionment decisions increase the political influence of the suburbs, their effect may run counter to economic liberalism in many respects. Suburbanites are apt to back government spending policies from which they benefit, such as improved highways and subsidies to commuter railroads. It is questionable how these people will react to other aspects of the welfare state.92

Third, it does seem very probable that Negro political influence will be increased, particularly in the South, since it is apparently more difficult to discriminate against Negro voters in urban areas. 33 This change may to some extent cut down the incidence of race-baiting, though alone it will by no means end such demagoguery. And while increased representation in southern state legislatures will not automatically bring about the collapse of resistance to integration, such representation will at least turn these legislatures into a forum in which both sides will be heard. 34

Increased Negro political influence will certainly help ease some racial problems; but, judging from past experience, it is not at all improbable that Negroes will be as callous toward the rights of other minority groups as whites have been toward those of the Negro. Perhaps more significant than scattered indications among Negroes of anti-semitism⁹⁵ and ⁹² See James Q. Wilson and Edward C. Banfield, "Public-Regardingness as a Value Premise in Voting Behavior," this Review, Vol. 58 (Dec. 1964), pp. 876-887.

93 See 1961 U.S. Commission on Civil Rights Report (Washington, D.C., G.P.O., 1961), Bk I.

⁹⁴ Georgia, for instance, in 1962 elected to its state legislature the first Negro since Reconstruction. Albert Saye, "Revolution by Judicial Action in Georgia," 17 Western Political Quarterly 10 (1964).

⁹⁵ The New York office of the Anti-Defamation League has a thick file of newspaper reports and analyses of anti-semitism among Negroes. While this evidence is not conclusive in proving the widespread existence of anti-semitism among Negroes, it is still disconcerting to those who had hoped that the Negro would learn and profit from the experience of his white brethren. These reports would come as no surprise to those who more overt hostility toward Puerto Ricans, is the past behavior of white ethnic groups. A recent status as a member of a lower caste group does not appear to have made whites more tolerant of newer immigrants into American society. Irish resentment of Poles and Italians has been as bitter as Yankee disdain for the Irish; and outside the South, white opposition to civil rights legislation—though obviously not against Lyndon Johnson—seems to have its strongest emotional base in working class neighborhoods of first and second generation Americans.⁹⁶

Fourth, it is naive to think that changing the nature of electoral districts will immediately change the nature of the legislative process. Because of public ignorance and apathy on many issues, legislators have considerable leeway in voting for or against measures and far wider freedom in allowing themselves to be placed in a position not to vote at all. The fundamental fact here may be that a legislature is a social system as well as a political institution, a social system in which the character of constituents is an important factor, but only one of many operative factors. 97

Furthermore, although dramatic civil liberties issues are occasionally fought out in the legislative arena, probably the more usual context for these problems, whether of discrimination against minorities, criminal justice, or political freedom, is within the jurisdiction of local police and local prosecutors. It is true that these officials may be applying statutes formally passed by state legislatures or ordinances that technically owe their legality to legislative sufferance; but these regulations typically allow broad administrative discretion, accept the thesis of E. Franklin Frazier in his Black Bourgeoisie (New York, 1957).

For discussions of Negro-Jewish relations, see especially: Kenneth B. Clark, "Candor about Negro-Jewish Relations," 1 Commentary 8 (Feb., 1946); James Baldwin, "The Harlem Ghetto: Winter 1948," 5 Commentary 165 (Feb., 1948); Nathan Glazer, "Negroes and Jews: The New Challenge to Pluralism," 38 Commentary (Dec., 1964); and R. C. Hertz, "Rising Tide of Negro-Jewish Tensions," 20 Ebony 117 (Dec., 1964).

⁹⁶ Direct evidence here is lacking. I say "seems" and base this statement on numerous newspaper stories in The New York Times and The Washington Post and Times-Herald during the fall of 1964 and on my own experience in working for the U.S. Civil Rights Commission in New Jersey.

⁹⁷ See John Wahlke, Heinz Eulau, William Buchanan, and LeRoy Ferguson, The Legislative System (New York, 1962).

and it is difficult to see how they could be otherwise drawn, given the complexity of the problems with which they deal. Ordinary breach of the peace regulations provide ample discretion for local officials to do a thorough job of curtailing civil liberties.

It is also true that strong legislative support for or against certain actions may influence police and prosecutor decisions. This influence, however, may trickle down rather slowly, and a few strategically placed legislators who are hostile to libertarian judicial decisions may encourage police to persist in practices of which judges disapprove.

IV. TOWARD A NEW JURISPRUDENCE

The work of the 1963 term reveals a libertarian majority solidly in control of the Court. Insofar as these Justices have adopted a revised version of Stone's jurisprudence, they are applying it in a more positive fashion than Stone envisioned.98 Instead of merely checking governmental action—though they are doing that in many instances—the Justices are also pushing and shaping governmental action to cope with the problems of twentieth century American society. They have accepted the necessity of big government to help run the complex economy of an urban, industrialized society. But as intellectual heirs of a liberal tradition, the Justices have not lost their fear of government as an oppressor of personal freedom. Nor have they lost their fear of the dangers to personal freedom from non-governmental action.

Edward S. Corwin once showed that historically the basic doctrine of American constitutional law had been one of vested rights99 -a doctrine that eventually asserted an almost unrestricted liberty to use, dispose of, and contract for property and labor. That doctrine died in 1937. Since then the Justices have been formulating, not always deliberately or perhaps even consciously, a new jurisprudence for the welfare state. This new jurisprudence has many facets, but its core, I believe, is composed of two concepts: freedom and social equality. "Freedom" here has been modified to mean political not economic freedom, for the Court has encouraged-not merely tolerated-government regulation of the economy.100 For its part, the concept of equality includes but goes far beyond the old common law standard of equal justice within the courtroom between rich and poor. The new concept is much broader in scope and more activist in effect. It requires judges as well as other government officials to foster equality within society as a whole. 101 The Justices have deemed this aspect of constitutional law so important as to incorporate the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause into the Bill of Rights. 102

The old jurisprudence was subject to serious tensions, and judicial inability to adjust the doctrine of vested rights to a mass, industrialized society led to its downfall. The new jurisprudence, too, is not without its tensions, as the discussion of the possible impact of the reapportionment decisions tried to illustrate. A more fundamental tension, despite a recent denial by Mr. Justice Goldberg, 103 is that between social equality and political freedom. In a society of men of unequal talent, ambition, and character, political freedom may be as dangerous to social equality as economic freedom was. This is not to deny that the Justices may be able to find a way that will allow much of both values to become operational, only to caution that their mutual existence may depend on a delicate process of reconciliation.

The Justices may lack a fully articulated theory of politics to explain and justify their role, or their variety of roles, in the American 100 For example: American Power & Light Co.

v. SEC, 329 U.S. 90 (1946); Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726 (1963); Interstate Natural Gas Co.
v. FPC, 331 U.S. 682 (1947); Phillips Petroleum
Co. v. Wisconsin, 347 U.S. 672 (1954); Wickard v.
Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942).

¹⁰¹ See, for example: Steele v. L. & N. Rr., 323
U.S. 192 (1944); Tunstall v. Brotherhood, 323
U.S. 210 (1944); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S.
1 (1948); Graham v. Brotherhood, 338 U.S. 232
(1949); Trainmen v. Howard, 343 U.S. 768
(1952); Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953);
Brown v. Board, 347 U.S. 483 (1954).

102 Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954).

103 "Equality in Governmental Action," 39 New York University Law Review 205 (1964). At one point Goldberg stated that he believes the framers of the Constitution "naturally assumed that [equality] was encompassed within the concept of liberty." Ibid., p. 207. On this point, Philip Kurland, "Equal in Origin and Equal in Title to the Legislative and Executive Branches of Government," 78 Harvard Law Review 143 (1964), has angrily lashed back at Goldberg in particular and the recent work of the Court in general.

⁹⁸ For a related but somewhat different thesis, see Miller, op. cit., supra note 63.

⁹⁹ "The Basic Doctrine of American Constitutional Law," 12 Michigan Law Review 247 (1914).

political system. They may also lack a coherent philosophy of law to balance liberty against equality and to direct governmental action into socially beneficial channels with a minimum of flooding onto the plains of personal freedom. Yet the Justices do not seem to lack a sense of political direction. Their positive approach to problems of law and policy may mean that they are making different kinds of law than they were thirty years ago; they are hardly making less important law—or less important policy.

MAO TSE-TUNG'S REVOLUTIONARY STRATEGY AND PEKING'S INTERNATIONAL BEHAVIOR*

TANG TSOU
University of Chicago
AND

MORTON H. HALPERIN Harvard University

Despite its political implications, the recent explosion of an atomic device has not greatly altered China's present military position vis-àvis the West. By all standards except population and size. Communist China is still not a first-rate power. But she has nevertheless proceeded to engage the two superpowers simultaneously in a contest from her position of military and economic weakness. What is equally undeniable is that the success of Peking's foreign policy in the struggle with both superpowers, though limited and perhaps only temporary, has considerably exceeded anticipations based on her military and economic strengths. It is the contention of this paper that an explanation of these two striking facts must be sought in the nature of Mao's revolutionary strategy in the Chinese internal political-military struggle and his belief in the applicability of this strategy to the international arena and to other countries, particularly those in the underdeveloped areas. Mao dared to challenge the militarily and economically strong United States because his revolutionary experience proved to his own satisfaction that his integrated and comprehensive strategy would enable him presently to score political gains from a position of military inferiority, and ultimately enable him to achieve highly ambitious objectives with initially meager means in a protracted struggle. This conviction also explains in part his willingness to challenge the Soviet policy of "peaceful coexistence" even at the cost of losing Soviet economic aid and at the risk of an open split in the international communist movement.

The key to the understanding of Communist China's foreign policy lies, accordingly, in Mao's revolutionary strategy and its projec-

* Grants to Tang Tsou from the Joint Committee on Contemporary China of the SSRC and the ACLS, the Social Science Divisional Research Committee and the Committee on Far Eastern Civilizations of the University of Chicago helped make this study possible. Morton H. Halperin wishes to acknowledge the support of the Center for International Affairs and the East Asian Research Center, Harvard University.

tion abroad. This paper begins with a brief examination of the various factors facilitating the Chinese Communists' projection of their revolutionary strategy abroad and with the enumeration of some items of evidence of this relationship between international behavior and revolutionary strategy. It then seeks to define the nature of Mao's revolutionary strategy by an end-means analysis and to show how the various elements of that strategy form a unified and intelligible structure. This reconstruction of Mao's revolutionary strategy on the basis of his writings and his actions is carried out with the hope that it might serve as an initial step in, and a provisional guide for, intensive research on the Chinese Communist revolution. It might also help in future attempts to interpret Peking's foreign policy. This interpretation, if correct, will in turn raise certain theoretical questions about the foreign policy of revolutionary regimes and perhaps even about the international behavior of nations in general.

I. REVOLUTIONARY STRATEGY AND INTERNATIONAL BEHAVIOR

All violent political revolutions start with a group of men who are initially weak in numbers and strength. But in the modern world, no other group of successful revolutionaries was confronted with greater odds, waged a more protracted armed struggle, and survived greater defeats than Mao Tsetung and his comrades. In his tortuous road to ultimate victory, Mao followed a pattern of action and adopted a set of principles which, on many occasions, helped him to achieve political gain from a position of military weakness and which, over a period of time, enabled him to bridge the enormous gap between his highly ambitious goal and his early militarypolitical impotence.

This pattern of action and set of principles followed in time and in logical sequence Lenin's substitution of the conquest of political power for socialism as the end-in-view of the Communist movement and his use of military analogy for the analysis of the revolutionary situation and for the development of a theory of political strategy. This military analogy obliterated the analytic difference between political and military forms of the class struggle and called attention to the relevance of military analysis as a method of formulating programs to deal with political conflict.1 But unlike Lenin, Mao was engaged in an intermittent civil war over a period of more than twenty years before the seizure of power. Thus, Mao went beyond Lenin in his emphasis on the importance of military power, laid down precepts for coordinating its use with political policies, developed the doctrine of protracted war, pursued a military strategy of surrounding the cities from the countryside, and exemplified in his strategies and tactics a combination of prudence with revolutionary enthusiasm. While Mao's doctrines and precepts are by no means profound, they were perfectly adapted to the objective conditions confronting him² and were in the best tradition of Realpolitik and the age-old military-political wisdom of China. They helped the Chinese Communists to win the most bitter and most protracted internal war in the twentieth century.

Furthermore, the Communists' theory of revolution, as Janos pointed out, is the theory of world revolution. To them the analytic categories relevant to domestic and international politics are identical.3 From their viewpoint their revolution to overthrow the Kuomintang government was, among other things, a fight against the lackeys of Western imperialism, particularly American imperialism in the last few years of the struggle; and they have seen their attacks on the West, particularly on the United States, after their capture of power as merely a continuation of their previous struggle. The precarious balance of power in the Far East and Southeast Asia within a world-wide context of American military superiority must have seemed to them analogous to the situation during the larger part of the civil war, when over-all Nationalist superiority was juxtaposed to local Communist strength in particular areas. Moreover, these long-standing principles which brought about ultimate success have a sacrosanct quality. They are immune from challenge by most of the now largely discredited traditional rules.

³ Janos, loc. cit., p. 40.

They are not checked by any principles of the newly established social order, which they themselves helped to bring into existence. Their projection into the international arena is also helped by the relatively short but highly traumatic experience of China as a member of the family of nations. This experience militates against wholehearted acceptance of the system of national states and the rules governing nations in that system. The moral unanimity among the leaders who claim to know the absolute and universal truth reinforces the proverbial Chinese ethnocentrism and strengthens the tendency to view the foreign scene in the Chinese image and to judge alien things by Chinese standards. Thus, it is not surprising that many of Mao's principles and precepts of political-military actions have underlain Peking's policies, strategies, and tactics in the international arena and in each specific encounter with other nations.

As early as August, 1946, Mao set down four theses on the international situation which, with some modifications, continued to guide his foreign policy. First, an all-out war between the United States and the Soviet Union in the immediate future was improbable. Second, the struggle in the immediate future between the socialist and imperialist camps would take place in "the vast zone" separating the United States and the Soviet Union which included "many capitalist, colonial and semicolonial countries in Europe, Asia and Africa." This thesis was the origin of the controversial concept of the intermediate zone. Third, the atomic bomb is a "paper tiger" because "the outcome of a war is decided by the people, not by one or two new types of weapons." Fourth, all reactionaries, including "the United States reactionaries" are paper tigers. "In appearance, the reactionaries are terrifying, but in reality they are not so powerful from the long-term point of view."4 These four theses in what amounted to Mao's first independent assessment of the global situation confronting the international Communist movement⁵ re-

'Mao Tse-tung, "Talk with the American Correspondent Anna Louise Strong," Selected Works, IV (Peking, Foreign Languages Press, 1963), pp. 97-101. Hereafter cited as Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), in order to distinguish it from the fourth volume of Mao's selected works published by Lawrence and Wishart which covers the period from 1941 to Aug. 9, 1945.

⁵ Prior to that time, Mao's pronouncements on international questions generally followed the twists and turns of the Soviet line. See Tang Tsou, America's Failure in China (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1963), pp. 209-16.

¹ Andrew C. Janos, "The Communist Theory of the State and Revolution," in Communism and Revolution, ed. Cyril E. Black and Thomas P. Thornton (Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1964), pp. 32-6.

² Thomas P. Thornton, "The Foundations of Communist Revolutionary Doctrine," ibid., p. 66.

flected his unified strategy in the Chinese revolution, particularly in the period between 1937 and 1945, which will be described later. This assessment of the global situation constituted Mao's justification of his acceptance in July, 1946 of all-out war with Chiang from the viewpoint of the international Communist movement as a whole and placed his revolutionary war within the context of the struggle between two camps.

Soon after the establishment of their regime, the Chinese Communists began to apply Mao's political-military strategy outside of China. In November, 1949, Liu Shao-ch'i, already the second ranking leader in the Chinese Communist Party, declared that the peoples of various colonial and semicolonial countries should follow the "path taken by the Chinese people in defeating imperialism and its lackeys." He specifically identified this path as consisting of Mao's three magic weapons: the united front, armed struggle, and party building.6 In defeating General MacArthur's drive to the Yalu, the Chinese Communist forces successfully carried out Mao's strategy of retreating deep into one's base area, waiting for the enemy to commit mistakes and fighting a battle of quick decision as a prelude to a general counteroffensive.7 In Indo-China, the Viet Minh applied to its own revolutionary war those Chinese methods and precepts suitable to Vietnamese conditions, perfected some new tactics of its own, and ultimately defeated the modern, fully trained, and excellently equipped French Expeditionary Corps. In the Quemoy

6 "Opening Speech by Liu Shao-ch'i at the Trade Union Congress of Asian and Australian Countries," For a Lasting Peace, For a People's Democracy, December 30, 1949, p. 14; H. Arthur Steiner, The International Position of Communist China (New York, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1958), pp. 8–15; A. M. Halpern, "The Foreign Policy Uses of the Chinese Revolutionary Model," The China Quarterly (July-Sept., 1961), pp. 1–16.

⁷ For Mao's doctrine on this point, see Mao Tse-tung, "Problems of China's Revolutionary War," Selected Works, I (London, Lawrence and Wishart, 1955), pp. 210–53. On the actions of the Chinese Communist forces in Korea, see Roy E. Appleman, South to the Naktong, North to the Yalu (Washington, G.P.O., 1961), pp. 667–776; S. L. A. Marshall, The River and the Gauntlet (New York, 1953). For an interpretation, see Allen Whiting, China Crosses the Yalu (New York, 1960), pp. 130–50.

⁸ George Modelski, "The Viet Minh Complex," in Black, ed., op. cit., pp. 207-209; George K.

crisis of 1958, a timely retreat, an early offer to negotiate, and a unilateral declaration of ceasefire kept the military risks and political cost to a minimum and achieved some political gains.9 In the military clash over the border with India in 1962, China inflicted a stinging defeat on Indian forces, and then declared a unilateral cease-fire, thereby exhibiting Mao's strategy of limited victory and restraint. The strategy and tactics of the Pathet Lao both in the coalition government and on the battlefield remind one of Mao's principles and precepts. Whether or not the Chinese Communists have given aid and advice to the rebels in the Congo, they certainly believe that their revolutionary experience holds important lessons for the Congolese. 10 Several documents issued in the dispute between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist Party of China show that Mao is pursuing the global, long-term strategy against the West of encircling the developed areas from the underdeveloped areas, which is a projection abroad of his strategy of surrounding the cities from the countryside in the Chinese civil war.11

The Chinese Communist leaders are highly self-conscious of their revolutionary mission. The late Marshal Lo Jung-huan told the cadres in the Political Academy in October, 1960: "At present, revisionism is spreading. The world revolution relies on the thought of Mao Tse-tung... [The thought of Mao Tse-tung] belongs not only to China but also has its international implications." Another recent Tanham, Communist Revolutionary Warfare, the Viet Minh in Indo-China (New York, 1961), pp. 23-8.

⁹ Robert W. Barnett, "Quemoy: the Use and Consequences of Nuclear Deterrence" (mimeographed) (Cambridge, Center for International Affairs, Harvard University, 1960); Alice Langley Hsieh, Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Era (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1962), pp. 119-30; Donald Zagoria, The Sino-Soviet Conflict, 1956-1961 (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1962), pp. 213-215; John R. Thomas, "Soviet Behavior in the Quemoy Crisis of 1958," Orbis (Spring, 1962), pp. 38-9; Tang Tsou, The Embroilment of Quemoy: Mao, Chiang, and Dulles (Salt Lake City, University of Utah Press, 1959).

¹⁰ Editorial, Jen-min jih-pao, June 24, 1964, p. 1. ¹¹ Tang Tsou, "Mao Tse-tung and Peaceful Coexistence," Orbis (Spring, 1964), pp. 36-51. For an interpretation of the struggle for power in China, see Tang Tsou, America's Failure in China, pp. 48-56, 127-141, 186-92, 300-311, 401-40.

11a Kung-tso t'ung-hsün [Work Correspondence] official analysis of the international situation contains the following prognosis: "Peaceful co-existence [with many countries other than the United States] or coexistence through stalemate [with the United States] is a transitional form. So is pacifist neutralism. The life of imperialism will necessarily come to an end; socialism will one day be realized throughout the world." Marshal Yeh Chien-ying declared:

No other nation in the world has more experience [in fighting a war] than we.... The nations which have not yet been liberated also want to overthrow imperialism and feudalism... and to wage armed struggle. They very much need our experience. Therefore, we should sum up our experience to hand it down to posterity and to present it to our friends. 110

As this experience is most relevant to the struggle of the "national liberation movement" in the underdeveloped areas, Peking accords a high priority in her foreign policy to the support of these movements. A military journal explained it this way:

Toward national liberation movements in colonial and semi-colonial countries, there are two different attitudes. One makes the improvement of relations with the West a primary concern and does not support or gives small amount of support to the national liberation movements. The other makes support for national liberation movements a primary concern. It permits some proper dealings with the Western countries but considers this a secondary question. Our country adopts the latter attitude, firmly supporting the national liberation movements and opposing colonialism and imperialism. We may have dealings with Western countries but do not bargain away our support for national liberation movements. 11d

So Peking's policy is actively to cultivate close relationships with countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, but not the Western countries, particularly the United States. In 1961, Africa was regarded as the center of the anti-colonial struggle. "When the time is ripe, a revolutionary upsurge will engulf the African continent." Even the Taiwan question is viewed in the broad context of the world-wide struggle against the United States in which "one incautious move will cause the loss of the game."11f If Communist China, "a newly emerging socialist country," should yield to the United States and allow imperialist forces to hold her territory, Taiwan, "her international prestige will drop ten thousand feet."11g By refusing to compromise on the issue of Taiwan and by keeping Sino-American relations in a stalemate, "we can keep the anti-imperialist banner, freely support the national liberation struggle in the colonial and semi-colonial countries, preserve our ability to attract political support, and stimulate our morale.11h Marshal Chen Yi, the Foreign Minister, summed up Peking's approach to international affairs neatly when he affirmed in September, 1964. that Mao's strategical and tactical thinking, together with the policies and general lines of the Party center, were the principal guides for Communist China's analysis of international problems in the past fifteen years.11i It is clear that Mao's revolutionary strategy in the struggle in China is a recurrent element in Peking's international behavior.

no. 8 (Feb. 2, 1961), pp. 16, 17. The Work Correspondence is a secret journal, designed for reading by the cadres of the People's Liberation Army at the regimental level and above. Hereafter cited as Work Correspondence.

II. THE BALANCE OF FORCES IN CHINA

To understand Mao's doctrines and precepts of political-military action in the civil struggle, one must begin with Mao's firm grasp of the contrast between his highly ambitious goal and his initially meager means—a contrast which is relevant to our analysis of his foreign policies, strategies and tactics. This highly ambitious goal of seizure of power as a first step toward the eventual establishment of a communist society was defined for him by ideology. But he was realistic enough to recognize that for a long time to come, the balance of social forces would not be in his favor. He described the Chinese society as having "a shape bulging out in the middle while tapering off towards the two ends."12 In more concrete terms, this imagery meant that the proletariat, on the one hand, and the "reactionary big landlords and big big bourgeoisie," on the other, formed a small minority of the population, while the peasantry, urban petty bourgeoisie and the other intermediate classes constituted the ¹¹b Ibid., no. 17 (April 25, 1961), p. 20.

¹¹⁰ Ibid., no. 12 (March 10, 1961), p. 4.

¹¹d Ibid., no. 17 (April 25, 1961), p. 22.

¹¹a Ibid., p. 23.

¹¹f Ibid., p. 20.

¹¹g Ibid., p. 25.

¹¹h Ibid., p. 24.

¹¹ⁱ Chen Yi, "Commemorating the Thirtieth Anniversary of the Publication of the Shih-chieh chih-shih," Shih-chieh chih-shih, Sept. 10, 1964, p. 1.

¹² Mao Tse-tung, Selected Works, III (London, Lawrence and Wishart, 1954), p. 239.

vast majority.¹³ Within this social structure, the balance of power between the "two ends" favored the "landlord class and big bourgeosie," with the intermediate classes under the influence of the counterrevolutionary forces.¹⁴ Thus, two of the characteristics of China's revolutionary war in its early stages were the "great strength of the enemy" and "the weakness and small size of the Red Army."¹⁵

But in spite of its military strength and its cunning, the enemy had its congenital weakness which was political, social and economic in character. Based on a frail capitalist system and a preponderantly "semi-feudal" economy, it could not effectively mobilize its resources. Presiding over a vast territory, it could not effectively govern every part of the country. Rent by numerous internal contradictions, it was split into factions perpetually fighting one another. Monopolizing political power, it could not win the cooperation of non-Kuomintang political groups. Exploiting the masses, it could not enlist popular support. Thus, it was vulnerable to the challenge of the revolutionary forces.

III. AN INTEGRATED STRATEGY TO ACHIEVE AMBITIOUS GOALS WITH MEAGER MEANS

In making this successful challenge, Mao's genius consisted in combining an ability to face reality squarely and a determination to change that reality. On the one hand, he fully realized the gap between his goal and his means. harbored no illusion about the relative strength of the Kuomintang and the Communists, and correctly detected the contrast between the Kuomintang's military might and political weakness. On the other hand, he gradually evolved a set of doctrines, principles and precepts governing his political-military actions which would in the first instance enable him to survive the attack of the vastly superior Nationalist forces, then to expand his own power, and finally to transform the balance of social forces in his favor, and to attain ultimate victory in the revolution.

He stressed the indispensability of military power to achieve political purposes and implement political policies. He emphasized the primacy of political purpose and policies to provide military power with the necessary foundation and direction and to exploit the political weakness of the Kuomintang in order to compensate for his own military inferiority.

As his grand strategy, he evolved the concept of surrounding the cities from the countryside. Concerning the duration of his revolution, he formulated the doctrine of protracted war. Concerning the form of military operations, he developed a doctrine of guerrilla warfare and its gradual transformation into mobile warfare. In military tactics, he followed the idea of retreat and dispersal of forces to avoid defeat, but concentration of forces to win battles of quick decision. As his objective on the battlefield, he subordinated the aim of defending or gaining territory to the goal of annihilating the enemy's effective strength and preserving his own forces. For evaluating the decisive factor in military success, he advanced the notion of the importance of men over weapons. For appraising the strength of the enemy, he proposed the principle that with regard to each particular struggle the Communists should not underestimate their enemies, while with regard to the whole situation the Communists should not overestimate them. He stressed the need to combine prudence with the revolutionary spirit. To avert irreversible defeat, he turned the united front doctrine into a rationale for seeking peace with the Kuomintang. To expand his influence while avoiding an all-out conflict, he practiced limited war. To transform military gains into legitimate authority, he sought political settlement through negotiations in a favorable climate of opinion created by astute propaganda and a moderate political program. To clinch final victory when the balance of forces could be changed in his favor by largescale fighting, he accepted an all-out war. These doctrines, principles, precepts, and practices were consistent with one another and formed a coherent whole. They were in accord with the political, military, and psychological demands of the objective situation. They helped the Communists to overcome tremendous difficulties and eventually to bridge the gap between the bold objective of seizing power and the modest means in the hands of the revolutionaries.

IV. THE INDISPENSABILITY OF MILITARY POWER

Mao realized at an early stage of his career that military power was an indispensable means to attain his revolutionary objective. To Mao, "a revolution is an uprising, an act of violence whereby one class overthrows another." It is, he warned, "not the same as inviting people to dinner, or writing an essay, or painting a picture, or doing fancy needlework; it cannot be anything so refined, so calm and gentle, or so mild, kind, restrained and magnanimous."16 Chiang's ruthless suppression of the Communists in the spring of 1927 and the failure of the Communists to arm themselves against his sudden attack dramatized the fact that sheer survival, if nothing else, depended on the possession of military power. After he established his bases in Kiangsi, he came to recognize that revolutionary violence in China would take the form of armed insurrections and protracted civil war,17 and that the existence of a regular Red Army of adequate strength was a necessary condition for the survival and expansion of the Red political power.18 He characterized the formation and development of the Red Army, the guerrilla units, and the Red areas as "the highest form of the peasant struggle under the leadership of the proletariat in semi-colonial China."19 After having fought a series of campaigns against encirclement and annihilation by the Kuomintang forces, he arrived at the view: "In China war is the main form of struggle and the army is the main form of organization. Other forms such as mass organization and mass struggle are also extremely important and indeed indispensable and in no circumstances to be overlooked, but their purpose is to serve the war."20 Mao urged every Communist to grasp the truth that "political power grows out of the barrel of a gun."21 He pointed out that having guns, we can create Party organizations, as witness the powerful Party organizations which the Eighth Route Army [i.e., one of the two Communist military formations during the Sino-Japanese War] has created in northern China. We can also create cadres, create schools, create culture, create mass movements. Everything in Yenan has been created by having guns. All things grow out the barrel of a gun.²²

¹³ Ibid., p. 260; id., IV, p. 25.

¹⁴ Mao, Selected Works, I, 88-9, 164.

¹⁵ Ibid., pp. 195-6.

Looking beyond the horizon of China, he

- ¹⁶ Mao Tse-tung, "Report of an Investigation into the Peasant Movement in Hunan," Selected Works, I, p. 27.
- ¹⁷ Mao, "The Struggle in the Chingkang Mountains," ibid., p. 100; "Tactics of Fighting Japanese Imperialism," ibid., pp. 164-165; "Problems of China's Revolutionary War," ibid., pp. 192-9.
- ¹⁸ Mao, "Why Can China's Red Political Power Exist?" ibid., p. 67.
- ¹⁹ Mao, "A Single Spark Can Start a Prairie Fire," ibid., p. 117.
- ²⁰ Mao, "Problems of War and Strategy," Selected Military Writings (Peking, Foreign Languages Press, 1963), p. 269.
 - ²¹ Ibid., p. 272.

said: "Experience in the class struggle in the era of imperialism teaches us that it is only by the power of the gun that the working class and the labouring masses can defeat the armed bourgeoisie and landlords; in this sense we may say that with guns can the whole world be transformed."²³ From this, he concluded: "The seizure of power by armed forces, the settlement of the issue by war, is the central task and the highest form of revolution. This Marxist-Leninist principle of revolution holds good universally for China and for all countries."²⁴

V. THE PRIMACY OF POLITICS

To seize power by armed force required a military power superior to the Kuomintang. But the Kuomintang's greatest strength was precisely its military power, while its weaknesses were political, economic and social. To develop a military power in the service of the revolution, it was necessary to adopt certain policies to exploit the political chaos, economic stagnation, social ferment, and nationalistic sentiments fostered by foreign encroachments. These policies, directed at the vulnerable chinks in the Kuomintang's armor, would provide the Communists with a political foundation on which to build their military power and compensate for their military weakness with their political influence. Thus, necessity and political expediency reinforced the imperatives of a revolutionary ideology in ²³ Ibid.

24 Ibid., p. 267. These two sentences are followed by a paragraph in which Mao discusses the application of this principle to capitalist countries. He expresses the opinion that it is the task of the parties of the proletariat there to build up their strength through a long period of legal struggle, and thus to prepare for the final overthrow of capitalism in an insurrection and civil war. This paragraph is omitted in the English version of Mao's selected works published in England in 1958. See Mao Tse-tung, Selected Works, II (new edition, London, Lawrence and Wishart, 1958), p. 223. For the Chinese version see Mao, "Chancheng yü chan-lüeh wen-ti" ["Problems of War and Strategy,"] Hsüan-chi ["Selected Works"], II (Peking, Jen-min ch'u-pan she, 1952), p. 529. The omission in the version published in England in 1958 seems to have been related to the debate between him and Khrushchev over the question of peaceful transition, which was the subject of a statement given by the Chinese Communist Party to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, expounding the former's dissenting view. See Peking Review, July 26, 1963, p. 28.

²² Ibid., pp. 272-73.

stressing the paramount importance of the political purpose and policies which military power was employed to achieve.

At the beginning of the first civil war with the Kuomintang, the political purpose, or in Marxist terminology the content of the revolution, was defined as the overthrow of the rule in China of imperialism and warlords, the completion of the bourgeois-democratic, national revolution under the leadership of the proletariat, and the carrying out of the agrarian revolution so as to eliminate the feudal exploitation of the peasants by the landed gentry.²⁵ "The Chinese Red Army," Mao wrote, "is an armed force for carrying out the political tasks of the revolution."²⁶

The political purpose gave direction to the armed struggle, differentiated the real friends from the real enemy, legitimized the political leadership of the armed forces, and pointed to the political foundation on which military power must be built. "Without a political goal," Mao warned, "guerrilla warfare must fail, as it must if its political objectives do not coincide with the aspirations of the people and their sympathy, cooperation and assistance cannot be gained."27 "Any tendency . . . to belittle politics, to isolate war from politics, and to become advocates of 'war is everything,' is erroneous and must be corrected," Mao wrote.28 A strong Communist party, in theory the party of the proletariat, must take command of the army.29 The agrarian revolution must be deepened to secure the support of the peasants.30 A workers' and peasants' political power must be established in the base areas, to carry out social and economic reforms, to mobilize the masses and to give support to the army. During the Sino-Japanese War, nationalism was used as a powerful tool to mobilize the masses.31 For its part, the army must not only fight to

- ²⁵ Mao, "Why Can China's Red Political Power Exist?" Selected Works, I, p. 64.
- ²⁶ Mao, "On the Rectification of Incorrect Ideas in the Party," ibid., p. 106.
- ²⁷ Mao, "On Guerrilla Warfare," trans. Brigadier General Samuel B. Griffith (New York, Praeger, 1961), p. 43.
- ²⁸ Mao, "On Protracted War," Selected Works, II, p. 158.
- ²⁹ Mao, "Problems of War and Strategy," ibid., p. 228.
- ³⁰ Mao, "The Struggle in the Chingkang Mountains," Selected Works, I, pp. 74, 80; "A Single Spark Can Start a Prairie Fire," ibid., p. 117.
- ³¹ Chalmers Johnson, Peasant Nationalism and Communist Power (Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1962).

destroy the enemy's military strength, but also "shoulder such important tasks as agitating the masses, organizing them, arming them, helping them to set up revolutionary political power and even establishing organizations of the Communist Party.32 In this manner. Mao created the political foundation for his military power, which was in turn his chief weapon in his political revolution. This chief weapon must, however, be employed in conjunction with other instruments and only to gain political objectives within the framework of the balance of military and political forces.33 Thus, the use of military power must be subordinated to political policy, and military action could succeed only when the political policy was correct. As Li Wei-han, the Director of the United Front Work Department points out in an authoritative article, "to win a war we must rely first on politics and we must first win the political war."34

While the political strategy of the Chinese Communists to win the political war went through many twists and turns, its essence was to "develop the progressive forces, to win over the middle-of-the-road forces, and to isolate the die-hards." Or to use Li Wei-han's formulation, the working class must, on the basis of the consolidation and expansion of the worker-peasant alliance, win over all the forces that can possibly be won over and unite with over 90 per cent of the country's population; only so can it establish a strong, over-all leadership, keep the enemy completely isolated and win victory for the revolution.³⁵

Once the intermediate classes were won over and the arch-enemy isolated, the revolutionary forces would enjoy such overwhelming popular support that their military power could be progressively developed and the balance of military power would be tipped in favor of the revolution. Mao's mobilization of the peasants and his attempt to win over the

- ³² Mao, "On the Rectification of Incorrect Ideas in the Party," Selected Works, I, p. 106.
- ³³ See Alice Langley Hsieh, Communist China and Nuclear Force (RAND Corporation, P-2719-1), p. 9.
- ³⁴ Li Wei-han, "The Chinese People's Democratic United Front: Its Special Features," Peking Review, Aug. 25, 1961, p. 17.
 - 35 Mao, Selected Works, III, p. 194.
- ²⁶ Li Wei-han, "The Struggle for Proletarian Leadership in the Period of the New Democratic Revolution in China," Peking Review, Feb. 23, 1962, p. 5.

intermediate classes drew new groups into the political arena, extended the base of political participation, and eventually created a coalition of social forces larger and stronger than the political elements supporting the Kuomintang. In turn, military success helped him to win over those who wanted to join the victorious side.

VI. FROM THE COUNTRYSIDE TO THE CITIES IN A PROTRACTED STRUGGLE

While political policies could provide the foundation for the development of military power and give it general direction, they furnished no specific guidance as to how this military power could be used. In the course of his struggle for survival and power, Mao evolved a series of strategic ideas in the light of the objective conditions confronting him. He built his first base area in the border region between two provinces, Hunan and Kiangsi, where the peasants were aroused to revolutionary actions during the Northern Expedition of 1926 and 1927. The terrain being mountainous, it was easy to defend. Being far away from the big cities, the centers of Nationalist power, it was situated at one of the weakest points of local control. Wedged between two provinces, it enabled the Communists to exploit the clashes of interests between provincial authorities. When a split took place within the ruling class and civil war developed among the Nationalist generals, Mao would consider the feasibility of "a strategy of comparatively venturesome advance and expand the independent regime over a comparatively large area by fighting."37 When warfare among the Kuomintang leaders stopped and when peace and stability prevailed in one or several provinces, he would adopt only a strategy of gradual advance while concentrating his personnel to consolidate his political power and military position in the central districts in the red border area. He would pursue a defensive strategy in Hunan where the ruling power was strong, but an offensive strategy in Kiangsi where the ruling class was comparatively weak. In all his military operations during this period, guerrilla warfare and mobile warfare of a guerrilla character were the main forms. The location of his base area, his selection of targets, and the form of military operations enabled him to use his inferior armed forces to his maximum advantage by exploiting the political weakness of the Kuomintang.

³⁷ Mao, "The Struggle in the Chingkang Mountains," Selected Works, I, p. 71. See also "Why Can China's Red Political Power Exist?" Ibid. pp. 67-8.

On the basis of his experience in the early successes of the Red Army and the lessons learned from the defeat in the Kuomintang's fifth campaign of encirclement and annihilation, Mao systematized his views into the strategy of surrounding the cities from the countryside and the doctrine of protracted war.

Some of these views he had adopted or advocated in opposition to the Li Li-san line of organizing armed uprising in major cities and concentrating the Red Army's forces for attacking them.38 Others stood in conflict with the policy inaugurated by Ch'en Shao-vü and followed by Ch'in Pang-hsien, which in September, 1931, again called for the seizure of major cities by the Red Army to win victory first in one or several provinces and which during the Kuomintang's fifth campaign of encirclement and annihilation led to a decision to fight the Nationalist forces in positional warfare instead of guerrilla warfare and mobile warfare.39 Since both the Li Li-san line and the policies of Ch'en Shao-yü and Ch'in Pang-hsien had the support of the Communist International and were based in part on Soviet experience, Mao found it necessary to point out that mechanical application of Soviet military doctrines would lead to defeat. He urged the Chinese Communists to cherish the experience of China's revolutionary war because of conditions special to the Chinese Revolution and the Chinese Red Army.40 His simple yet effective military doctrine was a systematization of his experience in fighting the civil war in which his instinct for survival, earthly wisdom, and the long tradition of Chinese military thinking were his principal guides. It was a product of progressive refinement of his initially rudimentary views formulated in the day-to-day military struggle. It was the realm in which Mao first "creatively ss "Resolution of Some Questions in the History of our Party," appendix to Mao, Selected Works, IV (London, 1956), p. 179; Benjamin Schwartz, Chinese Communism and the Rise of Mao (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952), pp. 141-4; James P. Harrison, "The Li Li-san Line and the CCP in 1930," China Quarterly (April-June, 1963), pp. 173-94; (July-Sept., 1963), pp. 140-59. For an account of the disagreement between Mao and the Comintern in 1927, see Stuart R. Schram, "The Military Deviation of Mao Tse-tung," Problems of Communism (Jan.-Feb., 1964), pp. 51-2.

39 Mao, Selected Works, IV, p. 204.

40 Mao "Strategic Problems of China's Revolutionary War," Selected Works, I, pp. 177, 192.

applied Marxism-Leninism to China" and declared his independence from the Soviet Union. It is also a basic source of his dispute with the Soviet Union today. 41

In Mao's view, a basic characteristic of the Chinese revolutionary war distinguished it from revolutions in capitalist countries, including the October Revolution in Russia. In these the first step was to seize the cities, and then advance into the countryside. In China, the reverse was the correct sequence. Mao's strategy was "to employ our main forces to create rural bases, surround the cities from the countryside and use the bases to expedite the nation-wide revolutionary upsurge." The rationale of this strategy he explained in these words:

Since powerful imperialism and its allies, the reactionary forces in China, have occupied China's key cities for a long time, . . . they [the revolutionary forces] must build the backward villages into advanced, consolidated base areas, into great military, political, economic and cultural revolutionary bastions, so that they can fight the fierce enemy who utilizes the cities to attack the rural districts, and, through a protracted struggle, gradually win an over-all victory for the revolution.44

The vast rural areas were the "home of the broad masses of peasants" where the Kuomintang's control was weak. Devoting themselves "mainly to rural work," the Communists exploited a fatal weakness of the Kuomintang and gradually developed their own military strength to defeat the Nationalists.

Mao realized that the strategy of surrounding the cities from the countryside could not soon defeat the Kuomintang. Thus he developed his doctrine of protracted struggle, of which protracted war was one form. As Mao envisaged it in 1936, this would take the form of the prolonged alternation between the Nationalist campaigns of "encirclement and annihilation" and the Communists' countercampaign. This pattern, Mao predicted, would come to an end when the Red Army became stronger than its enemy, because the Kuomintang lacked the political prerequisites

- ⁴¹ Tang Tsou, "Mao Tse-tung and Peaceful Coexistence," Orbis (Spring, 1964), pp. 36-51.
 - ⁴² Mao, Selected Military Writings, p. 268.
 - 43 Mao, Selected Works, IV, pp. 178, 193-4, 197.
- ⁴⁴ Mao, "The Chinese Revolution and the Chinese Communist Party," Selected Works, III (London, 1954), p. 85.
 - 45 Mao, Selected Works, IV, pp. 190-5.
- ⁴⁶ Mao, "Problems of China's Revolutionary War," Selected Works, I, pp. 198-203.

for fighting a successful counter-campaign against the Communists' campaign of encirclement and annihilation. This forecast was borne out in late 1948 and 1949.

The notion of a protracted war was applied to the Sino-Japanese War with some modifications to fit the new domestic and international situation. Instead of a prolonged alternation between the enemy's campaigns of encirclement and annihilation and the defenders' counter-campaigns, the protracted war would, Mao predicted in June, 1938, pass through three stages: first, Japan's strategic offensive and China's strategic defensive; second a prolonged strategic stalemate; and third, China's counter-offensive. In the first stage, mobile warfare should have been the principal form for the Chinese forces to adopt, with guerrilla and positional warfare the secondary forms. In the second stage, guerrilla warfare should be raised to the principal position, supplemented by mobile warfare and positional warfare. In the third stage, mobile warfare would again be raised to become the principal form, supplemented by positional warfare and guerrilla warfare.47

In the all-out civil war which began in the second half of 1946, Mao again envisaged a protracted struggle, in which the Communist forces would annihilate the Kuomintang's attacking forces one by one over a number of years.48 He discarded the strategic principle, adopted during the larger part of the Sino-Japanese War, that the dispersal of forces for guerrilla warfare should be primary and the concentration of forces for mobile warfare should be secondary—a principle which had given due credit to the mobility and strength of the Japanese forces and had taken advantage of the strategic stalemate created largely by the confrontation between the Nationalist and Japanese armies. He reverted to the rule, developed during the latter part of the first civil war with the Kuomintang, that the concentration of forces for mobile warfare should be primary and the dispersal of forces for guerrilla warfare should be supplementary.

This uncomplicated doctrine of protracted war was developed out of simple principles regarding military tactics and battlefield objectives. Once developed, it gave the latter greater operational significance. Mao's original military tactics were governed by the now famous formula: "The enemy advances, we retreat; the enemy halts, we harass; the enemy tires, we attack; the enemy retreats, we pursue." He cautioned: "Fight when we can win and run away when we cannot." He admitted that "few people run away as much as we do." He urged that "a belated retreat causes more damage than a premature retreat." The battlefield objective implicit in this tactic was the priority given to the preservation of his own forces over the defense of territory under his control.

⁴⁷ Mao, "On the Protracted War," Selected Works, II, pp. 128, 139, 180-1.

⁴⁸ Mao, Setected Works, IV (Peking), pp. 89-92, 103-6, 113-25.

As the guerrilla bands grew into regular units, a greater stress was put on the annihilation of the enemy forces. Mao's formula was to execute a strategic retreat deep into the base areas in order to facilitate the concentration of his forces and to create an opportunity to defeat the enemy there in a battle of quick decision followed by a strategic counteroffensive. 50 In the second civil war, the Kuomintang army had acquired new and more powerful weapons from the United States but its numerical superiority over Communist forces declined. Mao now laid special stress on the method of concentrating a superior force in each engagement to wipe out the enemy forces one by one and placed less emphasis on the need for strategic retreat deep into his base areas.51 Complete annihilation of Nationalist units in battles of quick decision enabled him to seize American weapons and capture Nationalist soldiers to replenish his own forces. In less than three years, it transformed the five-toone Nationalist superiority into overwhelming Communist superiority.

The doctrine that men are more important than weapons fully reflected the nature of guerrilla war in which popular support was the essential ingredient of military success. It was in full accord with the needs of a struggle in which politics played an important role in deciding the final outcome. It was in perfect harmony with the strategy of mobile warfare in which a poorly equipped army sought to defeat an opponent with vastly better weapons by concentrating locally a numerically superior force to annihilate the latter's units piecemeal and seize its weapons.

This doctrine required a complementary set of attitudes. The psychological complement had to cultivate realism in estimating the enemy's present strength, but at the same time bolster confidence in its ultimate vulnerability. It had to foster patience in the face of current difficulties but at the same time sus-tain high morale in the course of the revolution. It had to inhibit impulsive actions leading to defeat but at the same time kindle courage to seize every available opportunity to win a local victory. It had to nourish prudence during the prolonged period of military weakness but maintain the revolutionary spirit which in the long run argued for a basically offensive strategy. It had to promote cool calculaton in the choice of means, but at the same time inspire revolutionary enthusiasm in the pursuit of goals. In short, a synthesis of two constantly opposed attitudes had to be achieved before the doctrine of protracted struggle could be successfully applied.

From the very beginning, Mao's programs of action showed that he realized this necessity. But the synthesis was not easy to attain. Realism, patience, restraint, prudence, and cool calculation are frequently incompatible with the ultra-revolutionism of young idealists and rebels with a cause. Mao had to oppose his cautious military strategy and tactics to what he called "adventurism." His strategic and tactical views did not govern the program of the Party until the "'Left' line of reckless action" under Ch'ü Ch'iu-pai's leadership, the strategy of concentrating the Red Army to attack the major cities under Li Li-san's leadership, and the strategy of waging positional warfare to defend the Soviet area under the leadership of the Returned Student group all led to disastrous defeat.

But prudence must not be equated with a tendency to conservatism. The purpose of acting cautiously was to create conditions for a series of local victories until the over-all balance of forces shifted in the Communists' favor. Mao asserted:

... a revolution or a revolutionary war is an offensive yet has also its defensive phase and retreat. To defend in order to attack, to retreat in order to advance, to take a flanking action in order to take a frontal action, to be devious in order to go direct—these are inevitable occurrences in the process of development of many things, and military movements cannot be otherwise.

He synthesized the prudential and the aggressive elements in his program of action in 1948 as follows:

If, with regard to the whole, we overestimate the strength of our enemy and hence do not dare to overthrow him and do not dare to win victory, we shall be committing a Right opportunist error. If, with regard to each part, each specific prob-

⁴⁹ Mao, Selected Works, I, pp. 124, 222, 244.

⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 203-48.

⁵¹ Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 105.

⁵² Mao, Selected Works, I, p. 202.

lem, we are not prudent, do not carefully study and perfect the art of struggle, do not concentrate all our strength for battle... we shall be committing a "Left" opportunist error.⁵³

Later, in 1957, he stated this thought concisely in these words: "Strategically we should take all enemies lightly, but tactically take them seriously." ⁵⁴

VII. ARMED STRUGGLE AND POLITICAL STRUGGLE—THE QUESTION OF WAR AND PEAGE

1. Changing One Form of Struggle to Another

The strategy of surrounding the cities from the countryside and the doctrine of protracted war provided only guidance on the prosecution of war. But the overriding questions of political-military policy in a protracted struggle were when to seek peace, when to fight a war, and what form the war should take. In his revolutionary struggle with the Kuomintang, Mao was confronted with three different political-military situations and adopted three different policies which, in a sense, parallel the usual choices of a state in the international system under analogous circumstances: to seek peace, to fight a limited war, or to accept an all-out war. But on a deeper level of analysis, Mao's policies can be shown to be quite different. The peace he sought meant merely the cessation of an all-out war and did not preclude limited armed clashes. Conversely, his limited war was waged under the concept of "peaceful struggle." The threat or use of force on a limited scale as one of several instruments of policy was a fairly constant feature of Mao's practice rather than a last resort when nonviolent measures failed.55 In his all-out war, political, economic and psychological measures played a much more important role in deciding the outcome than in conventional war between states in the past.

Mao analyzed the question of war and peace with the Kuomintang in terms of the notions of "unity" and struggle and the concepts of "peaceful struggle" and "armed struggle." During the period of the united front with the Kuomintang against Japan, Mao wrote:

An important part of the political line of the Chinese Communist Party is to unite with as well as to struggle against the bourgeoisie...

- 53 Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), pp. 181-2.
- ⁵⁴ Comrade Mao Tse-tung on "Imperialism and All Reactionaries are Paper Tigers" (Peking, Foreign Languages Press, 1961), pp. 25-6.
- ⁵⁵ Alice Langley Hsieh, Communist China and Nuclear Force, p. 9.

Unity means the united front with the bourgeoisie. struggle means the "peaceful" and "bloodless" struggle waged along ideological, political and organizational lines when we unite with the bourgeoisie, a struggle which will turn into an armed struggle when we are forced to split with the bourgeoisie. If our Party does not understand how to unite with the bourgeoisie in certain periods, it cannot advance and the revolution cannot develop; if our Party does not understand how to wage a resolute and serious "peaceful" struggle against the bourgeoisie while uniting with the bourgeoisie, it will disintegrate ideologically, politically and organizationally, and the revolution will fail; and if our Party, when forced to split with the bourgeoisie, does not wage a resolute and serious armed struggle against the bourgeoisie, it will also disintegrate and the revolution will also fail.56

Mao's thought and practice have since been succinctly explained by Li Wei-han in the following words:

In order to defeat the enemy we must . . . be adept at choosing the most advantageous forms of struggle. The working class party must arm itself to the teeth ... with all the means and methods of struggle so as to be able to make timely changes in the form of struggle to suit changes in the situation. The forms of the struggle can be divided into main or secondary, and which should be the main and which should be secondary. differs under different historical conditions in different countries. The working class and the Communist Party must be good at mastering the main form of struggle under the historical conditions of the time and properly coordinating it with other forms of struggle; only by so doing can they deal the enemy effective blows or firmly maintain the leadership of the revolution.57

⁵⁶ Mao, "Introductory Remarks to The Communist," Selected Works, III, pp. 59-60.

⁵⁷ Li Wei-han, "The Struggle for Proletarian Leadership in the Period of the New-Democratic Revolution in China," Peking Review, March 2, 1962, p. 12. The first instalment of this article appears in the Feb. 23, 1962 issue of the same journal. This is one of the most significant, as well as one of the most revealing articles published in recent years by the Chinese Communists on their revolutionary strategy and tactics. For two other revealing articles by Li, see "The United Front-A Magic Weapon of the Chinese People for Winning Victory," Peking Review, June 9, 1961, pp. 13-6; June 16, 1961, pp. 17-21; "The Chinese People's Democratic United Front: Its Special Features," ibid., Aug. 18, 1961, pp. 11-5; Aug. 25, 1961, pp. 12-8; Sept. 1, 1961, pp. 10-4. For Taking the twenty-two years from 1927 to 1949 as a whole, armed struggle, as Li points out, was the main form of struggle against the Kuomintang and all other forms were meant to serve it. But, as Li goes on to explain, "This does not exclude cases where peaceful political struggle became the main form of struggle in a certain field and in a certain period."58 From 1927 to the establishment of the second united front in 1937, the main form of struggle was armed struggle, which was originally an instinctive response to the Kuomintang's policy of suppressing the Communists by force. From 1937 to July, 1946, it was "peaceful political struggle." In the transition from armed struggle to "peaceful political struggle" as the main form, Mao's policy and initiative played a large role, as we shall see. From July, 1946 onward, it reverted to armed struggle. This reversion was mainly a response to the Kuomintang's policy of driving the Communists from the strategically important regions and using relentless military pressure to force the Communists to accept a political-military fait accompli. But the Kuomintang's policy was itself a response to Mao's strategy of employing limited military actions to expand the territory under his control. Mao accepted all-out war when his policy of seeking a favorable settlement failed and when he saw a good chance of defeating the Kuomintang in a prolonged war despite the superiority of the Nationalist forces in number and arms. Limited war escalated into all-out war. The transitions in both 1937 and 1946 marked the culmination of a series of fluctuating events and Communist moves over a fairly long time during which Mao was preparing for the next main form of struggle.

In Mao's thinking, politics is one form of class war, while open warfare or armed struggle is another. "Politics is war without bloodshed," Mao said, "while war is politics with bloodshed." The transition from one to another was one of the numerous manifestations of the dialectical principle of the identity of contradictions. To Mao, this principle means not only that two contradictory aspects of a thing can coexist in an entity, but also that each "tends to transform itself into the other, to transfer itself into the opposite position." "War and peace," he wrote, "transform them-the relevance of this doctrine to the situation in the Congo, see Jen-min jih-pao, editorial, June 24, 1964, p. 1.

selves into each other," "because in a class society such contradictory things as war and peace are characterized by identity under certain conditions." 60

2. Coordinating One Form of Struggle With Another

Waging both political and military struggles to win "peace," 1935-1937. Mao was not only adept in alternating the main form of struggle in the light of changing conditions to advance his revolution, but also very skillful in integrating the two forms and blending force and diplomacy in dealing with the Kuomintang. The coordination of two forms of struggle to achieve a political objective is one corollary of the general rule that military power is an indispensable means to accomplish a political purpose and that conversely, political purpose must govern the use of military power. It also meant that force was one of the constant instruments to be used in conjunction with other measures. In the period between 1927 and 1937 when armed struggle was the main form, political struggle-in the specific form of appeals and agitations for the cessation of the civil war-was intensified and broadened as the military fortunes of the Communists ebbed or as the possibility of total defeat drew progressively closer.61 In this political struggle, the task of the Communists was facilitated by the political conditions in China created by Japan's aggressive actions: the rising Chinese nationalism demanding internal unity in order to oppose foreign aggression, the opposition of non-communist groups to Chiang's policy of suppressing the Communists first before resisting Japan's aggression, and the divisions within the Kuomintang over policy toward Japan.

During the Long March when the fortunes of the Red Army were at their lowest ebb, Mao in August, 1935, called for the cessation of the civil war. He appealed not only to the Kuomintang armed forces but also to all political groups in China to join with the Communists to form a broad united front against both Japan and Chiang. While Mao's declaration was in perfect accord with the policy of establishing popular anti-Fascist fronts throughout the world proclaimed formally by the Communist

⁵⁸ Li Wei-han, "The Struggle for Proletarian Leadership in the Period of the New-Democratic Revolution in China," loc. cit.

⁵⁹ Mao, Selected Military Writings, p. 227,

⁶⁰ Mao, Selected Works, I, pp. 329-30. See Vsevolod Holubnychy, "Mao Tse-tung's Materialistic Dialectics," China Quarterly (July-Sept., 1964), pp. 3-37.

⁶¹ Mao, Selected Works, I, pp. 153-74, 354-7, 368-74; Charles B. McLane, Soviet Policy and the Chinese Communists, 1931-1936 (New York, Columbia University Press, 1958), pp. 64-5.

International at the Seventh Congress in August, 1935,62 Mao could not have failed to realize that his policy would appeal to the nationalistic sentiments of many political groups and individuals who were not sympathetic to Chiang's policy of "internal pacification before resistance to foreign invasion." If successful, it would help the Communists to break out of their military and political isolation and to neutralize the Kuomintang's military power by political means. Before the year was over, it scored its first success when more than ten thousand students in Peiping took part on December 9 in a demonstration in opposition to the Kuomintang's policy of fighting a civil war and appeasing Japan.63

At the time when he intensified his political maneuvers to end the civil war, Mao also sought to use his military power to bring about the same result. In February, 1936, he made an intriguing military move. He ordered a strong contingent to cross the Yellow River into Shansi province with the aim of driving into Hopeh to engage the Japanese troops directly. This maneuver can plausibly be interpreted as an attempt to trigger a war between China and Japan which would automatically terminate the civil war. It was foiled by Chiang when he dispatched a strong force to block the Communists' eastward drive and ordered his other armies to attack the Shensi-Kansu Red area from the south and the west. Confronted by the overwhelming strength of Chiang's forces, Mao withdrew his contingent to the west of the Yellow River. To derive political advantage from his military retreat, he covered up his withdrawal with clever propaganda and accompanied it with a political offensive. In a circular telegram on May 5 addressed for the first time to the Kuomintang government as well as to other groups, Mao announced the "voluntary" withdrawal of the Red forces, giving as its reason the Communists' desire to avoid fratricidal strife and to keep intact China's strength for national defense. 64 He called for the cessation of the civil war and offered to hold cease-fire and peace negotiations with the Kuomintang army units attacking the Red Army. He abandoned the anti-Chiang slogan and merely urged Chiang to change his policy. Thereby he greatly facilitated the Communist efforts to influence the Nationalist leaders who wanted to stop the civil war and to fight the Japanese. The capability of the remnants of the Red Army to prolong the civil war and to inflict losses on the Kuomintang armies—thus weakening the over-all strength of the nation in the face of Japan's threat—was a strong argument for the establishment of the united front. Beginning in June or July, secret contacts were established between the Communists and Chang Hsüeh-liang and other high commanders of Manchurian and Northwestern armies of the Kuomintang forces surrounding the Communist area. In the field, the Communists conducted an intensive campaign to win over the Nationalist soldiers by using the slogan, "Chinese should not fight Chinese."

Mao's peaceful offensive and propaganda succeeded in inducing Chang Hsüeh-liang and Yang Hu-cheng, respectively the commanders of the Manchurian and Northwestern armies, to accept the idea of forcing Chiang to change his policy. Political support for peace and unity was thus engendered to compensate for Mao's military weakness, and political influence was transformed into military power. This political-military maneuver culminated in the detention of Chiang by Chang and Yang in the Sian Incident.

The respective roles of Moscow and Mao in obtaining the release of Chiang and effecting a peaceful settlement of that incident have not been clearly established by available evidence. In any case, the Chinese Communists themselves subsequently took credit for its peaceful settlement, just as Moscow did. It is described by Li Wei-han as "a great victory for comrade Mao Tse-tung's thinking regarding the united front at a decisive moment in history." In analyzing the reasons for the ensuing cessation of the ten-year civil war, Mao attri-65 Ibid., p. 140. In August, Mao made further concessions. See Edgar Snow, "Interviews with Mao Tse-tung, Communist Leader," The China Weekly Review, Nov. 14, 1936, p. 378. In this interview, Mao said that the Chinese Communists held the same attitude toward Korea and Formosa. "... if the Koreans wish to break away from the chains of Japanese imperialism, we will extend enthusiastic help in their struggle for independence. The same thing applies to Formosa." Ibid.

cit., p. 62, and Edgar Snow, Random Notes on China (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1957), pp. 1-2. For a contemporary report on the Sian Incident, see Edgar Snow, Red Star over China (New York, 1961), pp. 431-78.

⁶⁷ Mao, Selected Works, I, p. 259; Li Wei-han, "The Struggle for Proletarian Leadership in the Period of the New-Democratic Revolution in China," Peking Review, March 2, 1962, p. 13.

⁶² McLane, op. cit., p. 51.

⁶³ For the role played by Liu Shao-chi in organizing this demonstration, see Mao, Selected Works, IV, p. 200.

⁶⁴ Mao, Selected Works, I, p. 371.

butes it not to "the appeals of public figures throughout the country who desired peace and feared war" but to "the armed demands of the Communist Party of China and the armed demands of the Northeastern Army under Chang Hsüeh-liang and the Northwestern army under Yang Hu-cheng."68 The implication is that the civil war was stopped and peace was achieved not through polite appeals or pressure of public opinion but through military strength and armed struggle, although the political struggle in mobilizing political opinion to oppose the continuation of the civil war did contribute to the staging of the "armed demands." This appraisal of the Sian Incident forms a part of Mao's teaching on the transition from military struggle to "peaceful" political struggle as the main form of struggle and on the coordination of the two forms.

Waging military struggle within the framework of "peaceful political struggle," 1937-1946. After the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese War in July, 1937, the informal truce between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists that followed the Sian Incident developed into the anti-Japanese united front. It was formally established in September, 1937. To outside observers, relations between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists deteriorated so rapidly after August, 1938, and particularly after the armed clashes in Hopei and Shantung in late 1938 and 1939 that a united front as the layman understood the term no longer existed. But to the Communists, their policy toward the Kuomintang was still that of maintaining the anti-Japanese united front. Even after the military clashes flared up in the famous New Fourth Army Incident in 1941, Mao continued to affirm the policy of a national united front. This policy found expression in the call in 1944 and 1945 for the formation of a coalition government. In theory, it was in existence until Japan's surrender. 69 The key to this paradox lies in an understanding of Mao's policy of the united front in his own terms and of his practice of coordinating and integrating armed struggle with "peaceful political struggle."

The united front meant, on the surface, unity or alliance with the Kuomintang against the Japanese invaders. But for Mao, unity or alliance with the Kuomintang did not signify wholehearted cooperation with or unconditional obedience to the authority of the Nationalist government. Instead, it was an alliance based on the principle of the "independence and autonomy" of the Chinese Communist Party. 70 The absolute leadership and exclusive control by the Chinese Communist Party over the Communist units and base areas were always strictly maintained. The Communist armies were instructed from the very beginning to carry out a guerrilla warfare on their own initiative and independently of the Nationalist government." Moreover, Mao's policy of the united front did not exclude "struggle against the Kuomintang." On the contrary, it called for an intense struggle within its framework. In the over-all relations with the Kuomintang, this struggle took the form of "'peaceful' and 'bloodless' struggle waged along ideological, political and organizational lines."⁷² In specific situations, it took the form of limited armed struggle, as for instance in the clash between the Communist general, Ho Lung, and the Nationalist general, Chang Yin-wu, in 1938-1939 and the activities of the New Fourth Army in 1940.

Thus, the united front meant merely that "peaceful political struggle" was for the time being the main form of struggle and armed struggle the secondary or subordinate form. Behind it a series of limited armed conflicts ensued which nevertheless did not lead to an all-out war. This policy of expansion by limited conflicts without provoking all-out war was in full accord with the demands of the objective conditions. While the Kuomintang was strong enough to win an all-out war, the Sino-Japanese War rendered an all-out Nationalist attack improbable, though not entirely impossible. Thus, limited conflicts did not raise serious risks of all-out war for the Communists. Whatever the risks, they could, in Mao's view, be minimized, on the one hand by a policy of carefully controlling his own military actions and on the other by relying on his developing strength and limited retaliations to deter the Kuomintang. The limited armed struggles were justified by Mao "as a means to prolong the die-hards' resistance to Japan and the cooperation with us, thereby averting the outbreak of a large-scale civil war."73 However, it did not always exclude the intensification of limited armed struggle. Indeed, it sometimes called for a greater military effort because the strengthening of his bargain-

⁶³ Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 44. Italics added.

⁶⁹ Ibid., IV, p. 240; Li Wei-han, "The Role of the United Front in the Chinese Revolution," Pexing Review, June 16, 1961, pp. 17-8.

⁷⁰ Mao Tse-tung, Selected Works, II (new ed., London, 1958), pp. 67, 69, 218-22. For a discussion of this principle in its historical context, see Tang Tsou, America's Failure in China, 1941-1950, op. cit., pp. 137-41.

⁷¹ Mao, Selected Works, II, p. 67.

⁷² See note 56, above.

⁷³ Mao, Selected Works, III, p. 198.

ing position by military means and the preparation for the possible outbreak of an all-out war were two other features of the political-military struggle.

At the same time, Mao consistently practiced what is now known in the West as a policy of unilateral arms control. In doctrine, the defensive nature of the limited armed struggle was stressed. The concept of "justifiability" imposed a restraint on the frequency of armed clashes. The requirement of gaining an advantage in every engagement restricted the scale of the armed conflict, since the Communist troops could not fight a large Kuomintang force with assurance of victory. The aim of picking out the "most reactionary section" of the "diehards" to strike at first, limited the targets of attack. The injunction to seek "truce" after the achievement of victory in a limited armed clash controlled the duration of each specific engagement. The policy of taking the initiative to seek unity and conclude a peace agreement with the opponent sometimes punctuated the intermittent armed conflicts with periodic negotiations and sometimes made talks at the conference table a form of political struggle paralleling the armed struggle on the dispersed battlefields.74 The four-fold objective of nego-

⁷⁴ In a highly significant passage, Mao wrote: "[W]e must pay attention to the following principles in waging struggles against the die-hards. First the principle of self-defense. We shall never attack unless attacked; if attacked, we shall certainly counterattack. That is to say, we must never attack others without provocation; but once we are attacked, we must never fail to return the blow. Herein lies the defensive nature of the struggle. As to the military attacks of the diehards, we must resolutely, thoroughly, utterly and completely smash them. Secondly, the principle of victory. We do not fight unless we are sure of victory; we must on no account fight without preparation and without certainty of the outcome. We should know how to utilize the contradictions among the die-hards and must not deal blows to many sections of them at the same time; we must pick out the most reactionary section to strike at first. Herein lies the limited nature of the struggle. Thirdly, the principle of truce. After we have repulsed the attack of the die-hards and before they launch a new one, we should stop at the proper moment and bring that particular fight to a close. In the period that follows we should make a truce with them. Then we should on our own initiative seek unity with the die-hards and, upon their consent, conclude a peace agreement with them. We must on no account fight on daily and hourly without stopping, nor become tiation for a political settlement was to prevent the escalation of the limited conflict to an allout war by holding out the possibility of a political settlement; to seek formal recognition of some of the gains already achieved by the force of arms; to influence public opinion; and finally to win time and political support for an all-out civil war, if it did come. To Political bargaining was an intrinsic part of the military and political struggle. This policy of seeking a political settlement while using military power to strengthen one's bargaining position and preparing for an all-out war was continued during the period between the summers of 1945 and 1946.

Supplementing armed struggle with political struggle, 1946-1949. The Communists' shift to armed struggle as the principal form can be traced to the inner-party directive of July 20, 1946, drafted by Mao, in which the Central Committee called on the Communists to smash Chiang's offensive. Mao obviously placed little hope on the negotiations in Nanking between Chou En-lai and Chiang with Marshall as the mediator. He wrote: "Only after completely smashing Chiang's offensive in a war of selfdefense can the Chinese people regain peace."76 In contrast to the military conflicts in the period of the anti-Japanese united front, the present fighting was no longer defined as "waging struggles against the die-hards," but as "a war of self-defense." In August, the Chinese Communists ordered a general mobilization.77 In September, Mao called on the Communists to concentrate superior force to destroy the enemy units one by one in battles and campaigns of. quick decision under the general strategy of a protracted war. 78 In so doing, he reverted to the overall strategic concepts he had developed dizzy with success. Herein lies the temporary nature of every particular struggle. Only when the die-hards launch a new offensive should we retaliate with a new struggle. In other words, the three principles are 'justifiability,' 'expediency' and 'restraint.' Persisting in such justifiable, expedient and restrained struggles, we can develop the progressive forces, win over the middle-of-the-road forces, isolate the die-hard forces and make the die-hards chary of heedlessly attacking us... or heedlessly starting a large-scale civil war. And we can in this way win a favorable turn in the situation." Ibid., p. 199.

75 This use of negotiations gave rise to the familiar pattern of "fight, fight—talk, talk."

⁷⁶ Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 89. Italics added.

77 New York Times, Aug. 20, 1946, p. 4.

⁷⁸ Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 101.

during the first civil war to deal with the Kuomintag forces and during the first and third phases of the Sino-Japanese War to deal with the Japanese. These concepts had been fashioned and applied when armed struggle was the principal form of struggle. Now that armed struggle again was the main form and he was confident of ultimate victory, Mao abandoned the principle of truce he had laid down during the period of the united front when "peaceful political struggle" was the main form. He no longer asked the Communists to "stop at the proper moment" and bring a "particular fight to a close," after repulsing the Nationalist attack. He no longer entertained the idea of seeking on his own initiative a truce and then a peace agreement with the Kuomintang. Instead, he anticipated the possibility that after having halted the Nationalist offensive and recovered part of the lost territory, the Communist forces would seize the strategic initiative and go over to the offensive, and that the destruction of additional Kuomintang units one by one over a period of time would bring about a tremendous change in the relative strengths of the Kuomintang and the Communist Party. When this momentous change in the military situation materialized after the Communist victory in the Liaohsi-Shenyang campaign in Manchuria in November, 1948, he contemptuously dismissed the Kuomintang's overtures for peace and issued a call "to carry the revolution through to the end" by advancing south of the Yangtze River, overthrowing Chiang's regime, and establishing a new government.79 Thus, armed struggle as the principal form meant protracted and all-out war.

Yet even armed struggle as the main form was not incompatible with negotiations, provided they could be turned to the Communists' advantage. In the four months following the shift to all-out war in July, 1946, the negotiations between the Communists and the Kuomintang with Marshall as the mediator continued. Mao's objectives in these negotiations were to put the onus of starting the civil war on the Nationalists, to show the partiality of the United States toward the Chinese government and to rally the minor parties and groups around the Communist Party in opposition to the Kuomintang. Even after the "total national split" occurred in November, 1946, the Communists did not refuse the Kuomintang initiative to reopen negotiations. But they shrewdly attached unacceptable preconditions to the resumption of talks, thus making the Kuomintang appear responsible for the continuation of the civil war. 81 After military defeats in Manchuria, North China and Central China forced Generalissimo Chiang to step down from the presidency in January, 1949, Mao took up Acting President Li Tsung-jen's overtures for peace and turned the negotiations to his own purpose of imposing his own terms, dividing the opponents, weakening the morale of the Nationalist forces, and winning over those who were ready to cooperate with the victor in the civil war.82 Negotiations were accompanied by active preparations for crossing the Yangtze. After Li rejected Mao's terms, the Communist forces swept across the river, fully prepared for the task. These negotiations were obviously one form of "peaceful political struggle" waged simultaneously as the secondary form to supplement armed struggle, the main form.

Another form of political struggle was to induce defections by establishing secret contacts and understandings with Kuomintang officers.83 The government's fear of defection of its troops became, as the American White Paper on China noted, "a restraining influence in the planning of operations and tended to constrict government forces even more deeply in their defensive positions."84 One variation of this form was to secure surrender by negotiating separate peace agreements with local commanders. Another variation was the vigorous application of the long-standing policy of giving lenient treatment to prisoners of war and inducing them to join the Communist forces. In the two years after July, 1946, the communist army absorbed into its ranks some 800,000 former Kuomintang soldiers, which amounted to one third of the total number of ⁷⁹ Ibid., pp. 114, 299-306.

⁸⁰ In discussing the events from July to October, Mao asserted, "More and more people now realize the truth that Marshall's mediation is a fraud and that the Kuomintang is the arch enemy." Ibid., p. 117. See Tang Tsou, America's Failure in China op. cit., pp. 421-436.

⁸¹ Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), pp. 123, 127. Department of State, U.S. Relations with China (Washington, D.C., G.P.O., 1949), pp. 230-2.

⁸² Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 372. For the negotiations between Mao and Li and their proposals and counter-proposals, see Liang Sheng-chün, Chiang-Li two-cheng nei-mo ["The Inside Story of the Struggle between Chiang and Li"] (Hong Kong, Union Asia Press, 1954), pp. 69-104. This book was written by a confidant of Acting President Li.

Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), pp. 75, 79,
 U.S. Relations with China, p. 318.

new recruits.85 Still another form of political struggle was to incite anti-war, anti-government, anti-American sentiments among the population in the enemy's territory, as in the case of the movement "against hunger, against civil war, against persecution" in May, 1947, and the movement in opposition to the alleged American policy of supporting Japan in May and June of 1948.86 Mao had no illusions that these measures in the political struggle would by themselves enable him to defeat the Kuomintang; they could bring results only if he could win victories on the battlefield. But to a degree difficult to ascertain, the various forms of political struggle played a part in enabling the Communists to conquer the Chinese mainland much more quickly than their initial estimate of five years of hard fighting.

Fundamentally the political struggle in this period of civil war consisted in building up a "very broad united front of the whole nation" against Chiang's government. This united front was to be developed by winning over "all those who can be won over." It was to consist of 90 per cent of the people and isolate a small group of reactionaries. It was to be led by the Communist party.87 In line with this policy, he resisted every tendency on the part of some cadres to follow an ultra-left and adventurist line in relying too exclusively on the poor peasants, in neglecting the task of winning over other elements in the population, and in taking actions which would damage their interests or alienate them. Instead, he endeavored to win over all social elements with the exception of "the feudalists and the bureaucratic capitalists, the Kuomintang reactionaries and their accomplices."88 Beginning in early 1948, the land reform program which had mainly benefited the poor peasants was moderated, its target of attack was narrowed, and its tempo was slowed down.89

This policy of winning over more and more social groups was adjusted to the progress of the war. In its first year, the Communists had to attract a hard core of fighters, mainly from poor and lower middle peasants, who had received economic benefits through land redistribution. But as the military situation changed and an economic crisis developed in the Kuomintang areas, various groups that had chosen to side with the Kuomintang or had been vacillating became disaffected with the government and turned toward the Communists. To exploit this change in sentiment, the Communists broadened their appeal to an ever larger number of groups. In announcing its large-scale counter-offensive in October, 1947, the People's Liberation Army declared that its first policy to unite workers, peasants, soldiers, intellectuals and business men, all oppressed classes, all people's organizations, democratic parties, minority nationalities, overseas Chinese and other patriots; form a national united front; overthrow the dictatorial Chiang Kai-shek government; and to establish a democratic coalition government.⁹⁰

As the counter-offensive moved forward, these categories of social groups were given broad definition. "'Businessmen' means all the national bourgeoisie who are persecuted and fettered, that is, the middle and petty bourgeoise," Mao told his cadres in an inner-party directive. "Other patriots" referred "primarily to the enlightened gentry." "The category of working people" included not only "those engaged in manual labor," but also "those engaged in mental labor who are close to those engaged in manual labor and are not exploiters."

The inclusion of the enlightened gentry as a group to be united is particularly interesting because it consisted of landlords and rich peasants—two groups which were the targets of attack during the period of land reform from May, 1946, to the fall of 1947. Now a political criterion was explicitly introduced to differentiate the enlightened gentry from the rest of the landlords and rich peasants. The enlightened gentry were "ordinary landlords and rich peasants with democratic leanings." Emphasis was now placed on winning them over to support land reform, instead of forcing them to accept it. The political motive in this change in emphasis is made clear by Mao's remark

<sup>Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 271.
Ibid., pp. 120, 125; U.S. Relations with China, pp. 906; Tsou, America's Failure in China, pp. 451-2, 477-8.</sup>

⁸⁷ Mao, "The Present Situation and Our Tasks," Selected Works, IV (Peking), pp. 171-2. This report by Mao to the Central Committee in Dec., 1947, was widely publicized. It was published in the U. S. under the title Turning Point in China (New York, New Century Publishers, 1948). See also Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), pp. 187, 183, 238, 369, 417. For the changes in the public position of the Communists on the question of Communist leadership, see Tsou, America's Failure in China, pp. 184 n. 27, 186 n. 33; Mao, Selected Works, IV, p. 116.

⁸⁸ Mao, Selected Works, IV (Peking), p. 407.

⁸⁹ Ibid., pp. 175, 183, 194, 201-2, 236-7, 251, 337-8.

⁹⁰ Ibid., p. 150.

that if some of the enlightened gentry support land reform, it will help win over the intellectuals (most of whom come from landlord or rich peasant families), the national bourgeoisie (most of them have ties with the land) and the enlightened gentry throughout the country (who number several hundred thousand) and help to isolate the chief enemy of the Chinese revolution, the Chiang Kaishek reactionaries. 91

This re-emphasis on the role of the enlightened gentry, the intellectuals, and the national bourgeoisie was obviously related to the intensified effort made in early 1948 to enlist and solidify the support of the small parties and groups, and the dissidents in the Kuomintang. In January, the Democratic League, which had been dissolved by the Kuomintang in October, 1947, was re-established in Hong Kong; and the Nationalist dissidents formed the Revolutionary Committee of the Kuomintang. Both groups voiced their support for the Communist Party. By the time when the Communists were making preparations for convoking a new Political Consultative Conference to organize a central government, Mao could declare with some justification that "The Chinese revolution is a revolution of the broad masses of the whole nation. Everybody is our friend except the imperialists, the feudalists and the bureaucratcapitalists, the Kuomintang reactionaries and their accomplices."92 He had long ago called the united front, armed struggle, and partybuilding the three magic wands of the Communists in the Chinese revolution. There is little doubt that the united front helped him defeat Chiang in armed struggle. At the same time, the broadening and deepening of the "revolutionary united front" was made possible by the success in armed struggle.

In waging political struggle as a supplement to military struggle, Mao was also preparing for the transition once again from war to peace or from armed struggle to political struggle as the main form. The united front during the period of armed struggle rallied support for the Communists, enlisted non-Communist participation in the regime, helped to retain Kuomintang personnel in running various agencies, reassured the business men and industrialists, and limited economic and administrative dislocation to a minimum. It played a part in bringing to China in the next few years a political stability and solidarity unprecedented in the modern era.

VIII. COMMUNIST CHINA AND THE SYSTEM. OF NATIONAL STATES

A salient feature of international politics in the past fifteen years is Communist China's impact, greater than a nation with similarlylimited military and economic resources would normally have outside its immediate borders. It is quite true that her influence has been bought with great sacrifices and at the cost of many setbacks. But there have been enough successes to sustain her in the belief in the applicability of Mao's revolutionary strategy and tactics to the international arena. Furthermore, the doctrine of protracted struggle cannot be proved invalid by the mixed record of Peking's foreign policy or by the disproportion between costs and gains. The "thought of Mao Tse-tung," having as its basic injunction the "creative adaptation" of universally valid principles to concrete situations, permits flexibility in strategy and tactics while at the same time facilitating the attribution of failure to its incorrect application.

Thus, a basic problem in the evaluation of Peking's foreign policy is the extent to which the revolutionary experience of the Chinese Communist Party constitutes a useful example for other revolutionary movements to emulate. This depends in part on whether the objective conditions which made Mao's success possible exist or will emerge in other countries. One of these conditions is the political weakness of the government in power. There is little doubt that the existing regime in many underdeveloped countries is weak. But as the Nationalist government in China prior to 1937 shows, a politically weak government can still progressively consolidate its rule because of the feebleness of its opponents. What undermined the foundation of the Nationalist government in China and enabled the Chinese Communist Party to build up sufficient strength to defeat the Kuomintang was the Sino-Japanese War. Thus, a prolonged external war, a national liberation war, or a civil war between two non-Communist groups will enhance the applicability of the Maoist model. This is perhaps the reason why the Chinese Communists profess to detect a progressive intensification of the contradictions everywhere in the non-Communist world: the conflicts among the capitalist countries, the conflicts between the newly independent nations and the Western powers, the conflicts between the colonial and semi-colonial countries and the imperialist powers.

A much less important but by no means totally negligible factor contributing to Mao's victory was the acquisition of the captured ⁹¹ Ibid., pp. 207, 209-10.

⁹² Ibid., pp. 220, 225-6, 407.

Japanese arms from the Soviet forces in Manchuria after Japan's surrender. Here the geographical contiguity of the revolutionary forces to other Communist states comes into play. In a small country like Vietnam, this factor has a strong impact on the outcome. Finally, American policy placed very few obstacles in the way of Mao's march to power. In South Vietnam from 1954 to 1963, the United States placed too much emphasis on conventional military power and is learning only too late the paramount importance of the political factor in counter-insurgency warfare; we have so far failed to fashion a workable program for gaining popular support for a government assisted by the United States. But the absence of these four conditions will render it difficult for China to apply Mao's strategy successfully.

If one looks beyond individual nations to the global situation, there are other formidable obstacles which Mao must overcome or face eventual failure of his foreign policy. Unlike the Kuomintang, his two chief antagonists at the present time, the United States and the Soviet Union, represent two dynamic forces in the world arena. Both are politically and militarily strong. Mao's military strategy and tactics were developed for guerrilla and mobile warfare with conventional weapons. They are totally inapplicable to an all-out war in the nuclear age even for the defense of the Chinese mainland. Official Chinese doctrine has been modified to take account of nuclear weapons and in particular the nuclear threat from the United States. Some Chinese military leaders, however, have argued that this adaptation has not gone far enough.93

But the most basic source of the difficulties confronting Mao's attempt to apply his political-military strategy to the international arena is the system of national states itself. The confrontation between the international movement and the nation-state system, which in the first place produced Mao's "creative application" of Marxism-Leninism to the concrete conditions of China, has now resulted in his insistence on the correctness of a revolutionary strategy for the Communist camp which is based largely on his experience in the Chinese revolution. This in turn has disrupted the unity of the camp. Nationalism which helped Mao to power in China will become a formidable obstacle to Mao's ambition when the fear of Chinese influence and domination grows with the increase in Chinese power. Mao has worked out a program to turn nationalism against the West in general and the United States in particular. But nationalism can also be turned against him. National borders sometimes coincide with cultural, linguistic, and racial boundaries. The further Mao tries to move beyond the area of traditional Chinese cultural hegemony, the more formidable will be the difficulties imposed by cultural, linguistic, and racial differences.

93 Morton H. Halperin, China and the Bomb (New York, 1965), pp. 24-82. See also Alice Langley Hsieh, Communist China's Strategy in the Nuclear Age (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1962); David Charles, "The Dismissal of Marshal P'eng Teh-huai," China Quarterly (Oct.-Dec., 1961), p. 65.

Thus, the projection of Mao's revolutionary strategy into the international arena constitutes a factor which, quite apart from the Marxist-Leninist ideology, complicates Peking's adjustment to the system of national states. Peking's leaders are undoubtedly aware of the necessity for Communist China to live with the international system for a long period. But their tendency to understand the international situation and to fashion their program abroad in the light of their revolutionary experience cannot but make it difficult for them to understand the rules and customary conduct governing national states. For their revolutionary strategy was developed in a civil war in which the contending groups were not separated by any international boundary. Actions, strategy, and tactics employed in a civil war or political conflict within a nation are not always acceptable in the international arena, no matter how moderate or cautious they are. Frequently, the same strategy or tactics have quite different implications and consequences. in the two spheres of political conflict. The tendency to project their revolutionary strategy abroad prevents the Chinese Communists from drawing a sharp line of demarcation between two types of actions and two spheres of activities. They do not fully realize the incompatibility between the rules governing national states and their revolutionary strategy.

Many of the discrepancies between Peking's profession and actions arise not so much from hypocrisy as from this conflict between the need to live with the system of national states and the tendency to project Mao's revolutionary strategy abroad. Thus, on the one hand, Peking proclaims loudly that revolution cannot be exported and on the other hand, gives diplomatic support or advice and aid to "national liberation movements" everywhere. On the one hand, she proclaims the "five principles of peaceful coexistence" which embody the generally recognized rules of the system of national states and on the other hand her actions constantly violate the spirit and the letter of these principles. The Chinese Communists challenge the two superpowers simultaneously instead of playing the one against the other. Their understanding of war and peace is filtered through their revolutionary experience, their concept of armed struggle, and their propensity to use force as a constant instrument of policy. Peking denounces solutions of international issues based on the concept of spheres of influence, even if Communist China is given her share. It thus rejects a widely used method of resolving conflicts within the nation-state system.

The Chinese Communists' projection of their revolutionary strategy abroad is a more systematic and self-conscious expression of the general tendency of many peoples to project their way of life abroad, to judge foreign things by their own standards, and to understand alien affairs in terms of their image of themselves. This general tendency usually creates disturbances in international politics and has at one time or another brought about difficulties of some sort for the originators themselves. In the nineteenth century, Western traders and missionaries, backed by their governments with forcible measures, projected their way of life into China and disrupted the Confucian order. The total disintegration of the traditional social and political system in China doomed all Western hopes of seeing the emergence of a China fashioned after the image of a Christian, democratic nation in the West. Instead, a hostile, totalitarian regime issued from the social, political and economic chaos. While a fundamental force of social progress, cultural diffusion in any of its forms has its political and human costs. The tendency of a successful revolutionary elite to project its way of life abroad, to view alien things in terms of its self-image, is even more pronounced. Such an elite often finds adjustment to its international environment difficult. It frequently creates disturbances in the system of national states, and especially in the balance of power. The Chinese Communist Party is no exception to this rule. Mao's revolutionary strategy as reinforced by China's traumatic experience with the system of national states will make Communist China a disturbing influence in international politics for a long time and will render her adjustment to the international system a more protracted process than in other examples that come to mind. Meanwhile, Communist China will be a formidable force to reckon with and Mao's strategy will pose a serious challenge to world order.

⁹⁴ Marshal Lo Jung-huan claimed that no better discussion of the question of war and peace is to be found than in a speech by Mao in 1945 which dealt with CCP-Kuomintang relations and the civil war in China. Work Correspondence, no. 8 (Feb. 6, 1961), p. 17.

⁹⁵ Ibid., no. 17 (April 25, 1961), p. 19.

RESEARCH NOTES

THE ILLUSION OF JUDICIAL CONSENSUS: ZONING DECISIONS IN THE MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS

ROBERT J. SICKELS

United States Civil Service Commission

In some American courts of last resort, dissent is free and frequent; in others the judges vote unanimously for months, even for years at a time—a difference in judicial behavior which tempts inquiry and speculation. Although social scientists generally focus on dissenting courts and feed the human and scientific appetite for open controversy, the operation of every type of court is clarified by an examination of the ways and pitfalls of ostensible consensus among the judges. The purpose of this study of one supreme court and one body of law-zoning law in the Maryland Court of Appeals—is to demonstrate that under certain conditions unanimity in voting is illusory.

I. FINDINGS

Of the fifty-one high courts in the American system of government, the Supreme Court of the United States, with a reputation for airing crucial differences, is fittingly the most measured and probed. Dissent is less frequent in all the remaining fifty. In half, dissent is noted no oftener than in one case in twenty, on the average, as contrasted with expressed disagreement, often with several dissenting opinions, in some two-thirds of the cases decided with full opinion by the federal high court in recent years. Occasionally, behavioral analysis has been directed at the courts of the states and notably the Supreme Court of Michigan, which exhibits a level of dissent well below that of the Supreme Court of the United States yet high enough to invite study. The voting in such courts shows statistically significant individual, bloc, and coalition patterns. But in a majority of the courts of last resort, dissent is so rare that the usual analysis of aye and nay voting fails. A sampling of recent cases (Table I) clearly indicates this infrequency of dissent. The average rate of dissent for the states as a whole is only one case in ten.² The Maryland Court of Appeals, with no dissents in the cases sampled, is unlike the Michigan and United States Supreme Courts.³ It is one of those at the peaceful end of the range.

¹ Glendon Schubert, "The Michigan Supreme Court," in Quantitative Analysis of Judicial Behavior (New York, 1959), pp. 129-142; and S. Sidney Ulmer, "Leadership in the Michigan Supreme Court," in Glendon Schubert, ed., Judicial Decision-Making (New York, 1963), pp. 13-28.

² At the .01 level, 10.6 ± 2.6 per cent.

³ Schubert, Quantitative Analysis, p. 134, contrasts rates of dissent in 1956-57: .79 in the United States Supreme Court and .16 in the Wisconsin Supreme Court. Whatever the dissimilarities then and now, these two courts may be said to share a penchant for lively dissent, never a characteristic of the Maryland Court of Appeals.

TABLE 1. FREQUENCY OF DISSENT IN THE FIFTY-ONE SUPREME COURTS: CASES WITH ONE OR MORE DISSENTING VOTES IN SAMPLES OF TWENTY-FIVE*

Number of Cases with Dissent	Jurisdiction
0	Ala., Ariz., Del., Md. , Mass., Nev., N.C., R.I., S.C., Tenn., W.Va.
1	Ga., Id., Ill., Ky., Me., Minn., Miss., Mo., N.M., N.D., Vt., Wash.
2	Conn., Fla., Ia., Neb., N.J., S.D., Va., Wyo.
3	Ark., N.H., O., Ore.
4	Col., Kans., Mont.
5	Alaska, Okla.
6	Hawaii, Ind., N.Y., Ut., Wis.
7	Calif., La.
8	Mich.
9	Tex.
10	Pa.
• • • •	• • • • •
17	United States

* For each court, the 25 most recent cases from the most recent regional reporters and the United States Reports, as of May, 1964, less unsigned orders and memorandum opinions, advisory opinions, reprimands of counsel, and suspensions from the bar. Decisions with full per curiam opinions included. 373-4 U.S.; 193-4 N.E. 2d; 190-5 A. 2d; 377-86 P. 2d; 369-72 S.W. 2d; 157-8 S. 2d; 131-3 S.E. 2d; and 122-5 N.W. 2d. State frequencies significant ±5 at the .05 level or beyond.

The reasons for consensus and dissensus are buried in the political culture of each jurisdiction, to be unearthed with respect for the endless uses of law. Still, it is possible a priori to sketch some of the broad alternatives. In courts such as Michigan's the judges express some or all of their legal disagreements in the voting, and often in the authorship of opinions as well. In courts acknowledging little or no dissent, however, either substantial agreement actually prevails or there is disagreement not evident in the record of voting. In the latter event, at least two possibilities suggest themselves. Both sacrifice the expression of the real feelings of judges who find themselves in a minority on a particular issue, for the sake of the collectively felt needs for maintaining the prestige of the court and for gaining the advantages of collective bargaining, by presenting the outward appearance of a solid front. One possibility is that the court operates like a caucus, with an informal understanding that. except for the most exigent reasons, all the judges will be bound by the unrecorded vote of a majority, taken in camera. Such an understanding admits of variations in degree. Where a practice of this sort prevails, consistency in the disposition of cases is on the whole maintained until the majority viewpoint changes, by the replacement of judges or otherwise. But the outcome of zoning cases in Maryland cannot be reconciled with this explanation, as will presently be seen.

Another possibility is a log-rolling understanding that the entire court will go along with the judge assigned to write the opinion in a particular case, coupled with a system of rotating case assignments from member to member. The effective result then is one court acting as several one-man courts. The court, by division of labor, is in the hands of the judge who writes the opinion rather than the members who subscribe their perfunctory concurrence. Such is the case in Maryland.

Since the passage in 1960 of a constitutional amendment reorganizing its judiciary, Maryland has had the equivalent in another way of several Courts of Appeals with overlapping memberships. The amendment increased the number of judges from five to seven and provided that:

⁴ It was ostensibly against such a possibility, threatened by Franklin Roosevelt's court reorganization plan, that Chief Justice Hughes argued in a letter to Congress in March, 1937, "The Constitution does not appear to authorize two or more Supreme Courts or two or more parts of a supreme court functioning in effect as separate courts." U. S. Senate, Reorganization of the Federal Judiciary, 75th Cong., 1st sess. (1937), S. Rept. 711, p. 40. The real disagreement was over the Court's policy, of course, not its procedure.

Five of the judges shall constitute a quorum, and five judges shall sit in each case unless the Court shall direct that an additional judge or judges sit for any case. The concurrence of a majority of those sitting shall be sufficient for the decision of any cause....⁵

But this overt division of the Court has had less practical impact than the informal division which remains hidden by the rarity of dissent.

What of the possibility that the members of the Court of Appeals are in genuine agreement? They have little of the diversity of background, philosophy, and temperament of the justices of the United States Supreme Court. A common outlook on zoning would not seem implausible. Case by case, the opinions of the state judges reiterate a body of law composed of familiar leading cases; the judges defer to the Court of yesterday by upholding precedent and to their colleagues of today by concurring.

Maryland judge-made zoning law is not only stable, it is distinctive. The judicial gloss on the state enabling acts and local zoning ordinances has followed the other states with respect to the meaning of the basic mechanisms of zoning—original zoning, special exceptions, variances, and nonconforming uses—but it has assumed an unusually strong stand against rezoning (zoning amendment) by attaching strict conditions to the enactment of rezoning ordinances. According to the Maryland view, imitated in a few other courts, proponents of a rezoning ordinance must show an error in the original zoning or a basic change in neighborhood conditions.

A second theme in this body of judge-made law is judicial restraint, boldly advanced in concert with the error-or-change rule with which the Court undertakes the review of the merits of a large segment of the legislative decisions of local zoning authorities. The theme takes the form of a disclaimer of responsibility to intervene so long as there is room for debate. Stated the other way, the Court feels justified in imposing its own judgment only when the action of a zoning body is deemed

⁵ Laws of Maryland, 1960, Ch. 11, ratified the same year.

⁶ See, for example, the citations in Arden H. Rathkopf, The Law of Zoning and Planning, 3d ed. (New York: Clark Boardman Co., 1962), vol. I, sec. 27, p. 15.

"arbitrary, capricious, discriminatory, and illegal."

Protestations notwithstanding, the tools of activism are well honed and ready at hand in Maryland. The frequency of their use refutes the Court's claim of judicial restraint and the distribution of their use refutes the claims of unanimity and consistency. The probability that a rezoning or other local zoning action will be struck down rises and falls from the mean as the assignment of the writing of opinions rotates from one judge to another. At the extremes of probability, zoning actions are practically certain to be upheld by Judge Hall Hammond and to be voided by Judge William Henderson. Concurrences prove illusory; what matters is the authorship of the opinions of the Court.

The stark polarity of these positions is obscured by two groups of cases in which the unanimity of the judges is real and not merely nominal. First, all the judges are reluctant to direct a local authority to grant a zoning dispensation, as contrasted with their willingness to reverse an affirmative local action. Appeals from denials of zoning actions are therefore relatively noncontroversial. Second, a number of cases each year are decided on procedural grounds, such as timeliness of appeal, unrelated to substantive questions of zoning. The disparity between word and deed occurs in the remainder: appeals on the merits from local grants of zoning amendments, special exceptions, variances, and permits for nonconforming uses. Since its first in 1926, the Maryland Court of Appeals has decided 211 zoning cases,7 including only nine dissents. Of this number, 69 have been appeals from denials of zoning action by local authorities, decided 52 to 17 in favor of the zoning authority. Another 53 have been decided on procedural grounds, leaving a core of 89 cases: 42 upholding and 47 reversing the local zoning body.

Twenty-one of the 89 core cases in this period of nearly four decades have been decided by the two most divergent members, Judges Hammond and Henderson. Each has a record of opinions which deviates significantly from the average for the Court: Judge Hammond has written opinions of the Court nine to one in favor of sustaining the local zoning action⁸ and Judge Henderson has recorded nine cases to two against the local authority.⁹ If cases have been assigned to the two judges at random, the disparity in the outcomes cannot be attributed to chance alone. It appears that the two judges simply have different inclinations in zoning matters—one favoring flexibility and the other stability—and that the difference is reflected in the pattern of their opinions. A heavy work load may not permit the two and their brethren to conform to the model suggested by the state bar association in cooperation with members of the Court:

At the conferences on opinions each opinion is read in its entirety by the judge preparing it and only after comment, discussion, criticism and revision is it finally released as the opinion of the Court. Thus the opinions are truly opinions of the Court and not "one-man opinions."

Another possible explanation for the divergence between Judges Hammond and Henderson, that cases are assigned not at random but with such selectivity that Judge Hammond has received a set in which the zoning authority has acted with manifest good sense and Judge Henderson a set of patently bungled cases, is at variance with the semi-official assurance that "opinions are assigned essentially on a rotation basis."

The Court of Appeals has acquiesced in a system of decision which rests on the vicissitudes of case assignment rather than the consensus of a majority.

II. DISCUSSION

Two implications of this judicial behavior may be noted, one practical and one theoretical. Practically, it suggests the value of testing for divisions of labor beneath the surface consensus of state supreme courts-for judges who tend to find the written opinions of their colleagues more persuasive than the records of the cases at bar. The proposal is more radical than it might seem. Courts in their opinions and the professional digesters who furnish anonymous case headnotes and summaries to the legal community keep alive a presumption against the significance of judicial individuality. The usual summaries of opinions of the United States Supreme Court are equally impersonal, but in this instance an abundance of offsetting commentary circulates in the law reviews, the press, and in the opinions of the Court themselves. In the states, by contrast, the law reviews and the press as often reinforce ⁷ To April, 1964. Tables of cases are available from the author.

⁸ Significant at the .01 level.

⁹ Significant at the .05 level.

¹⁰ Maryland State Bar Association, "Report of Committee to Study the Case Load of the Court of Appeals," Transactions (Baltimore: Maryland State Bar Association, 1958), p. 307.

¹¹ Ibid.

the presumption of impersonality. To the press, mention of authorship of opinions of the Maryland Court of Appeals apparently is as unseemly as it is appropriate for the reporting of activities of the United States Supreme Court, the Maryland General Assembly, or a county council. A vital bit of data is withheld from lay and professional readers alike.

If there is a division of labor, the litigant in particular has an interest in knowing details of its operation in order to take advantage of the variations from one judge to another. Judge-shopping is an ancient if not altogether honored legal stratagem. But the Maryland Court of Appeals frustrates the effort by taking care that the rotation of assignments is "varied from time to time so that it is not possible to determine in advance just which judge will write the opinion in a particular case" an unnecessary precaution unless the assignment is crucial to the outcome.

The second implication of this pattern of decision is more in the nature of an asset than a liability, and more theoretical: a collegial court functioning as a plural court provides a new and different test of the determinacy of legal rules. Good tests for courts other than the United States Supreme Court are in short supply. With that court as its prime example, American jurisprudence has passed through the stages of asserting absolutely and denying absolutely the efficacy of general propositions in application to hard facts, and has abandoned the quest for the experimentum crucis in favor of a cautiously empirical middle position. There is fair agreement that judges, some conscious of their power and some not, have broad discretion within the rules of law and of their constitutions, statutes, and precedents-Holmes's "play in the joints"—and students of the United States Supreme Court know now the mechanics of rationalizing virtually any judgment pro or con in constitutional law, an exercise in which they have had ample instruction from the opinions of the Court. But whether a given court in a given area of law is judging with consistency and in some recognizable relation to the rules of positive law is an empirical question for which more refined operational phrasing for courts exhibiting little or no dissent is elusive.

The feasibility and form of a test of the efficacy of general propositions depend on the make-up and the performance of the court or courts under observation. In the case of a single court with a single judge, no direct test is readily available. The court affirms rules of law and disposes of cases. It may be unclear, comparing one case with another, whether similar decisions involve the consistent application of the rules to similar facts or an inconsistent application to dissimilar facts, and conversely whether dissimilar decisions are attributable to the facts or the process of applying the rules. Indirect tests are possible in theory, but impracticable to the degree that they require long time series or experimental retrying of the cases by the observer.

In the analysis of more than one court applying the same rules to equivalent facts, the efficacy of the rules can be tested simply and successfully. A significant difference in the decision patterns of two courts which is not traceable to differences in the facts of the cases before them can be attributed only to the indeterminacy of the rules of law.

The best known situation is the collegial court with two dimensions of expressed disagreement: dissenting opinions and the overturning of precedent. Since the facts available to the majority and the dissenters are identical, there is no need for statistical inferences or investigations of the comparability of the facts; and when a majority overrules old interpretations it of course is openly demonstrating to that extent the indeterminacy of the underlying legal propositions.

A court such as the Maryland Court of Appeals-collegial, nearly free of dissent, and inconsistent internally in so far as members concur in decisions they would decide differently on assignment-is functionally more akin to a system of courts applying the same rules than to one court like the United States Supreme Court. Observers of judicial behavior will find it profitable to watch for the possible operation of indeterminacy in this unlikely context. Overlooking concurrences, tabulating the authorship of opinions in a defined field of law, and testing for significant deviations from the average, they can contribute a note of realism to the literature of the law. Focusing on one field of law is necessary for accuracy, but it need not imply triviality of subject matter. Zoning decisions in the Maryland Court of Appeals, for example, often have made momentous differences in land use.

III. SUMMARY

The opinions of the judges of the Maryland Court of Appeals reflect an uncomplicated faith in legal rules and their literal application by traditional judicial methods. Whatever their private views, the judges do not recognize a need to interrupt their flow of work with a basic examination of the role of the judiciary.

Maryland has been untouched by the logical skepticism that has disturbed and divided some courts for several decades: the idea that "general propositions do not decide concrete cases" or that rules are only predictions of "what the courts will do in fact, and nothing more pretentious." Neither has it been touched by the psychological skepticism suggesting that legal principles sometimes function as defensive incantations—that ritual protestations of judicial restraint in activist opinions, to take one instance, may serve to reassure judges who value the principle of restraint while they also feel obliged to depart from it.

At least in their zoning decisions, the members of the Maryland Court of Appeals have striven for consistency of doctrine rather than consistency of decision. Because of the rotation of assignments for the writing of opinions and the automatic nature of concurrence in these cases, their nearly unanimous acceptance of a remarkably stable set of rules has resulted in a low level of determinacy and predictability from the point of view of the litigant, whose interest is in results.

It is entirely possible for a detectable consistency of decision, procedural or substantive, to be associated with a given set of rules and to lend predictability to the operation of courts of law. Procedurally, for example, a court may approach predictability by genuine judicial restraint in the manner of Felix Frankfurter, to whom other forms of consistency seemed either illusory or presumptuous, and substantively it may adopt the policy of activism in a known direction, as the United States Supreme Court has at different times in the areas of property and civil rights.

Compared to the Maryland high court, the Supreme Court of the United States is highly consistent in the general run of its business, because the tendencies of each of its members are known with some accuracy and the prediction of majority positions often follows by simple arithmetic. But the positions of members of the Maryland Court of Appeals are not additive and the position of the Court as a whole in a zoning case therefore is set by one man at a time.

¹³ Holmes, dissenting in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45 at 76 (1905).

¹⁴ Holmes, "The Path of the Law," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 10 (1897), p. 461, reprinted in his Collected Legal Papers.

DOES A "DIVISIVE" PRIMARY HARM A CANDIDATE'S ELECTION CHANCES?

Andrew Hacker

Cornell University

It is a rare election year when the nation's attention is not focussed on at least one party primary where the struggle for the nomination is highly competitive and the result a matter of doubt until the last precincts are reported. In many such cases the other party has settled on its own standard-bearer and thus sits back contentedly while the opposition wages its internecine battle before a rapt public. In recent years as varied personages as Estes Kefauver, Richard Nixon, and Charles Percy found themselves engaged in a hard-fought primary campaign to secure their nomination or renomination for state office.

Nixon's subsequent defeat in the 1962 race for the California governorship, and in a lesser degree Percy's 1964 experience in Illinois, served to illustrate the conventional view that the party whose candidate is obliged to fight a hard primary campaign has an important strike against it upon entering the general election. Common sense, if nothing else, suggests that the very existence of such a primary produces or symbolizes fissures among a party's supporters. The supposition also arises that those who backed the primary loser in the Spring may be less than enthusiastic about aiding his vanguisher in the Fall. And there is reason to believe that voters who are committed to neither party may wonder whether the party that needed to go to the polls to resolve its own leadership problems is fit to hold public office.

The validity of these common sense assumptions can be tested by juxtaposing the experience of candidates in their primary and general elections. The period to be considered here runs from 1956 through to 1964, and the offices contested are those of governor and senator.

Not all of the 50 states are sufficiently competitive to warrant inclusion in this analysis. If a single party dominates the election for state offices then the occurrence of a divisive primary within the already weak second party will hardly be the efficient cause of its going down to defeat in the November election. In such states the opposition party has little or no chance of winning either the governorship or a Senate seat anyway, so a primary fight within its own meager ranks makes little difference.

¹ This study starts with 1956 because that was the year for which Richard Scammon began to collate primary figures in his America Votes series (Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1958, 1960, 1962, 1964). Most of the primary and election statistics for 1964 were obtained from Congressional Quarterly Weekly Reports and, in a few instances, by personal correspondence with state officials.

Accordingly, the following 15 states will, for present purposes, be considered "one-party" states and so excluded from the ensuing calculations: Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, and Virginia. This list has been drawn notwithstanding that many of these states have had vigorous two-party competiton for their Presidential electoral votes. It also acknowledges that Oklahoma has elected a Republican governor. Texas a Republican senator, Vermont a Democratic governor, and Alabama and Mississippi Republican congressmen in recent years. Nevertheless 14 of these states are quite solidly Democratic; and if Vermont is no longer a safe Republican enclave, its shift to the two-party column is a relatively late development in the 1956-1964 period. Finally, four states-Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, and New York-hold no primaries for senatorial and gubernatorial nominations. The remaining 31 states are left to form the basis for this study.

Some of these 31 states are, of course, more competitive than others. Republican candidates for statewide office usually seem to be on the losing end of a near-miss in Nevada and Washington; and only two Democrats have been able to win a majority in Utah in the last eight years. Moreover some states have meaningful two-party competition for the governorship while their Senate seats do not change partisan hands. In Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa Republicans invariably won the Senate race during this period, and in New Mexico that office is pretty much a Democratic monopoly. Nevertheless these states are sufficiently competitive to deserve inclusion in the two-party category.

I. "DIVISIVE" PRIMARIES

A "divisive" primary is here defined as one where the winning candidate received less than 65 per cent of the total votes cast. In "token" primaries, correspondingly, the winner received 65 per cent or more of the ballots cast, or ran as a single candidate unopposed. This arbitrary cut-off point was decided upon as most appropriate for purposes of this study after first trying various alternative percentages. Put the other way around, in a "divisive" primary at least 35 per cent of the voters who participated cast their ballots for someone other than the candidate who ultimately won the nomination.

Between 1956 and 1964 there were 220 elections for senator and governor in the 31 states. In 94 of these both candidates had token primaries; in 27 both had divisive primary contests; and in 99 one candidate had only token opposition while the other had a divisive fight in the primaries. Lumping together the first two categories, it may be assumed that in 121 of the 220 elections, at least so far as their primary experience was concerned, the candidates entered the general election on an equal footing. These elections can be used as a "control" group, and it will be referred to again in the concluding section. But in order to analyze the influence of a divisive primary, our attention should first be directed to the 99 elections where one of the two candidates had had only a token primary.2

In these 99 cases, the opponent who underwent a divisive primary was the loser in the general election in 68 instances and the winner in only 31. Thus in almost 70 per cent of these elections it was the candidate who had to fight for his nomination who went down to a November defeat. From these figures it is easy enough to jump to the conclusion that the candidate emerging from a divisive primary stood a better than two-to-one chance of being defeated at the general election. On the other hand it appears that almost one-third of the divisive primary candidates managed to pick up the pieces and emerge victorious over an opponent who had had little or no trouble at the primary stage himself. Hence some inquiry must be made into the conditions under which some candidates with a divisive primary behind them went on to subsequent victory while others suffered defeat.

² Thus the total number of hard-fought primaries amounted to 153, of which 54 arose from the 27 occasions when both candidates had to struggle for their nominations, and 99 from the cases where only one of the two candidates had a strenuous fight. This figure is only 35 per cent of 440, the total number of November major-party candidacies in this period. In other words, almost two-thirds of the senatorial and gubernatorial candidates in 1956 through 1964 were either unopposed or received only token primary opposition in their quests for the nominations.

In dealing with almost 100 elections spanning almost a full political decade it is obvious that a wide range of causal factors are operative, many of them not amenable to measurement. When one candidate wins and another loses the reasons may have to do with such matters as personality, campaign organization, party swings, or other peculiarities of time and place. What is being undertaken here is, for all intents and purposes, an empirical exercise in model-building. The major variable is the primary experience of the candidate, and this factor will be held constant while surrounding and accompanying conditions are ranged against it.

II. THE OFFICE

Senatorial and gubernatorial elections differ in just about as many respects as they are similar. It is well understood, for example, that an incumbent senator stands a far better chance of re-election than does an incumbent governor. The senator can make his public reputation on national and international issues; most of his enemies on these have no vote in his state. The American governorship is a highly visible and vulnerable office locally, and the man who occupies it is often the scapegoat for all manner of parochial political grievances when he is so temerarious as to request a renewed vote of confidence. Of the 68 incumbent governors seeking re-election between 1956 and 1964, only 42 (or 62 per cent) succeeded in this bid. In contrast, of the 85 senators up for reelection no fewer than 71 (or 84 per cent) were returned to Washington. The high visibility of the governorship is also made evident by looking at the 75 occasions when the voters in a state happened to cast ballots for both senator and governor at the same time. In these 75 twin elections the total votes cast were higher in the gubernatorial contest on 60 (or 80 per cent) of the occasions. While the differences were seldom appreciable it is significant that, much more often than the other way around, some voters made a choice for governor and then left the senatorial places on their ballot unmarked. Moreover, in these twin contests no fewer than 31 (or 41 per cent) of them found a majority of the electorate choosing one party's candidate as governor and the other's as senator. It is clear, at any rate, that many voters are careful to distinguish the two statewide offices from each other.

Looking at their previous primary experience it develops that a gubernatorial candidate who

TABLE I. OFFICE AND ELECTION OUTCOME

Fate of "divisive" candidate	NO CARROLO A	Governor $(N = 50)$	Total (N = 99)
	(%)	(%)	(%)
\mathbf{Lost}	73	64	69
\mathbf{Won}	27	36	31
	******	***************************************
	100	100	100

fought a divisive primary stood a better chance of winning the general election than a senatorial candidate with a similar fight behind him. In absolute numbers this means that 18 candidates won the governorship even after a hardfought primary whereas only 13 senatorial candidates survived to victory. What is noteworthy, and this will be amplified later on, is that no less than eight of the winning governors were challengers facing incumbents, while this was the case with only 3 of the senatorial aspirants. In other words the experience of a divisive primary behind a gubernatorial candidate can be compensated for, at least in part, by the fact that his opponent is an incumbent governor who, despite his own token primary, stands a good chance of being defeated just because he is governor.

III. THE STATE

A variety of schemes and systems have been used to classify states by party, each with its own criteria and merits. To classify the 31 states here being studied as either "Democratic" or "Republican" it was simply asked how many of the statewide elections between 1956 and 1964 were won by each party's candidate in each state. If a majority of these elections were won, say, by Republicans then the state was listed as "Republican." This was the case with eleven states, and the "Democratic" label was assigned to 16 others. Four states were, for present purposes, put to one side since both parties there won an equal number of statewide contests.

³ The best known are Austin Ranney and Willmoore Kendall, "The American Party Systems," this Review, Vol. 48 (1954), pp. 477-485 and Joseph A. Schlesinger, "A Two-Dimensional Scheme for Classifying the States According to Degree of Inter-Party Competition," ibid., Vol. 49 (1955), pp. 1120-1128. For a recent summary and criticism of the major classification systems, see Richard I. Hofferbert, "Classification of American State Party Systems," Journal of Politics, Vol. 26 (1964), pp. 550-567.

Using this classification the candidates may be categorized as running in "friendly" or "hostile" territory. Any Democrat campaigning in Utah, for example, obviously has an uphill road to travel, no matter what kind of primary experience he had; and the same is true for any Republican aspirant in Washington or Nevada. Of the 99 elections being examined, ten took place in the four states where the parties struck an even balance, leaving 89 to be analyzed here.

What is most striking in Table II is that only eleven percentage points separate the electoral outcomes of candidates running in friendly as opposed to hostile states. It is not surprising that three-quarters of the candidates who had survived divisive primaries then went down to defeat in a general election in unfriendly territory—the surprise here is rather that as many as 25 per cent of such candidates won at all. However, 61 of the 89 candidates were running in states already sympathetic to their party and this presumed advantage did not prevent almost two-thirds of them from being defeated anyway. Apparently, then, the advantage of running in a friendly state is not sufficient to compensate for having undergone a divisive primary. It should be noted, further, that of these candidates who lost in friendly territory about equal proportions were aspirants for the governorship and a seat in the Senate.

The key difference between those who won and those who lost in friendly states lies in

TABLE II. STATUS OF STATE AND ELECTION OUTCOME

Fate of "divisive" candidate	"Friendly" (N = 61)	"Hostile" (N = 28)	Total (N = 89)
	(%)	(%)	(%)
Lost	64	75	67
\mathbf{Won}	36	25	33
	100	100	100

⁴ The "Republican" states are: Arizona, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, New Hampshire, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming. "Democratic" states: California, Hawaii, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. "Evenly Balanced" states: Colorado, Maine, Montana, and Nebraska.

whether or not the candidate was an incumbent. Table III. computed in absolute figures rather than percentages as the numbers are small, makes this clear. (Only 67 elections are tabulated as the other 22 did not involve an incumbent.) Thus the losers, whether they ran in friendly or in hostile states, were chiefly challengers who were running against incumbents. This condition of incumbency, or its lack, will be examined next. It only remains to remark that primary contests are twice as apt to occur in a party situated in friendly territory. Only on 28 occasions out of the 89 did the underdog party, already at a disadvantage in terms of popular appeal, have a divisive primary.

IV. INCUMBENCY

It is a rule of thumb that in elections where a challenger faces an incumbent the latter begins the race with an advantage. Thus if the survivor of a divisive primary is subsequently defeated the reason may have less to do with his primary experience than with the status of the opponent he faced at the general election. An incumbent was involved in 75 contests, and Table IV indicates how the candidates who had had "divisive" primaries fared in these. Most of these candidates were challengers and most of them went down to defeat. Indeed only eleven of these aspirants, faced with the double disadvantage of a divisive primary and of running against an incumbent, managed to win at all. In contrast, most of the 15 incumbents who had had divisive primaries won. It has already been noted that being or not being an incumbent has more to do with a candidate's electoral chances than the friendliness or hostility of the state in which he is running. By the same token there may be some value in inquiring whether the office involved makes any difference in the security apparently offered by incumbency.

For the same reason as before, absolute numbers will be used. What emerges from Table V is that of the six incumbents who lost five were sitting governors and only one was a senator. At the same time, of the eleven double-disadvantaged challengers who won, only three were senators and eight were aspirants for a governorship. This of course goes far toward underlining the volatile character of the office of governor: if it is relatively easy for a challenger to come by, it is also quite easy to depart from once he is there.⁵

⁵ By the same token a gubernatorial aspirant who had had a divisive primary even in a friendly state had less than a 50-50 chance of success. While a state's voters may be sympathetic to one

TABLE III. STATUS OF STATE, STATUS OF CANDIDATE, AND ELECTION OUTCOME

Fate	Number of candidates of "di- visive" candi-	In "Friendly" States		In "Hostile" State
date	Incumbents	Challengers	Incumbents	Challengers
Lost	2	29	4	12
Won	7	7	2	4
		• •	-
	9	36	6	16

TABLE IV. STATUS OF CANDIDATE
AND ELECTION OUTCOME

Fate of "divisive" candidate	Incumbent (N = 15)	Challenger (N = 60)	Total (N = 75)
	(%)	(%)	(%)
Lost	40	82	73
Won	60	18	27
	100	100	100

TABLE V. OFFICE, STATUS OF CANDIDATE,
AND ELECTION OUTCOME

Fate of "divisive" candidate	Number of candidates
	Incur	nbents	Chall	lengers
	Senators	Governors	Senators	Governors
Lost	1	5	30	19
Won	5	4	3	8
		-
	6	9	33	27

V. THE PRIMARY

Some primaries are more competitive than others; some are a veritable free-for-all while others are well structured contests between two prominent contenders. There were, for example, no less than nine aspirants for the Kansas Republican gubernatorial nomination in 1964, and the front-runner received less than 30 per cent of the primary vote. In contrast the Illinois Republican gubernatorial primary ballot that year had only two names and the winner, Charles Percy, secured more than 60 per cent of the votes.

of the parties, their friendship does not always extend to supporting that party's choice for governor. Thus of the 31 candidates running for governor in friendly territory, only 14 managed to win. On the other hand, 22 of the 30 similarly situated senatorial candidates did win.

Hence it might be thought that candidates who gain their nomination by securing a majority of the primary vote would fare better at the general election than their counterparts who won the candidacy with only a plurality. (None of the 31 states except Idaho had a run-off primary.) This, however, was not the case. Of the candidates who won their nominations with a majority vote in the primary, 71 per cent went on to lose in the general election; whereas of those who secured only a plurality in the primary, 68 per cent lost their general election. The difference, only three percentage points, is insignificant and it suggests that there are equal disadvantages in either leading a large field by a small margin (which shows that no one has a commanding popularity) or in running ahead of one or more competitors by a relatively larger margin (which, if the margin is less than 65 per cent, shows a polarized opposition).

Rather more interesting is the influence of the extent of voter turn-out in the primary on subsequent election results. The absolute number of people turning out to vote is not a very meaningful measure due to the differential standards of Presidential and mid-term years. Moreover local or national personalities and issues can be the cause of high primary participation; once in the booth, voters will usually go ahead and cast a ballot in any senatorial or gubernatorial contests that are in progress at the same time, even though these alone might not have brought them out. What can be evaluated, however, is the relation between the number of voters participating in a party's primary and the number who vote for that party's candidate in the general election. Thus the November vote may be used as a norm against which to measure the size of the primary turn-out in the preceding spring. Voting in the general election, to be sure, varies markedly as between Presidential and other years. However, of the 99 elections being examined here, half were in each category: 45 took place in 1956, 1960, and 1964, while 44 were in the intervening years.

Turn-out at a primary was classed as "high" if the total number of primary voters-regardless of which contender they voted for in the primary—was over 50 per cent of the primary winner's subsequent election showing. A "low" primary turn-out consisted of fewer than 50 per cent. Thus if the total vote for all the names entered in a party's primary was 120,000 and if that party's candidate got 200,000 votes in the election, then the primary turn-out was 60 per cent, and hence rated "high." The figures in Table VI reveal that candidates who survived divisive primaries where the turn-out

TABLE VI. PRIMARY TURN-OUT AND ELECTION OUTCOME

Fate of "divisive" candidate	"Low" Turn-Out (N = 35)	"High" Turn-Out (N = 64)	Total (N = 99)
	(%)	(%)	(%)
Lost	74	66	69
\mathbf{Won}	26	34	31
	100	100	100

was high actually went on to do better in the general election than those who won in primaries having low participation. Over a third of those in the high turn-out primaries fared well, compared with just about a quarter of those who emerged from primaries with low turn-outs. This may seem curious, as a higher turn-out might suggest a greater degree of interest and therefore the potentiality of greater intra-party tensions.

As a matter of arithmetic, a high primary turn-out of, say, 70 per cent may simply denote that the party's candidate did very poorly at the general election. If the 70 per cent stands for 70,000 primary voters in relation to 100,000 general election voters—while the opposition party was getting, say, 200,000 votes at that election—then a highly participative primary is not very impressive. But the point is that 34 per cent of the high primary candidates did in fact win, so the high turn-outs in their primaries are to be measured against what were majorities at the general election. At all events it appears that a high primary turnout, despite the divisive character of that balloting, is a better augury for a candidate than one that is sparsely attended. For despite the struggle taking place in the primary a high turn-out seems to indicate wide interest in the party's fortunes and thus some likelihood that this interest will be translated into support of the primary winner.

Finally it should be noted that turn-outs are higher in gubernatorial than in senatorial primaries. The average participation in contests for Senate nominations was 55.1 per cent whereas when the candidacy for a governorship was at stake the primary turn-outs averaged 64.0 per cent. Even when we allow for the years in which these races took place-for a slightly higher proportion of the Senate elections were in Presidential years—the contest for the governorship still aroused more public interest in the primaries. Indeed the difference of nine percentage points just noted remained steady in both Presidential and off-years.

TABLE VII. TYPES OF ELECTIONS AND OUTCOMES

	Elections With One Candidate Having a "Divisive Primary"	Elections With Both Candidate on Equal Terms
A Office Controlled	(%)	(%)
A. Office Contested	(N = 99)	(N = 121)
Governor	51	48
Senator	49	52
	100	100
B. Status of State Winner in "Friendly"	(N = 89)	(N = 104)
State	69	68
Winner in "Hostile" State	31	32
State	91
	100	100
C. Status of Candidate
	(N=75)	(N = 78)
Winner the incumbent	77	72
Winner the challenger	23	28
	100	100

This is more evidence of the governors' higher visibility, and it shows that he is a figure of interest at the primary stage no less than at the general election.

VI. A CONTROLLED CONCLUSION

Does a divisive primary place a candidate at a disadvantage as against an opponent who had smooth sailing in securing his nomination? The record as thus far reported would seem to suggest that a prior experience of a hard-fought primary is a handicap. For in the 99 elections examined, 68 were lost by the candidate with a divisive primary behind him. The tabulations, to be sure, showed that gubernatorial candidates, candidates running in friendly states, candidates who won their nominations in primaries with high turn-outs, and-most particularly—candidates who were incumbents. were all more apt to win. The winners; however, constituted only 31 per cent of the group being studied whereas, ceteris paribus, they would have constituted about 50 per cent.

It is therefore in order to compare these 99

elections with a parallel set of such contests where "other things" were, as near as may be, equal. These are the 121 elections where both candidates were at an equal advantage, at least so far as their experience in the primary was concerned. In this group, either both candidates had undergone a divisive primary or both had had token primaries. Table VII compares the status of the winners in the two groups of elections. It should, first of all, be indicated that an approximately equal number of senatorial and gubernatorial elections were in both groups. In the group of 99 where one candidate was presumably disadvantaged, 51 per cent of the elections involved the governorship; and among the 121 where neither candidate was handicapped, 48 per cent were gubernatorial elections. This difference of three percentage points is relatively insignificant.

More important is the fact that in the 89 and 104 contests taking place in states that could be classified as being either friendly or hostile to the respective candidates, the records are virtually identical. Therefore it would appear that the sympathies of the state constitute a persisting influence that remains unaffected by what occurred or did not occur at the primary.

Respecting the influence of incumbency, we have 75 elections pitting an incumbent against a challenger in the group with one presumably handicapped candidate, and 78 elections in the group where both candidates were on a par. While the challengers won in only 23 per cent of the former contests they managed to win in 28 per cent of the latter. This gap of five percentage points is not strikingly high, and it is difficult to know how much importance to ascribe to it. On the whole, it seems fair not to make too much of this difference.

Accordingly, it appears that a divisive primary, in and of itself, bears little relation to a candidate's prospects at the general election. The sorts of candidates who win and lose are much the same in contests where one or neither or both of the contenders have first undergone a divisive primary. Every election inexorably produces one winner and one loser. The conditions associated with victory and defeat are chiefly the traditional ones of incumbency and the party-orientation of the state in which the election is held. This study has sought to throw some light on which candidates who have had divisive primaries are more likely to win or to lose. But its chief conclusion is that their prospects would have been much the same even if they had had no difficulties at all in securing their nominations.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS AND VOTER TURNOUT IN A LOCAL COMMUNITY: A PROBLEM IN SPURIOUS CORRELATION

THAD L. BEYLE
Denison University

This paper presents an attempt, in a case study, to infer causal relationships between contests for local elective office and voter turnout—an attempt which required, in turn, the use of a recently developed mathematical technique for identifying and eliminating spurious correlations. The method no doubt has wider applications.

The case study involves a small New England town and its annual February town elections over the period 1947-1963. The town was chosen as one of the six affected by the newly established Cape Cod National Seashore. The time period was chosen to cover the interval during which the town was faced with the rapid increase in tourism which transformed it from a declining agricultural town to a service-based town. The policies and methods by which the town dealt with this basic change in its economic structure were of immediate interest, especially in the latter years when the National Park Service became involved in the problems the Cape has faced in this postwar period.1

The study raised the question of who was making the various types of governmental decisions that could be made locally. Qualitative interviews, supported by archival data, indicated that the Board of Selectmen and usually a Selectman made and carried out the town's necessary decisions, although it was generally recognized that this ability was restricted by prior decisions, decisions made elsewhere (public and private), and lack of technical knowledge. This decision making process was evidently not too taxing a burden prior to World War II, as the town and its agricultural base declined. But following the war, the dynamic growth in tourist use of the town and its facilities necessitated a broadened scope of town government activity. This was especially true in such problem areas as town services to the summer folk, land-use regulation and building codes. In early and partial response, the town meeting established a Planning Board in 1946, to plan and implement regulatory measures in these latter two fields. In other areas, existing governmental units were strengthened in various ways and temporary committees and governmental units were made permanent. To outward appearance, the town responded during the whole period by maintaining its basic governmental structure and relationships and by adding functions or enlarging units only where there was a felt need.

¹ The data for this study were obtained in conjunction with the author's unpublished dissertation, "The Cape Cod National Seashore: A Study in Conflict" (University of Illinois, 1963). The author wishes to acknowledge special indebtedness to Professors Phillip Monypenny and Bernard Lazerwitz of the University of Illinois and Professor Hubert M. Blalock, Jr. of the University of North Carolina.

If this were true, then the members of the Board of Selectmen should still retain their high position as the decision makers in the town notwithstanding changes, trends or outside influences. However, the town's initial response in establishing a Planning Board and the obvious land-use thrust of the National Seashore issue, 1957-63, suggested the possibility that the Planning Board had become an important decision maker in the community, equal to or even supplanting the Board of Selectmen. This possibility was further heightened by the conflict over the National Seashore, which found the Board of Selectmen approving the concept, at least, of a National Seashore, while the Planning Board, almost from the day of the initial proposal, acted as its most ardent antagonist. What body, then, really made the town's decisions? Qualitative interview data gave mixed answers on the role of the Planning Board in this process, depending on the respondent's viewpont. Those with pro-Seashore feelings saw the Planning Board as obstructionist and weak, while those with anti-Seashore feelings saw it as constructive and having some power in making and directing decisions. More objective data and other techniques were needed to test the hypothesis that the Planning Board was an important decision maker in the community and was so recognized by citizens of the town.

One of several quantitative checks available,2

² Another possible quantitative check involves the warrant articles which form the agenda for the town meeting. Ascertaining who backed the voting behavior in the annual town election, was used to measure the relative turnout in the voting for various offices, and thereby presumably the prestige in which they were held. These town elections involve all the elected offices in the town which are open for contest in that particular year and are held in February, at town meeting time. Because of the date, it seemed unlikely that extraneous state or national "noise" would interfere with the voting results. Also, so far as could be ascertained, these offices have not been overtly contested on a partisan basis.3 Therefore, the national, state and party variables would not seem to be possible "outside" intruders capable of causing any systematic bias in the February town elections. These elections should show what offices attract most attention.

I. THE DATA

The specific variables related were "voter turnout," or the per cent of the eligible voters who actually voted, and "office contests," or articles and how these articles fared over time should give some indication as to whose will tends to prevail. This approach would focus directly on the Board of Selectmen since most articles funnel through their office as they make up the final warrant. Thus it would tend to be a test of the ability of the Board of Selectmen to get their way and not an equal test of all town institutions, official roles, groups or individuals. A further question arises, which seemed unanswerable: what about those articles that did not make the final warrant? Incomplete records as to article sponsorship and non-warrant articles allowed too great a chance for error in the findings by this route of inquiry.

⁸ This assertion is based on examination of nomination papers for candidature for local office, newspaper accounts during the period, and the overwhelming dominance of the Republican Party in the Town. To demonstrate the last point two sorts of evidence are at hand. First, between 1947 and 1963 there were 100 candidates for local public office, defining candidature arbitrarily as anyone who received more than five votes for a particular office. The party registration of these candidates was: Republican 72; Democrat 7; Independent 18; Unknown 3. Of the seven Democrats who ran, only two were successful. Second, the town's per cent Republican vote for the gubernatorial candidate during the period was: 1946-92.7%; 1948—84.8%; 1950—83.7%; 1952—89.7%; 1954—88.9%; 1956—85.2%; 1958— 83.1%; 1960-81.7%; 1962-78.5%. While there is a decline in the Republican percentage over the period, it remains high enough to classify the town as one-party, Republican.

the winning candidate's percentage of the total vote cast for the candidates for that office. Five "office contest" categories were distinguished-four of them specific offices (Board of Selectmen, Moderator, School Committee and the Planning Board) and a fifth residual category for all "other elective" offices. The working hypothesis used to relate the variables was that the greater the contest for an office—the nearer the vote for it came to an even tiethe higher the voter turnout would be.4 If this proved to be so, and the filling of any one office was consistently contested and thereby created a higher voter turnout for it, this finding should indicate which office was perceived as most important in the town by those who run for office as well as by those who vote.

Table I presents the data on which the following analysis is based. Table II is a matrix that presents the interrelationship of the variables. A multiple correlation run with "voter turnout" as the dependent variable and the five "office contests" as the independent variables produced a correlation coefficient of .87. This means that the variations in the office contests explain over 75 per cent of the variation in the voter turnout—which further substantiates the assertion that little "outside noise" was impinging on these data.

In analyzing the matrix to ascertain which contest variable was causing the most changes in voter turnout, the data indicated that Board of Selectmen contests (+.84), "Other office" contests (+.49) and Moderator contests (+.38) correlated most closely with increases in voter turnout, while School Committee contests (+.13) affected voter turnout only slightly and Planning Board contests (-.52)actually correlated with a decrease in voter turnout. In the face of these results—particularly the high correlation between the Board of Selectmen contests and "Other office" contests (+.63), a spurious correlation seemed more than a possibility. The Board of Selectmen contests, that is to say, were perhaps causing covariation between voter turnout and "Other office" contests, which made the latter two variables appear to be highly related. It seemed possible also that Board of Selectmen contests were causing a spurious negative relationship between the Planning Board contests and voter turnout (-.52), since the former were related inversely to the Planning

⁴ Alvin Boskoff and Harmon Zeigler, Voting Patterns in a Local Election (Philadelphia and New York, J. B. Lippincott, 1964), p. 18 and Robert E. Lane, Political Life (Glencoe, 1959), pp. 308-11.

TABLE I. TOWN ELECTIONS, 1947-1963

	W. tau	Per	r cent of office	vote cast for wi	nning candidat	e for:
Year	Voter turnout⁴	Board of Selectmen	Moderator	School Committee	Planning Board	Other offices
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1947	41.2	100.0	100.0	100.0	62.3^{b}	100.0
1948	49.6	86.7	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1949	40.0	100.0	100.0	80.4	100.0	87.80
1950	74.2	42.3	100.0	100.0	53.5	53.2^{d}
1951	67.9	65.0	100.0	38.3	$52.4^{ m e}$	100.0
1952	17.8	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1953	72.6	49.0	100.0	95.9	38.7	100.0
1954	21.3	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1955	54.3	74.6	82.3	100.0	100.0	100.0
1956	54.3	71.5	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1957	15.5	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1958	75.8	78.5	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1959	80.7	47.0	24.6	100.0	72.7	52.1^{d}
1960	52.9	68.5	100.0	100.0	44.4	57.8f
1961	41.7	76.7	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
1962	67.3	32.2	100.0	49.1	100.0	71.8^{g}
1963	32.3	100.0	100.0	51.1	100.0	100.0

^{*} Per cent of eligible voters who voted.

Board contests (-.43) and highly positively to voter turnout (+.84). How could these surmises be confirmed?

II. THEORETICAL BASE

In order to test whether these apparent interrelationships were actually spurious, the author turned to a technique currently being developed in statistical analysis. The technique has developed in part from attempts to reduce the possibility of spurious correlations. Initially, these efforts were concerned with a

TABLE II. TOTAL CORRELATION MATRIX

	Voter turnout	Board of Selectmen contests	Moderator contests	School Committee contests	Planning Board contests	Other office contests
Voter turnout		+.84	+.38	+.13	52	+.49
Board of Selectmen
"office contests"	+.84		+.33	+.18	°43	+.63
Moderator "office
contests"	+.38	+.33	*	16	46	+.49
School Committee
"office contests"	+.13	+.18	16	_	+.01	04
Planning Board
"office contests"	52	43	46	+.01		56
Other "office contests"	+.49	+.63	+.49	04	56

b Average of five contests; winning candidates' votes ranged from 52.9 to 67.4 per cent.

c Office of Constable.

^d Office of Tree Warden.

e Two contests; one with 100.0 per cent winning vote, one with 52.4 per cent.

¹ Office of Recreation Commissioner.

g Office of Library Trustee.

two-variable relationship (x, y), in which some unexplained covariation appeared—unexplained in the sense that no logical connection between the two variables was evident, or, though some logical connection did exist, there was reason to suppose that both might be effects of some unknown cause (t). In either case, a third or test variable (t) was suspected of causing the covariation measured in the two-variable relationship (x, y) under investigation. The test variable (t) was therefore introduced into the system to measure accurately its relationship to the rest of the system.

If the relationship in the two-variable system (x, y) is indeed spurious, and the test variable is its cause, the original relationship will disappear (i.e., be reduced to zero) by the introduction of the test variable (t). Conversely, genuine relationship in the two-variable system will be reflected by the fact that it will be more clearly specified according to the test variable. Simon presented the mathematical foundations of this procedure and thereby laid the basis for expanding it to include more than three variables. Blalock has extended the procedure to include analysis of the relationships of four and five variables in a predictive system.

The initial step in carrying out this analysis is the intercorrelation of all variables in the system under study, with no assumptions as to any possible causal arrows. In the six-variable system, there are 15 pairs of relationships or 30 possible interrelationships. (See Table II.) At this point several assumptions are needed. The first underlies ordinary correlation analysis and assumes the relationships involved are linear. The others are more specific

⁵ Paul F. Lazarsfeld, "Interpretation of Statistical Relation as a Research Operation," Lazarsfeld and Morris Rosenberg, eds., The Language of Social Research (Glencoe, 1955), pp. 115-125.

⁶ Herbert A. Simon, "Spurious Correlation: A Causal Interpretation," Journal of the American Statistical Association, Vol. 49 (September, 1954), pp. 467-479.

⁷ Hubert M. Blalock, Jr., Social Statistics (New York, 1960) and Causal Inferences in Nonexperimental Research (Chapel Hill, The University of North Carolina Press, 1964).

⁸ For the purposes of simplicity and clarity, the following symbols are used in this portion of the presentation: Board of Selectmen contests (t); voter turnout (y); Moderator contests (x₁); School Committee contests (x₂); Planning Board contests (x₃); and, "Other office" contests (x₄).

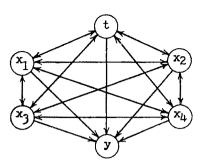

FIGURE 1. Diagram of relationships in six-variable system.

to the problem under study: there is a time precedence in the variables involved and all other "outside" or "extraneous" variables are random in their effect on the particular variable system under study. With these assumptions, the number of possible causal arrows is reduced and the system becomes a potentially predictive model in which the relationships between variables can be derived from the original correlation matrix.

In this particular six-variable case, one further assumption was made in order to test the interrelationships for possible spuriousness. This is that "voter turnout" was the dependent variable and that the causal relationship or arrow, if any, was uni-directional, from the several independent "office contest" variables to the dependent "voter turnout" variable. This was derived from the working hypothesis specified above.

The original system, containing 30 relationships between the six variables, was reduced to 25 when the uni-directionality of the influence of the independent variables on the dependent variable was assumed (Figure 1). By suggesting that one office contest variable may be causing spurious relationships between the remaining contests variables and voter turnout, the possible relationships are reduced to 5 (Figure 2). In this case, it appeared that the Board of Selectmen contests were the possible cause of spurious correlation, but to fully test the hypotheses of spuriousness each of the other office contest variables (t, x₁, x₂, x₃, x₄) was also placed in the causal position, in turn.

⁹ If it becomes apparent that a specific "outside" or "extraneous" variable is not random in its effects, this variable should be brought into the system of variables to aid in explaining the relationships under investigation. Simon, op. cit., pp. 471–473 and Blalock, Social Statistics, pp. 339–340.

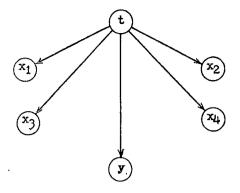

Figure 2. Diagram of source of spurious relationships.

The model of spuriousness (Figure 2) yields the following predictive equations:

$$\begin{aligned} \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{x}_1 \mathbf{y})} &= \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{x}_1)} \cdot \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{y})} \\ \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{x}_2 \mathbf{y})} &= \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{x}_2)} \cdot \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{y})} \\ \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{x}_3 \mathbf{y})} &= \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{x}_3)} \cdot \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{y})} \\ \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{x}_4 \mathbf{y})} &= \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{x}_4)} \cdot \mathbf{r}_{(\mathbf{t} \mathbf{y})} \end{aligned}$$

Table III contains predictive equations and computations based on the correlation coefficients in Table II.

III. ANALYSIS OF DATA

The model of spurious correlation which introduced the Board of Selectmen contests as the test variable into the original relationship

TABLE III. OFFICE CONTEST VARIABLES AS TEST VARIABLES

Model	Office contests variable being related to voter turnout	Correlation be- tween contests variable and voter turnout*	Predicted correlation by test variable†	Correlation not predicted by test variable‡
A. Test	Variable is the Board of Selectmen	contests		Washington Co.
	Moderator	+.38	+.28	+.10
	School Committee	+.13	+.15	02
	Planning Board	52	36	16
	Other	+.49	+.53	04
B. Test	Variable is the Moderator contests
	*Board of Selectmen	+.84	+.13	+.71
	School Committee	+.13	06	+.19
	Planning Board	52	17	35
	Other	+.49	+.19	+.30
C. Test	Variable is the School Committee co	ontests
	Board of Selectmen	+.84	+.02	+.82
	Moderator	+.38	02	+.40
	Planning Board	52	.00	52
	Other	+.49	01	+.50
D. Test	Variable is the Planning Board con	ntests
	Board of Selectmen	+.84	+.22	+.62
	Moderator	+.38	+.24	+.14
	School Committee	+.13	01	+.14
	Other	+.49	+.29	+.20
E. Test	Variable is "Other office" contests
	Board of Selectmen	+.84	+.31	+.53
	Moderator	+.38	+.24	+.14
	School Committee	+.13	02	+.15
	Planning Board	52	27	25

^{*} These correlation coefficients are taken directly from Table II.

[†] These correlation coefficients are derived from the predictive equations as related to each of the models. The reader may check these computations by fitting the correlation coefficients from Table II to the formulas involved.

[‡] This represents the difference between the values in column 1 and column 2.

(Model A in Table III), did produce very close predictions in two of the relationships—between the School Committee contests and voter turnout (+.13 vs. +.15), and between "Other office" contests and voter turnout (+.49 vs. +.53). In these relationships it can therefore be asserted that the Board of Selectmen contests caused a spurious statistical relationship between both the School Committee and "Other office" contests and voter turnout. In other words, any apparent effect of these contests on the turnout was almost entirely due to the relationship of all three to the Board of Selectmen contests. Reasonably close predictions were also produced in the other two relationships between the Moderator contests and turnout (+.38 vs. +.27), and between the Planning Board contests and turnout (-.52 vs. -.36). In these cases too, the Board of Selectmen contests caused a spurious statistical relationship in a major portion of the original relationships observed among these three variables.

The alternative hypotheses of spuriousness (Models B, C, D, E in Table III), were not able to predict the original correlations to the extent Model A did and so these were eliminated as alternative hypotheses and Model A is retained as the best explanatory model which fits the data. It is not the only possible model of explanation because it is impossible to rule out all other logical alternatives, such as an intervening model (Figure 3). But it is, at this point, the best explanatory model tested.

IV. CONCLUSION

From the foregoing analysis, it is evident the hypothesis that the Board of Selectmen contests were the cause of spurious correlation between the remaining office contests and the level of voter turnout in the February town elections was upheld. In more general terms, contests for the office of the Board of Selectmen will cause variations in voter turnout, while contests for the other elected offices in the town will not significantly affect the voter turnout unless in interaction with a contest for the Board of Selectmen.

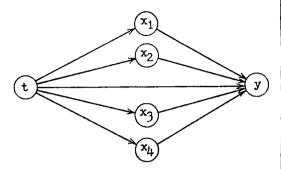

FIGURE 3. Alternative model of intervening variable.

It must be concluded the Board of Selectmen was the office perceived as most important in the town by those who ran for office and by those who voted. It appears the Planning Board did not become the focus of decision making power, as measured by people contesting the election of Planning Board members and by these contests in turn increasing the turnout of voters. While the postwar problems raised the possibility that the opposite might have happened, evidently the main decisions were still being made by or at least through the Board of Selectmen. Further, while the Planning Board's area of interest was extremely important and the focus of much activity during the period, it was evidently only part of the total problem facing the town for which the Board of Selectmen had greater responsibility. When the Planning Board acted as the most vocal and ardent antagonist of the National Seashore, it again spoke as and for a relatively narrow segment of interest as opposed to the Board of Selectmen, who spoke from a broader viewpoint. The use of the Simon-Blalock methodology aided in eliminating possible explanatory hypotheses derived from qualitative data which might have led to incorrect though plausible conclusions.

TYPES OF PRIMARY AND PARTY RESPONSIBILITY

IRA RALPH TELFORD Stanford University

A chief criticism of the American party system is the lack of party responsibility. In the view of some students, one characteristic of our political system that contributes to this irresponsibility is the practice in some states of allowing individuals to vote in primaries without regard to their partisan allegiances. In such an open primary Republicans may, if they wish, vote in the Democratic primary. and vice versa. The contrasting, and more common, practice is the closed primary, in which participation is restricted to party "members." Some political scientists think that the closed primary, by subjecting legislators to the presumed discipline of periodic scrutiny by their party's members, induces a greater measure of party regularity than the open primary, in which the official has to satisfy a more motley clientele.2 This position was taken in the best-known statement of the "party government" school, the 1950 report of the APSA Committee on Political Parties:

The closed primary deserves preference because it is more readily compatible with the development of a responsible party system. . . . on the other hand, the open primary tends to destroy the concept of membership as the basis of party organization.3

1 "As a matter of fact, membership in a political party has none of the usual characteristics of membership in an association. In most states the party has no control over its own membership. Any legal voter may on his own initiative and by his own declaration execute legal formalities before a duly designated public official making himself a registered member of the party. The party as such is not consulted. It does not accept the application; it does not vote the applicant into the association; it may not reject the application; and, finally, there is usually no recognized and authoritative procedure by which the party may expel a member." E. E. Schattschneider, Party Government (New York, 1942), pp. 55-56.

² This proposition is based on an assumption about the electorate's information level that does not appear to be confirmed by voting behavior research, which indicates that most voters do not even know their Congressman's name, much less his voting record. See Donald E. Stokes and Warren E. Miller, "Party Government and the Saliency of Congress," Public Opinion Quarterly (Winter, 1962), pp. 531-546.

3 Towards a More Responsible Two-Party System (New York, 1950), p. 71.

Other political scientists have expressed doubts about this presumed relationship between primaries and party responsibility,4 but there has been no systematic empirical evidence on the point. This paper will examine the relationship between primaries and party responsibility by comparing the party regularity of senators from open primary and closed primary

The Book of the States lists the type of primary operative in each state: seven states use the open primary, four states nominate their senators by convention, and twenty-six states use the closed primary, outside the South. The Southern states (all of which use the closed primary) are excluded from the comparison, or are tabulated separately, because southern Democrats tend not to go along with northern Democrats on many issues, thus beclouding the final results. That is, apparent differences between senators from both types of primary systems may be masking other differences due to special conditions in the South. Alaska and Hawaii are also excluded; they gained statehood at the end of the period covered.

The computations in the following tables are based on the Party-Unity Index in the Congressional Quarterly,5 which records each individual senator's roll-call votes cast with 4 The initial impetus for this study came from an article by Austin Ranney, "Towards a More Responsible Two-Party System," this REVIEW, Vol. 45 (June, 1951), pp. 488-499. The article was a critique of the then recently published report by the Committee on Political Parties, and notably, of the Committee's recommendation that only one major reform was needed in the primary laws of the United States—the abolition of all primaries except the closed variety. On this proposal Professor Ranney commented in a footnote: "Is there any evidence to suggest for example, that Senator Knowland (from a crossfiling state) and Senator Magnuson (from a blanket-primary state) disagree with and stray from the programs and positions of their respective parties more than say, Senator Morse, Senator Tobey, or ex-Senator Elmer Thomas (all from closed-primary states)?" (p. 490).

⁵ Computations taken from the following volumes of the Congressional Quarterly: Vol. 2, p. 786; Vol. 4, pp. 38-39; Vol. 6, p. 59; Vol. 8, p. 67; Vol. 10, p. 72; Vol. 12, p. 126; Vol. 14, p. 126; and

Vol. 16, p. 142.

TABLE 1. COMPARISON OF PARTY-UNITY INDEX FOR SENATORS FROM OPEN AND CLOSED PRIMARY STATES, 1945-1960

Non-Southern States Southern States Congresses Open primary Closed primary Closed primary Index N* Index Index % % 79th 82.7 12 79.6 65.2 21 72.8 22 SOth 91.1 14 82.9 52 77.3 22 81st 83.4 14 78.1 52 82d 85.9 77.9 52 75.1 22 14 87.8 84.3 51 70.0 20 83d 14 84th 76.9 74.6 63.3 85th 76.9 13 67.0 51 65.7 52.0 S6th 75.5 68.5 76.7 68.9 82.5 Mean

* Total number of senators upon which the percentage is based; the maximum number of senators from open primary states is fourteen, and from closed primary states fifty-two. States which nominate by convention (New York, Connecticut, Delaware, and Indiana) are excluded.

and against the majority of his party. Eight Congresses (1945-1960) were examined to determine the effect of party unity over a period of time. Coincidentally, the survey covered four Congresses under a Republican President (the 82d, 83d, 84th and 85th), and four under a Democratic President (the 79th, 80th, 81st and 86th). From Table I it appears that over a fifteen-year period a slightly but constantly higher percentage of party unity is evidenced by senators from open primary

TABLE II. COMPARISON OF PARTY-UNITY INDEX OF REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC SENATORS (EXCLUDING THE SOUTH) 1945-1960

	Open pri	imaries	Closed primaries
Congresses	Republi- cans %	Demo- crats	Republi- cans %	Demo- crats %
79th	75.2	88.0	79.9	82.9
80 th	91.8	89.5	83.9	86.6
81st	80.1	89.4	75.3	82.4
82d	85.0	88.0	76.0	82.1
83d	86.9	89.4	87.0	77.7
84th	71.3	84.5	73.6	74.1
85th	74.0	79.4	65.0	70.5
86th	71.7	76.5	69.6	66.7
Mean	79.5	85.6	76.3	77.9

states than from closed primary states. This would indicate that the closed primary does not improve party responsibility in the Senate. In no Congressional session do the open primary senators display less party unity than their closed primary colleagues. Table II confirms this conclusion by showing that controlling for party does not affect the resultsopen primary senators still exhibit a greater degree of party responsibility.

This paper is addressed to a simple but still significant question: "Do open primaries tend to produce more irresponsible legislators?" Our conclusion is that whatever the causes of party irresponsibility among United States senators, the type of primary does not appear to be among them.

COMMUNICATION

THE USES OF NEUTRALISM

TO THE EDITOR:

There is an historical experience which needs to be put alongside Francis Low-Beer's article (this REVIEW, June, 1964), "The Concept of Neutralism." It is the experience of the old Swiss Confederation before the French conquest of 1798. Political parallels are dangerous, yet surely any successful experience in building inter-state peace is worthy of study in a world threatened by mutual nuclear annihilation. As sovereign political units, the early Swiss cantons easily bear comparison with the nationstates of today. Each canton issued its own currency, levied its individual duties on commerce, and controlled its own military organization. The group was held together by a complicated series of treaties and by frequent sessions of the Diet-in reality, a council of ambassadors.

Swiss external neutrality has been examined and discussed at length, but very few—even among political scientists—are familiar with the phenomenon of internal neutrality: that is, the assumption of a neutral or non-aligned role by certain states or cantons within the Confederation, in order to facilitate peaceful settlements of disputes among themselves by means of conciliation, mediation and arbitration.

In the Pact of Lucerne (1332), the three original rural cantons (which had sworn eternal mutual support in the famous ceremony of 1291) enlisted a peacemaker. In the case of disputes among the original cantons (and there had already been many) Lucerne was bound by the terms of the pact to work for an understanding through conciliation and mediation. During the two centuries that followed, the device of permanent neutrality was applied more widely, and had some failures but more successes, with the result that a more definite and comprehensive commitment to neutrality plus active conciliation and mediation was applied in the treaties by which Basel, Schaffhausen and Appenzell joined the Confederation in 1501-13.

Swiss government representatives were so convinced of the relevance of their country's experience that in 1920 they alluded to this active neutrality clause in asking for a similar role of neutrality within the League of Nations

(the request was refused by the Allies)....

The recurrent danger of conquest by neighboring empires showed the Swiss that peace between the cantons was a matter of survival for their independence. Thus active peacemaking served the long-range interests of the adversaries in a dispute between cantons, as well as the interests of the conciliators.

Nuclear weapons now mean that preventing general war is a matter of survival for all countries. Thus conciliation and mediation by the non-aligned can similarly serve the longrange interests of the people of the United States, of the USSR, and of the non-aligned nations.

Low-Beer holds, as I understand it, that in a great-power dispute form and content cannot be separated, and therefore that the claim of the non-aligned to be concerned not with the merits of the dispute but with finding a peaceful settlement must fall to the ground. But if and when "form" reaches the stage of mass obliteration and social disorganization, it becomes more important than "content"; this logically supports the case of the non-aligned.

Insofar, moreover, as two or more "blocs" might succeed in dragooning non-aligned nations into their respective camps, they would be violating the principle of self-determination for the latter. Therefore non-alignment, although seemingly indifferent or even opposed to some immediate policies of the West, helps to safeguard the long-range Western value of national independence.

If one recognizes that the great problem of world affairs is to combine substantial stability with peaceful change, then one must, it seems to me, concede that non-alignment can perform an extremely valuable function: that of offering to new nations bristling against injustice another avenue for seeking change besides aligning themselves with the communist bloc. World society is too complex for its future evolution to be handled adequately by an oversimplified struggle between black and white. Thesis and antithesis are important, but synthesis is vital.

WILLIAM B. LLOYD, JR. Roosevelt University

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL CONTRIBUTION

FOREIGN LOCAL GOVERNMENT: A BIBLIOGRAPHY*

ROBERT L. MORLAN University of Redlands

The past few years have witnessed a steadily increasing interest on the part of political scientists in the comparative study of local government, although productive research is still rather limited in scope. The scholar contemplating study in this field commonly faces serious difficulties even in determining what work has been done to date, as well as in finding that the writings are widely scattered and extremely variable in nature. Much can be gained in the broader and more realistic understanding of politics through comparative study at the local level, and the customarily parochial treatment of local government in American college classrooms can be improved by a greater injection of the experience of other peoples.

This compilation is an attempt to pull together for the first time the most comprehensive possible bibliography of writings-books, articles and some documents-in English dealing with the organizational structure and functioning of local government in countries other than the United States and the United Kingdom. This would appear to be a logical starting point, providing an indication of areas where work needs to be done and the types of study in short supply, as well as a guide to basic information on many countries. Most writing up to this time has in fact focused on governmental organization and operation, which quite naturally precedes more behaviorally oriented studies. A sizeable body of literature also deals with certain specialized aspects of foreign local governments, notably finance and physical planning, but that is in sufficient quantity for a separate specialized bibliography.

This particular bibliography is confined to publications in English to keep it within manageable scope, and on the assumption that anyone investigating deeply into the experience of an individual country will of course need to develop his own bibliography of publications in the language of that country. Materials on the United Kingdom are not included because of their vast scope, ready availability and more general familiarity. Items dealing with colonial periods of areas that have recently become independent countries have also been excluded except in a few instances where they make a definite contribution to an understanding of the present. Textbooks on comparative government and general studies of the government and politics of individual countries, which often touch briefly upon local institutions, are not cited. The time span of publications covered is from 1950 to the present, in recognition of the need to keep the listings reasonably contemporary and the fact that the great bulk of the writing on this subject has been published within the last dozen years.

* The writer wishes to acknowledge with gratitude a grant from the John Randolph and Dora Haynes Foundation for the support of research of which this article is a partial product.

For easy use the bibliography, after some general listings, is arranged by major areas of the world, and then by countries within those areas. The geographical classification is arbitrary, purely for convenience. In the case of each of the broad areas there is first an indication of publications having general significance for that region or items that deal with more than one country, followed by the materials concerned with individual nations. Books and pamphlets are listed first, then periodical articles. Items are classified as "most useful" and "generally useful." There are obviously serious problems in value classifications, since "usefulness" is relative to the special needs of the researcher; the term is used here as relative to the above mentioned purposes of this bibliography. Each set of categories applies only to the materials on the country under consideration, with no attempt at comparative evaluation between items dealing with different countries. A considerable amount has been written on certain countries, very little on others. For some there have been no publications in English, and not uncommonly very little in the language of the country itself.

BIBLIOGRAPHIES

Bibliography of Public Administration in Latin America. (Pan American Bibliographic Series No. 43.) (Washington: Pan American Union, 1958.) Includes limited treatment of local government.

Halasz, D. Metropolis: A Selected Bibliography on Administrative and Other Problems of Metropolitan Areas Throughout the World. (The Hague: Intl. Union of Local Authorities, 1961.)

Japan Science Review: Law and Politics, 1951, 1952. (Tokyo: Union of Japanese Societies of Law and Politics.) This annual in English provided in the two years cited an annotated bibliography which included local government.

Davis, S. R., and Colin A. Hughes, "The Literature of Australian Government and Politics," 4 Australian Jour. of Pol. & Hist. (Aug., 1958), pp. 107-133. Includes local govt.

Morlan, Robert L., "Local Government in the Netherlands," 52 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. (Sept., 1958), pp. 835-837.

Wickwar, W. Hardy, "List of Seventy-five Books on Comparative Local Government, 1815-1961," 1 Local Govt. Throughout the World (July, 1962), pp. 29-30.

Zink, Harold (ed.), "Selected Materials for a Comparative Study of Local Government: France, Italy, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Latin America, Near East, India, Philippines, Japan," 50 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. (Dec., 1956), pp. 1107-1133.
Individual authors are Brian Chapman, Roger H. Wells, Annika Baude, Axel Holm, Leo B. Lott, Harold F. Alderfer, R. Bhaskaran, M. Ladd Thomas, and Kurt Steiner.

GENERAL

Most Useful

Alderfer, Harold F. Local Government in Developing Countries. (N.Y.: McGraw Hill, 1964).

Hicks, Ursula K. Development from Below: Local Government and Finance in Developing Countries of the Commonwealth. (London: Oxford, 1961)

Humes, Samuel, and Eileen Martin. The Structure of Local Governments Throughout the World. (The Hague: Nijhoff, 1961).

Maddick, Henry. Democracy, Decentralisation, and Development. (London: Asia Publishing House, 1963).

Robson, William A. (ed.). Great Cities of the World. (London: Allen & Unwin, 1957). Includes treatments of Amsterdam, Bombay and Calcutta, Buenos Aires, Chicago, Copenhagen, London, Los Angeles, Manchester, Montreal and Toronto, Moscow, New York, Paris, Rio de Janeiro, Rome, Stockholm, Sydney, Wellington, Zurich, Cologne, Johannesburg, Tokyo and Osaka.

Wit, Daniel (ed.) A Comparative Survey of Local Government and Administration. (Bangkok: Thammasat Univ., Inst. of Public Administration, 1961).

Generally Useful

Anderson, Nels. The Urban Community: A World Perspective. (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1960).

Bakker-Schut, F. Problems of Expanding Towns Viewed Generally and in Their Relations to the General Situation in Rural Areas. (Report prepared for The Hague Congress of IULA, June, 1957.) (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1957).

A Brief History of the Chinese Society for the Study of Local Self-Government. (Taipeh: Chinese Society for the Study of Loc. Self-Govt., n.d.)

Central Services to Local Authorities. (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1962).

Harris, G. Montagu. Comparative Local Government. (London: Hutchinson, 1949; N.Y.: Rinehart, 1950).

Hoven, W., & A. van den Elshout. Local Government in Selected Countries: Ceylon, Israel, Japan. (New York: United Nations, Dept. of Econ. & Soc. Affairs, Div. for Public Admin., 1963). Part of study by IULA on central services to local authorities.

The Large Town and the Small Municipality. (Proceedings of the Vienna Congress, June, 1953.) (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1954).

The Large Town and the Small Municipality: Their Strength and Their Weakness. (Reports prepared for the Vienna Congress, June, 1953.) (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1953.)

Lee, Rose H. The City: Urbanism and Urbanization in Major World Regions. (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1955).

Local Government Finance and Its Importance for Local Autonomy. (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1955).

Menon, V. K. N. Central Services to Local Authorities in Developing Countries. (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1963). Pamphlet.

National Associations in Local Authorities Throughout the World. (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1956).

Papers on the UN/EROPA Seminar on Central Services to Local Authorities, 21 Oct.-6 Nov.. 1963 in New Delhi. (New Delhi: Indian Inst. of Public Admin., 1963). Nine papers.

The Problems of Metropolitan Areas. (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1962). Papers presented at the World Conference of Local Governments, Washington, D.C., June 15-20, 1961.

Sady, Emil J. Strengthening Central Services to Local Governments: An Essential Step Towards an Effective Role for Local Government in National Development. (New York: UN Office for Public Administration, 1959.) Pamphlet.

Town and Country: Problems of Urban Expansion. (Proceedings of The Hague Congress, June, 1957.) (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1958).

The World's Metropolitan Areas. (Berkeley: Univ. of Calif. Press, 1959).

Atmosudirdjo, Prajudi, "Central Services to Local - Governments," EROPA Review (June, 1961), pp. 1 ff.

- Boulouis, Jean, "Local Government as a Basis of and Training in Democracy," 5 Internat'l. Soc. Sci. Bulletin, (no. 1, 1953), pp. 14-50. Report of the work of the 2d world congress of the IPSA on local government in various countries, The Hague, Sept. 8-12, 1952.
- Corcoran, J. D., "Local Government Abroad, and Citizen Participation," 42 National Municipal Rev. (Jan., 1953), pp. 6-10+.
- Dotson, Arch, "The World's Great Cities," 44 National Municipal Review (May, 1956), pp. 218-224; (June, 1956), pp. 281-286.
- Emmerich, Herbert, "Management Lessons from Abroad: A Brief Review and Comment on Three International Management Conferences," 33 Public Management (Sept., 1951), pp. 194-198.
- Farberov, N. "Local Government Councils in the People's Democracies," New Times (Jan. 24, 1951), pp. 3-6.
- Green, L. P., "Observations on Municipal Government," in Report of the Proceedings 1952, Inst. of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, South Africa, pp. 106-178. (Johannesburg: Inst. of Munic. Treas. and Accountants, South Africa, 1952.) Systems of local govt. in Europe, U.S., U.K., and South Africa; proposals for reform.
- Hoyt, Homer, "The Structure and Growth of American Cities Contrasted with the Structure of European and Asiatic Cities," Urban Land (Sept., 1959), pp. 3-8.
- "Local Government Structure and Organization: IULA World Conference in U. S. A.," Municipal Review (Oct., 1961), pp. 635 ff.
- Maddick, R., "Some Effects of Technical Innovations on the Relationship Between Central and Local Authorities," International Social Science Journal (No. 3, 1960), pp. 385 ff.
- Mercier, Paul, "Urban Explosion in Developing Nations," 16 UNESCO Courier (July-Aug., 1963), pp. 50-55.
- Mithen, P., "Australia's Report on Metropolitan Administration," 2 EROPA Rev. (June, 1962), pp. 93-103. Attempts in Australia, Japan, and the Philippines to deal with rapid metropolitan growth.
- Poulantzas, N. M., "Centralization and Decentralization in the Local Government," 13 Revue Hellenique de Droit International (Jan.-Dec., 1960), pp. 254-289.
- Rodwin, Lloyd, "Metropolitan Policy for Developing Areas," Daedalus (Winter, 1961), pp. 132-146.
- Sady, Emil J., "Improvement of Local Government and Administration for Development Purposes: Comparative Analysis of Approaches and Results of the Cambridge Conference on Local Government and the United Nations Working Group on Administrative Aspects of

- Decentralization for National Development," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (July, 1962), pp. 135-148.
- Stewart, Neil, "Local Government in People's Democracies," Communist Review (Nov., 1951), pp. 341-345.
- Weatherhead, Sir Arthur, "Local Government in Developing Countries," 2 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (July, 1963), pp. 167-169.
- Whalen, H., "Democracy and Local Government," 3 Canadian Public Admin. (March, 1960), pp. 1-13.
- Whalen, H., "Ideology, Democracy and the Foundations of Local Self-Government," 26 Canadian Jour. of Econ. & Pol. Sci. (Aug., 1960), pp. 377-395. Reply with rejoinder by B. Keith-Lucas, (May, 1961), pp. 247-256.
- Wickwar, W. Hardy, "150 Years of Comparative Study of Local Government," 1 Local Govt. Throughout the World (July, 1962), pp. 27-30.
- Williams, Oliver P., "A Typology for Comparative Local Government," 5 Midwest Journal of Pol. Sci. (May, 1961), pp. 150-164. Not directly concerned with study of foreign local government, but has possible relevance.

AFRICA GENERAL

Most Useful

- Akpan, Ntieyong U. Epitaph to Indirect Rule: A Discourse on Local Government in Africa. (London: Cassell, 1956).
- Cambridge Summer Conference on Local Administration in Africa. (Various papers.) (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ., Overseas Study Committee, 1961).
- Cowan, L. Gray. Local Democracy in West Africa. (N.Y.: Columbia Univ. Press, 1958).
- Wallis, C. A. G. Urgent Local Government Problems in Africa. (Addis Ababa: UN Economic Commission for Africa, 1962.) Seminar on urgent administrative problems of African Governments, Addis Ababa, Oct. 1962. Pamphlet.
- Wraith, Ronald E.. Local Government in West Africa. (N.Y.: Praeger, 1964).
- Keith-Lucas, Bryan, "The Dilemma of Local Government in Africa," in Robinson, Kenneth, & Frederick Madden (eds.). Essays in Imperial Government. (London: Blackwell, 1963), pp. 193-208.
- Wallis, C. A. G., "The Foundations of Local Government in India and Africa," 7 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1955), pp. 2-11.
- Wallis, C. A. G., "Urgent Local Government Problems in Africa," 2 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (April, 1963), pp. 61-74.

Generally Useful

Africa-Asia: Municipal Problems in Developing Countries. (XIV International Congress of

- Local Authorities, Berlin, June, 1959.) (The Hague: IULA, 1960).
- Cameron, Ian D., & B. K. Cooper. The West African Councillor. (2d ed., London: Oxford, 1961).
- Comhaire, J. L. L. Aspects of Urban Administration in Tropical and Southern Africa. (Cape Town: Univ. of Cape Town, School of African Studies, 1953). Mimeo.
- Wraith, Ronald E. Local Government, (2d ed., London: Penguin Books, 1956). Deals with Nigeria and the Gold Coast.
- Bascom, W., "Obstacles to Self-Government," 306
 Annals of the Amer. Acad. of Pol. & Soc. Sci.
 (July, 1956), pp. 62-70.
- Christensen, J. B., "African Political Systems: Indirect Rule and Democratic Processes," 15 Phylon (1) (1954), pp. 69-83.
- Mair, L. P., "Representative Local Government as a Problem in Social Change," 10 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1958), pp. 11-24.

GHANA

Most Useful

- Boateng, J. A. Problems of Local Government in Ghana. (Obuasi: Ashanti Times Press, 1957). Pamphlet.
- Greenwood, A. F., "Ten Years of Local Government in Ghana," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (Jan., 1962), pp. 23-28.

Generally Useful

Aryee, C. B., "General Principles of Local Government Law in Ghana," Local Gov't. Ass'n. Review (Accra) (June, 1962), pp. 18 ff.

Wallis, C. A. G., "Reorganization of Local Government in Ghana," 11 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1959), pp. 22-26.

KENYA

Generally Useful

Brown, R. Tatton, "Local Government in the African Areas of Kenya," 12 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1960), pp. 147-149.

NIGERIA

Most Useful

- Campbell, Michael J. The Law and Practice of Local Government in Northern Nigeria. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1963).
- Harris, Philip J. Local Government in Southern Nigeria. (London: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1957).

Generally Useful

- Brown, R. E., and H. G. Graham-Jolly, "Local Government in the West Region of Nigeria; The Process of Local Government in Nyasaland," 7 Jour. of African Admin. (Oct., 1955), pp. 180-192.
- Holland, S. W. C., "Recent Developments in

- Local Government in Eastern Nigeria," 2 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (Jan., 1963), pp. 3-15.
- Nicholson, E. W. J., "Standing Orders—and the Beat of Ceremonial Drums: Nigeria, Land of Contrasts; Experiences and Impressions of Local Government in Britain's Largest Colony," 64 Municipal Jour. (Jan. 27, 1956), pp. 209+; (Feb. 10, 1956), p. 305; (March 2, 1956), pp. 463-464
- Tugbiyele, E. A., "Local Government in Nigeria: Some Suggestions for Solving the Problems of Structure and Finance," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (Oct., 1962), pp. 225-230.

MALAWI (NYASALAND)

Most Useful

Brown, R. E., and H. G. Graham-Jolly, "Local Government in the West Region of Nigeria; The Process of Local Government in Nyasaland," 7 Jour. of African Admin. (Oct., 1955), pp. 180-192.

Generally Useful

Robins, J. W., "Developments in Rural Local Government in Nyasaland," 13 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1961), pp. 148-157.

RHODESIA

Generally Useful

- Billing, M. G., "Tribal Rule and Modern Politics in Northern Rhcdesia," 58 African Affairs (April, 1959), pp. 135-140.
- Fitt, A. W. G., "Local Government Changes in Northern Rhodesia," 71 Municipal Jour. (Oct. 25, 1963), pp. 3247-3248.
- "The Role of the Ministry of Local Government in Southern Rhodesia," 2 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (Jan., 1963), pp. 31-39.

SOUTH AFRICA

Most Useful

- Green, L. P. The History of Local Government in South Africa: An Introduction. (Cape Town: Juta, 1957).
- Green, L. P., "Local Government Reform in South Africa," 33 Fublic Admin. (Winter, 1955), pp. 419-424.

Generally Useful

- Floyd, T. B. Better Local Government for South Africa. (Pietermaritzburg: Shuter & Shooter, 1952).
- The Government of the Witwatersrand. (City of Johannesburg, Local Government Commission of Inquiry, 1955). Pamphlet.
- Coles, Cyril L., "The African and Local Government: An Experiment in the North," South African Municipal Magazine (June, 1960), pp. 19-43.
- Gey van Pittius, E. F. W., "The Transvaal's Experiment in Local. Government," 40 Public Admin. (Spring, 1962), pp. 65-68.

SUDAN

Most Useful

Abdulla, Ali Hassan, "Local Government in the Sudan," (address made during the Asia-Africa Day, 30th June 1959.) (Berlin: IULA Congress, 1959)

Wallis, C. A. G., "Local Administration in the Sudan," 13 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1961), pp. 158-164.

Generally Useful

Report of the Commission on Coordination Between the Central and Local Government. (Khartoum: Republic of the Sudan, 1960).

Buchanan, L. M., "Local Government in the Sudan Since 1947," 5 Jour. of African Admin. (Oct., 1953), pp. 152-158.

Maddick, Henry, "Decentralization in the Sudan," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (April, 1962), pp. 71-83.

Mynors, T. H. B., "Local Government in the Sudan," IULA Bulletin (1953, No. 1), pp. 31 ff.

Tanganyika

Most Useful

Liebenow, J. Gus, "Some Problems in Introducing Local Government Reform in Tanganyika," 8 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1956), pp. 132-139.

Generally Useful

Liebenow, J. Gus, "The Chief in Sukuma Local Government," 11 Jour. of African Admin. (April, 1959), pp. 84-92.

Liebenow, J. Gus, "Tribalism, Traditionalism, and Modernism in Chagga Local Government," 10
 Jour. of African Admin. (April, 1958), pp. 71-82.

Tanner, R. E. S., "Local Government Elections in Ngara, Tanganyika: A Study in the Process of Social Change," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (July, 1962), pp. 173-182.

UGANDA

Most Useful

Burke, Fred G. Local Government and Politics in Uganda. (Syracuse: Syracuse Univ. Press, 1964).
Apter, David E., "Some Problems of Local Government in Uganda," 11 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1959), pp. 27-37.

Generally Useful

Burke, Fred G., "The Application of the English Committee System to Local Government in Uganda," 10 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1958), pp. 39-46.

MISCELLANEOUS

Most Useful

Hughes, P., "The Introduction of Local Government to Basutoland," 2 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (July, 1963), pp. 154-159.

Kilson, M., "Grass-Roots Politics in Africa: Local Government in Sierra Leone," 12 Political Studies (Feb., 1964), pp. 47-66.

Lewis, H., "Rural Administration in Morocco," 14 Middle East Jour. (Winter, 1960), pp. 45-60.

Generally Useful

Thomas, F. C., "The Juhaina Arabs of Chad," 13

Middle East Jour. (Spring, 1959), pp. 143-155.

Development of direct rule institutions in a pastoral society.

ASIA

GENERAL

Most Useful

Tinker, Hugh. The Foundations of Local Self-Government in India, Pakistan & Burma. (London: Athlone, 1954).

Thompson, Virginia, "Rural and Urban Self-Government in South-East Asia," in Rupert Emerson, Representative Government in South-East Asia. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Univ. Press, 1955).

Yao, Chi-Ch'ing, "Local Self-Government in Southeast Asia," 1 EROPA Review (June, 1961), pp. 51-103.

Generally Useful

Africa-Asia: Municipal Problems in Developing Countries. (XIV International Congress of Local Authorities, Berlin, June, 1959.) (The Hague: International Union of Local Authorities, 1960). Pamphlet.

Menon, V. K., "India's Report on City Administration and Citizen's Participation," 2 EROPA Rev. (June, 1962), pp. 105-108. Southeast Asia.

Ward, Robert E., "Village Government in Eastern and Southern Asia: Introduction," 15 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1956), pp. 175-183.

Burma

Most Useful

Duka-Ventura, Eva, "The Failure of Local Self-Government," 4 SAIS Review (Winter, 1960), pp. 16-20.

Generally Useful

The Local Government Democratization Program of the Government of the Union of Burma. (Chicago: Public Administration Service, n.d.)

Local Government in the Principal Cities of Burma. (Chicago: Public Administration Service, 1957).

Organization and Function of the Ministry of Democratization of Local Administration and Local Bodies, Government of the Union of Burma. (Chicago: Public Administration Service, 1957). Mimeo.

India

Most Useful

- Dey, S. K. Panchayat-i-Raj: A Synthesis. (Bombay & London: Asia Publishing House, 1962).
- Jha, C. Indian Local Self-Government. (Patna, India: Novelty & Co., 1958).
- Retzlaff, Ralph H. Village Government in India. (Bombay & London: Asia Publishing House, 1962.) Case study of Uttar Pradesh.
- Sharma, Mahadeo P. Local Self-Government in India. (2d ed.) (Bombay: Hind Kitabs, 1951).
- Venkatarangaiya, M. Local Self-Government in India. A paper for The Hague Congress of the International Political Science Assn., 1952.
- Zink, Harold (ed.) Rural Local Government in Sweden, Italy, & India. (N.Y.: Praeger, 1958).
 By Arne Wahlstrand, Feliciano Benvenuti, & R.
 Bhaskaran.
- Dey, S. K. "The Panchayat: India's Answer to Grass-Roots Participation," 2 Free: A Roosevelt University Magazine, (Spring, 1963), pp. 19-26
- Dubhashi, P. R., "The Implications and Scope of Democratic Decentralization," 6 Indian Jour. of Public Admin. (Oct.-Dec. 1960), pp. 369-392.
- Maddick, Henry, "Panchayati Raj: Rural Local Government in India," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (Oct., 1962), pp. 201-212.
- Srinivasan, N., "Village Government in India," 15 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1956), pp. 201-213.
- Venkatarangaiya, M., "Local Self-Government in India," 31 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Oct., 1960), pp. 329-345; (Jan., 1961), pp. 347-376.

Generally Useful

- Agrawal, Shri R. N. Delhi Municipal Committee. (Bombay: All-India Inst. of Local Self-Govt., 1955).
- Avasthi, A. Local Self-Government in Madhya Pradesh. (Nagpur, India: Western Book Depot, 1950).
- Corporation of Madras. (Bombay: All-India Inst. of Local Self-Govt., 1952).
- Gurmukh Nihal Singh, Shri. The Metropolitan Area and its Administration. (Bombay: All-India Inst. of Local Self-Govt., 1956).
- Jha, C. The Local Government Committee. (Patna, India: Novelty & Co., 1963).
- The Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay.

 (Bombay: All-India Inst. of Local Self-Govt., 1952).
- New Delhi Improving City Government. (Proceedings of a seminar). (New Delhi: Indian Inst. of Public Admin., 1959).

- Park, Richard L., and Irene Tinker (eds.) Leadership and Political Institutions in India. (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1959).
- Raman Rao, A. V. Structure & Workings of Village Panchayats. (Poona, India: Gokhale Inst. of Politics & Economics, 1954).
- Samant, S. V. Village Panchayats. (Bombay: Local Self-Govt. Inst., 1957).
- Sen, Shri S. N. The City of Calcutta. (Calcutta: Bookland, 1960).
- Sharma, Mahadeo P. Local Self-Government and Finance in Uttar Pradesh. (Allahabad, India: Kitab Mahal, 1954).
- Thakore, J. M. Development of Local Self-Government in Bombay and Saurashtra. (Bombay: All-India Inst. of Local Self-Govt., 1957).
- Turner, Roy (ed.). India's Urban Future. (Selected studies from an international conference at Berkeley, California, June-July 1960). (Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1962).
- Chatterjee, P., "A Plea for Municipal Self-Government in Calcutta," Calcutta Review (Nov., 1958), pp. 296-399.
- Dubhashi, P. R., "Democratic Decentralization in Mysore State," 33 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (July-Sept., 1962), pp. 36-69.
- Hart, Henry C., "Bombay Politics: Pluralism or Polarization," 20 Journal of Asian Studies (May, 1961), pp. 267-274.
- Kabir, Rokeya R. "Local Self-Government in Bengal," 7 Jour. of the Asiatic Society of Pakistan (June, 1962), pp. 138-190.
- Kapur, S. S., "Village Democracy in India," 6
 United Asia (April, 1954), pp. 90-94.
- Kothari, Rajni, "Panchayati Raj: A Reassess-ment," 13 Economic Weekly (May 13, 1961), pp. 754-760.
- Lalani, K. T., "Civic Administration in Greater Bombay," Bombay Civic Journal (Aug., 1958), pp. 51-53.
- Lingamurty, V. "Partyless Panchayati Raj," 33 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (April-June, 1963), pp. 289-295.
- Mathur, Ramesh Narain, "Problems and Prospects of Democratic Decentralization in India: an Appraisal," 112 Modern Review (Dec., 1962), pp. 445-448.
- Rudolph Lloyd I., "Urban Life and Populist Radicalism: Dravidian Politics in Madras," 20 Jour. of Asian Studies (May, 1961), pp. 283-297.
- Sharma, Mahadeo P. "Recent Experiments in Local Self-Government in India," 3 Indian Jour. of Public Admin. (April-June, 1957), pp. 104-111.
- Somjee, A. H., "Periurban Politics in India," 3

 Asian Survey (July, 1963), pp. 324-331.
- Venkata Rao, V., "A Hundred Years of Local Government in Andhra and Madras," 28,29 Quarterly Journal of the Local Self-Government Institute (April, 1958), pp. 675-730; (July, 1958), pp. 109-173; (Jan., 1959), pp. 319-386.

Wallis, C. A. G., "The Foundations of Local Government in India and Africa," 7 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1955), pp. 2-11.

Weiner, Myron, "Violence and Politics in Calcutta," 20 Jour. of Asian Studies (May, 1961), pp. 275-281.

Japan

Most Useful

Guide to Local Government in Japan. (Tokyo: Japan Local Self-Government Institute, 1961). Pamphlet.

Local Government in Japan. (Tokyo: National Ass'n. of Japanese Towns and Villages, 1960). Pamphlet.

Steiner, Kurt. Local Government in Japan. (Thesis, Stanford Univ., 1955).

Dull, Paul S., "The Political Structure of a Japanese Village," 13 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1954), pp. 175-190.

Kojima, R., "Local Government in Japan," 1 EROPA Rev. (Oct., 1961), pp. 77-84.

"Metropolitan Administration in Tokyo," 6 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Jan., 1962), pp. 32-43.

Steiner, Kurt, "The Japanese Village and its Government," 15 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1956), pp. 185-199.

Steiner, Kurt, "Local Government in Japan: Reform and Reaction," 23 Far Eastern Survey (July, 1954), pp. 97-102.

Ulmer, S. Sidney, "Local Authority in Japan Since the Occupation," 19 Jour. of Politics (Feb., 1957), pp. 46-65.

Ward, Robert E., "The Socio-Political Role of the Buraku (Hamlet) in Japan," 45 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. (Dec., 1951), pp. 1025-1040.

Ward, Robert E., "Some Observations on Local Autonomy at the Village Level in Present-Day Japan," 12 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1953), pp. 183-202.

Generally Useful

An Administrative Perspective of Tokyo 1963. (Tokyo: The Tokyo Metropolitan Gov't., 1963) Pamphlet.

Brett, Cecil C. The Government of Okayama Prefecture. (Thesis, Univ. of Michigan, 1956).

The City of Osaka: Its Government and Administration. (Osaka: The Osaka Municipal Office, 1955). Pamphlet.

Local Government. (Tokyo: Prime Minister's Office, Autonomy Agency, 1959). Pamphlet.

Political Reorientation of Japan. (Washington: Govt. Printing Office, 1949). Report of the Occupation. Vol. I has a section on local government at pp. 260-289.

Tokyo. (Tokyo Metropolitan Govt., 1955). Pamphlet.

Tokyo 1957. (Tokyo: Metropolis of Tokyo Administrative Planning Section, 1957). Pamphlet. Braibanti, Ralph J. D., "Executive Power in the Japanese Prefectural Government," 9 Far Eastern Quarterly (1950), pp. 231-244.

ern Quarterty (1950), pp. 231-244.

Isomura, E., "Problems of the City in Japan," 7 Confluence (Summer, 1958), pp. 150-156.

Johnson, E., "Perseverance Through Orderly Change: The Traditional Buraku in a Modern Community," 22 Human Organization (Fall, 1963), pp. 218-223.

"Local Government in Japan," Civic Affairs (Sept., 1956), pp. 105 ff.

"The Metropolis of Tokyo," Civic Affairs (Jan., 1955), pp. 3-11.

Nishikawa, Kiyoharu, "Local Governments and Their Financial Administration in Post-War Japan," 18 Public Finance (1963), pp. 110-118.

Ward, Robert E. "Patterns of Stability and Change in Rural Japanese Politics," Occasional Papers, Center for Japanese Studies, No. 1, (Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan, 1951), pp. 1-6.

Warp, George A., "'Americanization' in Japan," 41 National Municipal Rev. (Oct., 1952), pp.
443-448.

Warp, George A., "In Our Image and Likeness," 42 National Municipal Rev. (April, 1953), pp. 175-178, 188.

MALAYA

Most Useful

Aris, Haji Ismail B. P. Local Government in Malaya. (Kuala Lumpur: n.p., 1963). Pamphlet.

Generally Useful

Hawkins, G., "First Steps in Malayan Local Government," 26 Pacific Affairs (June, 1953), pp. 155-158.

"Local Government in Malaya," Australian Municipal Journal (May, 1955), pp. 443 ff.

PAKISTAN

Most Useful

Dupree, Louis. The Basic Democracies Programme: The "Quiet Revolution" Keeps Rolling Along. (New York: American Universities Field Staff, Jan. 18, 1960, South Asia series, v. 4, no. 1). Pamphlet.

Friedman, Harry J., "Pakistan's Experiment in Basic Democracies," 33 Pacific Affairs (June, 1960), pp. 107-125.

Friedman, Harry J., & A. T. R. Rahman, "Administration at the Grass Roots: Pakistan's Basic Democracies," 7 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (April, 1963), pp. 102-112.

Newman, K. J., "Basic Democracy as an Experiment," 10 Political Studies (Feb., 1962), pp. 46-64.

Rahman, Habibur, and L. F. Rushbrook Williams, "Basic Democracies as Institutions of Local Government in Pakistan," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (Oct., 1962), pp. 239-256.

Sayeed, Khalid B., "Pakistan's Basic Democracy," 15 Middle East Jour. (Summer, 1961), pp. 249-263.

Wheeler, Richard S., "Changing Patterns of Local Government and Administration in Pakistan," 62 South Atlantic Quarterly (Winter, 1963), pp. 67-77.

Generally Useful

Masud, Ul-Hasan. Law and Principles of Basic Democracies. (Lahore, Pakistan: Social Service Foundation, 1960).

Pakistan, Bur. of National Reconstruction. A Bold New System: Basic Democracies. (Washington, D.C.: Embassy of Pakistan, n.d.). Pamphlet.

Ayub Khan, Mohammed, "Basic Democracy as Explained by its Architect," 9 Pakistan Quar. (Winter, 1959), p. 13.

Maron, Stanley, "Basic Democracies in Pakistan," 39 Foreign Policy Bulletin (Feb. 1, 1960), pp. 77-79.

Newman, K. J., "The Background of Basic Democracy," 10 Pakistan Quar. (Spring, 1960), pp. 8-13

TAIWAN

Most Useful

Tsung-huang, Li. Local Government in the Republic of China. (Taipei: Local Govt. Ass'n. of the Republic of China, 1961). Pamphlet.

Generally Useful

Ch'ê, Ch. The City of Taipeh. (Taipeh: Fu-min Geographical Inst. of Econ. Development, Research Report No. 71, 1956). Pamphlet.

Yao, Y. L. Local Self-Government in the Republic of China. (Taipei: n.p., 1959).

THAILAND

Most Useful

Local Government in Thailand. (Bangkok: Dept. of Interior, 1958). Pamphlet.

Generally Useful

Administrative Organization of the Bangkok Municipality. (Bangkok: Municipality of Bangkok, 1963). Pamphlet.

Arsa, Meksawan. The Role of the Provincial Governor in Thailand. (Bangkok: Thammasat Univ., Inst. of Public Admin., 1962).

Problems of Politics and Administration in Thailand. (Bloomington, Ind.: Indiana University, Inst. of Training for Public Service, 1962).

Ryan, John, and Edgar L. Shor. Administration of the Bangkok Municipality. (Bangkok; Inst. of Public Administration, 1958).

Hamilton, Randy H., "Municipal Government in Thailand," Western City (April, 1961), pp. 31 ff.

VIET NAM

Most Useful

Fall, B. B., "Local Administration Under the Viet Minh," 27 Pacific Affairs (March, 1954), pp. 50-57.

Ginsburgs, George, "Local Government and Administration in North Vietnam, 1945-1954," China Quarterly (April-June, 1962), pp. 174-204.

Ginsburgs, George, "Local Government and Administration in the Democratic Republic of Vietnam Since 1954," China Quarterly (April-June, 1963), pp. 195-211.

Generally Useful

Woodruff, Lloyd W. Local Administration in Viet-Nam: The Number of Local Units. (Saigon: Mich. State Univ. Advisory Group, National Inst. of Administration, The Republic of Viet-Nam, 1960). Pamphlet.

MISCELLANEOUS

Most Useful

Ginsburgs, George, "Local Government in the Mongolian People's Republic, 1940-1960," 20 Journal of Asian Studies (August 1961), p. 489-508

Generally Useful

Hsueh, S. S. Government and Administration of Hong Kong. (Hong Kong: University Bookstore, 1962).

"Choksy Report: An Appreciation and a Summary of the Recommendations," (a commission on local govt. appointed by the govt. of Ceylon) 27 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Jan., 1957), pp. 197-244.

Gamba, Charles, "Singapore-City and State," 5

Australian Jour. of Politics and History. (Nov., 1959), pp. 180 ff.

Silva, A. J. M. de, "The Local Government Service Commission in Ceylon," IULA Quarterly (1957, No. 4), pp. 53, 57.

Skinner, G. W., "Peasant Organization in Rural China," 277 Annals of the Amer. Acad. of Pol. & Soc. Sci. (Sept., 1951), pp. 89-100.

Steiner, H. Arthur, "Chinese Communist Urban Policy," 44 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. (March, 1950), pp. 47-63.

CANADA

GENERAL

Most Useful

Brittain, Horace L. Local Government in Canada. (Toronto: Ryerson, 1951).

- Crawford, Kenneth G. Canadian Municipal Government. (Toronto: Univ. of Toronto Press, 1954).
- Callard, K., "The Present System of Local Government in Canada," 17 Canadian Jour. of Econ. and Pol. Sci. (May, 1951), pp. 204-217.

Generally Useful

- Plunkett, Thomas J. Municipal Organization in Canada. (Montreal: Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, 1955).
- Rowat, Donald C. Your Local Government: A Sketch of the Municipal System in Canada. (Toronto & N.Y.: Macmillan, 1955).
- Brittain, H. L., "From the Ground Up in Canadian Government," 65 Municipal World (Aug., 1955), pp. 261-264; (Sept., 1955), pp. 310-312.
- Crawford, K. G., "Some Aspects of Provincial-Municipal Relations," 16 Canadian Jour. of Econ. & Pol. Sci. (Aug., 1950), pp. 394-407.
- Crouch, Winston W., "Administrative Supervision of Local Government: The Canadian Experience," 43 Amer. Pol. Sci. Rev. (June, 1949), pp. 509-523.
- Keith-Lucas, Bryan, "Metropolitan Local Government in Canada," 39 Public Admin. (Autumn, 1961), pp. 251-262.
- McIver, J. M., "A Survey of the City Manager Plan in Canada," 3 Canadian Public Admin. (Sept., 1960), pp. 216-232.
- Sampson, E. T., "Urban and Regional Government in Canada," Munic. Rev. of Canada (Dec., 1950), pp. 6-8.
- Wright, Frederick, "Metropolitan Organization: The Borough System of Government," Munic. Rev. of Canada (Sept., 1950), pp. 9-11.

SPECIFIC PROVINCES OR CITIES

Most Useful

- Grumm, John G. Metropolitan Area Government: The Toronto Experience. (Lawrence, Kan.: Univ. of Kansas, Governmental Research Center, 1959). Pamphlet.
- Hanson, E. J. Local Government in Alberta. (Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1956).
- Local Government in Saskatchewan. A Report Submitted to the Government of Saskatchewan, March 1, 1961, by the Local Government Continuing Committee. (Regina: Queen's Printer, 1961).
- Ross, R. K. Local Government in Ontario. (Toronto: Canada Law Book Co., 1962).
- Smallwood, Frank. Metro Toronto: A Decade Later. (Toronto: Bur. of Mun. Rsch., 1963). Pamphlet.
- Crosbie, J. C., "Local Government in Newfoundland," 22 Canadian Jour. of Econ. & Pol. Sci. (Aug., 1956), pp. 332-346.

Generally Useful

- Blowes, A. W., "Local Self-Government in Ontario," 61 Municipal World (Dec., 1951), pp. 367-368.
- Crouch, Winston W., "Metropolitan Government in Toronto," 14 Public Admin. Rev. (Spring, 1954), pp. 85-95.
- Feldman, Lionel D., "Legislative Control of Municipalities in Ontario," Canadian Public Administration (Sept., 1961), pp. 294 ff.
- Hanson, Eric J., "The Changing Structure of Local Government in Alberta," 1 Canadian Public Admin. (Sept., 1958), pp. 26-31.
- Hanson, E. J., "Local Government Reorganization in Alberta," 16 Canadian Jour. of Econ. & Pol. Sci. (Feb., 1950), pp. 53-62.
- Healey, J. J., "Municipal Government in Newfoundland," 61 Municipal World (Dec., 1951), pp. 368-70.
- Judge, J. W., "Some Aspects of Local Government in Alberta," 24 Muncipal Finance (Nov., 1951), pp. 82-86.
- Rose, Albert, "The Case Against Total Amalgamation in Metropolitan Toronto," 4 Public Affairs Report (April, 1963), pp. 1-5.
- Smiley, D. V., "Local Autonomy and Central Administrative Control in Saskatchewan," 26 Canadian Jour. of Econ. & Pol. Sci. (May, 1960) pp. 299-313.

EASTERN EUROPE

GENERAL

Most Useful

Stewart, Neil, "Local Government in Eastern Europe," 4 New Central European Observer (May 12-26, 1951), pp. 149, 168-169.

POLAND

Most Useful

- Boim, Leon. State Control in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Polish People's Republic. (Includes bibliography.) (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1961).
- Dolina, Josef, "Local Government in Poland," 6-7 Highlights of Current Legislation and Activities in Mid-Europe (Mar., 1958), pp. 121-133; (May-June, 1958), pp. 213-223; (May-June, 1959), pp. 209-225.

Generally Useful

- Jones, R. A., "Polish Local Government Reorganized on Soviet Model," 10 American Slavic Rev. (Feb., 1951), pp. 56-68.
- "Local Government in Poland: Historical Outline of the Development of Polish Towns," Municipal Review (Nov., 1961), pp. 726 ff.

U.S.S.R.

Most Useful

Barfivala, Ch. D. Local Government in the

- U.S.S.R. (Bombay: All-India Institute of Local Self-Government, 1958).
- Cattell, David T., "Leningrad: Case Study of Soviet Local Government," Western Political Quarterly (June, 1964), pp. 188-199.
- Churchward, L. G., "Soviet Local Government," 13 Australian Outlook (Sept., 1959), pp. 211-222.
- Rigby, T. H., "Soviet Local Government and Democracy," 8 Australian Outlook (March, 1954), pp. 19-31.
- Tucker, Robert C., "Field Observations on Soviet Local Government," 18 American Slavic and East European Review (Dec., 1959), pp. 526-538.

Generally Useful

- Armstrong, John A., "Administrative Apparatus in the Rural Ukraine," 15 Amer. Slavic and East European Rev. (Feb., 1956), pp. 17-37.
- Bobrovnikov, N.I., and A. I. Makarov, "Local Soviets' Powers and Public Civic Activity Grow," 12 Current Digest of the Soviet Press (Dec. 14, 1960), pp. 7-10.
- Boim, Leon. State Control in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Polish People's Republic. (Includes bibliography.) (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1961). Pamphlet.
- Churchward, L. G., "Continuity and Change in Soviet Local Government, 1947-1957," 9 Soviet Studies (Jan., 1958), pp. 256-285.
- Drain, G., "Some Aspects of Soviet Local Government," Local Government Chronicle (Sept. 16, 1961), pp. 1236 ff.
- Foster, W. S., "What's Happening in Soviet Cities," 73 Amer. City (Oct., 1958), pp. 110-113+.
- Kotok, V., "Some Data on the Local Organs of State Power of the U.S.S.R.," 29 Quarterly Journal of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Jan., 1959), pp. 387-394.
- Krivickas, Domas, "The Township Soviets," 7 Highlights of Current Legislation and Activities in Mid-Europe (Nov.-Dec., 1959), pp. 451-459. Lithuania.
- Lunev, A. E., "The Further Development of Democracy in Soviet State Administration," 4 Soviet Review (Summer, 1963), pp. 41-48.
- Parker, Ralph, "How a City Soviet Works," New World Rev. (March, 1953), pp. 23-25. Syzran, Soviet Union.
- Sukhanov, Mikhail, "Village Soviet: How People in Kuzminskoye Run Their Village," USSR (1959, no. 4), pp. 40-43.
- Swearer, Howard R., "The Functions of Soviet Local Elections," 5 Midwest Jour. of Pol. Sci. (May, 1961), pp. 129-149.
- Tikhonov, A. I., "Soviet Deputies and Their Electors," 12 Anglo-Soviet Jour. (Spring, 1951), pp. 24-31.
- Usherenko, Yakov, "City Bosses," USSR (Oct., 1960), pp. 1-5.

- Velikanova, G., "The 5000 Mayors of Vyborg," 13 Current Digest of the Soviet Press (Oct. 18, 1961), pp. 8-9.
- Wesson, R. G., "The Soviet Communes," 13 Soviet Studies (April, 1962), pp. 341-361. Comparison of USSR and Chinese communes.

YUGOSLAVIA

Most Useful

- Djordjevic, Jovan. Local Self-Government in the Federal People's Republic of Yugoslavia. (Belgrade: Standing Conference of Towns of Yugoslavia, 1956).
- Local Government Structure and Organization in Yugoslavia. (Beograd: Standing Conference of Yugoslav Cities, 1961). Pamphlet.
- Petrovic, Radivoje. Local Self-Government in Yugoslavia. (Belgrade: Publicity and Publishing Enterprise Jugoslaviya, 1955).
- Djordjevic, Jovan, "Local Self-Government in Yugoslavia," 12 American Slavic Rev. (April, 1953), pp. 188-200.
- Scott, D. J. R., "The Development of Local Government: Yugoslavia's Experience," 6 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1954), pp. 129-137.

Generally Useful

- Bjelidc, Sreten. Communal System in Yugoslavia. (Beograd: n.p., 1961).
- The Commune in the New Yugoslav Constitution. (Belgrade: Standing Conference of Towns of Yugoslavia, 1963).
- Gerskovc, Leon. The Commune as the Basic Community of Social Organization in Yugoslavia. (Beograd: Jugoslavija Information Service, 1958). Pamphlet.
- Kardelj, Edvard. Relations in the Commune. (Beograd: Standing Conference of Towns in Yugoslavia, 1961). Pamphlet.
- Kovacevic, Zivorad. Communal System in Yugoslavia. (Belgrade: Edition Jugoslaviya, 1958). Pamphlet.
- Local Government in Yugoslavia. (London: Yugoslav Embassy Information Office, 1954).
 Mimeo.
- Dermastija, M., "The New Local Government System in Yugoslavia," IULA Bulletin (1956, No. 2), pp. 28 ff.
- Djordjevic, Jovan, "New System of Local Self-Government in Yugoslavia," AICC Econ. Rev. (May 15, 1956), pp. 23-26.
- "Five Years of the Communal System," Review of International Affairs (Beograd) (Jan. 5, 1961), pp. 12 ff.
- Yovanovic, Slobodan, "County and Municipal Administration Reorganization," Yugoslav Observer (March, 1956), pp. 3-4+.
- "The Yugoslav Commune," International Social Science Journal. (1961, No. 3), pp. 379-456.

MISCELLANEOUS

Most Useful

Farago, Vilmos, "Local Self-Government in the Hungarian People's Republic," 3 New Hungarian Quarterly (April-June, 1962), pp. 156-159.

Ginsburgs, George, "Local Government and Administration in the Bulgarian People's Republic: 1951-1956," 23 Jour. of Central European Affairs (April, 1963), pp. 23-51.

Generally Useful

Taborsky, E., "Local Government in Czechoslovakia, 1918-1948," 10 American Slavic Rev. (Oct., 1951), pp. 202-215.

Vintu, I., "The Structure and Functions of People's Councils in the Rumanian People's Republic," International Social Science Journal (1961, No. 3), pp. 470 ff.

LATIN AMERICA

GENERAL.

Most Useful

Morse, R. M., "Latin American Cities: Aspects of Function and Structure," 4 Comparative Studies in Society and History (No. 4, 1962), pp. 473-493.

Generally Useful

Johnson, J. J., "The Latin American Municipality Deteriorates," Inter-American Econ. Affairs (Summer, 1951), pp. 24-35.

Marshall, A. H., "Caribbean Local Government," 65 Municipal Jour. (Aug. 2, 1957), pp. 1626-1627; (Aug. 9, 1957), pp. 1673+; (Aug. 16, 1957), pp. 1714-1715.

Sady, Emil J., "Central Americans Seek to Improve Local Government," IULA Quarterly (Summer, 1961), pp. 26 ff.

BRAZIL

Most Useful

Lordello de Mello, Diego. Local Government in Brazil. (Rio de Janeiro: Brazilian School of Public Administration, 1958). Pamphlet.

Donald, Carr L., "Brazilian Local Self-Government: Myth or Reality?", 13 Western Political Quarterly (Dec., 1960), pp. 1043-1055.

Generally Useful

Morse, R. M. From Community to Metropolis: A Biography of Sao Paulo, Brazil. (Gainesville: Univ. of Florida Press, 1958).

Donald, Carr L., "The Politics of Local Government Finance in Brazil," 13 Inter-American Economic Affairs, (Summer, 1959), pp. 21-37.

BRITISH GUIANA

Most Useful

Young, Allan. The Approaches to Local Self-Government in British Guiana. (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1958).

"Local Government in British Guiana," 28 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (April, 1958), pp. 753-770.

Marshall, A. H., "Local Government in British Guiana," 7 Jour. of African Admin. (Oct., 1955), pp. 192-197.

Marshall, A. H., "Report on Local Government in British Guiana," 30-31 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Oct., 1959), pp. 245-287; (Jan., 1960), pp. 413-428; (April, 1960), pp. 495 ff.; (Oct., 1960), pp. 269-285.

Generally Useful

Marshall, A. H. Report on Local Government in British Guiana. (Georgetown: n.p., 1955).

Burrowes, H. S., "British Guiana: Five Stages of Local Government," 68 Munic. Jour. (Mar. 18, 1960), pp. 882-884; (Mar. 25, 1960), pp. 969+.

Burrowes, H. S., "Local Government in the Rural Areas of British Guiana," 29 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Oct., 1958), pp. 268-277.

Mexico

Most Useful

Alisky, Marvin. State and Local Government in Sonora, Mexico. (Tempe, Arizona: Ariz. St. Univ., Bur. of Govt. Research, 1962). Pamphlet. Cardenas, Leonard, Jr. The Municipality in Northern Mexico. (El Paso: Texas Western College, Southwestern Studies No. 1, 1963).

Generally Useful

Klapp, Orrin E., & L. Vincent Padgett, "Power Structure and Decision-Making in a Mexican Border City," 65 Amer. Jour. of Sociology, (Jan. 1960), pp. 400-406.

MISCELLANEOUS

Generally Useful

Strengthening Municipal Government in El Salvador. (Chicago: Public Administration Service, 1955).

Mouchet, C., "The Ideas Concerning the Argentinian Municipalities in the Past and its Present Effectivity," Revista Municipal Interamericana (Julio, 1959-Junio 1960), pp. 41 ff.

americana (Julio, 1959-Junio 1960), pp. 41 ff. Rodrigues, M. R., "Local Government in Jamaica," 1 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (April, 1962), pp. 102-111.

MIDDLE EAST

GENERAL

Most Useful

Wickwar, W. Hardy. "Patterns and Problems of Local Administration in the Middle East," 12 Middle East Journal (Summer, 1958), pp. 249-260. Generally Useful

The Middle East: a Political and Economic Survey. (London & New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1950).

The Middle East, 1955. (London: Europa Publications, 1955).

Wickwar, W. Hardy. "Notes on Local Government Administration Areas and Local Government Units in the Middle East," 24 International Review of Administrative Sciences (No. 2, 1958), pp. 148-151.

ISRAEL

Most Useful

Background to Israel: Local Government-Rural Local Government and Development. (Jerusalem: Min. of Foreign Affairs, Min. of the Interior, Israel Union of Local Authorities, 1962). Mimeo.. 364 pp.

Samuel, E., "Government in the Communal Villages of Israel," 1 Indian Jour. of Public Admin. (July-Sept., 1955), pp. 184-192.

Generally Useful

The Arab Local Councils in Israel. (Jerusalem: Ministry of the Interior, Dept. of Minorities, Nov. 1960). Pamphlet.

Gutman, E. Some Remarks Concerning Local Government Functions. (Israel) (In Hebrew with summary in English). (Jerusalem: Eliezer Kaplan School of Economics and Social Sciences, The Hebrew University, 1958). Pamphlet.

Deevon, Elitzur, "The Local Government Advisory Council in Israel," IULA Quarterly (Autumn, 1960), pp. 60 ff.

TURKEY

Most Useful

Gorvine, A. Outline of Turkish Provincial and Local Government. (Ankara: Univ. of Ankara, Faculty of Political Science, 1956). Pamphlet.

Hanson, A. H., et al. Studies in Turkish Local Government. (Ankara: Public Admin. Inst. for Turkey and the Middle East, 1955).

Generally Useful

Bisbee, Eleanor. The New Turks. (Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press, 1951).

Yasa, I. Problems of Outlying Rural Administration in Turkey. (Ankara: Public Administration Institute for Turkey and the Middle East, 1956).

Bisbee, Eleanor. "Test of Democracy in Turkey: Structure of the Turkish Government," Middle East Jour. (April, 1950), pp. 170-182.

UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC

Most Useful

Alderfer, Harold F., et al. Local Government in the United Arab Republic, 1963. (Cairo: Institute of Public Admin., UAR and UN, 1963).

El-Araby, Mohamed Abdullah. An Outline of Local Government in the United Arab Republic. (Cairo: General Egyptian Organization for Authorship Translation, 1961).

Generally Useful

Ammar, Abbas M. Reorganization of the Egyptian Village on the Basis of Regional Decentralization. (Sirs-el-Layyan: Arab States Fundamental Education Centre, 1954). Pamphlet.

Bannerjea, B. N. The New Local Administration System in U.A.R. (II): A Note on Central Services Available to Local Authorities. (Cairo: Inst. of Public Administration, 1960). Pamphlet.

Development of Local Government in the U.A.R. (Southern Region.) (Cairo: Inst. of Public Administration, 1959). Pamphlet.

The New Local Government System in the United Arab Republic. (Cairo: Inst. of Public Administration, 1960). Pamphlet.

Bull, M. R., "Local Government in Egypt," Municipal Review (Jan. 1964), pp. 38-40.

"The New Local Administration System," 1 Arab Review (Sept., 1960), pp. 56-59.

MISCELLANEOUS

Most Useful

Engh, Arnljot. Municipal Administration and Taxation and Finance in Iraq. (New York: UN Technical Assistance Programme, 1956).

Iran Municipalities. (Teheran: Iran Municipal Ass'n., 1959). Pamphlet.

Sherwood, Frank P. Cities in Iran: Notes on Their Problems and Governance. (Los Angeles: Univ. of Southern California, School of Public Admin., 1961). Pamphlet.

Henderson, Keith M., & Emile S. Shahadeh, "The Evolution of Local Government in Lebanon," 2 Jour. of Local Admin. Overseas (July, 1963), pp. 137-139.

Zananiri, J. J., "Local Government and Administration in Lebanon," Unpublished M.A. thesis, (American Univ., Beirut, 1954).

Generally Useful

The Local Government Administration in Iraq. (New York: UNTAA Public Admin. Division, 1955). Pamphlet.

Sherwood, Frank P., "Local Government in Iran: the Role of the Municipal League," 35 Western City (Jan., 1959), pp. 14 ff.

PACIFIC AREA

AUSTRALIA

Most Useful

Davies, Alan F. Local Government in Victoria. (Melbourne: Melbourne Univ. Press, 1951). Larcombe, Frederick A. The Development of Local Government in New South Wales. (Melbourne: Cheshire, 1961).

Leach, Richard H., "Metropolitan Area Problems and Solutions in Australia," 62 South Atlantic Quarterly (Summer, 1963), pp. 347-364.

Generally Useful

- Greenwood, Gordon, & John Laverty. Brisbane, 1859-1959: A History of Local Government. (Brisbane: O. L. Ziegler for the Council of the City of Brisbane, 1959).
- Johns, J. R. H. Metropolitan Government in Western Australia. (Crawley, Western Australia: University of Western Australia, Dept. of Econ., 1950).
- "British Commonwealth Local Government,"

 Munic. Rev. of Canada (Feb., 1951), pp. 13-15.

 On Australia.
- Davies, Alan F., "Local Government in Melbourne," 14 Public Admin. (Sydney) (June, 1955), pp. 65-84.
- Knowles, G. H., "Local Body Government: the Case of the Decentralized Local Body," Jour. of Pol. Sci. (Nov. 1949), pp. 10-15.
- Local Government in Australia: Summary of Main Features. (Lithgow: Local Govt. Information Service, 1963). Leaflet.
- "Sydney Metropolitan Government," The Shire and Municipal Record (Sydney) (May 28, 1960), pp. 93-103.
- Wettenhall, R. L., "Tasmanian Local Government at the Crossroads," 21 Public Admin. (Sydney) (Dec., 1962), pp. 378-387.

INDONESIA

Most Useful

- Legge, John D. Central Authority and Regional Autonomy in Indonesia: A Study in Local Administration. (Ithaca: Cornell Univ. Press, 1961).
- Jay, Robert R., "Local Government in Rural Central Java," 15 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1956), pp. 215-227.

Generally Useful

- Goethals, Peter R. Aspects of Local Government in a Sumbawan Village. (eastern Indonesia). (Ithaca: Cornell Univ. Southeast Asia Program, 1961).
- van der Kroef, Justus M., "The Indonesian City and its Political Evolution," 20 Far Eastern Econ. Rev. (June 21, 1956), pp. 774-780.
- Legge, John D., "Central Supervision and Local Government in Indonesia," 3 Australian Jour. of Politics and History (Nov., 1957), pp. 79-95.
- Legge, John D., "Experiment in Local Government, 1950-1959," 13 Australian Outlook (Dec., 1959), pp. 272-284.

NEW ZEALAND

Most Useful

- New Zealand, House of Representatives, Local Bills Comm. Inquiry into the Structure of Local Government, 1959-1960. (Wellington: Govt. Printer, 1960.)
- Polaschek, Raymond J. (ed.). Local Government in New Zealand. (Wellington: NZ Inst. of Public Admin., 1956) (Oxford, 1957).
- Turner, C. M., "Local Government System in New Zealand," Munic. Rev. of Canada (April, 1950), pp. 19-22.

Generally Useful

- Redward, J. C., "Local Government Reform," New Zealand Jour. of Public Admin. (March, 1950), pp. 10-29.
- Turner, C. M., "The Local Government System in New Zealand is Similar but Simpler," 58 Municipal Jour. (Feb. 17, 1950), pp. 462-464.

PHILIPPINES

Most Useful

- Ludwig, Clarence C. Observations on Various Phases of Local Autonomy in the Philippines. (Manila: Univ. of the Philippines, Inst. of Public Admin., 1956). Pamphlet.
- Romani, John H., & M. Ladd Thomas. A Survey of Local Government in the Philippines. (Manila: Univ. of the Philippines, Inst. of Public Admin., 1954).
- Short, Lloyd M. The Relationship of Local and National Government in the Philippines. (Manila: Univ. of the Philippines, Inst. of Public Admin., 1955).
- Bundgaard, Leslie R., "Philippine Local Government," 19 Jour. of Politics (May, 1957), pp. 262-283
- Romani, John H., "The Philippine Barrio," 15 Far Eastern Quarterly (Feb., 1956), pp. 229-237.
- "The System of Local Government in the Philippines," 3 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Jan., 1959), pp. 7-10.

Generally Useful

- Aruego, Jose M. Philippine Government in Action. (Manila: University Publishing Co., 1954). Chs. 20-23 deal with local government.
- Rich, Bennett M. The Office of the Mayor of Manila. (Manila: Univ. of the Philippines, Inst. of Pub. Admin., 1955). Pamphlet.
- Rivera, Generoso F., & Robert T. McMillan. The Rural Philippines. (Manila: U.S. Foreign Operations Administration, 1952).
- Rivera, J. F. The Legislative Process of Local Governments. (Quezon City, P.I.: P.O. Rivera, 1956).

- Stene, Edwin O. (ed.). Public Administration in the Philippines. (Manila: Univ. of the Philippines, Inst. of Public Administration, 1955). Ch. 4, by Romani & Thomas, is on local administration.
- Villanueva, Buenaventuro M. Problems of Local Autonomy. (Manila: Univ. of the Philippines, Inst. of Public Admin., 1957). Pamphlet.
- Lacson, A. H., "The City of Manila: Problems, Achievements and Proposals," Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Jan., 1959), pp. 49-57.
- Ludwig, Clarence C., "Local Government in the Philippine Islands," 41 *Minnesota Municipali*ties (May, 1956), pp. 108-110.
- Mariano, Leonardo C., "Congress and Local Autonomy, 1 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Oct., 1957), pp. 363-378.
- Mariano, Leonardo C., "The President and Local Autonomy," 3 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Jan., 1959), pp. 39-45.
- Mariano, Leonardo C., "The Supreme Court and Local Autonomy," 2 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Jan., 1958), pp. 38-53.
- Rich, B. M., "The Development of Self-Government in Manila," 11 Western Pol. Quar. (Sept., 1958), pp. 583-597.
- Spencer, J. E., "The Cities of the Philippines," 57

 Jour. of Geography (Sept., 1958), pp. 288-294.

 Structure and political institutions.
- "Research Findings on Problems of Local Government," 3 Philippine Jour. of Public Admin. (Jan., 1959), pp. 11-15.
- Thomas, M. Ladd, "The Philippine Rural Development Program," Social Research (Summer, 1955), pp. 223-230.
- Villanueva, Alfredo B., "Some Contrasts Between Local Government in Minnesota and the Philippines," 43 Minnesota Municipalities (May, 1958), pp. 123-125+.
- Zimmerman, Virgil B., "Philippine Clues to the Future of Local Government in South-East Asia," 12 Journal of African Admin. (Jan., 1960), pp. 34-43.

MISCELLANEOUS

- Allen, C. H., "Local Government and Political Consciousness in the British Solomon Islands Protectorate," 12 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1960), pp. 158-163.
- Healey, A. M., "Native Local Government in New Guinea: Its Functions and Problem," 13 Jour. of African Admin. (July, 1961), pp. 165-174.
- Solenberger, R. R., "Continuity of Local Political Institutions in the Marianas," 23 Human Organization (Spring, 1964), pp. 53-60.
- West, F. J., "Local Government in French Poly-

- nesia and American Samoa," 2 Journal of Local Admin. Overseas (July, 1963), pp. 140-148.
- West, F. J., "Problems of Political Advancement in Fiji," 23 Pacific Affairs (March, 1960), pp. 23-37.
- West, F. J., "Problems of Political Advancement in Fiji," 13 Jour. of African Admin. (April, 1961), pp. 85-97.

WESTERN EUROPE GENERAL

Most Useful

- Nolting, Orin F. Some Observations on Municipal Government in European Cities. (Chicago: International City Managers' Assoc., 1955). Pamphlet.
- Papers of the European Symposium on the Administration of Intermediate Local Organizations (in Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Sweden, The Netherlands). (Milano: Amministrazione Provinciale di Milano, 1959).
- Zink, Harold D. (ed.). Rural Local Government in Sweden, Italy, & India. (N.Y.: Praeger, 1958).
 By Arne Wahlstrand, Feliciano Benvenuti, and R. Bhaskaran.
- Nolting, Orin F., "Council-Manager Plan in Europe," 40 Public Management (May, 1958), pp. 110-114.
- Nolting, Orin F., "Municipal Home Rule Abroad," 36-37 Public Management (Nov., 1954), pp. 250-253; (Dec., 1954), pp. 268-272; (March, 1955), pp. 55-59; (May, 1955), pp. 104-107.

Generally Useful

- Nolting, Orin F., "Europe's Manager Plan," 48 National Civic Review (March, 1959), pp. 123-127, 153.
- Nolting, Orin F., "Old Cities, New Ideas," 68
 Amer. City (Dec., 1953), pp. 98-99 +.
- "325 European Cities Use Council-Manager Plan," 73 Amer. City (April, 1958), p. 217.

AUSTRIA

Generally Useful

"Local Government in Austria: The Mainstay of the Free State is the Free Municipality," Municipal Review (March, 1960), pp. 188 ff.

Winter, William O., "Local Government in Austria Compared with American System," 8 Southern Illinois Business Bulletin (Fall, 1958), pp. 13+.

DENMARK

Most Useful

Marshall, A. H., "Danish Local Government," 62
Municipal Jour. (Oct. 1, 1954), pp. 2345-2346; (Oct. 8, 1954), pp. 2400-2401.

Marshall, A. H., "Local Government in Sweden & Denmark," 9 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1957), pp. 37-41.

Generally Useful

- A Capital of a Democracy: An Introduction to Copenhagen. (Copenhagen: Det Delske Selskab, 1955).
- "Local Government in Denmark: Some Facts and Problems," Municipal Review (Nov., 1960), pp. 745 ff

FINLAND

Most Useful

- Local Self-Government in Finland and the Finnish Municipal Law. (Helsinki: Union of Finnish Rural Municipalities, 1954). Pamphlet.
- Eskola, Aarne, "Local Government in Finland," 29 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst.
 (Oct., 1958), pp. 278-280. Reprinted from the Aug., 1958, Municipal Review.
- Knapp, David C., and Abraham Yeselson "Finland's Manager Plan," 50 National Civic Rev. (Feb., 1961), pp. 76-79, 85.

Generally Useful

- Brunn, O. The Administration of the City of Helsinki. (Helsinki: City Board of Helsinki, 1950). Pamphlet.
- Eskola, Aarne, "The Council Manager Plan in Finland," 42 Public Management (Feb., 1960), pp. 33-35.
- Eskola, Aarne, "Local Government in Finland," Town Planning and Local Government Guide (Jan., 1959), pp. 173 ff.

FRANCE

Most Useful

- Chapman, Brian. Introduction to French Local Government. (London: Allen & Unwin, 1953).
- Hourticq, Jean, "Local Government Reforms in France," IULA Quarterly (1959, No. 3), pp. 59, 63.
- Labrusse, Bertrand de, & Odile de Labrusse, "Local Government in France," 28 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Oct., 1957), pp. 427-434.

Generally Useful

- Chapman, Brian. The Prefects and Provincial France. (London: Allen & Unwin, 1955).
- Blondel, Jean, "Local Government and the Local Offices of Ministries in a French Departement," 37 Public Administration (Spring, 1959), pp. 65-74
- Elven, J. W., "The Administration of Bordeaux,"

- 2 Int. Comp. Law Quar. (April, 1953), pp. 238-257.
- Hewes, J. V., "The City of Paris and the Department of the Seine," Municipal Review (1959, No. 360), pp. 718 ff.
- Hourticq, Jean, "The District of the Region of Paris," IULA Quarterly (Winter, 1961), pp. 150 ff.
- Marshall, A. H., "Wide Powers Vested in Prefects and Mayors: Aspects of Central Administration and Local Government in France," 64 Municipal Jour. (Nov. 23, 1956), pp. 2773-2774; (Dec. 7, 1956), pp. 2878-2879.
- Westoll, J., "Local Government in France: A Comparison with English Administration," County Councils Gazette (London) (Aug., 1963), pp. 220-222.

GERMANY

Most Useful

- Smith, B. L. R. The Governance of Berlin. (International Conciliation Series, No. 525) (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1959).
- Hensel, Walther, "The Council-Manager Plan in Germany," 43 Public Management (Jan., 1961), pp. 2-5.
- Meyer, Ernst Wilhelm, "Local Self-Government in Germany," 4 Civic Affairs—Monthly Journal of Local Govt. & Pub. Admn. in India (Dec. 1956), pp. 113-116.
- Pommerening, H. E., "Local Self-Government in West Germany," 25 Quar. Jour. of the Local Self-Govt. Inst. (Oct., 1954), pp. 299-306.

Generally Useful

- Chaput de Saintonge, Rolland A. A. Public Administration in Germany: A Study in Regional and Local Administration in Land Rheinland-Pfalz. (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1961)
- Gillen, J. F. J. State & Local Government in West Germany, 1945-53. (Bad Godesberg: Office of the U.S. High Commissioner for Germany, 1953.)
- Glaser, K. The Government of Free Berlin.
 (Berlin: Berlin Special Services Library in Cooperation with the Berlin Army Education Center, 1958.)
- Litchfield, Edward H., et al. Governing Postwar Germany. (Ithaca: Cornell Univ. Press, 1953). Chs. on St. & Loc. Govt. by R. H. Wells.
- Municipal Self-Government in Germany (Koln-Marienburg: "Der Stadtetag," Sonderdruck aus Heft 6, 1959).
- Plischke, Elmer. Berlin: Development of its Government and Administration. (Bad Godesberg: Office of the U.S. High Commissioner for Germany, 1952).

Wells, Roger H. The States in West German Federalism. (N.Y.: Bookman, 1961).

"Local Government in Germany: Reconstruction on Democratic Principles," 60 Munic. World (June, 1950), pp. 191-192.

Orr, J. H., "United States-German Cities Compared," 75 Amer. City (Nov., 1960), pp. 116-117.

Simmons, J. M., "How the Council-Manager Plan Operates in West Germany," 73 Amer. City (Nov., 1958), pp. 124-125+.

Wells, Roger H., "Arising From the Ruins: West German Cities Move Rapidly Toward Democratic Local Self-Government in Step with Reconstruction," 45 National Munic. Rev. (Feb., 1956), pp. 66-71.

GREECE

Most Useful

Alderfer, Harold F. Report on Greek Local Government. (Athens: U.S. Mutual Security Administration, 1952).

Drakakis, A. Local Government in Greece. (Athens: Univ. of Athens, 1958).

Papastathopoulos, Catherine D., "Local Government and Administration in Greece, 1952-1962," 23 Jour. of Central European Affairs (Oct., 1963), pp. 333-360.

Generally Useful

Alderfer, Harold F. Facts on Greek Local Government: a Preliminary Outline. (Athens: Economic Cooperation Administration, Civil Government Division, 1950). Mimeo.

Alderfer, Harold F., "Modern Greek Government: The Basic Framework," Jour. of Central European Affairs (Jan., 1953), pp. 331-345.

Alderfer, Harold F., "Modern Greek Government: The Realities," Jour. of Central European Affairs (April, 1953), pp. 28-46.

Alderfer, Harold F., "U.S. Aid at the Grass Roots: Local Self-Government Strengthened and Brought Up to Date as Valuable By-product of [Mutual Security Administration] Program in Greece," 42 National Municipal Rev. (April, 1953), pp. 168-171+.

Atkinson, John, "Greece Has a Municipal System: On Paper Only," 58 Municipal Jour. (May 19, 1950), p. 1325.

Peter, Prince of Greece, "Municipal Authority in Greece," Municipal Review (June, 1963), pp. 374-376, 416.

IRELAND

Most Useful

Bromage, Arthur W. "Council-Manager Plan in Ireland," 43 Public Management (Feb. 1961), pp. 26-32.

Meghen, P. J., "Local Government in the Irish Republic: Virtues and Advantages of the Management System," Municipal Review (Nov., 1963), pp. 772-776.

Stokes, R. R., "Local Government in the Republic of Ireland," 7 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1955), pp. 27-33.

Generally Useful

Barrington, Tom, "Local Government in the Republic of Ireland," 71 Municipal Journal (Feb. 15, 1963), p. 435.

Bromage, Arthur W., "The Council-Manager Plan in Ireland," 9 Administration (Dublin) (Winter, 1961-62), pp. 309-317.

Bromage, Arthur W., "Irish Councilmen at Work" 2 Administration (Dublin) (Spring, 1954), pp. 87-98.

Childs, Richard S., "'Ireland Must be Heaven': But an On-the-Spot Look at the Country's Widespread Use of the Council-Manager Plan Raises Some Questions." 39 National Munic. Rev. (April, 1950), pp. 186-188.

"Irish Local Government in Crisis," 61 Municipal Jour. (Oct. 9, 1953), p. 2181.

McCall, S., "Local Government in the Provinces—A Survey," 8 Administration (Dublin) (Autumn, 1960), pp. 223-230.

Meghen, P. J., "The Development of Local Government in Ireland," 4 Christus Rex (April, 1950), pp. 121-131.

Robins, J. A., "The County in the Twentieth Century," 9 Administration (Dublin) (Summer, 1961), pp. 88-94.

Spencer, R. C., "Irish County Managers," 45 National Municipal Rev. (Oct., 1956), pp. 426-432.

ITALY

Most Useful

Fried, R. C. The Italian Prefects. (New Haven: Yale Univ. Press, 1963).

Rebecchini, Salvatore. The Rebirth of Self-Government in Italy. (U.S. Annual Conference of Mayors, 1950). Pamphlet.

Cappelletti, L., "Local Government in Italy," 41 Public Admin. (Autumn, 1963), pp. 247-264.

Generally Useful

Chapman, Brian. Italian Regional Government. (Thesis, Oxford University, 1951).

NETHERLANDS

Most Useful

Leemans, A. F., Local Government in the Netherlands. (The Hague: Inst. of Social Studies, 1963). Pamphlet.

Morlan, Robert L., "Cabinet Government at the Municipal Level: The Dutch Experience," 17 Western Political Quarterly (June, 1964), pp. 317-324.

Morlan, Robert L., "City Manager Contrasts: The Netherlands Experience," 22 Public Administration Review (Spring, 1962), pp. 65-70.

Oud, P. J., "The Burgomaster in Holland," 31 Public Admin. (Summer, 1953), pp. 103-116.

Generally Useful

Polak, C. H. F. The Netherlands Municipalities. (Speech delivered on the 50th anniversary of the Association of Netherlands Municipalities.) (The Hague: Assoc. of Netherlands Municipalities, 1962). Mimeo.

Symonds, R. R. The Three Great Cities of the Netherlands: A Comparative Study in Urban Function and Development. (London: University College, 1956).

Arkema, N., "Local Government in The Netherlands," Municipal Review (May, 1959), pp. 268 ff

Marshall, A. H., "Dutch Local Government in Era of Reconstruction," 63 Municipal Jour. (Jan. 21, 1955), pp. 158-159; (Jan. 28, 1955), pp. 225-226.

Morlan, Robert L., "Central Government Control of Municipalities in the Netherlands," 12 Western Political Quarterly (March, 1959), pp. 64-70.

Thijsse, J. P., "Rim-City Holland: Problems of a Metropolis in the Making," Delta (Winter, 1958-59), pp. 5-19.

Verstegen, J. M. P. J., "Local Authorities in the Netherlands," County Councils Gazette (London) (July, 1963), pp. 183-187.

Norway

Most Useful

Municipal Government in Norway and the Norwegian Municipal Law of 1954. (Oslo: Norges Byforbund-Norges Herredsforbund, 1963).

Evers, Kjell T., "Municipal Government in Norway," 41 Public Management (Nov., 1959), pp. 250-252.

Generally Useful

Park, George K., & L. C. Soltow, "Politics and Social Structure in a Norwegian Village," 67 American Journal of Sociology (Sept., 1961), pp. 152-164.

SPAIN

Most Useful

Lopez Rodó, L., "Spanish Local Government," 37

Public Admin. (Summer, 1959), pp. 153-163.

Generally Useful

Steparius, "Organic Democracy," 8 Ibérica (June 15, 1960), pp. 7-9.

SWEDEN

Most Useful

Andrén, N. Local Government in Sweden. (Stockholm: Swedish Institute, 1955).

Olsson, John. The Local Government of Sweden. (Stockholm: The Swedish Institute & Swedish Union of Rural Communes, 1950). Mimeo. Pamphlet.

Marshall, A. H., "Local Government in Sweden & Denmark," 9 Jour. of African Admin. (Jan., 1957), pp. 37-41.

Generally Useful

Hesslen, Gunnar. Public Administration in Sweden. (Chs. on "local admn." & "loc. self-governing units") (Stockholm: The Swedish Institute, 1950)

Langenfelt, P. Principles for a New Division of Sweden's Municipalities. (Stockholm: The Swedish Inst. for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries, 1962). Pamphlet.

Olsson, J., "The New Local Government Act in Sweden," IULA Bulletin (1956, No. 1), pp. 1 ff. "Principles for a New Division of Sweden's Municipalities," 1 Local Govt. Throughout the World (Oct., 1962), pp. 43-46.

SWITZERLAND

Generally Useful

Arnold-Baker, C., "Long Tradition Behind Swiss Democratic Local Government," 68 Municipal Jour. (Oct. 28, 1960), pp. 3361+.

Kaufmann, O. K., "Local Government in Switzerland: 'Sovereign' Municipalities 'Older Than State Government,'" Municipal Review (Jan., 1961), pp. 20 ff.

MISCELLANEOUS

Most Useful

"Local Government in Portugal," Municipal Review (August, 1960), pp. 530 ff.

Generally Useful

Boissevain, J., "Maltese Village Politics and Their Relation to National Politics," 1 Jour. of Commonwealth Political Studies (Nov., 1962), pp. 211-222.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS
Blalock, Causal Inferences in Nonexperimental Research. WILLIAM H. FLANIGAN	138
Eckstein, ed., Internal War. David A. Wilson	138
Peabody, Organizational Authority: Superior-Subordinate Relationships in Three Public Service Organizations. ROBERT T. GOLEMBIEWSKI	 140
Eldersveld, Political Parties: A Behavioral Analysis. Avery Leiserson	141
Sorauf, Political Parties in the American System. Stephen K. Bailey	142
Wildavsky, The Politics of the Budgetary Process. Murray Edelman	143
Russett et al., World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators. ARTHUR S. BANKS	144
Ward et al., Studying Politics Abroad: Field Research in the Developing Areas. William John Hanna	146
Stoessinger et al., Financing the United Nations System. Gerard J. Mangone	147
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY
POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHOD- OLOGY	149
American Government and Politics	158
Comparative Government and Cross-National Research	.184
Comparative Public Administration	211
	212
Other Books Received	229

BOOK REVIEWS

Causal Inferences in Nonexperimental Research. By Hubert M. Blalock, Jr. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1964. Pp. xiii, 200. $5.00.)

This is a highly instructive book in a field where political scientists need instruction. Blalock takes us well beyond the considerations introduced in ordinary statistics texts by concentrating on several difficult and important problems in quantitative social analysis. His emphasis is on the development of more rigorous procedures for rejecting causal arguments and on a variety of complications in the use, collapsing and combining of variables and controls. The arguments presented are drawn from a number of articles that have appeared mainly in sociology journals during the past few years.

Blalock is interested in developing more systematic procedures for evaluating causal models, and he argues that mathematical or statistical procedures are too flexible in their present condition for this discrimination. But somewhat more restrictive assumptions about relationships permit deductions that offer arguments for rejecting particular chains of causal relationships. These procedures and restrictive assumptions—what will probably be called the Simon-Blalock technique—are not applicable to most fields in political science where quantification of relevant variables has not been achieved.

The controversy that has developed among social statisticians over these techniques hinges on a disagreement over the extent to which these arguments provide a basis for causal inferences—a contention which Blalock would not support. A more critical question for social scientists is how much confidence we would have in a conclusion that a particular causal argument is inferior to another, i.e., how readily would we reject a causal argument dear to us? It is impossible to anticipate what qualms and considerations might occur to us if we were to regularly test our causal arguments with the technique advocated by Blalock, but it would promote analytic sophistication to face up to these problems whether we accept the conclusions of the Simon-Blalock technique or not. Described very briefly the technique depends on two points, our willingness to assume that among a given set of variables not all possible interrelationships are causal, and the argument that with a given set of correlations among the variables not all lines of causal relationship are equally convincing.

While doubtless the possibilities of more rigorous evaluation of causal models are of great consequence over the long run, for the immediate needs of political science Blalock's many observations on the effects of collapsing variables may be of greater assistance. Especially as we move into the early phases of quantification in various areas of political analysis we can expect to be forced into unhappy compromises in developing variables, and Blalock reveals a staggering array of pitfalls associated with grouping and collapsing dimensions. By generating artificial data with appropriate characteristics, he shows the impact on measures of association of grouping by high and low scores and of changing the unit of analysis or clustering units with respect to random and related third factors. The problems of interpreting relationships controlled or partialed by such variables are especially severe. While Blalock usually confines himself to artificial data, there is no reason to believe that these criticisms could not be applied throughout the quantitative analysis in social science with devastating impact.

Blalock takes for granted a sophisticated dissatisfaction with quantitative techniques but an unquestioned perseverance which may be missing in political science. If one were to rewrite the book for political scientists, far greater emphasis on the analytic weaknesses of unsystematic causal arguments would be appropriate, but Blalock addresses a more limited and specialized audience. The immediate application of this volume is limited to those areas of analysis where quantification permits the correlation of all or most relevant variables. Beyond this it joins that very small list of books that provide worthwhile background for courses in quantitative analysis and scope and method.

WILLIAM H. FLANIGAN University of Minnesota

Internal War. EDITED BY HARRY ECKSTEIN. (New York: The Free Press of Glenoce, 1964. Pp. 339. $6.50.)

Harry Eckstein has presided over one of the most exasperating books to face a reviewer in some time. The title, Internal War, is intriguing because it suggests a serious and timely subject. The roster of contributors—Gabriel Almond, William Kornhauser, Lucian Pye, Alexander Gerschenkron, Marion J. Levy, Jr., Talcott Parsons, S. M. Lipset, Karl W. Deutsch, T. P. Thornton, Sidney Verba, Arnold Feldman, and

Andrew Janos—constitutes a dazzling constellation of authoritative commentators. The volume is a product of a research project of some years standing at Princeton's Center of International Studies. The writers were assigned the task of writing papers for a symposium "on the application of contemporary social theories for the study of internal wars..." (p. 4). In short the reader infers a promise of penetration, illumination and substantial enlightenment on a pertinent and difficult matter. There is noticeable shortfall.

Moreover, I am disarmed by the editor's splendid candor in saying: "Whatever their merits in other respects, there is no use pretending that the essays here achieve the end intended. Some of them avoid any direct confrontation of the subject, others attack it, but without any considerable use of social science theory" (p. 5). I can only agree to that.

The editor faced with this situation and constrained to publish the results of a symposium has written an agile introductory essay on a novel subject—namely pre-theorizing. Since it is not within my power to discuss twelve very disparate essays in the present space I will attend principally to this introduction. The editor arrives at his topic by asking himself: What went wrong with the symposium? He poses the issue in this manner: There have been in the world a variety of events-coups d'état, terrorist campaigns, revolutionary wars, strikes and riots with political motives, and so forth-which we feel must have some relationship to each other in the realm of social behavior. If there is validity in social theory, then these phenomena must be susceptible to common theoretical management. At the same time here are the efforts of a number of the most notable social theorists of our time and these efforts have not achieved theoretical illumination. The possible faults might be found in the theorists as men, the theories, or the phenomena. In other words (1) the theorists may in fact be lazy or inept, or (2) the theories may be closed to these kinds of phenomena, or (3) the relationship between the various events which are grouped in the category may be so obscure and tenuous as to confound even the most brilliant and hard working of theorists, or (4) there may be no relationship among the events, theoretically or otherwise. Professor Eckstein cordially opts for the third alternative which lets everyone off the hook but him. He could, of course, have opted for the fourth alternative and given it up as a bad job. I, as will appear further on, am inclined toward the second.

Professor Eckstein then plunges into a discussion of pre-theoretical concerns. What he is actually talking about is theorizing, but since he restricts theory to the proposing of "testable (that is, falsifiable)" (p. 8) hypothetical generalizations, we can accept "pre-theoretical" as sufficient. This kind of work we are to understand involves four "operations."

- Delimitation, which is a combination of definition and identification of the phenomenon
- 2. Classification, which is the same as delimitation, only in a more refined way.
- Analysis, which is the identification of elements that combine in the classes of events.
- 4. "Problemation," an "ugly" neologism which means stating what it is you want to know in terms of what is (in some way or other) knowable.

All this obscures the issues aroused by juxtaposing contemporary social science theory to the occurrence of political violence. These issues capsulate the drama of scientific thought. There are theories but they fail to explain the new data. In such a situation, what do we do? We can amend the theories to accommodate the new data or we can discover new theories which explain the old and new data. What we must not do is rework the data until they fit into the old theories. In Professor Eckstein's situation I would have been more sceptical about the theories.

The dominant themes of contemporary social science theory are structural functionalism and systems analysis with emphasis on equilibrating or homeostatic activity. The fact that the tendency of this theory is to draw attention to stability rather than change, and to order rather than conflict has become a commonplace criticism of it. But the fact remains that this body of theoretical material is, at least in its present state, confounded by the event of organized political violence, by major transformation processes, by persistent conflict, and by permanent and pervasive disorder. I suspect that the difficulty which the contributors to this volume experienced in penetrating theoretically the events of social violence is to be found in a pre-fabricated blindness to the phenomena.

It is striking that the articles which approach the subject ad hoc—for example Lucian Pye on "Roots of Insurgency" or Thomas Thornton on "Terror as a Weapon"—are the more successful in confronting issues involved in political warfare. These successes are not cited as arguments in favor of ad hoc theorizing but are adduced as symptoms of general theoretical deficiency. This deficiency is genuine and should be recognized.

DAVID A. WILSON University of California (Los Angeles)

Organizational Authority: Superior—Subordinate Relationships in Three Public Service Organizations. By Robert L. Peabody. (New York: Atherton Press, 1964. Pp. 163, $5.50.)

Robert L. Peabody's Organizational Authority reinforces the usefulness of behavioral analysis in public administration, which makes it a valuable addition to a slim literature. And the study supports a multiple-factor approach to authoritative relations, thereby contributing to a body of contemporary efforts with a similar point.

The volume presents major difficulties, however. Its methodology and design are troubled; the presentation suffers in many particulars; and the interpretations of results are problematic.

Methodologically, Organizational Authority does not respect its own promises. The study is exploratory, and proposes to utilize a sample of 76 employees from three small public agencies to test the usefulness of conceptual and operational definitions of authoritative relations derived from an analysis of the literature. Four reasonable "types of authority" are chosen for nominal and operational definition and for empirical testing: authority of position; authority of competence; authority of person; and authority of legitimacy.

The types of authority do not get the proposed natural-science treatment, however. The case is clearest for codings of interview responses as "authority based on legitimacy." An analytical flow-chart reveals the volume's characteristic approach. The variable is barely mentioned on p. 49 as "developed from responses by organization members." On p. 119, a brief and very general discussion appears. On p. 126, a table lists without comment four sub-classes of "authority of legitimacy," one of which is "generalized legitimacy." None of this gives specific information about the conventions for coding interview responses as one type of authority or another. Indeed, the few examples given suggest considerable overlap of responses scored as "legitimacy" and "position."

The treatment of "authority of legitimacy"

The treatment of "authority of legitimacy" reflects little conceptual and operational care, then, and this datum stands in puzzling contrast to the volume's public purposes. At least the demands of space do not explain the slippage between intention and execution. Thus, some 30 pages of a short book are devoted to elementary descriptions of the local police force, the school, and the welfare office from whose members interviews were obtained. These descriptions add little to the analysis. Moreover, much of the extensive review of the "authority" literature takes the form of a sketchy annotated bibliography organized around (for example) the various institutional contexts within which authoritative relations have been studied. The misallocation of resources is multiple. Conceptual and operational problems are neglected. Moreover, the volume's early chapters are but weakly related to the study's empirical focus. Similar and more exhaustive reviews also are available.

The interpretations of the results in *Organi*zational Authority also are problematic. This is a function of both presentation and design. In presentation, for example, verbal conclusions often are unsupported by the sparse data offered. Consider Table 5, p. 90. It reveals no obvious differences by "eyeball inspection" between data from three agencies, except in one case where N=1. But the reader is assured on p. 91 that, in general, "expected differences did occur." No judgmental criteria are specified. Nor were statistical tests run. Table 4 presents similar difficulties, but the issues are broader. In addition, the curious N chosen as the base for the calculations in Table 10 inflates the percentages reported as the major findings by some 50 to 75 percent.

The volume's underlying research design also discourages clear-cut interpretations. Basically, the four kinds of authority were used only to classify interview responses to this very openended question: What does authority mean to you? At best, the design permits showing that some of the types of authority were useful for coding some aspects of some of the interview responses of some proportion of the sample of low-level operatives in small public agencies. This is a very limited design, even for an "exploratory study."

The results obtained do not somehow overcome the design limitations. Some 22 percent of the respondents could not be scored as mentioning even one of the four kinds of authority. The remaining 59 interviews contributed in unspecified ways only 122 scored responses, moreover, if we calculate from the data presented. Peabody concludes that this establishes the usefulness of the four kinds of authority. The data permit many interpretations, however, and particularly since little is reported about the scoring procedure. Three hundred and four responses would have been scored if each respondent had touched on each of the four kinds of authority in his interview and if double-counting were not allowed. The paucity of responses actually scored may indicate that the four kinds of authority have a limited usefulness in the analysis of all populations. Or the data may simply indicate that the design posed the wrong question to the wrong people in one particular case.

The design limitations of Organizational Authority reflect the neglect of the crucial point that the usefulness of the four kinds of authority can be established only by the test of hypotheses derived from them. Some "working hypotheses" are "advanced" on p. 49 of the volume, but they never reappear. Even so, conceptual unclarity prevails. Thus it is proposed that: "Authority of position is strongest when supported by both authority of competence and authority of person." The meaning is obscure. Since "authority of position" is said to inhere in hierarchical office, two similar formally-defined positions are neither "stronger" nor "weaker" given other conditions. The incumbents of these similar formal positions may be more or less effective or authoritative. Thus a more useful hypothesis would be: When authority of position is reinforced by high rank on (for example) competence, formal superiors will be more likely to have subordinates who are high producers and/or who are more satisfied at work. Such a hypothesis has been tested many times, in fact, with positive results. Very little additional data would have been required to test such a hypothesis in Organizational Authority.

The mention and subsequent neglect of the several awkward "working hypotheses" in Organizational Authority testify that the volume has not conceptually integrated the several types of authority as multiple co-varying factors in authoritative relations. The mention and neglect also illustrate how the development of suitable operations in the volume was complicated by conceptual inelegancies. Indeed, these inelegancies may reflect a detachment from the very elements upon which useful operations depend.

ROBERT T. GOLEMBIEWSKI
The University of Georgia

Political Parties: A Behavioral Analysis. By SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD. (Chicago: Rand McNally & Co., 1964. Pp. viii, 613.)

Congressman Neil Staebler, Chairman of the Michigan State Democratic Committee once said that Samuel J. Eldersveld gave up a promising political career when he left the mayor's office of Ann Arbor to return to his researches into party membership and organization in Michigan, the Netherlands, and elsewhere. The present volume gives the author's academic colleagues, at least, ample reason to approve his choice. Although the data of the study are confined to Detroit and Wayne County, its theoretical perspective and analytical categories are applicable to almost any political system. They consist of interviews with 70 county and congressional district leaders of the Democratic and Republican parties, 149 precinct leaders, and 596 residents drawn from a stratified sample of 87 precincts out of 2007 in the county's six congressional districts. The study design explicitly focuses upon the characteristics, perceptions, attitudes. communications and intra-organizational relationships between the county-district and precinct leaders of the two parties, as well as the mutual impact of these two levels of party organization upon the adult citizen public in the Detroit metropolitan area.

Part I investigates four attributes of political party organization: membership policy, the group affiliations of party members and officials, the effective authority relationships between levels of party structure, and the social origins and career patterns of party activists throughout the organization. Part II presents what is by all odds the most thoroughgoing analysis of local party leaders' political orientations to be found anywhere in the literature, classified by (a) awareness of party organization goals, (b) public policy preferences, (c) personal motivations, (d) personal, intra-party role perceptions, (e) environmental and value perspectives toward the political system as a whole. Part III analyzes the personal interactions of local party leaders and activists as an organizational system from the standpoint of three operational requirements: (a) efficiency as a task group, (b) the frequency, direction, style and content of the communications network, (c) patterns of participation and consent in organizational decision-making. Part IV analyzes the functional-dysfunctional effects of party activity in satisfying: (a) individual needs inside the party organizations (political socialization and recruitment), (b) the parties' organizational needs (consistency of voter perceptions, identifications with and support of the party), and (c) the needs of citizens generally and the larger political system. The latter are revealed by measures of popular belief and confidence in the system, by the extent of political interest, involvement and information among the voters, and by individual incentives (careers) and group rewards (benefits in public policies) to persons who come to realize their stake in the larger political system through their interactions (support, bargaining, alliances) with the party association.

Specialists will particularly appreciate the degree to which Eldersveld consistently employs the concepts of contemporary empirical theory. The book will have to be read to appreciate the progress it represents in systematic development and testing of hypotheses about party voters, members, officers and leaders. Generalists will be interested in what he does to advance the "general theory of parties" for which M. Duverger pleaded so eloquently a decade ago. Here, apart from the title, the book is modest and unpretentious. It claims to be no more than a study in depth of the American party system in one metropolitan area; its concepts and research tools are only potentially adaptable to comparison with parties in a wide variety of cultural and demographic contexts. Secondly, its focus is on the local electoral party organization; it has very little to say about the relations of local and national parties, or about the relations of electoral party personnel with those in legislative and executive policy-making, either locally or nationally. Thirdly, the study contains almost no data on the actual selection (nomination) of candidates or the control of elected representatives by party organization officials. In short, Eldersveld has produced an analytical model for American electoral party organization, not a complete picture of "political parties in the modern state."

He explicitly recognizes that his conception of party closely approximates that of Merriam and Gossell in their work of 1923. But whereas their contribution was literary rather than quantitative, insightful rather than demonstrative, unique rather than connectible, Eldersveld's model will be understood and respected by theorists everywhere, regardless of their commitments or preconceptions. It is not a mere deviant case of Michels' elitist hierarchy, Weber's mirror of the society's particular form of social domination, Selznick's combat group, Duverger's bureaucratized, mass-educational movement, or Downs' team-coalition of individuals in complete agreement on party goals and election policies, acting in full knowledge, perfect communication and complete involvement with organizational decisions. Eldersveld's image of the party is best set forth in his own words (pp. 525-28):

an open, clientele-oriented structure, permeable at its base as well as its apex, preoccupied with the recruitment of deviant as well as established social categories, willing to provide mobility and access for political activists into the major operational and decisional centers of the organization. It is a "stratarchical" rather than an elitist command structure, with power and decision-making devolved to and autonomized at lower levels. Deference is not exclusively upward, but reciprocal. The party must also be visualized as a tenuous alliance of socio-economic subcoalitions, having a mutually exploitative relationship to the party, with varying degrees of cohesion, identification and interaction, and with varying potentials for disloyalty and disaffection. Finally, the party is not a hierarchy of subelites whose admission, power and status are closely determined by the top leadership group, but an aggregate of differential career types with highly varying aspirations and rates of mobility and turnover . . . [sic]

AVERY LEISERSON

Vanderbilt University

Political Parties in the American System. By Frank J. Sorauf. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown & Co., 1964, Pp. xiii, 194.)

This is a sophisticated, literate, and succinct survey of the American party system. It is far more than a paraphrase of the works of others. It is a creative and, on the whole, successful attempt in brief compass to make sense out of the American political kaleidoscope. The author is skilled in analytic theory building. He is extremely wise about political motivations. He is versed in comparative political systems. He writes with enviable clarity.

The book begins with a definition of party based upon function and role. According to the author, the primary job of the American party is to organize, inclusively, for the winning of elections. The overriding party function, however, operates within a social system and an historical tradition which shapes and conditions the party role. Federalism, separation of powers, economic and social pluralism leave American parties decentralized, only intermittently organized, and largely pragmatic and non-ideological in character.

By far the most brilliant parts of the book are Chapters V & VI: "The Structure of Incentives," and "The Contest for Office." I do not know whether Mr. Sorauf has ever been actively engaged in practical politics. No matter. He understands the carrots and sticks of politics, who wields them, and why. He also understands what he calls the art and craft of campaigns.

It is no real criticism of the book to point out that the Goldwater candidacy has been as embarrassing to political scientists as it has been to the Republican Party. (e.g. "The voices of the far right in American politics—some of whom do disagree on the fundamentals of the economy, the Constitution, and social equality—have been muted by the electoral majoritarianism of the two major parties" p. 31.) Who of us has not been thrown off base by this political aberration?

It is a real criticism of the book to say that the final three chapters are in part unfair, simplistic, and contradictory. Mr. Sorauf's disdain for the "party responsibility" boys leads him to erect a series of straw men and to consume the straw with the fire of his scorn. It causes him to overstate the pluralism of American politics; to underplay the role of reformers in establishing the climate of opinion in which structural changes in our political system occur (e.g. the currency of ideas surrounding the apportionment decisions in the Supreme Court; the institutionalization of the two national committees; or the Kennedy "packing" of the Rules Committee); to ignore an important part of the political logic of the nationalization of American politics; and to defend the proposition that "major changes and reform within political parties most often take place as a response to the changing environmental circumstances" while accepting a view of that environment which is closer to the world of Calhoun or Coolidge than to the world of Lyndon Johnson.

Reformers out of phase with their times make little immediate sense. But they often construct a series of ideas and procedural options which assume growing importance as environmental conditions change the necessities of an age. A review of the Congressional Quarterly proves a clustering of legislative party votes over time which, although not rigorously disciplined, is far more ideological and programmatically consistent than Mr. Sorauf's book admits. There is far more dependence of state and local organizations upon national political activity and finance—especially during a Presidential election—than Mr. Sorauf suggests. In a world of nuclear war and national and international economic interdependencies, questions of survival and security become ubiquitous and frequently override more limited regional and parochial interests. The party that forgets this is doomed to fail in its electoral function. Reapportionment and the impending death or retirement of some old timers in Congress are bound to affect the partisan structure and behavior of the legislative branch.

America will not end up adopting in toto the recommendations of the American Political Science Association committee on a more responsible two-party system. But the Committee's recommendations are less out of tune with the observable present and the foreseeable future than Mr. Sorauf implies.

Perhaps it is time that analytically oriented and normatively oriented political scientists had an ecumenical conference. The extreme positions have been defended so long and so outrageously that a new sorting out of where we are and where we should be going may well be in order. The normative fellows must be prepared to deal with the brilliant analysis of the first two-thirds of Mr. Sorauf's book. The analytic fellows must be prepared to wrestle with the structural and behavioral implications of observable and predictable changes which have emerged in American national politics since World War II.

Stephen K. Bailey Maxwell School, Syracuse University

The Politics of the Budgetary Process. By Aaron Wildaysky. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown and Company, 1964. Pp. xi, 216.)

To deal with budgeting is to deal with the concrete payoffs of the political process, and this book analyzes budgetary policy-making in political terms. It is a sophisticated study of the political system that the direct participants in federal appropriations decisions comprise: of the simplifying devices they employ to make possible a modicum of rationality in handling decisions too complex to be tackled whole; of the aids used in calculating budgetary demands and grants; of the interlocking system of roles and the differing perspectives and strategies to be observed in bureaus, departments, the Bureau of the Budget, and the appropriations committees.

The author makes a strong case for the thesis that by and large the system serves the nation fairly well and that the most popular targets of its would-be reformers are precisely the devices that make it work with an acceptable measure of rationality and self-correcting feedback. Reform proposals are typically based upon concern that the entire budget is never examined as a whole and that decisions about specific programs are accordingly made without a weighing of their relative merits. But this view ignores the fact that there is no consensus on a ranking of programs; that an organic budget would therefore inevitably mean an explicit and visible triumph of particular values in a way that is not now necessary; that a program budget emphasizes ideological differences and makes agreement more difficult. In short, these reform suggestions are really prescriptions for political conflict and for a change in the values realized through politics and not merely prescriptions for a change in the methods of budgeting.

The present system, moreover, does produce more opportunity for alternative views to be expressed and greater assurance that major errors in calculation will be corrected than any alternative proposed. In an area in which the limits of rational decision making are fairly quickly reached decision-makers must satisfice, considering only a small number of alternatives at one time, paying most attention to changes from the last budget, and assuming that interests they ignore or underestimate will make themselves felt at some other point in the balkanized budgetary process. To pretend that budget makers can consider all possibilities is bound to be illusory and to amount to propaganda for a particular result.

The study is especially perceptive in demonstrating that the various roles of the agencies involved in budgeting ("the agency as advocâte, the Budget Bureau as Presidential servant with a cutting bias, the House Appropriations Committee as guardian of the Treasury, The Senate Appropriations Committee as responsible appeals court") permit each one to reduce its burden of calculation because it can assume that it can play its own role militantly, confident that others will balance it by playing the other politically necessary roles.

Any book that makes a significant contribution to conceptualization is bound to raise questions as well as answer them, and the Wildavsky study leaves this reader wondering whether something systematic can now be learned about some issues with which he deals only casually.

Can something more rigorous be said about the political and social correlates of decisions about incremental changes from previous budgets? Wildavsky deplores the unwillingness of budgetary reformers to face the larger political implications of their suggestions, but insofar as he takes the role of advocate of the current system he sometimes falls into the same trap. It is not self-evident that all significant bodies of opinion, particularly the advocates of drastic change, are represented by the role-players, and to ignore the possibility they are not is to advocate the status-quo by indirection. If there is anything systematic about the way in which the system responds to, slows down, or speeds up social change, we should know it.

Second, can something systematic be learned about the relative effectiveness of the strategies the author has identified? Any statement of social phenomena in terms of an inventory of influences falls short of explanation, though it is possible that anything more than an inventory is impossible at this time. When this question is explored, it will almost certainly be tied to rates of social change as well.

Wildavsky's book is encouraging evidence that our increased exposure to organization theory, game theory, and social psychology is producing a more powerful and explanatory political science.

MURRAY EDELMAN

University of Illinois

World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators. By Bruce M. Russett, Hayward R. Alker, Jr., Karl W. Deutsch, and Harold D. Lasswell. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964. Pp. x, 373. $10.00.)

Not many years ago, the study of comparative government in most American universities consisted largely of serial, descriptive appraisals of the "major foreign powers"—usually European, with occasional reference to non-European powers such as India, China, and Japan. By the mid-1950's, responding to the everlengthening membership of the United Nations and to strictures against the "traditional approach" by Roy Macridis and others, both researchers and class-room instructors began shifting their attention to generalized types and components of political systems. More recently, thanks to the increasing availability of "hard data" of the sort collected and disseminated by the Statistical Office of the United Nations. wholly quantitative cross-national comparison has become both feasible and fruitful. The acknowledged leader of the "quantitative revolution" in comparative studies has been Karl Deutsch, who, in association with Harold Lasswell and others, was instrumental in organizing the Political Data Program at Yale University. The World Handbook is the first major product of the program. Principal author of the Handbook is the Program's Director, Bruce M. Russett, with important methodological contributions in a concluding section by Hayward Alker, Jr.

The greater bulk of the Handbook consists of 75 data series "selected with reference to existing theories of international and comparative politics" and representing, in each case, "an attempt to operationalize a variable central to several important theories of political or social change" (pg. 2). The series are grouped into "Distribution Profiles" under the following headings: Human Resources, Government and Politics, Communications, Wealth, Health, Education, Family and Social Relations, Distribution of Wealth and Income, and Religion. Summary measures accompanying each series include the range, mean, median, standard deviation, case and data deciles, and modal decile.

It should not detract from the importance of the Handbook to note that few of the data series represent original compilations. As the authors themselves point out, "our data-gathering efforts have been unavoidably influenced by availability.... We tried, however, to go considerably beyond the original sources in processing the data in order to bring out important characteristics of the distributions" (p. 4).

Since the primary criteria for selection of the data series are stated to have been "theoretical importance," "accuracy," and "availability," one may be permitted to cavil at certain of the more obvious omissions. Why, for example, were Telephones Per Capita or Energy Consumption not included?

The full case list for the Handbook embraces 141 independent nations and dependent territories. The number of cases for each series, however, ranges from a low of 12 to a high of 133. (The authors state, incorrectly, that their basic list is composed of 133 countries, with the number of countries represented in each table "varying between 11 and 134.") The mean is 74.9, or 53% of the possible maximum. The fluctuation in case content and size will present problems for those using Handbook data for certain types of multivariate analysis. "Missing data" computer programs exist, however, for simple linear correlation purposes and such a program was evidently used by the authors in assembling the correlation matrix included in Part B: The Analysis of Trends and Patterns.

The compilers of the Handbook are to be commended for their painstaking and instructive handling of the "reliability" problem. It is somewhat surprising therefore that a spot check reveals far more errors of their own commission than one might wish for. One may scarcely be accused of nit-picking in taking Table 9 (Percentage of Population in Cities Over 20,000) as an example. The figures given for at least 15 out of the 120 cases on this list either are not to be found in the sources cited or fail to agree with the figures given therein.

Another type of error, illustrative of the difficulty of relying on secondary sources which themselves rely on secondary sources, is also exhibited in Table 9. Much of the data offered in this table is taken from Norton Ginsburg's Atlas of Economic Development, rather than from UN sources. Much of Ginsburg's data, in turn, is taken from an "unpublished manuscript" by Leo F. Schnore, with the notation that "Data are from 1955 except as otherwise noted." But it may easily be demonstrated that a sizeable proportion of the items from Schnore (identified as being 1955 data) are actually of earlier vintage. The authors simply accept Ginsburg's assertion (who presumably accepted Schnore's) that "Data are for 1955" without checking into its accuracy.

A somewhat less serious difficulty concerns the use of transformations to help normalize excessively skewed distributions. Increasingly, quantitative data analysts are recognizing the need for such transformations, but few indulge in other than logarithmic manipulation of their data. Thus the present authors, while transforming somewhat over a third of their variables before computing correlation coefficients restrict themselves exclusively to logarithms. Now it happens that many (though by no means all) of the data series relevant to contemporary cross-national research are of a "right skew" character, viz., a "bunching" of scores at the lower end of the scale, with progressively fewer entries as one moves to the higher values of the scale. Under such circumstances a logarithmic transformation may, indeed, be appropriate (a square root transformation may, however, be even more appropriate, depending on the exact configuration of the skew). For an extreme left skew, on the other hand, a square or cubic transformation will usually be called for. Additional transformations may be required for other distributional patterns.

For purposes of this review, a Chi-Square distribution analysis was performed on the data for Tables 8, 9, 51, and 64, four distributions that the authors did not transform but which, from their graphs, seemed to be somewhat non-normal. Distributions 8 and 9 are both right skewed, but a square root rather than a logarithmic transformation proved appropriate in each case. Distribution 51 (left skewed) proved to be relatively normal (Chi-Square = 7.1) but with an outlier (South Africa) at -3.6 S.S. A cubic transformation resolved the problem of the outlier, while reducing the Chi-Square value to 1.8. In the case of Distribution 64, an arcsin square root transformation improved the distribution somewhat, though admittedly not much.

It would, in this writer's opinion, have added immensely to the final product if analyses such as the foregoing had been performed for each data series, with the Chi-Square value for each raw distribution (based on 0.1 probability regions or deciles of the normal curve), together with the most appropriate transformation (if any) specified in each case.

The purist might wish to take issue with a number of "side" comments. For example, the authors state (pg. 292) that "percentage Roman Catholic seems not to be highly correlated at the worldwide level with anything (except percentage Christian), not even . . .

negatively with economic development or development rates or achievement motivation as the famous Weberian 'Protestant ethic' theory would indicate."

The obvious reason for this finding is the prevalence of Catholicism as the dominant religion in Latin America, which tends, by and large, to exhibit "transitional" developmental status. If, on the other hand, predominantly Catholic countries and predominantly Protestant (or Mixed Christian, or Muslim) countries are compared along various "developmental" dimensions, more truly "Weberian" patterns will be seen to emerge.

In an interesting discussion of "'Stages' of Economic and Political Development," as defined by Handbook data, the authors frankly acknowledge the perils of indulging in diachronic inference on the basis of synchronic or "cross-sectional" evidence. They rightly point out that "a more direct and dependable method for examining stages [of development] would be to look at . . . data for many countries over long periods of time." But the necessary "hard" data are most assuredly lacking, and this reviewer is inclined to agree that it may indeed be useful in the absence "of better longitudinal data, to use the cross-sectional data we have as if they in some way applied to development over time" (p. 299).

An informative presentation of curvilinear regression is included under the topic "Changing Relationships Between Variables," and the more sophisticated reader will find the discussion of "Regionalism Versus Universalism in Comparing Nations" highly stimulating. A large number of the Handbook series are in the form of percentages, and Alker displays considerable finesse in coming to grips with the problem of ecological correlation.

If the Russett-Alker Handbook does not wholly measure up to what it may become in succeeding editions, it is nonetheless a most impressive beginning. This is not intended as damnation by faint praise. Pioneering efforts are seldom perfect. Despite its flaws, the World Handbook is unquestionably one of the more significant publications of the year in political science.

ARTHUR S. BANKS

Indiana University.

Studying Politics Abroad: Field Research in the Developing Areas. By Robert E. Ward, Frank Bonilla, James S. Coleman, Herbert H. Hyman, Lucian W. Pye, and Myron Weiner. (Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown and Company, 1964. Pp. vii, 245. $2.50 paper.)

Sponsored by the Committee on Comparative Politics of the Social Science Research Council, this book is addressed particularly to political scientists who are embarking on research projects in the developing areas. Although the authors want to interest younger scholars in doing field research in the developing areas, their primary concern is efficiency and effectiveness in the field. They hope to sensitize the prospective field researchers to likely methodological and practical problems. to suggest some of the ways previous researchers have coped with the problems, and to assure novices that the problems are not "the result of some peculiar malevolence" toward them and their projects (p. 2). The level on which the authors propose to accomplish these tasks is the strategic, which is said to lie between general theory and specific tactics.

Lucian Pye begins these efforts by recommending a cross-disciplinary approach and a return to the fundamentals of theory-building and data-collection. Here and elsewhere in the book, the need for flexibility in the planning and data-collection stages of research is stressed. The chapter concludes by identifying some of the characteristics of most developing political systems and suggesting consequent research needs. The characteristics include cleavage, ambivalence, fragmented identities, personality politics, omnifunctionality, and instability. The theoretical bases for selecting the characteristics and the research which has already been completed are not noted.

The opening sentence of Robert Ward's contribution leads one to hope for an analysis of the social system of research. "The relationship between scholars, their working environment, and the type and quality of their research output," he writes, "is complex and poorly understood" (p. 26). However, separate topics are taken up in his two chapters. These include different conceptions and statuses of scholarship and scholars, linguistic and design preparations, the advantages of a straightforward and comprehensible identification of self and project, disruptions of the researcher's time schedule, nonprofessional involvements, and suitable payment of debts.

The book's introduction indicates that documentary research, interviews, survey research, and observation will be the methods of data-collection examined. All but the last of these are covered. In the chapter on documentary research, written by James Coleman of UCLA, a realistic assessment of document availability (existence and use policy) is made and access strategies are suggested. In addition, several types of studies which could profitably use documentary research are noted and, in five valuable appendices prepared with Gülgün Karal, facilities, sources, and bibliographies are identified.

Myron Weiner begins his chapter on political interviewing by commenting on the influence the researcher's background and training have upon the conduct of inquiry. Perceptively, he states that the researcher "may all too often compare the practice of government abroad with the theory of government at home" (p. 109). Other matters discussed include the use of interpreters, reconstructing an event through interviews, access, evaluating responses with the respondents' purposes in mind, and group interviewing.

The chapter on survey techniques, written by Frank Bonilla, begins with an examination of three fundamental issues: Does "public opinion" exist in developing countries? If so, what are its functions? What methods are appropriate for its study? The author indicates the desperate need for analyses of interviewer-respondent interaction and the meaning of cross-cultural comparisons, and he comments on some problems of field administration and public relations. Unfortunately, the prospective field researcher is not assisted with probability sampling in uncharted areas with unenumerated populations.

The concluding chapter, by Herbert Hyman, includes descriptions and evaluations of research designs related to comparison and the study of change. The scientific reason for comparison is also given: "Actual cross-national comparisons, based on equivalent methods, provide an accurate empirical norm for evaluating a descriptive finding from one country" (p. 172).

Studying Politics Abroad is, for the most part, successful in what it sets out to accomplish. It interests, sensitizes, suggests, and assures; in addition, it makes some attempts to provide the student with a necessary technical background. Most important, professors will no longer have to spend hours with departing field researchers passing on the folklore of research in the developing areas.

In two ways, this book reflects the underdeveloped condition of political science. The first is that the presentation is at the level of common sense. Unfortunately, the dangers of common sense are present: explanations and justifications are often not given for suggestions, and many of the boundaries between application and non-application are not specified. The second reflection of political science underdevelopment is the assumption the authors implicitly make throughout the book that the prospective field researchers have virtually no background either in the politics of the developing areas or in field research methods. But can it be that students are being dispatched from American pillars of higher education to do research in developing areas without having read Almond, Pye, and Riggs? Can it be that students will plan to interview without having read Hyman, and Kahn and Cannell? An equivalent question could be related to each of the chapters in the book. Therefore, if the pillars of higher education are doing their job, a short sensitizing-suggesting-assuring booklet would have been sufficient. If the pillars are failing, we desperately need a more complete book, at least the equivalent of the Handbook of Social Psychology.

WILLIAM JOHN HANNA Michigan State University.

Financing the United Nations System. By John Stoessinger and Associates. (Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1964. Pp. 348. $6.75.)

The noble ideas embedded in the United Nations Charter, as well as its crisp constitutional structure, often make the breathless enthusiast for world peace forget that the UN is a political system. Money is both the root of all evil and the goad to much good. This excellent book cogently and coherently puts the problem of financing the United Nations into political perspective by examining the dilemma of apportioning the costs of the Organization among states with conflicting national policies and by analyzing possible scurces of new international revenues.

Ten distinguished scholars of United Nations affairs have collaborated with the author in producing a remarkably lucid study, considering the intrinsically tedious matter of statistical compilations, and the skewering of gross national products usually intended to deny art and exalt science. Indeed, Dr. Stoessinger has kept the sprawling materials of international organization research within neatly hemmed boundaries, leading in logical order from a first chapter postulate that the present "financial crisis" of the UN is in reality a political crisis over the role of the Organization as translated by divergent national policies of member states to a conclusion that international political consensus must be nurtured with all the crafts of statesmanship in order to invigorate the financial health of the United Nations.

Between the sheets of this sensible approach to the construction of world order lies a short historical examination of the fiscal problems of the League of Nations and contemporary regional organizations, details on the costs of UN membership, and a description of the procedures to estimate, assess, and appropriate the regular budget of the United Nations. Quite rightly almost a third of the book is devoted to the financial impact upon the United Nations of the peace and security operations in Korea, the Middle East, the Congo, and other peace-keeping interventions, for these political activities, not the studies, conferences, and recommendations of the UN in economic, social, legal affairs—really account for the fiscal "crisis."

The heart of the problem of UN solvency does not lie in the magnitude of the costs or in the poverty of the membership, but in the unwillingness of states to support UN peace-keeping operations that they find politically unwelcome. Failing to find international consensus to back the costs in the Middle East and the Congo, some members of the UN pressed for a legal opinion to bolster a political point of view and one chapter of this volume deals with a World Court advisory opinion of 1962. By a fractured majority of 9-5 the Court found that the expenditures authorized by the General Assembly resolutions for UNEF in the Middle East and the UN Congo Force constituted "expenses of the Organization" under Article 17, but, as the authors note, the political import of the opinion was reflected in each of the ten different statements made by the judges as they labored to apply legal tools to a controversial political issue.

In succeeding chapters that treat the fiscal problems of the UN voluntary programs, such as UNICEF, the Expanded Program of Technical Assistance, and the Special Fund, the shift of the budgetary battle lines is emphasized, for tension generally lies between aidgiving and aid-receiving states, marking the perennial rift between debtors and creditors. The amounts of money involved are relatively small and quite voluntary for every state. No problem of assessment exists although there are other problems of increasing donations and collections. Attention is drawn to the proposals to merge some of the programs or incorporate them into the regular budget of the United Nations, with the authors wisely coming down on the side of developing a vigorous consensus for support of the programs rather than expecting some procedural alteration to transform their image or effect.

Similarly, the budgets of the Specialized Agencies are examined, with their receipts from assessed governmental contributions, grants for carrying out EPTA and Special Fund projects, and donations. The lament for a lack of funds to cover needed programs and the complaint of arrears mark the budgeting problems, but the Agencies face no serious plight as they trim their plans to fit revenues. For eighteen years criticism has been vented upon the lack of coordination between the specialized agencies and the UN, with inconclusive findings and little action. Nothing remarkable has been added to the debate here, while the World Bank and its affiliates, together with the International Monetary Fund are perforce treated in a few pages.

Finally, the authors turn to the possibility of raising revenues for the United Nations outside the present assessment-of-states system and the voluntary donations by states to certain economic and social programs. Their conclusion that private contributions can only provide a very modest increment to UN activities seems correct, perhaps understated in light of the record of private contributions coming almost entirely from the United States, except for specific refugee and humanitarian programs. UN levies on international activities, such as mail, canal, sea, and air traffic, and UN exploitation of Antarctica, the seabed, and communications in outer space are examined succinctly to determine their potential for raising money for the UN, but the general conclusions are that the proposals are either too controversial to be accepted, too small in their yield to be worthwhile, or too remote in return to meet the present demands for the development of the UN system. There can be no substitute for the failure of states to meet their financial obligations to the UN here and now.

Overall the combined work of the authors of this tidy volume, so pertinent to the contemporary financial impasse and the future expansion of international organization activities, deserves high marks for a judicious investigation of an important public issue. Calm balance marks its character. Policy makers dealing with UN affairs will have much fact and figure to digest, while ordinary men will be reminded that all organizations, even those designed to achieve the most noble aims of mankind, can move no further and faster than the political consensus that binds them.

GERARD J. MANGONE Maxwell School, Syracuse University

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

The Image: A Guide to Pseudo-Events in America. By Daniel J. Boorstin. (New York and Boston: Harper Colophon Books, 1964. Pp. iv, 315. $1.75.)

First, this is a most entertaining book, written with wit, sparkle, and a knack for the quotable phrase. "What ails us is not what we have done with America, but what we have substituted for America." "The great forward strides of American civilization have blurred the edges of reality." "We imagine ourselves masters of a plastic universe." "How surprising if men who make their environment and fill experience with whatever they please could not also make their God!" "The wonderful pliability of human nature, in a society where anyone can become a celebrity." Second, the book creates concepts which should become by-words as much as Riesman's "other-directedness": (a) the "pseudo-event" which, unlike the genuine, spontaneous event, is planted for reporting purposes, stands in an "ambiguous relation to the underlying reality," and tends toward a self-fulfilling prophecy; (b) "well-knownness" which is replacing fame. Once there was admiration for the "flash of divinity" in a great man, now people are "known for their well-knownness." (c) "Celebrity" substitutes for the hero, but the concept is not confined to people. "A best seller is a celebrity among books." (God) "is the Celebrity Author of the World's Best Seller." (d) The "image" takes the place of the ideal. Unlike the American "dream" which "was here to be reached for and not to be lived in," "images" are synthetic, passive, and ambiguous. Third, Boorstin as good as asserts that this unreality is all of our life. His third chapter, "From Traveler to Tourist," pushes the scope of the study from mass communications into a sketch of our entire existence. "We are threatened by a new and peculiarly American menace, . . . the menace of unreality. The threat of nothingness is the danger of replacing American dreams by American illusions." Fourth, Boorstin has something to say about the causes of this danger which roots in the "Graphic Revolution," i.e. electronic and photographic technology. He has almost nothing to say, though, about the consequences of living in unreality; no word about foreign or domestic policies, or family relations, ethics, education. This may be because of his bluntly admitted inability to "describe reality," even though he keeps referring his "pseudo-events" to what he calls an "underlying reality." More than once he suggests that our "dreams" are real while our illusions are not. At other times, he attributes the modern American "menace" to "our strengths" rather than our weaknesses.

This book is not a study of life, it merely describes the doxa that stand between us and reality. It is a good to call attention to them, and a courageous look into their blurred face may have a healing effect. Boorstin, however, has confined himself to the relatively amiable self-delusions of the public relations world. He has passed over, in silence, the far more dangerous deceptions of the modern ideologies, as, e.g., Positivism, Historicism, Marxism, Racism, which put a contrived "Second Reality" between man and the knowledge of his own condition. These "dreams" of man's selfcreation, self-redemption, self-perfection cause indeed a "thicket of unreality" that intervenes between our policy makers and the real situation. One can only shout "Amen" as Boorstin counsels, at the end: " . . . each of us must prepare himself to receive messages from the outside." Boorstin himself, however, does not help much as long as he can manage no more than "suspect that there may be a world out there, beyond our present or future powers to image or imagine." The scientist, after all, is called to penetrate through the doxa to aletheia. -- GERHART NIEMEYER, University of Notre Dame.

Jeremy Bentham: An Odyssey of Ideals. By Mary P. Mack. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1963. Pp. xiii, 482. $7.50.)

If a statuary Hall of Fame in political theory were to be created, Jeremy Bentham's likeness would no doubt be assigned a modest niche in a secondary wing. This volume—the first of a projected 2-volume work by an historian—is dedicated to the cause of moving Bentham's statue at very least out into the main hall. The author tells us that she began her study of Bentham troubled by the usual interpretation of him as a shallow "rationalist," a "comic philistine," and a "trivial and defective thinker." She concludes—although part of the supporting evidence and argument are yet to come in the second volume—that the usual interpretation is dead wrong: Bentham was in fact a "great man who has often been misunderstood and therefore undervalued" (p. xi).

The evidence and the argument of this first volume are divided into three parts: Part I sets the familial and intellectual background (1748–1769); Part II outlines the fundamentals of Bentham's Utilitarian "science" (1768–1782); and Part III shows Bentham venturing, somewhat hesitantly to be sure, out into the political world to test and refine his science. The volume ends in 1792, just after Bentham became a "democrat," as a result of, among other things, his enthusiasm for the first stages of the French Revolution; and just after old Jeremiah Bentham died, leaving Jeremy and his brother Sam a fortune sufficient to permit them to indulge in certain projects based on Jeremy's science.

The author's claim that Bentham has been grossly and unjustly undervalued rests essentially upon three points. The first is that no one can justly judge Bentham's thought without fully digesting the apparently considerable mass of his unpublished writings, as well as the numerous volumes which have already seen the public light. (The author computes that "almost every day of his adult life, from 1770 to 1832, he wrote about fifteen folio pages" [p. 5].) The second point is that nearly all the critics have imputed a sterile. narrow and static "doctrine" to Bentham, when in fact he was the "creator of a general method"; the core of that method was "a 'logic of the will' that covers every human action and not merely a limited ethical or political theory" (p. xi). The third, and really crucial, point is that Bentham's system is never judged properly because it is never seen as an uncompleted system, the key portions of which center upon the unfinished "logic of the will." The argument, here, reduced to its bare elements, is as follows: Utilitarianism, as a "method," required the mass of men to adopt a totally new vocabulary to replace their conventional, and therefore hopelessly ambiguous, language. Bentham sought to supply that new vocabulary by the creation of ponderous Greek-root neologisms. But when he found, early on, that his readers refused to accept this new vocabulary, he began, about 1782, to write in two different ways: private analyses of the logic-of-the-will variety; and public works of a polemical and popular kind. And what is most crucial, his disappointment at the rejection of the early specimens of the new vocabularly caused him never to completeindeed, says the author, he never really wrote, let alone published-his "most important work" (p. 162). In short, the vital middle of Bentham's whole system—the "logic of the will," meant to serve as a bridge between the principle of pleasure (an "empirical generalization") and the principle of happiness (a "normative injunction")-failed to be completed because the mass of his contemporaries refused to accept the first morsels they were asked to digest (p. 223).

We are led, then, to this conclusion: Benthamite Utilitarianism cannot possibly be rejected as unsound because it has never been tried. But in order for it to be tried, two things would be necessary: first, the vital middle, the "logic of the will," would have to be available in completed form; and second, the mass of men would have to be willing to be converted by it. Since the first of these conditions cannot, in the nature of things, ever be realized exactly as Bentham intended itunless we are to suppose that he might come back to earth to complete that which he left undonethe second seems to be irrelevant. The author might object, of course, that someone else might complete the vital, missing part; in which case Bentham would be given credit for providing the inspiration and outlining the method. Possibly. But we would still want to see whether the necessary conversion is any more likely now, or in the future, than it was when Bentham provided his own first public samples. I have my doubts; but perhaps Miss Mack will silence them in the second volume of this work, the first of which is, in spite of my skepticism regarding substance, a valuable complement to the texts considered by the political theorist.—RICHARD H. Cox, State University of New York (Buffalo).

Three Tactics: The Background in Marx. By STANLEY MOORE. (New York: Monthly Review Press, 1963. Pp. vii, 96. $2.25.)

Discussions of Marxism, as of theology, have generally been conducted better in Europe than in North America. But time has wrought changes, and whatever the situation may be in theology, so far as Marxism is concerned, contemporary American writing on the subject sometimes equals the best that Europe can produce.

This slight book, Three Tactics, is a case in point. The author obviously knows his material and can plunge straight into a theoretical discussion and sustain it at a sophisticated level. I would judge the author is sympathetic to Marxism, yet he is free of dogmatism and asks shrewd and important questions.

The general question which he sets out to answer is whether, corresponding to the conflicts in the Marxist movement, there is a similar conflict of principles in the writings of Marx himself. He finds there is such a correspondence and that Marx in fact enunciated three theories for the ending of capitalism and never committed himself wholly to one.

In his earlier days Marx talked of the permanent revolution. This was a prescription for a conspiratorial minority revolution, allegedly in the interest of the majority. This Marxist aberration became Leninist orthodoxy, but today is adhered to only by the Chinese.

The second, or main line, of Marxist theory stressed increasing misery and a majority proletarian revolution. This was the "iron law" of historical materialism, which guaranteed the overthrow of capitalism. Tactical support has not been drawn from the doctrine from the time of Lenin's Two Tactics in 1905, until the Russians tried to revive it about 1960.

The third theoretical model may be called that of competing systems. As feudal society became penetrated by capitalist institutions, so capitalist society becomes permeated by socialist institutions. Piecemeal reform takes the place of revolution. This strain of thought ante-dates Marx and has a mixed ancestry. It was expressed in the tactics of the Revisionists. Although Marx gave it little support, Engels backed it more heavily.

Since three competing models can be found in Marx and Engels, it is not surprising that the Communist movement should be divided on tactics. Today the Russians have dropped the Leninist orthodoxy and have moved to a tactical position somewhere between that and Revisionism. Fortunately, this tactic is more suited to co-existence in the atomic age, and has the advantage of being in the mainstream of Marx's writings.

The author conducts his discussion lucidly, and with an economy of words, although there is a certain caution and inconclusiveness about his work. Yet the book as a whole sharpens the conflicting theoretical and tactical tendencies in Marxism, and may usefully be recommended to students.—H. B. Mayo, University of Western Ontario.

The Politics of Conscience: T. H. Green and His Age. By Melvin Richter. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. 415. $7.50.)

One of the more curious aspects of nineteenth century English history is the profound political and social influence exerted by Green and Idealism. For despite the almost impenetrable character of Green's writings and his uncompromising lecture presentation, he had a considerable impact on Liberal thought. Richter's study seeks to discover the factors which made Green so influential and, also, to account for the rapid decline of that influence.

Richter contends that Green's thought, as well as that of other Liberal reformers, was a reaction to the severe attacks on his traditional Methodist religion. Green was faced with a "great crisis of faith precipitated by science and scholarship. . . . an acute crisis of conscience which troubled those Christian believers who at the same time regarded themselves as thinking men." Higher biblical criticism and Darwinian evolutionary theory made it necessary to give to religion "a compelling restatement in the style of abstract thought respected by the educated" or to abandon religion to the lower classes where it would never exert "the full force upon the whole society that comes from uniting faith with a creed formulated by first-rate minds on the highest intellectual level" (pp. 15-16). While rejecting the dogmas of Methodism, Green sought to save its ethical teaching and above all its "philanthropic humanitarianism" by turning to Idealism. Thus a priori philosophy was to provide "the secure base on which to build a new structure of belief embodying the essentials of Christianity" (pp. 310, 180). This "unassailable foundation" would withstand any further advances in empirical knowledge. Methodism with its emphasis on individual responsibility, social activism, voluntarism, and reform was wed to Idealism with its concepts of the progressive unfolding of history and the selfrealization of the individual. Self-realization was to mean the active life of the good citizen working toward the betterment of his society. "In politics as in theology, the doctrine of citizenship and reform developed by Green can best be understood as a surrogate faith appealing to a transitional generation" (p. 19).

But Idealist philosophy soon proved to be radically insufficient. It became evident that Green's a priori arguments were certainly not the necessary conclusions of any thinking man. Moreover, two apparently opposing tendencies quickly added to the decline of Idealism. On the one hand, the statism latent in Idealism began to assert itself, especially in Bosanquet, Green's own common sense and his commitment to freedom and voluntarism had protected him from taking the steps which some of his (perhaps more consistent) followers could not resist. On the other hand, the principle of voluntarism itself was undermined, just as was the Liberal party, by the rise of the Labor party and Labor's increasing demands for positive governmental action. Indeed, Richter maintains persuasively that Green was certainly not a precursor of the modern welfare state.

Many of the merits and demerits of Richter's study may be traced to his methodological approach. His study is designed to demonstrate the usefulness of studying political and social thought by combining the method of sociology of knowledge with that of the history of ideas. The former approach "is highly suggestive" but "contains many discrepant hypotheses not always supported by convincing evidence," while the latter approach "tends in practice to be meticulous in detail, but insignificant and mechanical in general theory" (p. 10). Just as Green must be admired for seeking to steer between the Charybdis of moral relativism and the Scylla of dogmatism so frequently associated with Idealism, Richter must be admired for his endeavor to combine two such different and demanding methods. Yet it cannot be said that he has always avoided their dangers nor succeeded in thoroughly harmonizing them. Richter claims that the "emphasis" of his "book falls, not upon what was personal, striking or eccentric about its subject, but upon those patterns of piety, of family and social life, of politics, education and voluntary association which formed Green and others like him." But in the sequel he insists that he sought "to read with care all of Green's texts; to accept provisionally the meaningfulness of his problems and the validity of his method" and only to turn to "non-intellectual considerations-sociological, economic, psychological . . . in certain instances" (pp. 9, 11). Accordingly, the chapters on Green's background tend to overgeneralize while those on his ideas tend to be "meticulous" and sometimes repetitious. Throughout it is difficult to know whether Richter is maintaining that Green consciously attempted to blend Idealism and Methodism or whether he was subconsciously reacting to the crisis of his time.

But whatever the limitations Richter's study nevertheless demands our attention for it is a significant contribution to the understanding of an important man and his times. Richter's orderly and intelligent presentation indicates a considerable mastery of some rather difficult material.—

James Steintrager, University of Texas.

Individualism, Collectivism and Political Power. By Ervin Laszlo. (Martinus Nijhoff: The Hague, 1963. Pp. 172. 19.80 guilders.)

This book is divided into two parts: (1) a philosophical analysis of "sociopolitical principles" and (2) a description and analysis of political power, as embodied in Democratic individualism and Communist collectivism. The subtitle, "A Relational Analysis of Ideological Conflict," suggests that Laszlo intended to show the interrelations between the social and political principles described in Part I, and the uses of political power in the individualist and collectivist systems covered in Part II. Laszlo identifies "theories built upon an ontology of being" with "the individualist idea of society"; and "theories built on the ontology of existence" with "the collectivist idea of society" (p. 28). This is as close as he comes to uniting the two parts of the book. This study falls short of its apparent intention in two ways. First, the two sections of the book are too separate and quite unrelated; there is almost no application of the principles described in Part I to the two basic political systems discussed in Part II. Second, the author is concerned in Part II almost entirely with "the impact of Soviet ideological collectivism on the evolution of contemporary political thought" (p. 151), and Democratic individualism is brought in only here and there and is used as a foil to describe and analyze Communist collectivism in theory and practice, rather than being given consideration in its own right. The author is aware that "institutionalized collectivism is a relatively novel phenomenon on the scene of civilization," and that "the tradition of all people has had more of an individualist than a collectivist content . . . " (p. 152). The title and structure suggest that this study is concerned with a comparison of these two basic systems in their struggle for supremacy. But almost the whole of Part II is concerned with the origins and development of Marxian Communism. and with the present status and appeal of Soviet ideological collectivism in theory and practice throughout the world.

Laszlo clearly states his intention and thesis in Part I: "Our intention is to deal merely with the cognitive processes which play a predominant role in the ontological evaluation of societal (and by implication, of general) reality, and which may thus be shown to have influenced the political thought of our contemporaries" (p. 20). "Our thesis is that there are two types of concepts ascribable to every apprehended object, resulting from two different modes of comprehending it" (p. 21). His main purpose—"to investigate the genesis and qualification of the patterns of ontological concepts"-is pursued from "the sceptical epistemological position of conceptual nominalism" (p. 21). In brief, the author is painfully aware of all the complex philosophical problems and practical difficulties confronting political science from the time of Locke to the view of the universe propounded by Einstein, which he accepts as his own. Unfortunately, this leads him to adopt an esoteric, technical, complex and needlessly abstract philosophical vocabulary, centered in "epistemology" and "ontological concepts." Together with his discursive style, this diction makes much of the first section of his book a series of semantic problems in abstract and wordy phrases, which at their worst are almost meaningless cant and jibberish. Much of Part I reads like a satirical parody of modern political theory written in unreadable doublethink. By "empirical factors of differentiation among social strata" (p. 146), the author means private property. Surely sentences such as the following could have been written in more concrete and concise language: "Finally collectivist states have shown a tendency to explicate their ontological principle by defining a particular set of heuristically functioning theoretical concepts serving to reinterpret concepts of being in the light of a dominant ontology of existence" (p. 52). This example can be matched by others on almost every page of Part I. Almost the only clear writing in the first section is the comparison between Fascism and Communism, and the description of totalitarian dictatorship (pp. 52-56).

In Part II a remarkable change is evident in the style of the book. The author's description and analysis of the historical origins and development of the structure of Communist ideology is concise and clear. He presents an excellent summary of how Marx and Engels adapted Feuerbach's materialism and Hegel's philosophy and dialectics. He subjects Communist dialectics and its institutionalized theory to a very perceptive analysis. His chapter on popular political thought under Communism is especially well done. The chapter on national revisionism includes perhaps the best account to date of the nature and spirit of the Hungarian revolt of October, 1956, from the viewpoint of non-Soviet Marxism. Laszlo's thesis is that the revolt was not for "freedom" as understood in Western constitutional Democracy, but for "freedom" under Hungarian national socialism; that it "was not counter to the collectivist principles of Communism" (p. 134), but only against Russian dominance of Hungarian national unity (pp. 130-136). The thesis is too simple, but if the rest of the book were as well written as this section even sceptical readers would find much of value for understanding and insight.—Peter J. STANLIS, University of Detroit.

In Search of Wealth and Power: Yen Fu and the West. By Benjamin Schwartz. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1964. Pp. xx, 298. $5.95.)

More than a decade ago Professors John Fairbank and Ssu-yu Teng wrote in a pioneering volume (China's Response to the West), "the field of modern Chinese intellectual history has lain fallow far too long." Until "trained and competent Asian and Western scholars... spend long periods of time in translation and research... we shall never know what has really happened in China since the opening to the West."

They might have added the responsibility for penetrating thought and reflection to the burdens of translation and research. All these functions have combined to produce the brilliant study under review in which Mr. Schwartz, a Harvard colleague of Professor Fairbank's, opens a broad new vista into "what really happened" as China confronted and reacted to Western ideas. In the process he has both enlightened and challenged us with the highest standards of scholarship in this field. Plainly only a scholar with a command of the relevant Chinese literature plus a seasoned knowledge of Western philosophic thought could have undertaken so successfully a comparative analysis of Eastern and Western intellection.

Students of 19th century European liberalism will find this as absorbing a study as will those of modern Chinese thought and social development. Yen Fu's life-long struggle to reassess central Chinese issues in the light of Western thought holds a mirror to still unresolved questions in the West regarding the real roots of liberalism and the causal relations between liberalism and modernization.

The primary focus, however, is upon the relation between these Western speculations and the questions that dominated Yen Fu's consciousness: What was the secret of Western wealth and power? What did the West have that China lacked? Where did the crucial difference between the two lie?

Why Yen Fu and why these particular questions? Professor Schwartz traces the crystallizing of these concerns in late 19th century China as Confucian, pseudo-Legalist, and inchoate nationalist sentiments coalesced in a new amalgam of ideas among the literati. These notions were a response partly to rising domestic forces, more directly to impinging Western and Japanese power. Thoughtful Chinese were inclined, by the turn of the 20th century, to acknowledge that wealth and power were no longer inconsistent with traditional values. Indeed, power was indispensable to their perpetuation. But how were these dynamic forces in their alien Western forms to be analyzed and understood, much less appropriated? Following the humiliation of 1894-95 these questions stood somewhere near the forefront of the Chinese mind.

Yen Fu emerged, by a set of fortuitous circumstances, as one of the first literati to penetrate to the core of these questions. With a rare combination of classical training and the English language, acquired at the Foochow School of Navigation, he was sent to England (1877) for advanced naval training. But naval science was already incidental to his greater concern over the spectre of China's weakness in the face of Western aggressive dynamism and overwhelming vitality. His two years in England set the direction of his career as essayist, translator, and publicist extraordinary. Convinced, now, that the secret of Western wealth and power lay hidden in the writings of English social philosophers, he undertook a program of prodigious investigation and, later, translation. Herbert Spencer-whose A Study of Sociology he read in 1881-became his intellectual lodestar. He went on to Adam Smith, Montesquieu, Huxley, John Stuart Mill, and others, translating major works of each and interlarding them with copious commentary. With Professor Schwartz' complete command of this literature and his obvious appreciation of philosophic subtleties in both the Eastern and Western traditions, he takes us step by step through Yen's relentless search for the key to Western strength. His reflections center, of course, on social Darwinism, individualism, equality of opportunity, scientific social engineering, the essence of freedom-all considered as instrumental values contributing to the overarching Western achievement, in Yen's view, of releasing vast human intellectual and physical energy. Chinese cultural norms, by contrast, had never stirred the "energy of faculty" and China would remain weak, Yen concluded, until it learned to trigger these dormant vitalities. The great sages "shrank back from the actualization of men's potentialities, settling for peace, harmony, and order on a low level of human achievement." They had "succeeded in their attempt to freeze the process of evolution at a given stage of social equilibrium." Here, in the last analysis, was the crux of the difference between East and West.

Professor Schwartz describes the changing cast of Yen's declining years (to the end he was excluded from the inner circle of governmental authority) and concludes with a penetrating comment on the wider implications of his findings. The enduring influence of Yen's career on his own and the succeeding generation will have to be traced in other studies. Such studies and all future work in modern Chinese intellectual history, however, will be deeply indebted to Professor Schwartz for so searching and lucid an analysis of this crucially important bridge-figure standing between the intellectual gropings of the expiring Ch'ing on the one hand and British liberalism on the other.

Professor Louis Hartz comments in the Introduction on the significance of this work for students of modern Western political and social thought.—Melville T. Kennedy, Jr., Bryn Mawr College.

A Dictionary of the Social Sciences. Ed. by Julius Gould and William L. Kolb. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1964. Pp. xvi, 761.)

A one-volume dictionary emphasizing concepts, with contributions by such scholars as Samuel Finer, Wilfrid Harrison, Robert McKenzie, Edward Banfield, David Easton, Clyde Kluckhohn, Theodore Newcomb, and David Truman.

Cumulative Index to the American Political Science Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963. Ed. by Kenneth Janda. (Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1964. Pp. xxii, 225. $5.00.)

An application of the "KWIC" (key-word-incontext) indexing method to the articles published in this Review since its origin.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

JUDITH N. SHKLAR

Harvard University

Akzin, Benjamin. Die Struktur von Staat und Recht. Der Staat. No. 3, 1964.

Aschenbrenner, Karl. The Roots of Conflict and Action. Inquiry. Autumn, 1964.

Barry, B. M. et al. Symposium: "Public Interest." The Aristotelian Society. Supplementary Volume XXXVIII. 1964.

Bernstein, R. J. Professor Hart on Rules of Obligation. Mind. October, 1964.

Blackham, H. J. Modern Humanism. Journal of World History. No. 1, 1964.

Brock, Werner, Karl Jaspers and Existentialism. German Life and Letters. July, 1964.

Caldwell, L. K. Biopolitics: Science, Ethics and Public Policy. The Yale Review. Autumn, 1964. Cohen, Julius. The Outer Edge of Legal Criticism. 18 Rutgers Law Review, 1964.

Edinger, L. J. Political Science and Political Biography (II): Reflections on the Study of

Leadership. The Journal of Politics. August, 1964 Fougeyrollas, Pierre. Dal declino delle ideologie all' avento di una novella coscienza politica. Civitas. July-August, 1964.

Freund, Julien and Luthy, Herbert. Controverse sur Max Weber. Preuves. September, 1964.

Galtung, Johan. The Balance of Power and the Problem of Perception. Inquiry. Autumn, 1964.

Greenleaf, W. H. The Thomasian Tradition and the Theory of Absolute Monarchy. The English Historical Review. October, 1964.

Hart, D. K. Saint-Simon and the Role of the Elite. The Western Political Quarterly. September, 1964.

Haskar, Vinit. Aristotle and the Punishment of Psychopaths. Philosophy. October, 1964.

F. A. Hayek. The Legal and Political Philosophy of David Hume. Il Politico. December, 1963.
Jaeger, George and Selznick, Philip. A Normative Theory of Culture. American Sociological Review. October, 1964.

James, Alan. Power Politics. Political Studies. October, 1964.

Johnson, H. C. The Concept of Bureaucracy in Cameralism. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1964.

Kearney, H. F. Puritanism, Capitalism and the Scientific Revolution. Past and Present. July, 1964.

Kettler, David. Montesquieu on Love: Notes on the Persian Letters. American Political Science Review, September, 1964.

Kohak, Erazim. T. G. Masaryk's Revision of Marxism. Journal of the History of Ideas. October-December, 1964.

Lukács, Georg, Sozialistischer Realismus heute. Neue Rundschau. No. 3, 1964.

Macpherson, C. B. Post-Liberal Democracy. The Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1964.

Mann, Golo. Max Weber als Politiker. Neue Rundschau, No. 3, 1964.

O'Neill, John. The Concept of Estrangement in the Early and Later Writings of Karl Marx. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. September, 1964.

Puzzo, D. A. Racism and the Western Tradition. Journal of the History of Ideas. October-December, 1964.

Ratnam, K. J. Charisma and Political Leadership. Political Studies. October, 1964.

Rueger, Zofia. Gerson and the Right of Resistance (1642-1644). Journal of the History of Ideas. October-December, 1964.

Sharp, Gene. Ethics and Responsibility in Politics. Inquiry. Autumn, 1964.

Smith, D. G. Pragmatism and Group Theory of Politics. American Political Science Review. September, 1964.

Specht, Rainer. Über Descartes' politische Ansichten. Der Staat. No. 3, 1964.

Stadler, P. Wirtschaftskrise und Revolution bei Marx und Engels. Historische Zeitschrift. August, 1964.

Thaver, H. S. Plato: The Theory and Language of Function. The Philosophical Quarterly. October, Thompson, S. M. The Authority of Law. Ethics. October, 1964.

Wasserstrom, Richard et al. Symposium: Human Rights. The Journal of Philosophy. October, 29, 1964.

Wilson, A. M. The Development and Scope of Diderot's Political Thought. Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century. XXIV/XXVII: 1963.

Winch, Peter. Understanding a Primitive Society. American Philosophical Quarterly. October, 1964.

Zetterbaum, Marvin. Tocqueville: Neutrality and the Use of History. American Political Science Review. September, 1964

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES*

S. SIDNEY ULMER University of Kentucky

45-51.

Group Behavior

Bartos, O. J. (45) A Model of Negotiation and the Recency Effect, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (September 1964) pp. 311-326.

Cloyd, J. S. (43) Functional Differentiation and the Structure of Informal Groups, The Sociological Quarterly, Vol. 5 #3 (Summer 1964) pp. 243-

Edmonds, V. H. (37) Logical Error as a Function of Group Concensus: An Experimental Study of the Effect of Erroneous Group Concensus Upon Logical Judgments of Graduate Students, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #1 (October 1964) pp. 33-38.

Emerson, R. M. (44) Power-Dependence Rela-

(September 1964) pp. 282-298.

Relations, Vol. 17 #3 (August 1964) pp. 221-225. Reitan, H. T., Shaw, M. E. (28) Group Membership, Sex Composition of the Group, and Conformity Behavior. The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, First Half, (October 1964) pp.

Sampson, E. E. (8), Brandon, A. C. The Effects of Role and Opinion Deviation on Small Group Behavior, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (September 1964) pp. 261-281.

Subsequent Conformity. Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (September 1964) pp. 245-260. King, M. G. (18) Structural Balance, Tension, and Segregation in a University Group, Human Status Mobility and Reactions to Deviance and tions: Two Experiments, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3

Katz, E. (6), Libby, W. L. Jr., Shodtbeck, F. L.

* The number in parentheses following the name of each author indicates institutional affiliation which may be determined by reference to the institutional list below.

Schubert, Glendon A. (1) The Power of Organized Minorities in a Small Group Administrative Science Quarterly, Vol. 9 #2 (September 1964) pp. 133-153.

Research Methods

Alker, H. R. Jr. (12) Russett, B. M. On Measuring Inequality, Behavioral Science, Vol. 9 #3 (July 1964) pp. 207-218.

Capecchi, V. Une Methode de Classification fondee sur l'entropie, Revue Française de Sociologie, Vol. 5 #3 (Juillet-Septembre 1964) pp. 290-306.

Danzger, M. H. (9) Community Power Structure: Problems and Continuities, American Sociological Review, Vol. 29 #5 (October 1964) pp. 707-717.

Gold, D. (10) Some Comments on "The Empirical Classification of Formal Groups," American Sociological Review, Vol. 29 #5 (October 1964) pp. 736-739.

Harris, C. C. Jr. (13) A Scientific Method of Districting, Behavioral Science Vol. 9 #3 (July 1964) pp. 219-225.

Humphreys, L. G. (3) Number of Cases and Number of Factors: An Example Where N is Very Large, *Educational and Psychological Measure*ment, Vol. 24 #3 (Fall 1964) pp. 457-466.

Lieberson, Stanley (11) Limitations in the Application of Non-Parametric Coefficients of Correlation, American Sociological Review, Vol. 29 #5 (October 1964) pp. 744-746.

McQuitty, L. L. (1) Capabilities and Improvements of Linkage Analysis as a Clustering Method. Educational and Psychological Measurement, Vol. 24 #3 (Fall 1964) pp. 441–456.

Somers, R. H. (49) Simple Measures of Association for the Triple Dichotomy, Journal of the Royal Statistical Society, Vol. 127, Part 3 (1964) pp. 409-415.

Williams, J. A. Jr. (46) Interviewer-Respondent Interaction: A study of Bias in the Information Interview, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (September 1964) pp. 338-352.

Interpersonal Influence

Bonjean, C. M. (17) Class, Status, and Power Reputation, Sociology and Social Research, Vol 49 #1 (October 1964) pp. 69-75.

Clignet, R. P. (6), Foster, P., Potential Elites in Ghana and the Ivory Coast: A Preliminary Comparison, The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #3 (November 1964) pp. 349-362.

DuBrin, A. J. Trait and Interpersonal Self Descriptions of Leaders and Non-Leaders in an Industrial Setting, *Journal of Industrial Psychol*ogy, Vol. 2 #2 (June 1964) pp. 51-55.

Friedland, W. H. (36) For a Sociological Concept of Charisma, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #1 (October 1964) pp. 18-26.

Schmitt, D. R. (11), The Invocation of Moral Obligation, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (September 1964) pp. 299-310.

Speroff, B. J. (6) The Identification of Hidden Sociometric Leaders, Group Psychoterapy, Vol. 17 #2-3 (June-September 1964) pp. 96-103.

Culture and Institutions

Gilbert, E. J. (32), Schatz, J. A., An Ill-Conceived Proposal for Apportionment of the U. S. House of Representatives, Operations Research, Vol. 12 #5, (September-October, 1964) pp. 768-773.

Glenn, N. D. (17) The Relative Size of the Negro Population and Negro Occupational Status, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #1 (October, 1964) pp. 42-49.

Patterson, S. C. (39) Inter-Generational Occupational Mobility and Legislative Voting Behavior, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #1 (October 1964), pp. 90-93.

Stark, R. (8), Class, Radicalism and Religious Involvement in Great Britain, American Sociological Review, Vol. 29 #5 (October, 1964) pp. 698-706.

Voting

Coleman, J. (5), Heau, E., Peabody, R., Rigsby, L. Computers and Election Analysis: The New York Times Project, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #3 (Fall 1964) pp. 418-446.

Opinions and Attitudes

Byrne, D. (17), McGraw, C. Interpersonal Attraction Toward Negroes, Human Relations, Vol. 17 #3 (August 1964) pp. 201-213.

Choo, T. (29) Communicator Credibility and Communication Discrepancy as Determinants of Opinion Change, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64 First Half (October 1964) pp. 65-74.

Festinger, L. (15) Behavioral Support for Opinion Change, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #3 (Fall 1964) pp. 404-417.

Grafton, T. H. (38) An Attitude Scale on Accepting Negro Students, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #1 (October 1964) pp. 38-41.

Hodge, R. W., Siegel, P. M., Rossi, P. H., Occupational Prestige in the United States, 1925-63, The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #3. (November 1964) pp. 286-302.

Rim, Y. (19), Social Attitudes and Risk Taking, Human Relations, Vol. 17 #3 (August 1964) pp. 259-265.

Runciman, W. G. 'Embourgeoisment', Self-Rated Class and Party Preference, The Sociological Review, Vol. 12 #2 (New Series) (July 1964) pp. 137-154.

Schuman, H. (47), Harding, J. Prejudice and the Norm of Rationality, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (Sept. 1964) pp. 353-371.

Cognitive Processes and Individual Decision Making

Clifford, C. (4), Cohn. T. S., The Relationship Between Leadership and Personality Attributes Perceived by Followers, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, First Half (October 1964) pp. 57-64.

Cole, M. (15), Schneider, A. Amount of Reward and Information in a two-person Game. Canadian Journal of Psychology, Vol 18 #3 (September 1964) pp. 197-208.

Komorita, S. S. (4) A Model for Decision-Making Under Risk, The American Journal of Psychology, Vol. 77 #3 (September 1964) pp. 429-436.

Kuethe, J. L. (5), Levenson, B., Conceptions of Organizational Worth The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #3 (November 1964) pp. 342-348.

Rodwan, A. S. (3), Hake, H. W. The Discriminant Function as a Model for Perception, The American Journal of Psychology, Vol. 77 #3 (September 1964) pp. 380-392.

Sabath, G. (30) The Effect of Disruption and Individual Status on Person Perception and Group Attraction, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64 First Half, (October 1964) pp. 119–130.

Shrauger, S. (35), Altrocchi, J. The Personality of the Perceiver as a Factor in Person Perception, Psychological Bulletin, Vol. 62 #5 (November 1964) pp. 289-308.

Sigel, R. S. (4) Effect of Partisanship on the Perception of Political Candidates, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28, #3 (Fall 1964) pp. 483-496.

Sutton-Smith, B. (24). Roberts, J. M. Rubrics of Competitive Behavior, The Journal of Genetic Psychology, Vol. 105, First Half, (September 1964) pp. 13-37.

Motivation and Personality

Ball, D. W. (40) Covert Political Rebellion as Ressentiment, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #1 (October 1964) pp. 93-101.

Bonney, M. E. (23) Some Correlates of a Social Definition of Normal Personality, Journal of Clinical Psychology, Vol. 20 #4 (October 1964) pp. 415–422.

Cróckett, H. J. Jr., (42) Social Class, Education, and Motive to Achieve in Differential Occupational Mobility, The Sociological Quarterly, Vol. 5 #3 (Summer 1964) pp. 231-242.

Evans, G. (21) Effect of Unilateral Promise and Value of Rewards Upon Cooperation and Trust, Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 69 #5 (November 1964) pp. 587-590.

Eysenck, H. J. (14) Principles and Methods of Personality Description, Classification and Diagnosis, The British Journal of Psychology, Vol. 55, Part 3 (August 1964) pp. 284–294.

Friedlander, F. (2), Walton, E. Positive and Negative Motivations Toward Work, Administrative Science Quarterly, Vol. 9 #2 (September 1964) pp. 194-207.

Gladstone, R. (27), Gupta, G. C., Dogmatism and the Gulf Hypothesis, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, First Half, (October 1964) pp. 21–26.

Goldstein, M. J. (22) Perceptual Reactions to Threat Under Varying Conditions of Measurement. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 69 #5 (November 1964) pp. 563-567.

Leventhal, H. (12), Jacobs, R. L., Kridirka, N. Z., Authoritarianism, Ideology, and Political Candidate Choice, Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 69 #5 (November 1964) pp. 539-549.

McDavid, J. W. Personality Correlates of Two Kinds of Conforming Behavior, *Journal of Per*sonality, Vol. 32 #3 (September 1964) pp. 420-435.

Quinney, R. (48) Political Conservatism, Alienation, and Fatalism: Contingencies of Social Status and Religious Fundamentalism, Sociometry, Vol. 27 #3 (September 1964) pp. 372-381.

Rankin, R. E. (25), Quarrick, E. A., Personality and Attitude Toward a Political Event, Journal of Individual Psychology, Vol. 20 #2 (November 1964) pp. 189-193.

Vaughn, G. M. (26) The Trans-Situational Aspect of Conforming Behavior, Journal of Personality, Vol. 32 #3 (September 1964) pp. 335-354.

Weatherley, D. (31) Some Personality Correlates of Authoritarianism, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, First Half (October 1964) pp. 161-167.

Key to Institutions Listed in Bibliography

- 1. Michigan State University
- 2. United States Naval Ordinance Station, China Lake, California
- 3. University of Illinois
- 4. Wayne State University
- 5. Johns Hopkins University
- 6. University of Chicago
- 8. University of California, Berkeley
- 9. Queens College, New York
- 10. University of California, Santa Barbara
- 11. University of Wisconsin
- 12. Yale University
- 13. University of California, Davis
- 14. University of London
- 15. Stanford University

- 17. University of Texas
- 18. Queen's University, Ontario
- 19. Technion, Israel Institute of Technology
- 21. Fort Hays Kansas State College
- 22. University of California, Los Angeles
- 23. North Texas State University
- 24. Bowling Green University
- 25. West Virginia University
- 26. Victoria University of Wellington
- 27. Oklahoma State University
- 28. University of Florida
- 29. Boston University
- Postgraduate Center for Psychotherapy, New York City
- 31. University of Colorado

- Sandia Laboratory, Albuquerque, New Mexico
- 35. Duke University
- 36. Cornell University
- 37. Florida State University
- 38. Mary Baldwin College
- 39. State University of Iowa
- 40. California Lutheran College
- 42. University of North Carolina
- 43. University of Nebraska
- 44. University of Cincinnati45. University of Hawaii
- 45. University of Hawan
- 46. University of Washington 47. Harvard University
- 48. University of Kentucky
- 49. University of Michigan

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

See How They Run: The Making of a Congressman. By Paul Allyn and Joseph Greene. (Philadelphia: Chilton Books, 1964. Pp. xv, 176. $4.50.)

Upon finishing this little book, the reader has the uncomfortable feeling that he has been hoodwinked. Surely See How They Run must be some kind of spoof-perhaps a satire on recent political novels like Convention. No serious effort could possibly be so bad. It must have been done tongue in cheek. The use of pseudonyms by the authors would tend to confirm this hypothesis. On the dust jacket, the reader is solemnly informed, "Like the characters in their book, Allyn and Greene are real, though their names are fictional," Yet somehow the gnawing suspicion persists that the authors are in earnest. The preachy pronouncements on congressional reform in the prologue lend credence to this idea. And further substantiation is provided by the thirty-two pages of appendices containing a brief history of the nominating process reprinted from a National Municipal League publication, excerpts from a Democratic Congressional Campaign Manual, and lengthy quotations from Wesberry v. Sanders (which has no discernible relevance since the story concerns electoral contests wholly within a single congressional district).

If the authors are playing it straight—as most of the evidence seems to indicate—they are the most unintentionally hilarious bunglers outside of the fictional character, Police Inspector Jacques Clouseau, so deftly portrayed by Peter Sellers in A Shot in the Dark. Indeed, the book reads as if written by the good inspector himself. Pompous phrases with vaguely ominous overtones and trite metaphors abound. In the prefatory materials, every effort is made to create an atmosphere of suspense, as this excerpt from the jacket blurb exemplifies:

In real life, as in this book, the election of a Congressman is the final scene—the anticlimax, in fact—of a suspenseful drama that begins long before Election Day. It is a drama with a large supporting cast, including not only the voters, but also the Congressman-makers, whose work is largely done behind the scenes. This book takes you backstage to show you how this drama is produced.

Then the authors promptly proceed (on the second page of the prologue) to rob their "real-life drama" of any suspense whatsoever by divulging which candidate wins the congressional primary subsequently depicted.

Mere description is inadequate to convey the style in which this book is written. It must be savored to be fully appreciated, as in this representative passage:

Then the telephones jangle again and, as in a kaleidoscope, the room is alive with motion. Always there is tension; waiting for a phone to ring, waiting for the message, waiting for another ring.

No one feels the tension more than Walt Morin. Twenty-eight years old and an attorney for four years, he wore his patience and his shoe leather thin for the party, doing canvasses, distributing campaign literature, chauffeuring candidates and their aides, even going out for coffee and crullers to nourish the campaign strategists. (p. 5.)

Characterizing the substance of this book is less difficult. As the authors avow at the outset, "What you are about to read is not a novel." (p. ix.) Actually, it is a greatly elongated version of the "Mr. Smith Runs for Congress" mythical case study which is a standard ingredient of the chapter on political campaigns in most introductory textbooks on American government.

Firmly subscribing to the principle that any appraisal should be balanced, I searched every page for a redeeming feature. This proved to be a futile quest. But it did afford a plausible explanation of why the authors chose to remain anonymous: to protect their reputations as writers.— KENNETH KOFMEHL, Purdue University.

Voting Patterns in a Local Election. By Alvin Boskoff and Harmon Zeigler. (Philadelphia and New York: Lippincott. 1964. Pp. 153. n.p.)

The local election examined is a bond issue election in Georgia's DeKalb County, a part of the Atlanta metropolitan area. Until recently a predominantly rural county, DeKalb has more than doubled its population since 1950. Moreover, the modern world has invaded the county in the form of considerable industrial growth. Yet it is no mere bedroom suburb. Many of its residents are employed in the county, and thousands of Atlanta residents "commute" to work in DeKalb.

This is a study of voting behavior in the tradition of the studies of Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and the Michigan Survey Research Center. The authors call attention to the declining emphasis on ecological determinism in studies of presidential voting since socio-economic status may be less determinative of voter choice in some presidential elections than others. In recent studies of presidential elections, greater stress has been placed on the psychological basis of group or individual voting decisions, but this psychological emphasis has not yet appeared in studies of local elections. The authors seek to bring this approach to the study of a local election.

The authors chose an election in which the voters supported by a two-to-one majority a bond issue to finance a number of services which are standard for a rapidly urbanizing county, e.g., an incinerator plant, expanded library service, more fire stations, parks, water mains, sewers, and roads. The authors classify voting districts into high and low support districts, then subdivide each category into urban, suburban, and rural. Within two weeks after the election, interviews were conducted in each of these twelve voting districts with a systematic sample of respondents chosen from among persons who had actually voted. The total number of persons interviewed in DeKalb County was 136.

Income, perceived socio-economic status, and the 40-60 year age bracket appear to be the factors most closely associated with support or rejection of the bond issue. In terms of type of precinct, the greater support came from the suburban and urban areas, especially the suburban areas, and the greatest opposition came from the low-income, rural fringe. When asked their chief reason for supporting the bond issue, the "yes" voters referred to "progress" or asserted the need for a particular expanded public service. Opponents either denied the need for the services or registered a hostile attitude toward county government, often making dark references to graft.

Although support for the bond issue was highest among a socially homogeneous group of upperincome suburbanites, the authors insist that status did not directly effect the voting decision. Rather they feel that they have isolated

...strong and pervasive differences in outlook between two categories of county residents. On the one hand was found a willingness to face, and finance some solutions to, problems of growth and expanded service. This attitude is most clearly found in residents of ... suburban areas, in middle and high income categories, among professionels, large proprietors and managers, among relatively recent residents, and among persons forty to sixty years of age. An opposing viewpoint approaches county government ... as a necessary evil that should neither be changed nor trusted. This attitude stems fundamentally from an inability to accept the dramatic changes fostered by increasing industrialization, population expansion, and the spread of urban values. Consequently, its adherents have understandable apprehensions about the future and a reluctance to "invest" in a world they have not made and do not admire. (pp. 72-73)

"Civic responsibility" is the term applied to this willingness to face and finance solutions to the county's problems. This attitude was not inculcated by a propaganda campaign; communications could not alter voters' basic predispositions. Possibly this civic responsibility can be traced to the socialization process which transmits conceptions of community needs to particular social groups. The authors conclude cautiously that other studies would be necessary to reach a firm conclusion that civic responsibility could not emerge from a different kind of status group.—Donald S. Strong, University of Alabama.

Congress: The Sapless Branch. By Senator Joseph S. Clark. (New York: Harper and Row, 1964. Pp. xviii, 268. $4.95.)

It is heartening to note that members of the United States Congress suddenly have discovered the book-reading public. As in many other things, the late John F. Kennedy led the way. His Profiles in Courage was so successful-whether judged in literary, financial, or political terms-that many of his former colleagues on "The Hill" have been emboldened to try their hands, and the hands of their staff assistants, at writing books. A recent count by the New York Times Book Review found Senators Clark, Dodd, Douglas, Ervin, Fulbright, Goldwater, Hartke, Humphrey, Jackson, Javits, Keating, Kefauver, McCarthy, Muskie, Mundt, Pastore, Proxmire, Tower and Young either awaiting their first royalty checks or putting the final touches on book manuscripts. Members of the House, while fittingly less prolix than Senators, include quite a number of actual or fledgling authors: the late Clem Miller, John Brademas, Fred Smith, Jim Wright and others. "Publish or perish" seems to be becoming a rule of congressional as well as academic life.

Judging by Senator Joseph S. Clark's Congress: The Sapless Branch this extraordinary development is not likely to result in many books of value to political scientists. Perhaps it is unfair to judge this book, and those to follow, by such a standard: they are being written for a general, not a professional, audience. But it would be even more unfair to the readers of this Review to apply any other measure of value.

Senator Clark's book is a mixture of autobiography, institutional history, and polemics. On the first count, the book is a failure. Perhaps no incumbent politican should be expected to bare his soul to the world—and thereby to his constituents and future political rivals. But Senator Clark carries prudence to the point where almost nothing is revealed about Joseph S. Clark, the man. Political scientists interested in the recruitment and motivation of legislators will have to look elsewhere for data. Senator Clark is justly famous as a Senate maverick, but the book tells us nothing about why the chamber's methods for socializing new members did not work in his case.

As history, the book is trivial. We are told, in all seriousness, that "the assassination of President Garfield by a disappointed job holder forced Congressional action" on civil service reform. Over twenty years of history are dismissed with the words "Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler, Fillmore, Pierce and Buchanan abode their destined hours and went their way." We are informed that "... the so-called Jazz Age produced nothing from Congress save two really bad tariffs, a long inconclusive squabble over farm legislation and a long-delayed investigation of the Teapot Dome Scandals, as a result of which former Senator Albert B. Fall went to jail. . . . " These thumbnail clichés add little to anyone's historical perspective.

But Senator Clark's main objective is to argue the case for Congressional reform. Both his critique of Congress as it now operates and his prescriptions for it ills are familiar. Senator Clark pays our profession the ultimate compliment; he seems to have read what we have written on congressional reform and to have adopted much of it as his own. The Congress is not sufficiently responsive to the "will of the majority"; it is controlled by an "irresponsible," conservative, bi-partisan "Establishment"; it is a stumbling block to Presidents seeking to implement "progressive" national policies. Disciplined, programmatic, national parties; an end to the filibuster; a dilution of the seniority system; a revamped Rules Committee; a large increase in presidential influence over Congress; these and other well-worn reforms are needed if Congress is to adapt to the exigencies of the twentieth century.

This is not the place for a full scale discussion of the merits of this package of reforms. In recent years, however, many political scientists have become disenchanted with these one-time articles of faith. Senator Clark chooses to ignore this new mood in the scholarly literature on Congress. But the record of the 88th Congress is harder to overlook. During two years, the creaky and juiceless old branch on Capitol Hill has written an historic Civil Rights Act, a nuclear test ban treaty, a college construction act, land conservation and wilderness bills, a mass transit act, and an antipoverty program into the statute books. Viewed in the light of these major legislative accomplishments and the change in professional opinion, Senator Clark's charges and proposals seem strangely outdated.

But perhaps the fault is as much ours as his. While disillusionment with old "solutions" is rife among us, few political scientists are willing to embrace the congressional status quo. As a profession, we need to supply Senator Clark with new and better ammunition.—Donald R. Matthews, Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences.

The Democrat's Dilemma. By Philip M. Crane. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1964. Pp. xiv, 376, $4.95.)

The implicit thesis of this book is that a small band of dedicated persons have captured control of the Democratic party. The overt thesis is that ideas first popularized by the Fabian Society in Great Britain and the Intercollegiate Socialist Society in the United States have become the new orthodoxy.

Either of these propositions would require better marshaled evidence than Mr. Crane presents before they could be fully accepted. He has written a history of socialist thought which barely mentions Karl Marx. He has written an account of the Democratic party which ignores the South except for a suggestion that C.O.P.E. is about to become the dominant political force in that region. His characterization of his protagonists is usually limited to hints that they are untrustworthy. (His total description of Graham Wallas: "Wallas was one of the most intemperate of the lot in his attitude toward religion. He left Highgate School, where he had been teaching, after refusing to lead the boys to chapel.") Mr. Crane often avoids even a hint of a consecutive time base, treating as one "simultaneous" event a number of occurrences which vary in significant respects. On pages 136 and 137, for example, he moves from 1927 to 1929 to 1925 to 1946 to 1948 to 1947 to 1955 to 1959 to 1960 to 1953 to 1960 to 1948 to 1925. And he reintroduces essentially the same data in slightly different guises in chapter after chapter.

Nonetheless, The Democrat's Dilemma is important to political scientists. Mr. Crane has gathered considerable information about what the late V. O. Key called "a partisan cluster of interest groups." He discusses many organizations associated with the liberal-trade union coalition which constitutes the left wing of the Democratic party: the A.D.A., the Fund for the Republic, the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, the Rand School of Social Science, the New School for Social Research, the A.F.L.-C.I.O., C.O.P.E., the I.L.G.W.U., and Group Research, Incorporated. Mr. Crane is an historian, and apparently unfamiliar with David Truman's concept of overlapping membership or Lester Milbrath's use of communication networks to analyze the activities of lobbyists. The political scientist, however, will find many hints of ways in which these concepts can be applied. Certainly the massive political activity of labor unions is one of the most important features of the current American political scene. They have some 4,000 publications of their own, and spent $2,278,000 on the 1960 election. We do need to know more about their political Another reason for the importance of this book is that it typifies feelings which had important political consequences in 1964. Philip Crane is a militant young conservative. He has a firm commitment to "the free enterprise system, national sovereignty, republican government, individual liberty, and natural rights." The Democrat's Dilemma apparently was written to sound an alarm about what he and his colleagues regard as a perilous threat to these values. It was industry resulting from such passionate belief which enabled militant conservatives to gain control of the Republican party. Hence a careful examination of their attitudes deserves a high place on the agenda of political science.—John H. Kessel, University of Washington.

Lawyers in Politics: A Study in Professional Convergence. By Heinz Eulau and John D. Sprague. (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1964, pp. xii, 164, $1.95.)

Though the disciplines of Law and Political Science are old partners with overlapping interests, the roles of lawyers and bar groups in the political process have never been subjected to adequate empirical or theoretical analysis. Happily, this void in the literature is being filled and this volume represents an important—though modest—step in that direction. Professors Eulau and Sprague are concerned generally with the "consequences of a professional group's presence for the functioning of a political system." Using interviews carried out for The Legislative System project, the authors present some very interesting data on the comparative backgrounds and role perceptions of lawyers and non-lawyers in the legislatures of New Jersey, Tennessee, Ohio, and California.

They conclude that despite the numerical dominance of lawyers among occupational groups represented in these legislatures, lawyer-legislators do not differ significantly from non-lawyer-legislators in their perceptions of the legislative-political role or (as has been shown in other studies) in their actual role behavior. Where lawyers do seem to differ from non-lawyers in the legislative setting are in those few roles which emphasize lawyers' pre-political occupational skills and experiences. Or to put it differently, only where lawyer-legislators are recognized as such, rather than simply as legislators, can their perceptions and behavior be differentiated.

The strength and utility of this volume lies in the clear and cogent manner in which the information is presented. Though limited in scope and by the fact that they were originally collected for other purposes, the data shed new light on the potential influence of occupation on legislative role behavior. Furthermore, they should prove to be a viable stimulus to further hypothesis testing.

But perhaps even more interesting than these basic findings—and certainly likely to be more controversial—is the authors' attempt to generalize from their data to a middle range theory of the relationship between law and politics. If the road they traverse is the correct one, presumably it will also lead to explanations of other occupational impacts on legislative behavior.

Professors Eulau and Sprague accept the notion that the polity constitutes "an autonomous system of role relationships" which, in turn, makes for values and styles of behavior which distinguish the political from other social systems. And they further accept the influence of the political culture in socializing all practitioners regardless of background. But since they assume as well that occupational background is a critical determinant of political behavior, they must create a theoretical formulation which will both accept this notion and still account for data which does not demonstrate its applicability to lawyer-legislators.

Briefly, they hypothesize the existence of a convergence, or isomorphism, between the professions of law and politics. Members of these professions are said to acquire similar skills and to play roles which can be described as functionally equivalent and potentially interchangeable. Law and politics "are distinct and structurally independent of each other as professions," but similar in role structure because of a continuous process of convergent development. An isomorphism between the two professions is said to exist when professional membership ceases to differentiate any important aspect of behavior. As this takes place, and as the two professions become increasingly integrated into the political system, "their members find opportunities that facilitate the actual interchange of institutional positions, careers, and professional roles more than is the case with other occupations."

The reason, therefore, why lawyer-legislators do not demonstrate identifiably distinct role perceptions is that the roles they must play as legislators do not differ greatly from those which they have learned as lawyers. Consequently, they bring few new perspectives and have little impact, as lawyers, on the legislative process.

It seems to me, however, that this theory is not entirely satisfactory for several reasons. It purports to explain similarities between lawyers and non-lawyer legislators by reference to a functional equivalence of occupational roles. But the data in the book do show some differences, and these are also explained, though in less theoretical terms (p. 121), on the basis of the prepolitical skills which lawyers bring with them to the legislature. This discrepancy could be rationalized by saying that it represents the difference between the perfect convergence of the model and the imperfect convergence in reality of law and politics. But this would detract, proportionately, from the explanatory power of the model.

A second criticism stems from this same discrepancy. In positing the functional (or role) equivalence of the professions of law and politics -which seems quite plausible—the authors may be overlooking the crucial fact that in many other respects the lawyer-politician is alienated from the dominant norms of the legal profession. There are, of course, very few available data on which to base a comparison of lawyers in and out of politics. But what information we have surely supports the notion that the gap between "professional" and "political" lawyers over adherence to the basic values and perspectives of the legal profession is important if not unbridgeable. Lawyers in a legislative setting are not likely to be prototypes of the "typical" lawyer; and within that setting there is a possibility that differences among lawyer legislators will be equally acute. If this is true, then the question of where these particular lawyers learned the appropriate roles becomes critical. It is possible that this learning came after they joined the legislature. If so, then they may be viewed in the same light as other occupational groups, whose members were socialized within the political culture.

The fact of the matter is that these data permit of several interpretations. The authors have chosen one, but others could and should be explored.—JOEL B. GROSSMAN, University of Wisconsin

The Cause is Mankind: A Liberal Program for Modern America. By The Hon. Hubert H.

HUMPHREY (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 172. $4.95.)

Having appeared in 1964, this volume must be taken as a campaign tract. Nevertheless, it tends to reveal the man who is now Vice-President of the United States. It was composed by the publisher from recent speeches by the candidate on a wide variety of subjects. There is no point in reviewing all the subjects. Since the book sets out to be a personal, popular exposition of modern liberalism, the interesting question is whether a consistent theme can be found in it, to which this reviewer's answer is affirmative.

The latent theme is that "liberalism" rightly has two aspects, intellectual and spiritual. Its proper intellectual method is flexible and eclectic in service of the moral content, which is liberation and enlargement of human potential. These two sides of liberalism are applied to a number of subjects, beginning with some textbook historical perspective in which two current academic emphases appear: that Americans have never before had as much freedom as widely generalized as they presently enjoy; and that the early, relatively easy advent of popular government in America helped produce a flexible liberalism free of rigid European doctrines. Thus implicitly are liberalism and democracy related.

In this volume some topics seem to be covered dutifully, others enthusiastically. The more dutiful subjects are "groupy" and distributive—the "mixed economy" and the roles of public intervention and welfare expenditures; largeness and smallness in economic enterprise; the history, contributions, and deserts of labor, agriculture, and business. The enthusiasm shows most clearly in discussion of substantive policy to promote human potential, rather than of political, social, and economic structure. In domestic policy, this means civil rights, of course-and 1964 was an appropriate time for recognition of Humphrey's national role in this issue since 1948. But the enthusiasm now runs well beyond civil rights and social welfare legislation to newer problems and policies: technology and manpower, public aid to education and training, where economic and benevolent aspects seem to meet in complementary ways. Similarly, in foreign policy Humphrey's emphasis is on ways in which it deals directly with people: economic and technical aid, Public Law 480, world trade, and the Peace Corps -again merging commercial and humanitarian concerns in an apparently conscious adaptation of older liberalisms. Individual education and training-public investment in human resources-is the link relied upon.

Those who know the author—as many political scientists do—will recognize his consistent interests in this speech material, including his legislative sponsorship of many of the current policies on which he comments. In doctrine, the equation of liberalism and popular democracy, the emphasis on positive freedom and the spiritual-even spirited-side of liberalism are also characteristic. This is not a mind happy or content with antinomies; the man would obviously rather broaden opportunities than scan priorities. If there is still room for crabbed, academic concern with issues of planned priority, public accountability and private control in federal subsidy of education, investment in human development, and "manpower policy," Humphrey is likely to leave these for academic analysis and, as politician, press for action. This seems a better division of labor than one in which professors are activists and politicians are conservatives; though fortunately a rough balance seems to hold in both fields. And political scientists who read this book or know its author may reflect that group pluralism, governmental structure, legal rules all surround the core principle of individual opportunity and development which, if a vague political standard by itself, is perhaps the least dispensable standard of any and is Hubert Humphrey's usual, ebullient, instinctive concern.—Charles E. Gilbert. Swarthmore College.

The American South in the 1960's. Edited by Avery Leiserson. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1964. Pp. xiii, 242. $6.00.)

This symposium volume represents a quick reprinting, under auspices of a commercial publisher, of the 25th anniversary issue (February, 1964) of The Journal of Politics, to which has been added a brief introduction by Alexander Heard. As occurs frequently with symposia, the title is overlarge (nine of the eleven articles deal with orthodox political science subjects) and the contributions are uneven. The chief virtue of the work -and presumably this fulfills its major intent-is to provide guideposts or benchmarks in portraying dominant political trends in the South since 1948, the date of the last symposium on the South conducted by The Journal of Politics. Even so, several articles are rather surface surveys, and there is much overlap among chapters of attention and speculation on such themes as legislative reapportionment, greater Negro voting, and developing Republicanism. The volume is further weakened in its thematic strength by the absence of any chapter seeking to pull the main points together and in its reference utility by the omission of an index. (One might also question the difference of $4.05 between the publisher's hardback and paperback editions, and deplore the substandard physical appearance of the book, especially as to skimpiness and unevenness of margins.) In sum, the symposium succeeds better in communicating the importance of current changes and ongoing continuity than it does in presenting an orderly, cumulative, or complementary appraisal of those factors.

In the lead chapter, Leslie W. Dunbar argues that race relations and attitudes comprise the critical elements in Southern change. In his view, the character of white response to the irreversible fact that the initiative in shaping race relationships has passed from white to Negro hands will determine the South's ability to align itself with the rest of the nation and yet to maintain a constructive regional identity as well.

Four chapters rely on a broad overview approach. O. Douglas Weeks sets forth the several paths of regional resistance in national politics and Samuel DuBois Cook treats, with some heat, of the activities of segregationist and conservative organizations in the post-1954 period. William H. Nicholls details both the extent to which the South has advanced economically the past few decades and the important gaps that remain between the Southern and non-Southern economies. Nicholls, too, is sensitive to the adverse impact on economic growth of regional, racial and rural traditions. George W. Spicer assesses the initiatory role played by federal judicial action. through a review of case law and subsequent patterns of compliance and resistance. While noting that delays in effectuating educational desegregation derive in part from the procedural and substantive weaknesses in the Supreme Court's implementation decree of 1955, he concludes by justifying judicial intervention in this area because of the marked unwillingness or incapacity of the more overtly political branches and levels of government to handle the problem.

Political overviews with a more particularized focus are offered by Malcolm E. Jewell and Coleman B. Ransone, Jr. In the former's chapter, state legislative patterns are examined, with special reference to the implications of reapportionment for urban, Negro, and Republican strength and to associated trends toward heightened legislative factionalism and conflict. Ransone concentrates on political factors sustaining gubernatorial power in the Southern states, but this once again leads to an emphasis on the nature of rejuvenated Republicanism and on the effects of the arousal of racial anxieties.

Two other chapters apply more specialized perspectives. Lawrence Logan Durisch advocates the necessity and desirability of far greater planning and development programs, within each of the Southern states and among them as a region. Robert H. Connery and Richard H. Leach present a case for preventive planning and advance action so that Southern metropolitan areas can develop effective governmental forms adequate to deal with their emerging needs before the latter become virtually unsolvable problems.

The two remaining chapters, involving competent narrower empirical investigations, are among the volume's stronger contributions. Donald R. Matthews and James W. Prothro apply samplesurvey methods to uncover the image of the major parties held by Southern whites and Negroes. Their findings and commentary are helpful to the problem of assessing the durability and strength of Republicanism and in determining its group basis of support. Alfred Clubok, John De Grove, and Charles Farris report on several community situations where the Negro vote has been encouraged and manipulated by whites. Their discussion serves to remind that there need be no automatic correspondence between Negro possession of political rights and Negro securing of political benefits, a viewpoint often lost sight of in the current stress on the centrality of Negro suffrage for Negro advance. In much the same way the Matthews-Prothro article, in common with several of the other chapters, reminds that a strengthened presidential Republicanism need not be rapidly or inevitably reflected in competitive two-partyism at the state/local levels. The South is changing, but neither as swiftly nor as discontinuously with its past as conservatives fear or liberals hope.—Allan P. Sindler, Duke University.

The Futile Crusade: Anti-Communism as American Credo. By Sidney Lens. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books. 1964. Pp. 256. $5.00.)

The Futile Crusade is a sensible or a naive book, depending on whether you are a softboiled or a hardboiled egghead. The postwar stance of American foreign policy, Mr. Lens argues, has been almost exclusively negative. Not only have we failed to develop a positive alternative to communism, but we have sanctimoniously judged other nations on the basis of their outlook towards the Soviet bloc. The result has been a propping up of governments that pass our test of purity and the alienation of new states wishing to sit out the Cold War.

Most of what Mr. Lens has to say is familiar, much of it is consciously exaggerated, and hardly anything he says will persuade the reader who is not already convinced. While the book is chiefly about our problems in the international arena, the most revealing parts deal with the ideological schism besetting liberalism right here at home. Mr. Lens has a soft spot for the "soft" liberals: for those who are, in a word, soft on communism and other of the more ruthless regimes of our time. To understand is to excuse; and Mr. Lens is nothing if he is not understanding. We may be told that Sukarno and Nkrumah have quashed opposition parties, that Algeria and the United Arab Republic are a far cry from being democracies, that Cuba and China are dictatorships pure and simple. Mr. Lens' reply is:

All of this is true for the most part, yet it is only an episodic phase of the world revolution. No revolutionary nation can fulfill its promise without great difficulties, without setbacks, without spurts and spasms. (p. 223)

And then follows the not surprising reminder that our own revolutionary birth was succeeded by a Shays Rebellion, Alien and Sedition Laws, and acts of disorder and oppression.

The real villains of this tract are not to be found on the right. If Dulles' policy was negative and unimaginative, that is what you might expect from a Republican with a Wall Street background. And if McCarthy and likeminded politicians capitalized on a nation's anxieties, this was simply the know-nothing mentality at work. Mr. Lens, rather, reserves his harshest criticism for the liberals who opted to take a hard line on communism. This was the trahison des clercs. Each must do his bit to help defend the Republic in time of crisis, and the egghead felt called upon to contribute his talents no less than others. The result was the erection of an intellectual apparatus justifying our foreign policy. Philosophers would discourse on the "nature of communism," showing it to be unsullied evil. Social scientists would demonstrate that Marxism was a tissue of logical errors: that America had a mixed economy, a pluralist polity, and more symphony orchestras than anyone else. Time magazine, in a cover-story featuring Jacques Barzun, welcomed the long-lost intellectual back into the fold.

If most liberals moved from a soft to a hard position there are two possible explanations. The first is that they were correct in their reassessment of communism and its threat to the West. The second is that they sensed that their own advancement and survival in a difficult era depended on accommodating to the dominant outlook of society. Mr. Lens does not explore either motives or motivations here. It would have been a fascinating exercise had he done so. For the scholar, at least in America, leads an exposed and dependent existence. Just how far this vulnerability affects his intellectual posture is a nice problem in the sociology of knowledge. But if being a liberal has been tolerable it is chiefly because most liberals have managed to make it clear that they are, in their own way, as hard-minded about communism as the Rotarians across town.

Can American policy be anything other than negative, reacting and responding to ever-arising communist initiatives? Mr. Lens has his eight-point program calling for aid to those new nations that show signs of encouraging land reform, setting up village development plans, and widening the ambit of allowable political dissent. But he also wants us to turn positive, and here lies the real dilemma. For this raises the question as to whether we possess or can develop a social and ideological alternative to communism. It may well be that we are already middle-aged, that our time in history is running out, that the American model and American guidance can no longer excite the world. And if the national imagination is incapable of adjusting to the conditions Mr. Lens describes, then retaining our bases in an autocratic Spain may be a better hope than sending tractors to a doubtful Nigeria.—Andrew Hacker, Cornell University.

Herbert Hoover: A Biography. By EUGENE LYONS. (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday and Co., Inc., 1964. Pp. xii, 442. $5.95.)

When Herbert Hoover accepting the Republican nomination for president observed, "I was Quaker born," he epitomized plenty. A native of Iowa he lost his father at six and his mother at nine and was then sent to Oregon to be reared by Quaker relatives. His was a rural rearing and schooling in a home somewhat short of poverty but always in the Republican tradition which was to be challenged in the very convention that nominated him and by a delegate soon to be nominated as his running mate. Still in his teens he went to the just emerging Stanford University entering the day it opened. He was soon the leader of the "Barbs" determined to prevent domination of the campus by the Greek-letter fraternities.

Under the intellectual stimulus of Dr. Branner, Herbert made the most of his opportunity to develop his aptitude for geology. During summers he built up a tough physique on geological surveys. Graduating from Stanford in 1893 he set out hunting a job with forty dollars in his pocket which were soon spent. Then, as he put it in his Memoirs, he "experienced the bottom levels of despair... the ceaseless tramping and ceaseless refusal of employment." One day he tried at the office of Louis Janin, a famous California mining expert, to hear that the only vacancy was for a typist, whereupon Hoover astonished Janin with "I can type. When do I start?"

Before long Janin, having discovered what a remarkable secretary he had, and utilizing a bold ruse, got the young man an assignment with an English mining company which took Hoover through London offices to the wilds of Australia and a miserable mining camp manned by carousing dregs of humanity. Here Hoover's extraordinary competence promptly won him the designation "The Chief." Next he was in Peking, China with his particular colony there soon surrounded by the Boxer rebels. It fell to this competent Quaker virtually to take charge as commander-inchief until American marines came to the rescue. He was frequently under fire and once rescued a Chinese child in the line of fire. But when the episode had been written up and submitted to him for possible publication he tore the paper to shreds with the comment, "I'm no Teddy Roosevelt."

By successive assignments Hoover's far-flung mining activities became almost world-wide in range. Then came the sudden outbreak of World War I with tens of thousands of panic stricken American tourists unable to get home. Now back in London Hoover took charge and soon had the refugees home.

Next, Belgian relief fell to him and with perfect self confidence he assumed personally an obligation for twelve million dollars for food. Then followed the relief of civilians within the belligerent countries with the military in each desperately bent on crushing the enemy regardless of starving civilians. But with an astonishing command of the vast problem, and using the threat of arousing the wrath of neutrals. Hoover bent the stubborn will of ministers, monarchs, and dictators to his determination to relieve the starving. Now he became the Great Humanitarian as ancient parks, streets and squares were renamed for him. Returning home President Harding appointed Hoover Secretary of Commerce, whereupon that department was suddenly invigorated as it had never been. Without lifting his hand he was nominated by the Republican party and elected President. Here was something else to challenge this man of extraordinary talents. As President he learned to find occasional emotional relief from frustrations with such quips as, when a grand daughter was born, "Thank God she won't have to be confirmed by the Senate." Such is the essence of the story of Herbert Hoover as told in his biography by Eugene Lyons.

At this point rises a question: Why is it that whoever has read the three volumes of Hoover's Memoirs and later reads the book under review, gets to wondering whether the Hoover of this biography can be the man who wrote the Memoirs. What transformed the great liberal of the biography, the humanitarian sympathetic with labor and the less fortunate everywhere into a ludicrous symbol of conservatism and reaction? Of course he had the misfortune to have proclaimed his hopes for an approaching end of poverty before his dream was to be shattered by the Great Depression. His phobia of what came to be called creeping socialism unquestionably hampered his adaptation of available means for alleviating the overwhelming distress. Later the New Deal's encroachments on private enterprise he held due to European ideologies not the pressure of events. The Great Depression itself he held due to "the European economic hurricane that swept over us" rather than stock market speculation. Had he been reelected "we would quickly have overcome the depression." He could break out in wrath as when a favorite project of his was opposed by a "conglomeration of professors and intellectuals tainted with mixed socialist, fascist, and antique ideas." Capitalism, assumed to be the ultimate in economic evolution, would apparently be standing firm when Gabriel trumpets forth the Judgment Day.

But why does this fascinating biography skip such human foibles? Doubtless because it is, after all, a literary work of art in the sense that art is an idealized representation of nature. There are those who will long for citation of authorities and an index.—Wilfred E. Binkley, Ohio Northern University.

The Politics of Water in Arizona. By Dean E. Mann. (University of Arizona Press, 1963. Pp. xviii, 317. $6.50.)

Problems of water scarcity have been acute in the Southwest since the region was first settled. They are becoming of increasing concern in many other parts of the nation.

This study describes the water problems of Arizona, the most arid of the fifty states. Its seventeen chapters present in detail how water policies developed from territorial days until today. As in all arid states, government was deeply involved in water problems. But the author makes it clear that long range planning and long range decisions have proved politically impossible. Thus Arizona has not faced up to the inherent limitations on growth and development resulting from water scarcity. Federal programs have generally been tied to local interests and have been dominated by local goals, so that while providing some immediate assistance, federal action has not contributed significantly to the solution of longer range problems.

For those seeking rationality in public decisionmaking, Dean Mann's study will prove disillusioning. The record is one of frequent rejection of technical advice and of ready response to short range pressures serving local or individual advantage. From the time of settlement, the pattern of government action has been a patch work of decisions stimulated by self-seeking or misinformed groups. And the result, as the author suggests, leaves one uneasy as to the future.

Clearly, water problems will continue to be sources of tension and conflict in Arizona, and this book by Dean Mann will be a basic source of information wherever and whenever Arizona water problems are considered. It would probably be useful to have similar studies for every state.

But it is perhaps unfortunate that the author has not added more to our understanding of politics and the political process as it operates in the allocation of scarce resources. Except in war, our political system has not generally had to face resource allocation problems. Only in the arid regions in the handling of water has the system had to deal on a continuing basis with resource allocation problems. Yet there is reason to expect that allocation problems (initially with respect to water) will become of increasing political significance throughout the nation. It would have been useful, therefore, if the author had gone beyond description to suggest some hypotheses and generalizations with respect to the way in which our political system is likely to respond in this relatively unfamiliar but increasingly important context.—Norman Wengert, Wayne State University.

The States Rights Debate: Antifederalism and the Constitution. By Alpheus Thomas Mason (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice Hall, Inc., 1964. Pp. 206. Cloth—$5.00.)

The publication at this time of Professor Mason's excellent book on the roots of American federalism is fortunate, for the tempo of states rights arguments has grown recently and political scientists around the world are taking a new look at federalism. This study extends from America's late colonial period to the adoption of the Bill of Rights. As one follows the arguments of Hamilton, Wilson, Lee, Jefferson, Martin, Seabury, Madison-particularly Madison-and others, one is impressed with the current application of much of what was written a long time ago. This is of particular interest since the Constitution was only then coming into being and the drive for and against the adoption of a Bill of Rights had become a basic issue. At that time many persons had hoped that the incorporation of these rights into the Constitution would set a limit to a potentially dangerous central government; others feared that these proposed amendments, if adopted, might seriously limit the powers of a necessarily strong national government. Thus, these words of early American statesmen, with few exceptions, touch on many issues that confront the United States in the 1960's.

Eighteenth century constitutional theory with regard to federal-state relations had about as little to do with what was written and spoken concerning states rights as has that which is being written and spoken concerning that subject today. Rather, men were guided by personal opinions and personal interests. In fact, very few eighteenth century voices of national importance argued for the assimilation of state powers into an all-powerful national government merely because they considered unitary government to be theoretically preferred. There are possibly about as many—or rather as few—who have defended the proposition that the great centers of power in a plural nation should be vested in the constituent units merely because they believe that the result would be particularly conducive to life, liberty, and a widespread pursuit of happiness. Madison, the principal participant in this early drama, was no more consistent in the furtherance of a particular dogma than were many of his contemporaries. He took a number of stands that at times conflicted with views he expressed at other times. He was guided to ideas and doctrines, or from them, by a deep concern with political events and developments that either encouraged or disturbed him. His concern was not always a naked theory but, rather, a practical goal.

This stimulating volume does not deal specifically with all the implications that readers (in addition to this reviewer) might read into it. But Professor Mason, in the valuable essays with which he opens each chapter, has made clear how early political leaders reacted to constitutional problems of federalism that were far more difficult for them to solve than those that we face today, and he has indicated how they discovered which side of any issue was "right." These arguments of the 1780's that set forth the "proper" role of the state within the Union bear serious consideration today, and they sound surprisingly familiar. If this be so, there is satisfaction in such a discovery, for federalism is not dying; it may change a bit from time to time, but it survives. - Charles AIKIN, University of California (Berkeley).

The Republican Party, 1854-1964. By George H. Mayer. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. ix, 563, $9.75.)

The author has written a political history of one of the two major parties in the United States. His major sources are the papers of the principal actors, and biographies and Ph.D dissertations. It tells more than anyone reasonably could want to know about the Republican Party, how it came to be, the strategies of the protagonists in the varving nominating conventions down through 1960, and how successive Republican administrations have fared. It is well researched (if one accepts a tendency to overlook the literature of political science) and, excepting for a few sections which deal with complicated issues such as the Kansas-Nebraska Act in more detail than may seem relevant to the book's major purpose, it is felicitously written and enjoyably informative. In all, it is a nostalgic experience for anyone who has read in the history of American politics, and a handy compendium of facts for him who must prepare lectures in the field.

The author's emphasis upon collections of private papers as sources, coupled, perhaps, with his candidly avowed position that the "golden age" of politics "reached its peak in the decade of the '50's when the Republican party was born, and expired with the nineteenth century" has led him to slight if not disparage the Republican politics of the 1950's and 60's.

He is not interested so much in analysis or hypotheses, as in presenting facts. If any general formulation of a theory concerning parties in the United States is to be found, it is implicit for the most part. There is, for example the comment on Dewey: "As titular leader of the minority, Dewey had avoided interference in congressional politics. although the tactics of the legislative leaders distressed him." Well, what of this notion of congressional and presidential parties, not to mention the concept of titular leadership? How do the two relate (that is, if there is but one "party" in Congress for each presidential party)? These questions are but suggestive of a large number which the reader will find himself wishing to put to the author.

Professor Mayer offers a prefatory admonition against "the misleading impression that the party exists nine months in every four years to conduct a campaign for the Presidency." In what sense or how many senses does it exist? There are tidbits of information on the history of party organization, which might be taken to be one form in which those amorphous entities called parties are objectified, but this serves merely to whet the reader's appetite.—Cornelius P. Cotter, Wichita State University.

Power and Politics in Labor Legislation. By Allan K. McAdams. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1964. Pp. xiv, 346. $7.50.)

This book, which is a refurbished doctoral dissertation in economics, details the legislative history of the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959. In a field as sharply polarized as labor-management relations where the very concept of neutrality is suspect, the author achieves a remarkable degree of objectivity. It would be hard to tell which side he favors. Utilizing research techniques highly suitable to his subject (interviewing and examination of documents), he succeeded in getting generous access to key sources. Moreover, by his discreet manner of handling the information gathered, he displays commendable responsibility for preserving "the great reservoir of good will toward scholars" upon which such access depends.

Regrettably, the author flaws his otherwise admirable work by adopting an inappropriate thesis and by not devoting sufficient attention to the internal power structures of Congress. In his own words, "The major thesis of the study is that the public, in ways which were sometimes direct and sometimes indirect, decided the outcome of the battle over labor reform legislation in 1959." As blunt an instrument as even an aroused public opinion could hardly determine the particulars of as complicated a measure as the Landrum-Griffin Act. To his credit, the author disavows this interpretation as his narrative unfolds. However, to make the point that a widespread demand for strong labor legislation helped some of the contending forces would hardly warrant such an elaborate presentation. And focusing on this proposition inevitably restricts his perception and analysis of the factors involved. Fortunately, he does not steadfastly pursue his central theme. Throughout the study he includes materials which do not substantiate and sometimes contradict his thesis-but without making explicit the significance of such considerations to the extent necessary for a balanced exposition of how this measure came into being.

In particular, he fails to recognize the factor most responsible for the form in which the legislation finally emerged: the formal and informal power structures within Congress. Although he touches on the role of the over-all leaders in the two chambers, he does not adequately consider the nature of their authority and function. He does not go into the intricate network of crisscrossing obligations, commitments, and understandings among the majority and minority leaders, chairmen and ranking minority members of the legislative, rules, and appropriations committees, and the deans of the state delegations upon which their power depends. Hence, he does not appreciate the impact on Speaker Rayburn's ability to control the Rules Committee when Halleck displaced Martin as Minority Leader in the House. And he only hints at the erosion of the Speaker's power resulting from Rayburn's diminishing vigor.

While the author accords at least a cursory treatment to the conservative coalition in the House, he does not even mention the corresponding liberal Democratic bloc loosely organized under the direction of Representatives Lee Metcalf of Montana and Frank Thompson of New Jersey. He describes the difference in attitude toward remedial legislation between the Teamsters and AFL-CIO Unions. He notes that some Democratic Congressmen like James Roosevelt of California were spokesmen for the Teamsters while others favored the AFL-CIO. But he does not discuss the interaction between these considerations and the factional diversity and competition for leadership among the liberal House Democrats. This omission is ironic for two reasons. The author frequently describes the activities of Metcalf and Thompson without any apparent awareness of the larger group for which they were concurrently supplying leadership. And passage of the Landrum-Griffin Bill precipitated greater formalization of that body as the House Democratic Study Group. Likewise, the author does not develop fully enough the sharp cleavages between the presidential and congressional wings of the Democratic Party, the disability the Democrats suffered from having a substantial element of their numerical superiority consist of freshman Congressmen from marginal districts, and other significant aspects of the total picture.

As a consequence, this book is not the definitive biography of the Landrum-Griffin Act. That work remains to be done by someone with a more comprehensive conceptual framework than was brought to this study. Meanwhile, it will serve as a useful but fragmentary reference on labormanagement relations in the congressional arena.—Kenneth Kofmehl, Purdue University.

Men At the Top: A Study in Community Power. By Robert Presthus. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. 362. $2.95, paper; $8.50 cloth.)

This book is a well-designed and executed comparative study of community power structure. The author selected two small communities in upstate New York (designated as Edgewood and Riverview, populations 8500 and 6000) whose similarities and differences suggested their suitability for fruitful comparative study. His findings are significant not only for students of community power, but also for those concerned with normative theories of pluralism and democracy.

Presthus' point of departure is an analysis of the findings and perspectives of earlier studies, focusing particularly on the familiar divergence of pluralist and elitist interpretations of community power. Sociological studies, he notes, have often followed the inspiration of the Lynds' pioneering studies, and have found an elitist power structure in which political power is derivative from economic power. Political scientists, on the other hand, tend to be "romantically pluralistic" in their assumptions, and have discovered power structures characterized by competition, fragmentation, and fluidity. These differences are viewed as perhaps stemming from different interpretations of rather similar findings, rather than from widely contrasting data. Recent political science studies are cited as having preserved the term "pluralism" while narrowing its operational meaning. This book is an attempt to explore and clarify this issue by careful comparison of two communities to determine the various social conditions associated with varying degrees of elitism or pluralism in community leadership structure.

Methodologically, Presthus analyzes the advantages and limitations of decisional and reputational methods of identifying community leadership structures. Although operating from an initial preference for a decisional approach, both methods were utilized in the study, and both are viewed as useful.

A few of the book's major findings may be briefly noted. A power structure of about eighty citizens was found in the two communities. In one case (Edgewood) economic leaders were found to be somewhat more powerful than political leaders; in the other (Riverview) political leaders were not only more powerful but "exercised relatively greater initiative and control" than did Edgewood's economic leaders. In both instances, however, a degree of meaningful competition between political and economic elites was found. These findings are related to various characteristics of the two communities.

Significant differences were found between the two communities with respect to the extent of pluralism in decision-making patterns. Pluralism was measured by membership in voluntary organizations, extent of individual participation in major decisions, and extent of organizational participation in decisions. The most striking result of these measurements was, in both communities, the surprisingly low rate of organizational participation in major decisions. Presthus suggests that "the role of voluntary organizations in ensuring pluralist forms of political decision-making has been somewhat overstated." The communities also differ with respect to the degree of consensus on basic community values. A higher degree of consensus appears to be correlated with a significantly higher rate of individual participation in major decisions. However, in Riverview, with more political competition and a higher rate of voter participation in local elections (conditions presumably associated with pluralism), decisionmaking is more concentrated and there is more rank-and-file apathy than in Edgewood.

Comparing his findings with those of other studies, Presthus finds a marked tendency toward elitism in small cities. Further, he feels pluralism is likely to continue to decline because of the "tendency for the major conditions of community decision-making to be set down by higher levels of government and industry."

This excellent book is rich in empirical findings which are highly suggestive. Theoretically, it serves to bridge some of the gaps between divergent interpretations. It should not be too long until a sufficiently wide range of community studies are available for a broad systematic analysis of the nature and conditions of varying degrees of elitism or pluralism in various community situations. This book is an important contribution to this development.

The book's concern with the normative problems of democratic theory is also noteworthy. It becomes increasingly clear in reading this book that some of the conventional pluralistic rules of thumb will not quite do. Anyone concerned with the problems of implementing democratic values in mass society will find an effective statement of some of these problems here.—Forbes Hays, Carleton College.

Race and Radicalism: The NAACP And The Communist Party in Conflict. By WILSON RECORD. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1964. Pp. xiii, 237. $5.00)

The Communist Party has been unsuccessful in making headway among American Negroes. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at least up to more recent movements in the 60's, has commanded the respect of most Negroes and the so-called white power structure as the civil rights organization. Since the Communist party had designs in the civil rights area, it was only natural that the Party would have to weaken or obliterate altogether the strong position of the NAACP. And this is what the CPUSA set out to do. However, the NAACP has proven an insurmountable barrier to Communist designs. With broad powers vested in a watchful middle-class Board of Directors (Executive Board), the Communists have found it virtually impossible to infiltrate the Association at the national level; and whenever and wherever they have done so in the more open though nationallyoriented local branches, the leadership elite (Executive Board) of the NAACP has the power and has actually taken corrective and precautionary measures. (See esp. pp. 142-146.)

This, in part, is what Professor Wilson Record tells us in his Race and Radicalism: The NAACP and The Communist Party in Conflict. The study is an outgrowth of a much larger research project on the problem of Communism in American life. Professor Clinton Rossiter of Cornell University was project director, and he in turn commissioned several studies—one of which was the activities of Communists in pressure and opinion-forming groups. This sub-project was supervised by Professor John P. Roche of Brandeis University, and it was he who asked Professor Record to study the interaction between the CPUSA and the NAACP.

Record describes how the NAACP has refused to waver in pursuing its prime civil rights objective. Whether by infiltration, establishing competing organizations, staging sympathy demonstrations, and directing propaganda attacks, the CPUSA has met with little or no success in penetrating the Association or in gaining Negro support outside of it. This despite the fact that the Negro was an obvious and ripe target for the CPUSA. Here was a group for "which the American dream held least luster," and which occupied "the lowest rung on the American ladder." (p. 1)

But even so, the Negro has fundamentally been and remains an American first.

As an historical account of a relatively neglected area of civil rights research, Record's study is a useful contribution. Nevertheless, this kind of study, at least as Record does it, is not without shortcomings. One need which the book does not fill is for a serious study of this timely topic, such as that done by Record, that would appeal to a wider audience—an audience whose mind is filled with all sorts of notions, prejudices, and views on the subject. To have Professor Record's findings read by many of these persons, (and many need to read them) would be of immeasurable educational and informational value. Unfortunately, however, the laborious (albeit praiseworthy) chronological detailing of events (chs. 2-7), is apt to discourage all but the most dedicated reader.

Moreover, as Professor Record acknowledges, (p. xiii), much of the material, especially up to 1951, can be found both in his earlier book, The Negro and the Communist Party (University of North Carolina Press, 1951), and several journal articles. To the scholar, it thus becomes repetitious, although perhaps convenient. What the present study does is to update the earlier work, focusing somewhat more sharply on relations between the NAACP and the CPUSA. In addition, the concluding chapter considers the impact of more recent civil rights organizations (e.g., Congress of Racial Equality) on the NAACP, but here, the author attempts to do too much. While the impact of these newer civil rights organizations is relevant, the manner in which Record handles the subject is too summary a treatment of "tempting possibilities" (p. 219) not discussed in the study itself.

In another vein, it is quite apparent and even understandable that Professor Record is sympathetic to the NAACP and to the cause it espouses. This, however, should not lead him to view civil rights issues outside their proper political perspective. (Record is a sociologist at Sacramento State College.) Note, for example, the following passage: (pp. 230-31)

And what is ahead for the NAACP? In a sense the Association is working itself out of a job. Since its single purpose is to eliminate racial barriers, once the barriers are down there will be no raison d'etre for an NAACP; indeed, once that glorious day arrives, continued organization of Negroes qua Negroes would negate what the Association has been striving for from the beginning. Negroes who dislike aspects of American society other than racial discrimination will continue to work through protest movements other than the NAACP; and it is to be hoped that with racialism behind and full acceptance won, there will come a relaxation on the part of Negroes about books and plays and movies which portray a colored man in an unfavorable light, for sophistication in such matters is the ultimate gauge of mature citizenship and full equality.

If and when that "glorious day arrives," one can rest assured that the NAACP and similar organizations will still be in business. There will be a continued need for such organizations in the sense that all groups (e.g. Catholics, Jews) require defenses (and offenses) in the ordinary play of politics between and among competing interests. What will perhaps happen is that the NAACP will reorient its program in keeping with social change and political realities.

In addition, it is idealistic to exhort any group to accept unfavorable portrayals of those identified with the group. Professor Record misses the point. What Negroes (and others) object to is stereotyped and one-dimensional character portrayals. Aside from the admittedly subjective criticism that certain kinds of unfavorable portrayals might not in themselves be worthy of "sophistication," Record's view could be criticized on the more practical grounds that such portrayals might do serious harm to the very cause which organizations such as the NAACP have fought to attain. Even more established groups, such as Catholics and Jews, maintain active organizations not only to promote their views on matters of special concern, but also to guard against threats to their social station and self-esteem. This does not indicate a lack of "sophistication..." -LUCIUS J. BARKER, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

States in Crisis, Politics in Ten American States, 1950-1962. By James Reichley and Others. (Chapel Hill, North Carolina, University of North Carolina Press, 1964. Pp. xii, 264. $6.00.)

The journalist is the indispensable ally of any serious student of government and not least of scholars concerned with state politics. State house reporters not only supply otherwise unobtainable information from scattered parts of the nation, they also frequently provide suggestive interpretations of the events they report. Deeper analysis is, however, rarely produced by reporters whose training and daily routine discourage more intensive work. Even when freed from deadline pressures journalists usually fail to achieve perspective and rigorous analysis, as they have demonstrated in countless hackneyed volumes of journalistic commentary. There are exceptions, of course, but James Reichley's States in Crisis is not one of them. In contrast with his earlier work on Philadelphia politics (The Art of Government) the present work falls flat.

In his concluding chapters Reichley raises a number of interesting questions about the viability of American state government, but unfortunately the remainder of the book, written by ten other journalists about their states, presented Reichley with little relevant information to serve as the basis for substantial generalizations. This is a pity for the states they discussed (Arizona, California, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska,

New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, and Virginia) are an interesting cross section that might have demonstrated something about state government trends had they received more than a journalistic once-over-lightly. Instead there is the customary retelling of well-known (or rightly forgotten) election campaign tales, of regional and factional cleavages, of adroit and inept political maneuvering. They write clearly and briskly, although in some cases with annoying cuteness, but they do not have a great deal to say.

The book is also studded with dubious inferences of the kind expected in undergraduate term papers. Who knows whether Nebraska voters "seemed to suspect that [Fred Seaton] had been too long in Washington to understand their problems?" Who can say whether labor union aid to Senator Barry Goldwater's opponent in 1958 "produced a strong reaction in the Senator's favor"? One looks in vain for more evidence in support of the assertion that the "friends and neighbors" influence is strong in Nebraska, for more information about legislative politics in almost all the states discussed, and especially for a more sophisticated treatment of such subjects as ethnic rivalries and money in politics, both of which are discussed at some length but quite superficially. Surely we do not need to be introduced to the "balanced-ticket" as if it were a new development. Also a good many political scientists who have been in and out of state government and politics for years will question the assertion that the "alliance between intellectuals and the Democrats has had little carry over at the state or local levels."

One saving grace of the book is that its authors, unlike most journalists, do not set themselves up as holier than any politician to lecture from lofty objectivity. But that and the occasional nugget of useful information the book contains do not explain to me why the University of North Carolina ever decided to launch this collection on the engulfing tide of print. (The book lacks an index, but that hardly matters in this case.)—DUANE LOCKARD, Princeton University.

Congressman from Mississippi: An Autobiography. By Frank E. Smith. (New York, Pantheon Books, 1964. Pp. ix, 338. $5.95.)

Years ago, when I read Frank Smith's book, The Yazoo, in the Rivers of America series, I warned him that he could be forgiven for his views or his votes but not for writing a book; even John Sharp Williams, with his Heidelberg degree, never risked that. In his second volume, after a competent 12-year career of courage marked by his leadership for truth in textile labeling, public works, foreign aid, international understanding, training for the displaced, security for the mentally retarded and many other laws, he becomes the first deep South congressman to expose the arrogance of Rules and Appropriations Committees, the idiocy of rewarding renegades, the vicious race-baiting of the Memphis Commercial Appeal, and to make clear why he felt economic improvement is a better approach to racial progress than frontal attacks for non-local consumption. When he went to Washington I sent word that he would make the best possible congressman he could and still stay in congress. He did.

My wife, whose people have also been around Greenwood over a century, was teaching in the junior college he attended, and I have worked with him in campaigns and conventions, as well as on the other side sometimes, and share with him an Ole Miss history degree, legislative service, including the authorship of the free textbook and poll tax bills he mentions, opinions on Lamar. Collins and Sillers and know the part he played in nominating Stevenson and Kennedy. But I am unable to credit that the Delta is full of honest. public spirited leaders, in spite of Stephen Bailev. that lanterns on the levee were ever lit except in imagination, that Greenville is more liberal than Tupelo, that racists run northeast Mississippi. that we have an inferior state government, or that those who talk out of the other side of their mouths when they cross the Smith and Wesson line are liberals. The progress of Mississippi has been achieved mainly by men who have had slight support in the Delta. To state that no Mississippian since John Sharp Williams has affected national destiny is to ignore the Mississippian who was responsible for the passage of the Civil Rights plank at the 1948 convention which gave President Harry S. Truman his narrow margin for reelection.

A sharp dissent must be entered to his remark that "Few voices for racial justice have come from the church," for more ministers have been forced to leave the state than members of any other profession, and churches, with all their inadequacies, have shown more courage and sheltered more men of good will than colleges, schools, press, bar, business or government. The mentally underprivileged who bomb and burn churches realize on which side the churches are. As Rabbi Klein told a Clarksdale club, "You lost this fight in 1776, not in 1865."

This is a tremendous story of how a boy whose father was murdered by a Negro for no reason at all, and whose family was not in the top Delta bracket, has been able to carry on his father's faith that hate is not the answer, and to achieve much. He laments that he has not done more, but he could not have done much more and survived that long. The nation is using the ability as a TVA director of this statesman whom Edward Morgan called "A breath of fresh air" and to whom a constituent confided, "You are for the United States," and may well find in the future higher use for a man who is what Woodrow Wilson liked to call himself, "An emancipated Southerner."—CHARLES GRANVILLE HAMILTON, Booneville, Mississippi.

Religion and Politics in America. By Murray S. Stedman, Jr. (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1964. Pp. vii, 168. $4.95).

Religion and Politics in America is more a primer of activities and problems of churches in politics than an interpretation of fundamental questions concerning the relationship of religion to power in the United States. Anyone looking for an analysis of how seventeenth century Protestant principles shaped American political institutions and style will be disappointed. There is no discussion of how the revolutionary Protestant principle that each man is free to experience God and express the meaning of that experience without the intervention of higher authorities helped promote highly individualistic, market-organized politics. There is no exploration of the relationship of Protestant witness to utopianism in politics at home and messianism in foreign policies abroad. Nor has Stedman tried to show the theological or sociological bases for Protestant-Catholic division over such issues as censorship, divorce, and aid to parochial schools.

Stedman has mainly written about "people, as organized into churches, and the relationships between such organizations and the political process." A solid compendium of facts are here: the rates of growth of different churches; their organizational approach to politics; the various methods used by churches to pressure the government; and the different ways in which religious interests affect local politics.

Although facts and issues are introduced throughout the book, they are not usually analyzed in any depth. In the book's closing paragraph, Stedman suggests that "the churches in America are in a unique position to speak to the public interest" due to the widely held assumption that they are selfless and disinterested; but the validity of that assumption is left unexplored. Religion does affect the party affiliations of Americans, as Stedman states, but there is very little discussion of when, how, and who. While it is true that "sociological studies of American voters have indicated that there is a definite correlation between religious affiliation and party preference," it has also been shown repeatedly how closely that relationship is tied to class factors except in the case of Jews.

The absence of discussion in depth means that any single chapter of Religion and Politics in America reads like a good introduction to a longer study on the subject of the chapter. The very brevity of the book keeps the author from asking the whys about the facts he presents: why did the Scotch Presbyterians on the frontier become prohibitionists? Why did Methodism catch fire in the United States? Why did Mormons, Christian Scientists, and Jehovah Witnesses spring from American soil? Why does practically every American politician insist that God is on our side? Why was Kennedy able to overcome the prejudices of many voters? Why did the Irish Catholic influence in McCarthyism fail to reappear in the radical right wing of today? These are questions to be probed in a longer, deeper book on Religion and Politics in America.

Stedman should be praised for the concise, clearly written catalog of issues and facts he has offered, but he should also be chided for an overly ambitious title and for failing to make explicit the limitations of his effort. He also should have been reminded to look at a variety of important books which would have helped him put more meat on his own, including Robert Brown's, The Spirit of Protestantism and John H. Fenton's, The Catholic Vote.—LAWRENCE H. FUCHS, Brandeis University.

Leadership in a Small Town. By AARON WILDAY-SKY. (Totawa, N. J.: Bedminster Press, 1964. Pp. 388. $7.50).

Welcome to Oberlin, where "the roads to influence . . . are more than one; elites and non-elites can travel them, and the toll can be paid with energy and initiative as well as wealth." (p. 214.) Wildavsky's Oberlin is a reaffirmation of small town democracy, stressing the fragmentation of power, the influence of elected public officials, and the role of public opinion and elections in determining public policy. Alienation, mass manipulation, economic elites, power pyramids, the X family, etc., do not really exist in small town America. Who rules in Oberlin?—"different small groups of interested and active citizens in different issue areas with some overlap, if any, by public officials, and occasional intervention by a larger number of people at the polls." (p. 8)

How does Wildavsky arrive at these conclusions? Undergraduate students at Oberlin College "were asked to prepare case studies of events going on at the time." (p. vii) From these sources, together with the author's own observations, a portrait of leadership in Oberlin was constructed. Eleven case studies are presented in all, including such diverse issues and events as the determination of municipal water rates, the passage of a fair housing ordinance, the division of United Appeal funds, and a municipal election. Wildavsky's statement of a research design which can resolve once and for all the dispute between elite and pluralist theory is deceptively simple:

"If (after examing these issues) we find that the same participants exercise leadership in nearly all significant areas of decision, that they agree, and that they are not responsible to the electorate, we conclude that a power elite rules in Oberlin... if we find that the leaders vary from one issue to the other, with such overlap as there is between issue areas concentrated largely in the hands of public officials, we must conclude that there is a pluralist system of rule in Oberlin." (p. 253)

Armed with this criteria for affirming a pluralist political structure, Wildavsky examines his case studies and finds that no single group in Oberlin dominated decision-making in every issue area. It was true that "the number of citizens and outside participants who exercise leadership in most cases is an infinitesimal part of the community" (p. 265), but no person or group exerted leadership in all issue areas. To the extent that overlap among leaders in issue areas existed, this overlap involved public officials-the city manager, the mayor, and city councilmen-who owed their positions directly or indirectly "to expressions of the democratic process through a free ballot with universal sufferage." (p. 265) In addition to public officials, leadership was exercised by individual "specialists," who confined their participation to one or two issue areas, and "meteors," who were selfselected activists participating sporadically in one or two issue areas. Leaders very often competed among themselves and did not appear united by any common interest. Persons exercising leadership were of somewhat higher social status than the rest of the community, but it was not status or wealth which distinguished leaders from nonleaders. What are leaders? "Leaders are activists. More precisely they are the most active activists." (p. 282) Anyone could become a leader simply by becoming active; power was available for the asking. Inequalities of influence among individuals was a product of differing levels of interest and activity in public affairs.

The elitist-pluralist debate continues to characterize dialogues about community power. No doubt many readers of Wildavsky's book will not share his optimism about pluralism, competition, fluidity, access, and equality in community politics. Wildavsky's definition of elitism is so restrictive and his definition of pluralism so inclusive, that he is foreordained to conclude that any set of power relationships he discovered in Oberlin were pluralist. He assumes elitism to exist only if the same individuals possess exclusive control over every public decision, and only if there is no competition among persons exercising influence. Now it is doubtful if there was ever a society in which there was no competition among influentials, or in which specialists in particular issue areas did not influence the outcome of public decisions. Wildavsky's concept of elitism comes dangerously close to being made of straw. His concept of pluralism is so all-inclusive that it possesses little analytical usefulness. The author himself demonstrates this when he proclaims on the basis of his Oberlin findings that all cities in America are pluralist.

Wildavsky might have made a greater contribution to the study of community power if, instead of treating elitism and pluralism as a dichotomous variable, he had thought of these constructs as ideal types at separate ends of a continuum. He then could have identified those characteristics of Oberlin politics which resembled each of these constructs, and in this way Oberlin could have been located along an elitist-pluralist continuum. No doubt decision-making in Oberlin is quite pluralist, yet Wildavsky's material includes some important resemblances to the elitist construct. The total number of identified influentials was an extremely small proportion of the adult population, "cliques" were identified whose influence rested upon control of economic resources as well as political skill, and apathy if not alienation was widespread in the community. Wildavsky appears to reject the elitist view that power is a set of social relationships among people which persists over time and which is related to the social structure of the community. He views power in Oberlin as an unstructured, transient thing. Each public decision involves different individuals who establish for a fleeting moment a set of relationships among themselves. After each decision these relationships disappear to be replaced by a different set of relationships among different people when the next public decision must be made. This comes very close to saving that power as structure does not exist. It suggests that power is an attribute of individuals, more specifically their interest and activity level. Yet the reader suspects that even in Oberlin decisions are not sui generis, that some power relations persist over time, and that they are somehow related to the social structure of the community. Wildavsky might have written an even better book had he not rejected altogether the contributions to community analysis which elite theory can make. THOMAS R. DYE, University of Georgia.

Interest Groups in American Society. By HARMON ZEIGLER. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, 1964. Pp. viii, 343. $6.75.)

The author's command of the relevant literature and his ability to handle it with sophistication are impressive. However, the book is hard to judge largely because of the kind of book that it is: a text which moves on a much higher level than do most textbooks.

Zeigler asserts at the outset that the "intention of group theory has been misinterpreted, on occasion, as the establishment of a broad-gauge theory of the political process..." (p. iii) Group theory properly understood assumes rather that "public policy is formed as a result of competing pressures..." (p. iv) and that organized groups furnish only a part of the pressures. The problem is to develop a "theory of the role of organized groups in politics." (p. iv) More specific questions are when do organized groups become part of the pressures on a decision and why do some groups have more success than their rivals.

Before attacking the main problem and the questions it implies Zeigler re-enforces and extends his interpretation of the received theory. He observes, "Surely it would be useless to maintain that all public policy is a result of the conflict of organized 'pressure groups,'" (p.24) and accepts the view that opposing conceptions of the public interest when held by involved officials are factors affecting decisions just as are the activities of 'pressure groups.' I take it that Zeigler feels these propositions are a part of group theory interpreted fairly. Zeigler also endorses the criticism of group theory that "it does not provide an accurate account of the role of institutions and environmental conditions," (p. 25) particularly political culture. Finally, he feels the most serious misunderstanding concerning group theory involves the notion of interest. Zeigler's position is that group interests are not co-extensive with organized associations. Some members of an organization may not endorse its stated aims while other persons not members of the organization may agree with its aims. The author summarizes by saying, "Public policy, then, is formed as a result of the interplay of group interests. We are concerned with the role that organized 'pressure groups' play in this process." (p. 30)

Succeeding sections of the book describe the political culture and the institutional context within which these groups move. A set of three chapters deal with business, labor, and agriculture. The discussion of labor is headed, "Organized Labor: Protest and Defeat," a title which reflects the author's judgment concerning the group's power. This judgement is based, at least, in part on a comparison of labor's goals with the content of public policy, a technique for measuring influence which is open to criticism as the author concedes and which is certainly crude at best. The last chapters deal with the place of organized groups in the legislative, administrative, and judicial processes. As one might expect, these chapters are a bit uneven, a condition which reflects the state of the literature and no failure of the author.

I have three comments. First, Zeigler's interpretation of received interest group theory is informed and skillful but debatable. For instance, it may be argued that group theorists did intend a "broad-gauge theory" and certainly more than a theory concerning the activity of organized groups in politics. Again it may be argued that the received theory does involve the contention that the sum total of pressures on a policy decision is furnished by groups, organized and unorganized, official and unofficial, and that competing conceptions of the public interest are "superstructure" (to borrow a term from another theory). If Truman is taken as the text, it is a mistake to say that group theorists have neglected the impact of institutions on the group struggle. However, an argument concerning the true meanings of the group theorists or their interpreters is not inviting nor is it crucial since Zeigler's discussion of group theorists is for the purpose of setting forth his own starting point; and this leads to the second comment.

His version of group theory is a very modest one. Such modesty may be an adornment in a textbook, but this is theoretical retreat rather than advance. Instead of a limited number of explanatory statements employing more or less theoretical terms we are left with something much more diffuse and also less extensive. One may guess that the residue is called theory by virtue of the strange uses to which we put the term theory (in this book review as elsewhere). Perhaps group theory has collapsed and in reality this is all that is left. However, it seems that despite our alleged familiarity with what may be one of the few legitimate offspring of our discipline that there has been great willingness to destroy by criticism and little willingness to reformulate and use with rigor, in other words, to develop.

My last comment is that Zeigler's survey of the literature concerning the activities of organized pressure groups is on a mature level in that the complexities are retained. It is done with clarity and in good order, qualities which serve to recommend the text for use.—Thomas A. Flinn, Oberlin College.

The Constitution of the United States. By Edward Dumbauld. (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1964. Pp. xv, 502. $9.95.)

A clause-by-clause history and annotation of the Constitution by the United States judge for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

The American Legislative Process: Congress and the States. By William J. Keefe and Morris S. Ogul. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1964. Pp. vii, 498. $7.95.)

A textbook describing the American legislative process topically with illustrations from both Congress and the state legislatures.

America Votes, Vol. 5, 1962. Ed. By RICHARD M. Scammon. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1964. Pp. 456. $12.50.)

The fifth volume of this useful and carefully done series contains state, city, county and ward break-downs of voting for President, governor, senator, and representative in 1960 and 1962.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Franklin L. Burdette University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Anderson, Lee F. Variability in the Unidimensionality of Legislative Voting [in Congress]. Journal of Politics. August, 1964.

Branyan, Robert L., and R. Alton Lee. Lyndon B. Johnson and the Art of the Possible. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Burdette, Franklin L. Congress, the People, and Administration. Public Administration Review. December, 1964.

Carleton, William G. Kennedy in History: An Early Appraisal. Antioch Review. Fall, 1964.

Christian, Jane M. The Navajo. Southwestern Studies. Fall, 1964.

Duncan, John Paul. Res Publica Quam Bonum, Res Publica Quam Liberum. Oklahoma Law Review. August, 1964.

George, B. J. The United States in the Ryukyus: The Insular Cases Revived. New York University Law Review. November, 1964.

Johnson, Herbert A. Impeachment and Politics. South Atlantic Quarterly, Autumn, 1964.

Law, Science, and Technology: A Symposium. George Washington Law Review. October, 1964.

Neil, William M. The American Territorial System since the Civil War: A Summary Analysis. Indiana Magazine of History. September, 1964.

Neustadt, Richard E. Kennedy in the Presidency: A Premature Appraisal. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1964.

Saloma, John S., III. The Responsible Use of Power: A Critical Analysis of the Congressional Budget Process. American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, Washington, D. C. 1964.

Stevenson, Adlai E. The Darkest Shadow: Man's Ability to Annihilate Himself. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1964.

Witmer, T. Richard. The Aging of the House [of Representatives]. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

State Government

Faust, Martin L. The Constitution and the Administrative Structure [in Missouri]. Research Center, University of Missouri. 1964.

Fordham, Jefferson B. A Spur for the States [for Legislative Improvement]. National Civic Review. October, 1964.

Forrest, Edward. Apportionment by Computer. American Behavioral Scientist. December, 1964. Garrity, Thomas A. Separation of Powers Doctrine in New Mexico. Natural Resources Journal. October, 1964.

Guild, Frederic H. Legislative Councils after Thirty Years. Public Affairs Research Bureau, Southern Illinois University, 1964.

Hagensick, A. Clarke. Flouting Their Own Law [against Other State Positions for Maryland Legislators]. National Civic Review. October, 1964.

Jensen, James R. Legislative Apportionment in Texas. Public Affairs Research Center, University of Houston. 1964.

Johnson, Carlyn E. Taxing Interstate Commerce: A New Experience in Indiana. Notre Dame Lawyer. August, 1964.

Kelso, Paul. State Budget Preparation in Arizona. Institute of Government Research, University of Arizona. 1964.

Morris, Willie. Legislating in Texas. Commentary. November, 1964,

Riggs, Robert E. Vox Populi: The Battle of 103 [Constitutional Amendment]. Institute of Local Government, University of Arizona. 1964.

Swanson, Thor. A State [Alaska] in Emergency. National Civic Review. October, 1964.

Tanzer, Michael D. State and Local Government Debt in the Postwar Period. Review of Economics and Statistics. August, 1964.

Local Government

Bugge, Lawrence J. Wisconsin Municipal Indebtedness. Wisconsin Law Review. July, 1964.

Feinberg, Mordecai S. The Implications of Core-City Decline for the Fiscal Structure of the Core-City. National Tax Journal. September, 1964.

Gottlieb, Manuel. The Milwaukee Waterworks Expansion: A Case Study in Urban Investment Planning. Public Administration Review. December, 1964.

Hays, Samuel P. The Politics of Reform in Municipal Government in the Progressive Era. Pacific Northwest Quarterly. October, 1964.

McQuillan, John P. Municipal Fair Employment Ordinances as a Valid Exercise of the Police Power. Notre Dame Lawyer. August, 1964.

Stutz, Robert L. Collective Bargaining by City Employees. Labor Law Journal. November, 1964.

Wright, Deil S., and Robert W. Marker. A

Half-Century of Local Finances: The Case of Iowa. National Tax Journal. September, 1964.

Zeidler, Frank. Essays in More Effective Urban Renewal. Institute of Governmental Affairs, University of Wisconsin. 1964.

Intergovernmental Relations

Campbell, Alan K., and Seymour Sacks. Administering the Spread City. Public Administration Review. September, 1964.

Dvorin, Eugene P. Foreign Aid by States [California]. National Civic Review. December, 1964

Hanson, Royce. The Politics of Metropolitan Cooperation: Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments. Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies. 1964.

Holden, Matthew, Jr. The Governance of the Metropolis as a Problem in Diplomacy. Journal of Politics. August, 1964.

Kolasa, Bernard D. Interstate Compacts and Congress: The Port of New York Authority Case. State Government. Autumn, 1964.

Leach, Richard H. Atlanta Area Faces Problems of Growth. National Civic Review. November, 1964.

Penjerdel Adaptability Study. 4 Parts. Pennsylvania Economy League, Philadelphia. 1964.

Porter, Dean A. Interlocal Fiscal Relationships. Municipal Finance. November, 1964.

Thursby, Vincent V., and Annie Mary Hartsfield. Federal Grant-in-Aid Programs in Florida. Institute of Governmental Research, Florida State University. 1964.

Walker, David B. Federalism Today. National Civic Review. November, 1964.

Warren, Robert. Political Form and Metropolitan Reform. Public Administration Review. September, 1964.

Weissbourd, Bernard. Segregation, Subsidies, and Megalopolis. Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. 1964.

Zeidenstein, Harvey G. Federal Grant-in-Aid Programs in Illinois. Illinois Legislative Council. 1964.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Anastaplo, George. Freedom of Speech and the First Amendment. University of Detroit Law Journal. October, 1964.

Andrain, Charles F. A Scale Analysis of Senators' Attitudes toward Civil Rights. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1964.

Applebaum, Harvey M. Miscegenation Statutes: A Constitutional and Social Problem. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1964.

Apportionment and the Courts—A Synopsis and Prognosis: Herein of Gerrymanders and Other Dragons. Northwestern University Law Review. September-October, 1964.

Birkby, Robert H., and Walter F. Murphy. Interest Group Conflict in the Judicial Arena: The First Amendment and Group Access to the Courts. Texas Law Review. October, 1964.

Boyd, William J. D. Apportionment Facts. National Civic Review. November, 1964.

Carpenter, Richard. Reapportionment—A Hollow Victory. Public Management. October, 1964.

The Controversy over the U. S. Supreme Court's "School Prayer" Decisions. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. November, 1964.

Cramton, Roger C. The Powers of the Michigan Civil Rights Commission. Michigan Law Review. November, 1964.

Duncan, John B., and Albert Mindlin. Municipal Fair Housing Legislation: Community Beliefs and Facts. Phylon. Fall, 1964.

Emerson, Thomas I. Freedom of Association and Freedom of Expression. Yale Law Journal. November, 1964.

Falk, Richard A. The Complexity of Sabbatino. American Journal of International Law. October, 1964.

Figinski, M. Albert. Military Chaplains—A Constitutionally Permissible Accommodation between Church and State. Maryland Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Frantz, Laurent B. Congressional Power to Enforce the Fourteenth Amendment against Private Acts. Yale Law Journal. July, 1964.

Gellhorn, Walter. A Decade of Desegregation—Retrospect and Prospect. Utah Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Herrmann, Klaus J. Some Considerations on the Constitutionality of the United States Military Chaplaincy. American University Law Review. December, 1964.

Kim, Richard C. C. The Constitution, the Supreme Court, and Religious Liberty. Journal of Church and State. Autumn, 1964.

Nelson, William E. Section 1983: A Civil Remedy for the Protection of Federal Rights. New York University Law Review. November, 1964.

Nolan, Bijou C. The Unions, Free Speech, and the Shopping Center. Southern California Law Review. Vol. 37, No. 4, 1964.

Rice, Charles E. The Meaning of "Religion" in the School Prayer Cases. *American Bar Associa*tion Journal. November, 1964.

Rudolph, Wallace M. The Reapportionment Cases A Conservative Defense of Individual Rights. Nebraska Law Review. July, 1964.

Sax, Joseph L. Takings and the Police Power. Yale Law Journal. November, 1964.

School Prayer and the Becker Amendment. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1964.

Self-Incrimination and the States: Restriking the Balance. Yale Law Journal. July, 1964.

Sit-In Cases of 1964—A Constitutional Right to Public Accommodations? Georgetown Law Journal. Fall. 1964.

The Supreme Court, 1963 Term. Harvard Law Review. November, 1964.

Symposium: Constitutional Problems in the Administration of Criminal Law. Northwestern University Law Review. November-December, 1964

Tarrow, Sidney G. Lochner versus New York: A Political Analysis. Labor History, Fall, 1964.

White, Welsh S. Effective Consent to Search and Seizure. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. December, 1964.

Working Rules for Assuring Nondiscrimination in Hospital Administration. Yale Law Journal. November, 1964.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Arnold, Richard S. The Power of State Courts to Enjoin Federal Officers. Yale Law Journal. July, 1964.

Barndt, Richard V. Language and Logic in the Law. Texas Law Review. November, 1964.

Bates, Frederic L., and Raymond Payne. Parole in Georgia: A Study of Factors Involved in Revocation. Institute of Law and Government, University of Georgia. 1964.

——, and Frank K. Gibson. Literature on Parole. Institute of Law and Government, University of Georgia. 1964.

Bloustein, Edward J. Logic and Legal Realism: The Realist as a Frustrated Idealist. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1964.

Burger, Warren E. Who Will Watch the Watchman? American University Law Review. December, 1964.

The Changing Role of the Jury in the Nineteenth Century. Yale Law Journal. November, 1964.

Currie, David P. The Three-Judge District Court in Constitutional Litigation. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1964.

Daly, John Charles. Ensuring Fair Trials and a Free Press. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1964.

Donnici, Peter J. The Amendment of Pleadings—A Study of the Operation of Judicial Discretion in the Federal Courts. Southern California Law Review. Vol. 37, No. 4, 1964.

Extradition Habeas Corpus. Yale Law Journal. November, 1964.

Federal Regulation of Firearms Sales. University of Chicago Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Fenton, William B. District Courts in Kansas.

Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1964.

Findlay, Robert C. What Constitutes Punishment? Notre Dame Lawyer. August, 1964.

Gibson, Frank K. A General Overview of Parole, Probation and Penal Administration in Georgia. Institute of Law and Government, University of Georgia. 1964.

Grossman, Joel B. The Role of the American Bar Association in the Selection of Federal Judges: Episodic Involvement to Institutionalized Power. Vanderbilt Law Review. June, 1964.

Indigent Defendants. [Symposium.] Missouri Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Kalven, Harry, Jr. The Dignity of the Civil Jury. Virginia Law Review. October, 1964.

Kaufman, Irving R. The Uncertain Criminal Law. Atlantic. January, 1965.

Martin, William B. Modern Mettle: The Misconstrued Morality. Kentucky Law Journal. Vol. 52, No. 4. 1964.

Meador, Daniel J. Accommodating State Criminal Procedure and Federal Postconviction Review. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1964.

Moore, James William. Problems of the Federal Judiciary. Tennessee Law Review. Summer, 1964.

——, and Donald T. Weckstein. Diversity Jurisdiction: Past, Present, and Future. Texas Law Review. November, 1964.

Official Inducements to Plead Guilty: Suggested Morals for a Marketplace. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1964.

Packer, Herbert L. Two Models of the Criminal Process. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1964.

Potter, Roy E. The Case for Interrogatories Accompanying a General Verdict. Kentucky Law Journal. Vol. 52, No. 4. 1964.

Procedural Protections of the Criminal Defendant—A Reevaluation of the Privilege against Self-Incrimination and the Rule Excluding Evidence of Propensity to Commit Crime. Harvard Law Review. December, 1964.

The Proposed Penal Law of New York. Columbia Law Review. December, 1964.

The Prosecutor's Constitutional Duty to Reveal Evidence to the Defendant. Yale Law Journal. November, 1964.

Quinney, Richard. Crime in Political Perspective. American Behavioral Scientist. December, Roseman, Samuel I. A Better Way to Select Judges. Journal of the American Judicature Society. October, 1964.

Shaffer, Thomas L. Appellate Courts and Prejudiced Verdicts. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. October, 1964.

Shafroth, Will. The New Criminal Justice Act.

American Bar Association Journal. November, 1964.

Symposium: Habeas Corpus—Proposals for Reform. Utah Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Thompson, Samuel M. The Authority of Law. Ethics. October, 1964.

Tompkins, Dorothy C. Bail in the United States: A Bibliography. Institute of Governmental Studies, University of California, Berkeley. 1964.

Uhlenhopp, Harvey. The Integrated Trial Court. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1964.

Vann, Carl R., and Fred Morganroth. Psychiatrists and the Competence to Stand Trial. University of Detroit Law Journal. October, 1964.

Wright, Charles Alan. Proposed Changes in Federal Civil, Criminal, and Appellate Procedure. Tennessee Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Public Administration and Administrative Law Bailey, Stephen K. Ethics and the Public Service. Public Administration Review. December, 1964.

Blaine, Harry R., Eugene C. Hagburg, and Frederick A. Zeller. The Grievance Procedure and Its Application in the United States Postal Service. Labor Law Journal. November, 1964.

Coleman, Jack W., and David C. Dellinger. Incentive Contracting. Air University Review. November-December, 1964.

Corson, John J. Should Our Public Executives Get Better Salaries? Public Personnel Review. October, 1964.

Cuneo, Gilbert A., and Eldon H. Crowell. Parallel Jurisdiction: If the Court of Claims Can, Why Not the Administrative Boards? Fordham Law Review. December, 1964.

Douglas, George V. The Theory of Leadership. Public Personnel Review. October, 1964.

Elman, Philip. Agency Decision-Making: Adjudication by the Federal Trade Commission. Food-Drug-Cosmetic Law Journal. October, 1964.

———. Rulemaking Procedures in the FTC's Enforcement of the Merger Law. Harvard Law Review. December, 1964.

Emmerich, Herbert. The Specific Gravity of Decisionism. Public Administration Review. December, 1964.

Fellows, Erwin W. Merit System Trends and Problems: Some Underlying Cultural Values. Public Personnel Review. October, 1964.

Government Contracts Disputes: An Institutional Approach. Yale Law Journal. July, 1964.

Governmental Decision Making. [Symposium.] Public Administration Review. September, 1964.

Hebal, John J. Training and Development [of Personnell in the Pacific Northwest: British Columbia, Oregon, and Washington. Canadian Public Administration. June, 1964.

Indik, Bernard P. The Relationship between Organization Size and Supervision Ratio. Administrative Science Quarterly. December, 1964, Jacoby, Sidney B. The Effect of Recent Changes in the Law of "Nonstatutory" Judicial Review. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1964.

Kray, Dorothy J. California Tax Court: An Approach to Progressive Tax Administration. Southern California Law Review. Vol. 37, No. 4. 1964.

Lumbard, Eliot H. Encouraging Integrity in Office. Citizens Union Research Foundation, N. Y. 1964.

Moan, Charles E., Jr. Public Employee Training on the State Level in the United States. Bureau of Government Research, University of Rhode Island. 1964.

Newland, Chester A. Trends in Public Employee Unionization. Journal of Politics. August, 1964.

An 'Ombudsman' for America? [Symposium by Albert H. Rosenthal and Donald C. Rowat.] Public Administration Review. December, 1964.

Phillips, Barbara Ashley. The Oregon Tax Court: Some Thoughts on Its First Decisions. Oregon Law Review. June, 1963. [1964.]

Schaller, Lyle E. Is the Citizen Advisory Committee a Threat to Representative Government? Public Administration Review. September, 1964.

Schwartz, Michael. The Reciprocities Multiplier [in Rule Enforcement]: An Empirical Evaluation. Administrative Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Stanley, David T. Excellence in Public Service—How Do You Really Know? Public Administration Review. September, 1964.

Stepanek, Michael, Jr. Implied Powers of Federal Agencies to Order Divestiture. Notre Dame Lawyer. August, 1964.

Stone, Julius. The Twentieth Century Administrative Explosion and After. California Law Review. August, 1964.

Thomas, James C. An Answer to Regulation Critics—Control of Administrative Agencies. Tulsa Law Journal. June, 1964.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion Adamany, David. The Size-of-Place Analysis Reconsidered. Western Political Quarterly. September. 1964.

American Presidential Elections. [Symposium.] Current History. October, 1964.

Bagdikian, Ben H. How Newspapers Use Columnists. Columbia Journalism Review. Fall, 1964. Ball, Donald W. Covert Political Rebellion as Ressentiment. Social Forces. October, 1964.

Bemis, James L., and Gerald M. Phillips. A Phenomenological Approach to Communication Theory. Speech Teacher. November, 1964.

Blaisdell, Lowell L. Cluseret and the Fremont Campaign of 1864. Mid-America. October, 1964.

Bonjean, Charles M. Class, Status, and Power Reputation. Sociology and Social Research. October, 1964.

—, and David M. Olson. Community Leadership: Directions of Research. Administrative Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Chrislock, Carl H. A Cycle in the History of Minnesota Republicanism [1892-1902]. Minnesota History. Fall, 1964.

Coleman, James, et al. Computers and Election Analysis: The New York Times Project. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1964.

Danzger, M. Herbert. Community Power Structure: Problems and Continuities. American Sociological Review. October, 1964.

Davis, Allen F. Settlement Workers in Politics, 1890-1914. Review of Politics. October, 1964.

Emery, Edwin. Press Support for Johnson and Goldwater. Journalism Quarterly. Autumn, 1964

Fair, Daryl R. Party Strength and Political Patronage. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Fattu, N. A., and V. R. Rao Uppuluri. On a Bias in Voting. American Statistician. December, Flynn, James R. The U. S. Peace Movement: Its Electoral Prospects. Political Science. March, 1964.

Gerber, George. Ideological Perspectives and Political Tendencies in News Reporting. *Journal*ism Quarterly. Autumn, 1964.

Grantham, Dewey W., Jr. The Progressive Era and the Reform Tradition. Mid-America. October, 1964

Haley, Vincent P. Limitations on Political Activities of Corporations. Villanova Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Hofferbert, Richard I. Classification of American State Party Systems. Journal of Politics. August, 1964.

Hofstadter, Richard. The Paranoid Style in American Politics. Harper's Magazine. November, 1964

Jones, Charles O. Inter-Party Competition for Congressional Seats, Western Political Quarterly. September, 1964.

Mabee, Carleton. The Crisis in Negro Leadership. Antioch Review. Fall, 1964.

Marascuilo, Leonard A., and Harriett Amster. Survey of 1961-1962 Congressional Polls. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1964. Morgenthau, Hans J. Modern Science and Political Power. Columbia Law Review. December, 1964.

Prince, Carl E. Patronage and a Party Machine: New Jersey Democratic-Republican Activists, 1801-1816. William and Mary Quarterly. October, 1964.

Rankin, Robert E., and Eugene A. Quarrick. Personality and Attitude toward a Political Event. Journal of Individual Psychology. November, 1964.

Raymond, Harold B. Ben Butler: A Reappraisal. Colby Library Quarterly. September, 1964.

Reed, Roy. How to Lynch a Newspaper [in Arkansas Politics]. Atlantic. October, 1964.

Schubert, Glendon. The Power of Organized Minorities in a Small Group. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1964.

Seligman, Lester G. Elite Recruitment and Political Development. Journal of Politics. August, 1964

Sigel, Roberta S. Effect of Partisanship on the Perception of Political Candidates. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1964.

Silva, Ruth G. Compared Values of the Singleand the Multi-Member Legislative District. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1964.

Simon, Herbert A., and Allen Newell. Information Processing in Computer and Man. American Scientist. September, 1964.

Statute Restricting Political Activity of Public Employees [in California] Held Unconstitutional. New York University Law Review. November, 1964.

Steelman, Joseph F. Jonathan Elwood Cox and North Carolina's Gubernatorial Campaign of 1908. North Carolina Historical Review. Autumn, 1964.

Strawson, P. F. Intention and Convention in Speech Acts. Philosophical Review. October, 1964.

Wells, Henry. Paying for Elections [in Puerto Rico]. National Civic Review. November, 1964.

Wilkins, B. Hughel. The Political Economy of the Sales Tax Issue: A [Political] Test in Texas. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Young, Alfred. The Mechanics and the Jeffersonians: New York, 1789-1801. Labor History. Fall, 1964.

Zinn, Howard. Abolitionists and Freedom Riders: The Tactics of Agitation. Columbia University Forum. Summer, 1964.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Alhadeff, David A., et al. The Commission on Money and Credit's Research Studies: A Collective Review Article. Journal of Finance. September, 1964.

Aliber, Robert Z., and Herbert Stein. The Price of U. S. Exports and the Mix of U. S. Direct and Indirect Taxes. American Economic Review. September, 1964.

Burress, Glenn E. The Initial Effect of the 1964 Tax Cut on Consumer Spending. National Tax Journal. September, 1964.

Controversy over Federal Programs to Relieve Unemployment in the U.S. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. October, 1964.

Etzioni, Amitai. Getting R & D Out of Orbit. American Behavioral Scientist. October, 1964.

Harbrecht, Paul P., S. J. The Modern Corporation Revisited. Columbia Law Review. December, 1964.

Klein, William A. A Proposal to Simplify the Income Tax Rate Structure. Wisconsin Law Review. July, 1964.

Robinson, Warren C. Benefits Received Financing in the Federal Fiscal System. National Tax Journal. September, 1964.

Rose, Arnold M. The New Problem of Large-Scale Unemployability. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. October, 1964.

Smiler, N. J. Long-Term Unemployment, the Structural Hypothesis, and Public Policy. American Economic Review. December, 1964.

Thomas, Morgan D. The Export Base and Development Stages Theories of Regional Economic Growth: An Appraisal. Land Economics. November, 1964.

Natural Resources

Ciriacy-Wantrup, S. V. The "New" Competition for Land and Some Implications for Public Policy. Natural Resources Journal. October, 1964.

Eveleth, Peter Ames. An Appraisal of Techniques to Preserve Open Space. Villanova Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Hagman, Donald G. Open Space Planning and Property Taxation—Some Suggestions. Wisconsin Law Review. July, 1964.

Land-Use Symposium. Iowa Law Review, Winter, 1965.

Lovejoy, Wallace F. Oil Conservation in a New Setting. Natural Resources Journal. October, 1964.

Nash, Gerald D. The California State Land Office, 1858-1898. Huntington Library Quarterly. August, 1964.

Pagter, Carl R., and Cameron W. Wolfe, Jr. Lake Tahoe: The Future of a National Asset—Land Use, Water, and Pollution. California Law Review. August, 1964.

Roth, Bernhard A. Water's Everywhere [in Somerset County, Maryland]. National Civic Review. December, 1964.

Sewell, W. R. Derrick. The Columbia River

Treaty and Protocol Agreement. Natural Resources Journal. October, 1964.

Spilhaus, Athelstan. Oceanography: A Wet and Wondrous Journey. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. December, 1964.

Vaughn, Gerald F. In Search of Standards for Preserving Open Space. *Public Administration Re*view. December, 1964.

Agriculture

Bernstein, Barton J. The Postwar Famine and Price Control, 1946. Agricultural History. October, 1964.

Blackmore, John. Rural Economic Development—Some Lessons from the Past. Journal of Farm Economics. November, 1964.

Breimyer, Harold F. Government Service in Farm Product Marketing. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. Autumn, 1964.

Davies, Richard O. The Politics of Desperation: William A. Hirth and the Presidential Election of 1932. Agricultural History. October, 1964.

Dykstra, Robert R. Town-Country Conflict: A Hidden Dimension in American Social History. Ibid.

Icanes, Raymond A. Government Programs Which Counteract the Trade Restrictive Effects of Foreign Food Laws. Food-Drug-Cosmetic Law Journal. October, 1964.

Shover, John L. The Communist Party and the Midwest Farm Crisis of 1933. Journal of American History. September, 1964.

Business and Labor

Aaron, Benjamin. Labor Injunctions in the State Courts—Part I: A Survey. Virginia Law Review. October, 1964.

American Government-Business. [Symposium.] Business History Review. Summer, 1964.

Arnold, Thurman. A Reply to "Farewell to Grand Juries in Antitrust Litigation." American Bar Association Journal. October, 1964.

Atleson, James B. The NLRB and Jurisdictional Disputes: The Aftermath of CBS. Georgetown Law Journal. Fall, 1964.

Auerbach, Jerold S. The La Follette Committee: Labor and Civil Liberties in the New Deal. Journal of American History. December, 1964.

Barber, Richard J. Technological Change in American Transportation: The Role of Government Action. Virginia Law Review. June, 1964.

Bok, Derek C. The Regulation of Campaign Tactics in Representation Elections under the National Labor Relations Act. Harvard Law Review. November, 1964.

Discrimination and the NLRB: The Scope of Board Power under Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(b)(2). University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1964.

The Enforcement of the Right of Access in Mass Picketing Situations. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1964.

Fleming, R. W. The Labor Arbitration Process: 1943-1963. Kentucky Law Journal. Vol. 52, No. 4. 1964.

Goodman, Stephen M. The Availability and Reviewability of Rulings of the Internal Revenue Service. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1964.

Hale, G. E. Prices, Profits and Prestige. Washington and Lee Law Review. Fall, 1964.

——, and Rosemary D. Reciprocity under the Antitrust Laws: A Comment. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1964.

Handler, Milton. Recent Antitrust Developments—1964. Michigan Law Review. November, 1964.

Hed-Hofmann, Tamar. The Maloney Act Experiment. Boston College Industrial and Commercial Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Hemleben, Sylvester John. Mississippi Workmen's Compensation: Selected Cases. Department of Research in Business and Government, University of Mississippi. 1964.

Hendrick, James Pomeroy. The United States Antidumping Act. American Journal of International Law. October, 1964.

Hickey, Robert John. Government Regulation of Inter-Union Work-Assignment Disputes. South Carolina Law Review. Vol. 16, No. 3, 1964.

Jaeger, Walter H. E. Product Liability: The Constructive Warranty. Notre Dame Lawyer. August, 1964.

Jones, William K. Licensing of Domestic Air Transportation. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Spring, 1964.

Kovarsky, Irving. State Piggyback Statutes and Federalism. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. October, 1964.

——. Union Security, Hiring Halls, Right-to-Work Laws and the Supreme Court. Labor Law Journal. October, 1964.

Kuhlman, John M. Incremental Decision-Making and Antitrust Policy. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Levitan, Sar A. Reducing Worktime as a Means to Combat Unemployment. W. E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research. 1964.

Lewis, Willard A. Unemployment Compensation Law in Labor Disputes. W. E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, 1964.

McCulloch, Frank W. An Evaluation of the Remedies Available to the NLRB. Labor Law Journal. December, 1964.

Product Simulation: A Right or a Wrong? [Symposium.] Columbia Law Review. November, 1964.

Rosen, Sanford J. The Individual Worker in Grievance Arbitration. Maryland Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Schwartz, Alan. Procedural Arbitrability under Section 301 of the LMRA. Yale Law Journal. July, 1964.

The Securities Act Amendments of 1964: Effect on the Over-the-Counter Market. St. John's Law Review. December, 1964.

Simon, Sidney I. Cost Accounting and the Law. Accounting Review. October, 1964.

Unfair Competition: Protection of Commercial Property Rights against Foreign and Domestic Practices. [Symposium.] St. John's Law Review. December, 1964.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Austern, H. Thomas. Drug Regulation and the Public Health. New York University Law Review. November, 1964.

Bernzweig, Eli P. Public Law 87-693: An Analysis and Interpretation of the Federal Medical Care Recovery Act. Columbia Law Review. November. 1964.

Brennan, William J., Jr. Education and the Bill of Rights. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. December, 1964.

Cahn, Edgar S., and Jean C. The War on Poverty: A Civilian Perspective. Yale Law Journal. July, 1964.

Caldwell, Lynton K. Biopolitics: Science, Ethics, and Public Policy. Yale Review. Autumn, 1964.

Clement, Roland C. The Report on Pesticide Use. Natural Resources Journal. October, 1964.

The Contemporary University. [Symposium.] Dædalus. Fall, 1964.

Dambach, Charles A. A Review of the Report of the Committee on Environmental Health Problems to the Surgeon General. National Resources Journal. October, 1964.

Edwalds, Robert M. Functions of the State Mental Hospital as a Social Institution. Mental Hygiene. October, 1964.

Felix, Robert H. The National Mental Health Program. Journal of Public Health. November, 1964

Goldhammer, Keith, and Frank Farner. The Jackson County Story: A Case Study. Center for the Advanced Study of Educational Administration, University of Oregon. 1964.

Good Samaritans and Liability for Medical Malpractice. Columbia Law Review. November, 1964.

Gordon, Sanford D., and Dennis M. Shea. A Political Profile of the Rural Social Studies Teacher. Social Education. October, 1964.

Hoffman, Martin. Reflections on Narcotics Addiction. Yale Review. Autumn, 1964.

Kerr, Norman D. (pseudonym). The School Board as an Agency of Legitimation. Sociology of Education. Fall, 1964.

Lipset, Seymour Martin. Sociology and Political Science: A Bibliographical Note. American Sociological Review. October, 1964.

Moskow, Michael H. Collective Bargaining for Public School Teachers. Labor Law Journal. December, 1964.

Nam, Charles B. Impact of the "GI Bills" on the Educational Level of the Male Population. Social Forces. October, 1964.

O'Connell, John D. The Right to Die—A Comment on the Application of the President and Directors of Georgetown College. Utah Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Pleasure Boating and the Law: A Symposium. Temple Law Quarterly. Summer, 1964.

The Question of a Separate Federal Program for the Development of "Appalachia." [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. December, 1964.

Rheingold, Paul D. Products Liability—The Ethical Drug Manufacturer's Liability. Rutgers Law Review. Summer, 1964.

Riecker, John E. Foundations and the Patman Committee Report. Michigan Law Review. November, 1964.

Rogers, Richard B. Public Control of Private Sectarian Institutions Receiving Public Funds. Ibid

Rourke, Francis E., and Glenn E. Brooks. The "Managerial Revolution" in Higher Education. Administrative Science Quarterly. September, 1964.

Science and Culture. [Symposium.] Dædalus. Winter, 1965.

Selby, Earl and Anne. Wyoming Cleans Up [Unemployment Compensation]. National Civic Review. December, 1964.

Symposium on Medical Malpractice. Ohio State Law Journal. Summer, 1964.

Terry, Luther L. The Health Officer and Medical Care Administration. Journal of Public Health. November, 1964.

Tonkin, Leo S. Federal Research and the Universities. Johns Hopkins Magazine. October, 1964.

Wildman, Wesley A. Collective Action by Public School Teachers. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. October, 1964.

Military Affairs and National Security

Aron, Raymond. The Spread of Nuclear Weapons. Atlantic. January, 1965.

Avins, Alfred. Accused's Right to Defense Counsel before a Military Court. University of Detroit Law Journal. October, 1964.

Bergstrom, Robert W. Antitrust Immunity or Exemption for Activities Involving Government Contracts—"Weapon Systems" and "Team Bidding." Northwestern University Law Review. September-October, 1964.

Box, Clyde. United States Strike Command. Air University Review. September-October, 1964.

Brown, George W. Generals and the Public: Recent Policymaking in Civil-Military Relations. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1964.

Falk, Stanley L. The National Security Council under Truman, Eisenhower, and Kennedy. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1964.

Feld, Bernard T. The Nonproliferation of Nuclear Weapons. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. December, 1964.

Jones, Douglas N. Economic Aspects of Military Assistance. Air University Review. November-December, 1964.

Peck, Darrell L. The Use of Force to Protect Government Property. Military Law Review. October, 1964.

Stone, Jeremy J. Bomber Disarmament. World Politics. October, 1964.

Webb, John F., Jr. Military Searches and Seizures—The Development of a Constitutional Right. Military Law Review. October, 1964.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Extend and Amend the Sugar Act. Hearing. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

- Watershed Projects. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ———. Committee on Education and Labor. Amendments to Davis-Bacon Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ————. Public Employment Service. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Committee on Government Operations. Drug Safety. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ------. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Cigarette Labeling and Advertising. Hearings. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- Tax Assessments on Common Carrier Property. Hearing before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

- mittee. 2 vols. House Report No. 1480. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Ocean Transportation of Grain to Russia. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Committee on Public Works. Watershed Development Projects—1964. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Committee on Un-American Activities. Communist Activities in the Buffalo, N. Y., Area. Hearings. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Select Committee on Government Research. Documentation and Dissemination of Research and Development Results. House Report No. 1932, 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ————. Federal Facilities for Research and Development. House Report No. 1931. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- Higher Education. House Report No. 1933. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ————. Manpower for Research and Development. House Report No. 1907. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- Government Small Business and Procurement Practices. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- The Impact upon Small Business of U. S. Softwood Lumber Standards. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ———. Should the Federal Government Establish a National Program of Public Work for the Unemployed? House Doc. No. 363. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Use of Nuclear Power for the Production of Fresh Water from Salt Water. Hearing. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

Senate. Committee on Armed Services. Series of Explosions of Air Force's Atlas F Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

- ——. Committee on Commerce. Economic Impact of Low Water Levels in the Great Lakes. Hearing before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964

- Commission. Hearings. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

 Committee on Government Operations.

 Organized Crime and Illicit Traffic in Narcotics.
- Organized Crime and Illicit Traffic in Narcotics. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Federal-State Water Rights. Hearings bebefore Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- —————. Indian Fishing Rights. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- Antitrust Aspects of the Funeral Industry. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- Laws. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- Of Prisons and Justice: A Selection of the Writings of James V. Bennett. Senate Doc. No. 70. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Select Committee on Small Business. Impact of Defense Spending on Labor Surplus Areas—1964. Hearing before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- 7 ————. The Role of Small Business in Government Procurement—1964. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ——. Special Committee on Aging. Interstate Mail Order Land Sales. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.

Other Federal

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. The Intergovernmental Aspects of Documentary Taxes. 1964.

- ———, The Problem of Special Districts in American Government. 1964.
- -----. State-Federal Overlapping in Cigarette Taxes. 1964.
- ——. Statutory and Administrative Controls Associated with Federal Grants for Public Assistance, 1964.
- ——. Tax Overlapping in the United States, 1964. 1964.
 - -----. 1965 State Legislative Program. 1964.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. Property Taxation in 1962. 1964.

_____. State Tax Collections in 1964.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Office of Education. Projection of Educational Statistics to 1973-74. 1964.

Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget. Measuring Productivity of Federal Government Organizations. 1964.

President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy. Hearings, 26 vols. 1964.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

The Uncommon Commoner: A Study of Sir Alec Douglas-Home. By John Dickie. (London and New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 224. $4.95.)

The nomination of Barry Goldwater in 1964 (and of Wendell Willkie in 1940, if one follows the accounts in the left-wing journals of 1940 rather than the mythology of 1964) incited a reaction not wholly enthusiastic on the part of a certain segment of the press and public. But such a reaction is by no means confined to this country. When Harold Macmillan, rather than R. A. Butler, was made Prime Minister (and, for practical purposes, Leader of the Conservative Party) by Queen Elizabeth, the action of the Queen was denounced by some critics as "unconstitutional." And the selection of Sir Alec Douglas-Home was greeted by a letter to The Guardian which included the statement "After having read the shocking news that Lord Home has become Prime Minister, I have decided to renounce my British citizenship" (page xiii). The Leader of the Labour Party announced that "a week of intrigues has produced a result based on family and hereditary connections. The leader has emerged—an elegant anachronism" (page xiv). Denunciations of the undemocratic method of selection of Leader of the Conservative Party might provoke a rebuttal along the lines of Diana Spearman's suggestion that if the pre-1832 electoral system in England had been as bad as its critics suggested, it would never, in 1831, have elected a House of Commons which was favorable, in the majority, to the Reform Bill.

Mr. Dickie has written a careful and scholarly, but quite readable, brief study of the Prime Minister. Although friendly to the Prime Minister, he is not undiscriminating or uncritical. Personal touches abound, including theories as to the pronunication of the Prime Minister's name; an account of a lawsuit worthy of Perry Mason involving a salmon-catching dog (The Earl of Tankerville versus a Dog, the property of the Earl of Home), in which judgement "was given in favour of the dog" (page 5); and parliamentary repartee which includes the story of the politician who said that "all that was wrong with South Africa was that it wanted a better class of settler and a better water supply," and received the comment (perhaps from an Irishman) that that was all that was wrong with Hell (page 31). Elected in the Conservative landslide of 1931, Lord Dunglass (as he then was) introduced himself as one of the Clydesiders, (a group of firebrands of I. L. P. leanings), but parted with them soon on the issue of Scottish Home Rule. Easily returned in the election of 1935, he was shortly thereafter made Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Labour. In a memorable debate in July, 1936, he was severely heckled by his fellow-Clydesiders for his defense of the means test, shortly after which he became Parliamentary Private Secretary to Neville Chamberlain, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer in Stanley Baldwin's government. It is Mr. Dickie's opinion that identification of Lord Dunglass with the Chamberlain policy of appeasement is considerably overdone, in that it fails to note (a) the comparative lack of influence in decision-making of most Parliamentary Private Secretaries at that time and (b) the peculiar aloofness of Chamberlain. Lord Dunglass's main political function was to act as a two-way channel of communication between Chamberlain and the rank-and-file members of the House, and this function continued after Chamberlain became Prime Minister in 1937. However, believers in guilt by association point out that it was Lord Dunglass who received from Lord Halifax and delivered to Chamberlain, via Sir John Simon, the Munich invitation; and that he accompanied Chamberlain to Munich, where he was shocked by the bad manners of Hitler and the vulgar vanity of Goering. In the days after Munich and in the early days of world War II it was Lord Dunglass's painful duty to report to the Prime Minister the increasing extent of anti-Chamberlain feeling. Mr. Dickie feels that "the legacy of his three years with Chamberlain . . . was twofold" (page 56), that appearement as a policy could never succeed unless undertaken from a position of strength, and that the extent of pacifist sentiment in Great Britain was one of Hitler's greatest assets.

With the replacement of Chamberlain by Churchill, Lord Dunglass intended to join his regiment; but this was prevented by the development of spinal tuberculosis, which prompted his famous quip that his doctors had put backbone into a politician. He was able to speak in parliament in May 1944, and his remarks on foreign policy reflected his extensive reading during his illness. He came close to suggesting that Churchill's attitude toward Russia and the Polish Question was dangerously similar to Chamberlain's attitude toward Germany and the Czechoslovak Question. A year later, when the wartime coalition was dissolved, he became, for the "caretaker" period, one of the two Joint Paliamentary Under-Secretaries of the Foreign Office, going out of office as Labour came in. and losing his seat in the House to Tom Steele after a campaign in which his expressions of doubt as to the future of Russian policy were extensively interpreted as "pro-Nazi" sentiments. It may be noted that Quintin Hogg, later Lord Hailsham, had expressed the same sentiments earlier in replying to his remarks in the House. In 1950 Lord Dunglass defeated Tom Steele in a very close contest. Before the election of 1951 the death of his father had removed him from the House of Commons. The formation of the new Churchill Government in October resulted in his appointment to the new position of Minister of State for Scotland, Churchill having apparently forgotten that the new Minister was the "rebel" back-bencher who had criticized the handling of the Polish Question. The story of his appointment first to the Commonwealth Office by Eden and to the Foreign Office by Macmillan is better known, and the leadership crisis and his unexpected elevation to the premiership is well recounted by Mr. Dickie.

One slight error will probably cause offense to patriotic North Carolinians and to the D. A. R. Guilford Court House in North Carolina is referred to as "Guildford." But this is the exception that proves the rule in a work notable for its accuracy in other respects.—Arthur B. Dugan, The University of the South.

Town Councillors: A Study of Barking. By ANTHONY M. REES AND TREVOR SMITH. (London: The Acton Society Trust. 1964. Pp. 117. 7/6.)

This brief monograph helps to fill a gap in our knowledge of British grass roots politics. It is a study in the social background, recruitment, working conditions and work perceptions of thirty councillors and aldermen of a London suburb of 72,000 persons, overwhelming working-class in character. The authors disclaim that the Borough is typical, in fact in the recent reorganization of London government Barking will join with industrial Dagenham to form a new Borough.

Some of the study's finding are as follows: Only twenty percent of councillors are native of the Borough, a minority are gainfully employed in Barking. Although it has been noted elsewhere that "the average age of councillors is a great deal too high," seventy percent of Barking's councillors belong to the 40-59 age group. Women councillors are on the average older than their male colleagues. The schooling of the majority of Barking Council was brief and limited in scope; none went to university. Twenty-three councillors, however, underwent some part time further education.

As might be expected middle-class representation on the Council exceeds by three times the middle-class composition of Barking. Unskilled manual occupations are clearly underrepresented. As regards social mobility of councillors, half have ascended socially. The authors conclude that as a group councillors "tend to be rather more mobile in an upward direction than their neighbors and this is as true of Labour members as of their opponents." In spite of this councillors have a rather low estimate of their prestige. Half of the councillors think that they do not enjoy high status in the eyes of their fellow citizens; none of them mention entering politics for the sake of future political advancement, and yet, because of the character of their political involvement they find a gratifying excitement in their Council work. While their reasons for entering politics are many, early political socialization and the impact of the Second World War loom large. The most striking fact about political recruitment in Barking is the shortage of candidates. In a working-class community, Conservatives find it even more difficult to locate candidates willing to stand for the Council and thus have been forced to recruit outside the community. At the same time Conservative candidates can get on the Council more quickly than their Labour colleagues. However, four-fifths of the councillors either experienced no delay in becoming candidates or did not want to stand initially. The relative ease of election is indicated by the fact that twenty of the thirty councillors had never been unsuccessful at the polls.

Perhaps the weakest section of the monograph is the one concerning the working conditions of the councillors. On the one hand the institutional dimensions and the functions of the Council are not clearly spelled out. On the other hand it is difficult to accept the evaluation on the part of the councillors and officers that "the line between policy-making and policy-execution was pretty firmly drawn. Certainly it does not seem that 'the officers make the policy' . . . " Nothing presented in this monograph confirms or denies the assertion. The form of the councillors' workdistribution of committee places, length of work, specialization, errand-running-all these are discussed at length. But the substance of the councillors' work, the character of their decisions and how the decision-making process works entirely escapes the reader. What is missing then in this study is the description of a policy-making process, such as the one provided by Birch in his account of rate-making proceedings in Glossop. The inclusion of the interview schedule would also have been helpful.—Lucian C. Marquis, University of Oregon.

The History of Parliament. The House of Commons, 1754-1790. By Sir Lewis Namier and John Brooke. (New York, For the History of Parliament Trust by the Oxford University Press, 1964. 3 vol.)

Two volumes of a proposed History of Parliament 1439–1509 in three volumes by Colonel Josiah C. Wedgwood appeared in 1936 and 1938. Revival of the scheme on a different plan was made possible in 1951 by annual parliamentary grants to the Trustees. Emphasis is on the House of Commons and the treatment of the individual members.

The first volume of the present work contains (1) the ambitious "Introductory survey," by John Brooke, who completed the work of the late Sir Lewis Namier, and (2) the accounts of the individual constituencies in the period. The second and third volumes are devoted to the biographies (in alphabetical order) of the members. All of the accounts are centered upon the parliamentary activity of the members, and represent the latest and best information. All biographical sketches are signed. Some of the biographies are quite brief owing to the lack of personal information and the meagerness of the official record. The remark that "there is no record of his having spoken in the House," or its equivalent, occurs not infrequently, and may at times be a mute comment on the meager official record.

Progress of this History in capable hands based at the Institute of Historical Research, University of London, will do much (1) to augment the frustratingly meager official record, (2) probably to point the way to the eventual editing of the official record with any possible additions, and (3) possibly to stimulate the present keepers of the record to exercise the greatest of care.—James B. Childs, Library of Congress.

Aufstieg und Krise der deutschen Sozialdemokratie. By Wolfgang Abendroth. (Frankfurt am Main: Stimme-Verlag 1964. Pp. 144. DM 9.80.)

The book under review is the postscript to a number of publications that have appeared at the centennial of the Allgemeinen Deutschen Arbeitervereins (the forerunner of the Social Democratic Party of Germany). The author, Professor of Political Science at the University of Marburg, knows much about the SPD, having been a member of the party's Executive Committee until 1962

Since Franz Mehring's monumental Geschichte der deutschen Sozialdemokratie little has been published in terms of a coherent over-all survey of the party. This seems to have prompted Abendroth to have written the modest volume the way he did. His aim is to present a critical survey of the historical process in which the SPD grew from a small faction to become, in terms of members and votes, the largest political organization in Germany. A chronological approach is employed, and sources are excellently annotated. The appendix contains the major party programs from Eisenach (1869) to Bad Godesberg (1959).

In the preface, Abendroth professes that the basic premises underlying his political philosophy have been formed by Marx, Engels, and Mehring. The author asserts that democracy in Germany can be made safe only if the advanced capitalistic order is replaced by a socialistic one—a change that must be brought about by the employees. The turn, however, can be accomplished only if the workers and left-wing intellectuals follow the pattern set by the Founding Fathers of German Social Democracy.

Abendroth is highly critical of the SPD development. He states that in all great crises of German history the party was the object of rather than the shaping subject of events. Abendroth exemplifies by pointing out that the SPD, and the Internationale, capitulated during the first few days of World War I in front of the "patriotic" giddiness of national suicide. Second, he maintains that during the last years of the Weimar Republic the SPD did not understand the intensity of the national crisis and was not able to analyze the viciousness of Nazism. In following an acquiescent attitude, the party, slowly but surely, sacrificed the rights and the living standard of the German workers. The author alludes that the SPD should have taken up the united front offer of the Communists and, with the KPD, should have taken a definite stand to defend German democracy. Instead, the Social Democrats helped to reduce themselves to political impotency.

Turning to the post-World War II period, Abendroth criticizes the party for its illusionary attitude toward the re-capitalization of West German society. When the federal elections of 1949 and 1953 did not bring the anticipated electoral success, the leaders of the SPD, according to the author, lost their patience and ran after the mass mood attracted by the Wirtschaftswunder. The Bad Godesberg Program cast out the last remnants of socialist aims from the party platform and negated for good the method of the conscious development of the working class consciousness against the oligarchic capital. Finally, in 1960 the SPD withdrew its Deutschland-Plan and therewith, according to Abendroth, denied its former foreign and national political theses.

However, the author holds out some hope for the party. He thinks that the course of the party could still be changed, be it through the influence of the unions, be it through intra-party discussions or through outside pressures extended by renegade formations. These forces, individually or together, could move the party back toward the aims set forth by the Founding Fathers. Only then would the SPD again become the true representative of the employees.

Professor Abendroth has written a profound and thought-provoking volume. Unfortunately, it is much too concentrated. While the reviewer shares a few misgivings with the author about the radical changes introduced at Bad Godesberg (1959) and Hannover (1960), there are, nevertheless, two important pragmatic questions that Abendroth does not discuss in his survey of the contemporary SPD. First, do the majority of German Social Democrats subscribe to the kind of SPD advocated by the author? Second, could this socialist force become a viable party to win federal elections in affluent West Germany? The answers are obviously no.—Herbert R. Winter, Rhode Island College.

The Social Democratic Party of Germany. By Douglas A. Chalmers. (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1964. Pp. xiv, 258. $6.50.)

Beginning with Robert Michels' Political Parties (1911), the SPD, grandfather of all socialist parties, has been continental Europe's most intensively studied democratic party. The pre-Weimar period has been admirably treated in Carl Schorske's German Social Democracy 1905-1917 (1955) and A. Joseph Berlau's The German Social Democratic Party 1914-1921 (1949). Now we also have thorough and highly commendable works by Hunt on the Weimar period and by Chalmers on the party in the Bonn Republic. The Hunt and Chalmers studies complement one another particularly well in that each traces one of the two stages of the party's now complete ideological shift away from Marxist socialism and concentrates upon analyzing the consequences for the party's organization.

The SPD's developmental tendencies of the Weimar years continued into the Bonn Republic, but through the 1950's the demand for revitalization became intensified. If the party were to challenge the CDU successfully, it would have to expand beyond its class base, to respond to increasing pluralization in German society by redefining its representational role, and to respond to changes in the political culture by playing down its socialist ideology. At Bad Godesberg in 1959 the SPD adopted a program without an ideology, a program which repudiated traditional doctrine in expressing acceptance of the church, military defense, and private property.

Chalmers gives us a history of this transformation from an ideologically-oriented to a problemoriented party, reviewing carefully the choices facing the SPD and the changes in the role of its social theory in policy decisions, in ensuring party unity, and in mobilizing public support. Thereafter he focuses, in four chapters, on the implications of the new approach for: (1) policy-making; (2) leadership recruitment; (3) party organization; and (4) public relations. The consequences of attempting to broaden appeal include the fragmenting of policy-making channels as communications are established with a wide range of groups and the passing over of organization men of the Kurt Schumacher or Erich Ollenhauer type in selecting as leader the more widely popular Willy Brandt.

Because "As an idea, a philosophy, and a social movement, socialism in Germany is no longer represented by a political party" (p. 228), the SPD is vastly changed in character. Its transformation is away from the pattern of responsiveness noted by Michels and Hunt and away from the defining characteristics of Duverger's "mass party"; though its public image has not yet greatly changed, it is gaining the flexibility and the style of the "electoral party."—Sven Groennings, Indiana University.

Der Kampf um den Bau Des Mittellandkanals. By Hannelore Horn. (Cologne: Westdeutscher Verlag, Staat und Politik, vol. 6, 1964. Pp. 145.)

Das Regierungssystem der Bundesrepublic Deutschland. vol. 1: Leitfaden, vol. 2: Quellenbuch. By Thomas Ellwein. (Cologne: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1963. Pp. 630.

Dr. Hannelore Horn analyzes in an absorbing manner the political processes of early Wilhelminian Prussia with regard to a particular episode: the successful mutilation by the Agrarian interests of the Prussian government's bill for the building of a much needed waterway connecting the Rhein and the Elbe, Western and Eastern Germany. Dr. Horn studies first the Landbund's penetration of the Conservatives, which until then were an old style Honoratioren party, thus molding this political group for their own purposes. She then shows how the lop-sided political arrangements of the Prussian constitutional system were utilized by the Landbund to hold up the government project until all features which might have remotely threatened their own interests were eliminated. In point of fact the canal project was completed only during the Weimar Republic. Of course, the Landbund could not have carried through its operation so successfully if the other parts of the reigning establishment had not known that any serious slight to the Landbund would endanger major navy and tariff bills in the Reichstag.

In this fight the mutual dependency of the bureaucracy, government, industry, and Eastern estate owners made it impossible for the Prussian government to continue its attempt to penalize the so-called Kanalrebellen (those governmental officials who were at the same time members of the Prussian diet and who in spite of all political pressures had cast their vote for the Landbund and against the government). At a time when Germany's parliaments are again filled with public officials of all sorts—c. 23% in the Bundestag, sometimes more than double their number in the individual diets-Dr. Horn's painstaking inquiry is illuminating, both in terms of the motivations, multiple pressures, and elements of choice influencing the Kanalrebellen and their personal careers, and in terms of the impact of the specific political decision. Today, due to the greater variety of interests with which officials are concerned, their role in German politics, both on the federal and on the state levels is more diversified and complicated. But analysis of this relatively simple model of the dual role played by officials as representatives both of state power and of agrarian interests, shows how, in the special German context, close attention to the interaction of official and group behavior may produce happy results.

Thomas Ellwein's governmental system of the Federal Republic may officially be dubbed a text for the student of German political science, but behind this modest exercise emerges an interesting and balanced analysis of the German establishment of the last fifteen years. The author shows institutional changes throughout these years, develops a typology of attitudes frequently found in important groups, and in a tentative way tries to develop yardsticks of measurement for political behavior. He asks whether a new political style has been developed and, with a side glance at the Spiegel affair, hesitates to give an unqualified answer. With this question mark, he shifts his attention to problems of administration and justice, the interrelation between Rechtsstaat and Sozialstaat to which, quite in keeping with the German public's primary interests, he devotes a good share of his book. Here the leitmotif is found in his remark that when political parties are defaulting, the bureaucracy is in danger of losing its instrumental character and of assuming instead responsibility for determining community goals. In the context of the author's thinking this remark is neither trite nor almost obvious, for it is tied to the search for a non-formalistic meaning of today's Rechtsstaat. What is evident throughout this volume, and gives it its striking character, is the contrast between the quasi-permanent installation of the people in the Wirtschaftswunder and their very provisional moral and intellectual allegiance towards the institutions of the Federal Republic.

The second volume contains a 250 page source book which includes constitutional, political, administrative, and financial material, and at the same time highlights the problems of a federal structure eternally on the move. The choice of materials should not only help the German student, but will be equally beneficial to the American teacher of German affairs. It would have been still more helpful if the author had reprinted some excerpts from the Bundestag question period of the days in November 1962 when the Spiegel affair blew up in the face of Messrs. Adenauer, Strauss, and Hoecherl.—Otto Kirchheimer Columbia University.

German Social Democracy 1918-1933. BY RICHARD N. HUNT. (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1964. Pp. xi, 292. $7.50.)

The title of this volume in the "Yale Historical Publications" is somewhat misleading. Professor Hunt's study concerns itself primarily with the internal history of the Social Democratic movement during the Weimar Republic rather than with the SPD's part in the first German republic. However, in the reviewer's opinion this narrower focus is by no means a shortcoming, for not only has the broader issue been previously discussed in innumerable other studies, but we have heretofore lacked a first-rate history of the Weimar SPD-in English as well as in German. This we now have with Hunt's fine analysis of the development of the party organization, the sociological character of the movement, its relationship with the trade unions and its internecine factional struggles. Subsequent studies may add further details and correct some errors, but no one will hereafter be able to deal with the politics of Weimar Germany or the history of the SPD without reference to this excellent volume.

Professor Hunt's indebtedness to the late Sigmund Neumann—which he acknowledges in his preface—is evident throughout the book. He follows Neumann's 1932 analysis of the SPD as a party unable to deal with the challenge of severe crisis conditions in the political system, largely because a conservative leadership was unwilling or unable to change its accustomed ways and could not be displaced by more qualified men. Perhaps these did not exist, as some of the old leaders have claimed in their defense, and perhaps conditions external to the SPD made it impossible for the embattled party to make drastic changes in its leadership and structure by the time the party and the Republic faced the mortal danger of Nazism. No doubt, the rivalry of the Communist party and the animosity of anti-democratic elements among the German elites immensely complicated the task of the SPD-factors which Hunt fails to appreciate adequately. Nonetheless, as this study shows in unsurpassed detail, in the last analysis the nature of its leadership explains why the party did not show greater vigor in the last vears of Weimar Germany.

Following a rather conventional review of the history of the SPD before 1918, Hunt describes the formal and sociological structure of the SPD organization and its leadership, accentuating the factors which led the movement to become increasingly inert and its top leadership ever more fearful of risking what it had gained and ever more hostile to challenges to its authority. As the selfproclaimed defenders of the democratic system these leaders could ill afford the self-satisfied lethargy which characterized so many of them, for the Republic needed dynamic defenders, not only in the Nineteen Thirties but throughout its history. Indeed, as Hunt indicates, these leaders faithfully reflected the mood of most of the lesser functionaries and probably most party members. But we are confronted by the question whether the task of a democratic party leadership is limited to expressing the sentiments of its supporters, or whether greater initiative on the part of democratic leaders necessarily violates the terms of their mandate. By relying perhaps too heavily on rather one-sided interpretations by various leftwing critics of the SPD leaders, Hunt tends to overstate his case and resorts at times to rather unfair characterizations of men and deed. But his diagnosis remains, for all that, fundamentally true.

To the reader who is fairly familiar with the general subject, Hunt's discussion of the relationship between SPD and the trade unions and of the left-wing criticism of the party leaders adds little that is new. Here his contribution is one of synthesis, of putting these factors in perspective in terms of the larger problems characterizing the internal development of the party. The author's sympathies lie clearly with the critics; a more balanced view might have done the SPD leaders more justice. And while his grasp of the left-wing intra-party opposition is, on the whole, adequate, that of the so-called "Young Turks" leaves something to be desired. The assertion that men like Schumacher, Mierendorf, Haubach, and Leber held in common "nationalist and demagogic inclinations" similar to those of Déat in France and Mosley in Britair is a gross exaggeration.

The potential analytical pitfalls of historicism are illuminated by Hunt's concluding observations. His analysis of the Weimar SPD leads him to conclude that if the present Social Democratic party achieves more "active grass-roots participation" and "succeeds in drinking at the fountain of youth," the earlier oligarchic trend might be reversed, the stagnation that characterized the Weimar era shaken off, and the party might at last obtain a majority at the polls. However, Bonn Germany is not the Weimar Germany. The political context of the present confronts the SPD with problems which cannot be solved by avoiding the sins of the fathers, but require a far more radical transformation of the party in the light of entirely different environmental conditions.—Lewis J. Edinger, Washington University.

Germany, The Wall and Berlin: Internal Politics During an International Crisis. By John W. Keller. (New York: Vantage Press, 1964. Pp. 437. $4.95.)

What explains the political stability of West Germany in the face of one potentially explosive international confrontation after another? Only the major episodes affecting Berlin need be mentioned-the blockade, the uprising in East Germany in 1953. Khruschchev's ultimatums, the Wall—to evoke the seemingly convulsive environment in which the political institutions of the Federal Republic have developed. The combination of a persistently superheated international situation on one side and a low-temperature domestic politics on the other is so incongruous as to suggest a paradox: the very fluidity and capriciousness of its international environment have helped to produce the viscosity of West German internal politics.

John W. Keller does not himself suggest this conclusion in his chronicle of West German public and partisan reaction to the building of the Berlin Wall, but his detailed documentation of this most recent episode tends to confirm it as a description of West German politics at each major crisis of the last fifteen years. In this case there is almost a litmus-paper quality about the situation since the sealing-off of the Berlin border occurred in the midst of a parliamentary election campaign that both major parties and the Free Democrats, as the "third" party, regarded as extraordinarily important in giving the party system a form that it might bear for some time to come. All three leading parties had more or less severe internal problems that were working themselves out as the campaign progressed: the Christian Democrats were split over the future role of Konrad Adenauer, the Social Democrats faced a test of their new "bourgeois" program and tactics, and the Free Democrats had to consider the possibility that the trend toward a two-party system would culminate this time in their exclusion from federal politics.

Despite such high stakes the campaign muddled along listlessly until the events of August 13. Five weeks later, when the votes were counted, it was clear that whatever portentous developments might have come had the campaign not been enlivened by the building of the wall, the new reality was an old one. Coalition government was again a necessity, and the respective gains and losses suffered and enjoyed by the three parties were ambiguous enough in size and direction to make generalization little better than speculation. In only one case were the omens clear. Adenauer. by portraying the situation as a mere "preliminary crisis" and refusing to go to Berlin-whether he did so intentionally or out of necessity can be ignored here-and by his cavalier reference in a public rally on August 14 to the question of Willy Brandt's illegitimate birth, gave his opponents in the CDU the leverage they needed to begin taking the final steps that would dislodge him from the Government.

Questions of stability, of the political style of the Bonn parties, and other aspects of the new political culture that has grown up since 1945 can be examined with profit by studying the West German political system under stress. Professor Keller touches some of these questions, but only in passing, and he makes only a minimal effort at relating his own work to the pertinent literature. He records the events, political reactions, and policy statements of the period from August through December of 1961 in great detail, but his treatment cannot be described as a study. It is, literally, a laying-out of the record, and it is based not on documentary sources but largely on gleanings from the popular press. Of reporting there is a great deal, of analysis very little. No themes are accented sufficiently to warrant mentioning here. Page after page is filled with verbatim reporting or paraphrasing from German and other newspapers. It seems unlikely that this tortuous path through the tabloids and the more respectable press will be trod again. The book may have a certain value as a documentation, but even this must be qualified by the failure to provide the scholar with that small convenience he finds so helpful, an index.—Donald R. Reich, Oberlin College.

Westdeutschland, 1945–1950. Der Aufbau von Verfassungs- und Verwaltungseinrichtungen über den Ländern der drei westlichen Besatzungszonen Teil II. Einzelne Verwaltungs Zweige: Wirtschaft, Marshallplan, Statistik. By Walter Vogel. (Boppard am Rhein, Harold Boldt Verlag, 1964, Pp. xvi, 433. Schriften des Bundesarchivs 12. DM 28.)

After the plan of an extremely detailed government organization manual, the author at the Bundesarchiv of the German Federal Republic in Coblenz is engaged in furnishing an exact statement of the intricate and little known structure of German zonal and bizonal authorities in the three Western Zones of Germany between the conclusion of the War in 1945 and their absorption in the German Federal Republic by 1950. Mention of the military government authorities is made only insofar as relates to the German authorities. Adequate citation is given to the sources available in the Bundesarchiv. The first part, which appeared in 1956 as no. 2 of the Schriften des Bundesarchivs, had only 213 pages, and treated the agencies dealing with food, agriculture and forestry. The work is being continued, and points up the need for similar work on the German authorities of the other zone as well as overall on the organization of the military government authorities of all four zones.—James B. Childs, Library of Congress.

Political Parties in Norway. BY HENRY VALEN AND DANIEL KATZ. (Olso, Norway: Universitetsforlaget, 1964. Pp. xii, 383. 40 kroner or $5.75. Exclusive English-speaking distribution by Tavistock Press.)

This is more than a comprehensive study of Norwegian political parties and voting behavior. It is a sophisticated survey research study testing many hypotheses which have been used in studies of American voting behavior (particularly, The American Voter) upon the Norwegian political system. By contrasting the American and Norwegian political systems, the authors have contributed greatly to our knowledge of comparative voting behavior.

Appropriately, this book is subtitled, "A Community Study." A report of a study on the 1957 general election in selected communities of the Stavanger area of southwestern Norway, this is one of a series of election studies sponsored jointly by the Institute of Social Research in Oslo and the Christian Michelsen Institute in Bergen. The authors are particularly interested in studying political tendencies in communities undergoing rapid economic and social changes. This factor governed the selection of the particular wards (stemmekrets) selected for the study. As a ward is defined as the "area adjacent to a polling place" it seems to this reviewer that precinct would have been a more descriptive term.

Basic data for this study was obtained from two sets of interviews. First, a voter survey of 1017 respondents was drawn from the electoral register at random. Second, a group of 149 office-holders in the party organizations at the province, commune, and ward levels were queried. These interviews yielded data with which to compare the perceptions of and attitudes toward controversial issues, the character of party leadership, and the relation of party organizations to social organizations of party voters and leaders. Elaborate appendices at the end of the volume report on the sampling procedures and contain the questionnaires used in the study. The sophisticated method used in designing the study is obvious. The series of well-organized and meaningful tables, the summaries of findings, and interpretative surveys placed at the end of each section of the study add much to the clarity of the presentation of the

In an intriguing chapter (Chapter 5), the authors attempt to demonstrate empirically the impact of party leadership on voting behavior. They use the Cutright and Rossi technique to hold constant the various demographic determinants of voting behavior and, thus, to assess the impact of the party organization. Professors Valen and Katz freely admit at the outset that their sample is not ideal for the employment of this technique. To supplement the Cutright and Rossi method they conducted voter interviews asking questions to tap awareness of local party activity. the existence of personal and impersonal communication from the party, citizen interest in or evaluation of party activities, and knowledge of party leadership.

The authors conclude that the degree of organizational activity of the party at the election district level made no appreciable difference in the votes cast on election day. The authors believe that other determinants of voting behavior are so important in Norway that the influence of the party organization in direct personal contacts is of no significance though the party organization may have an impact in reaching people through the mass media. In a subsequent section on the socioeconomic bases of support of the Norwegian parties, it is clearly demonstrated that the three major dimensions of Norwegian political behavior are: (1) socio-economic differentiation (occupational status, educational level, and income level), (2) rural-urban factors, and (3) age.

Norwegian political behavior is notable for its high degree of stability. While in recent elections the variations between the votes of Norwegian political parties have been very small, there have been significant long-term changes in Norwegian political behavior. In looking at political change in the Stavanger area, the authors are looking for changes caused by shifts in occupation or geographic concentration occasioned by increased industrialization and bureaucratization. They explore the change between generations by comparing the voting of individuals with parental voting and parental class influence and changes within the political history of the same individual. This study destroys the prevalent notion that the long-term trend of political change in Norway is favorable to the Labor party. For while less than 20% of the first-time Labor voters defect to other parties, the absolute number of defections away from Labor exceeds the defections of the other parties to Labor. Labor's declining commitment to ideology, the growing white collar class, and age are suggested reasons.

The final chapter deals with the relation of parties to social organizations. Norwegian pressure groups are shown to operate differently than their counterparts in the United States. In Norway, pressure groups do not serve the function of furnishing information and staff work in guiding legislation; on the other hand, they do assist the government in formulating legislative programs and have a direct channel for their demands through the political parties. Informally these ties between the social organizations and the parties take the form of overlapping leadership and informal groups working within the party, especially in the nominating process.

There are many other interesting aspects of this study such as political identification and the character of leadership that merit comment but space does not permit. In conclusion, this is a highly readable and worthwhile volume. It is hoped that this study will stimulate other scholars to do similiar research on the various political systems of the world. The contributions of such studies to comparative politics can not be overestimated.—H. Gaylon Greenhill, Wisconsin State University, Whitewater.

500 jaren Staten-Generaal in de Nederlanden. Van statenvergadering tot volksvertegenwoordiging. Edited by S. J. Fockema Andreae and H. Hardenberg. (Assen, Van Gorcum & Comp., N. V., 1964. Pp. 341. Plates.)

In January 1464, Burgundian Duke Philip the Good called the first continuing States General in the Low Countries to convene at Bruges. From this beginning has derived the present States General of the Netherlands. Even in the period between 1431 and 1464, there had been a few special meetings of similar character. To celebrate the five centuries of parliament, nine chronological segments have been treated by nine different authors. Each contribution is accompanied by a bibliography. The work, which was published with the assistance of the Prince Bernhard Fonds, has a joint introduction by the present chairmen of the two chambers of the Netherlands States General. Beginnings of an organized central government with financial agencies are traced at a very early date. Even though the earlier States General were unicameral, the present bicameral form seems first to have appeared with the Batavian Republic in 1798. The last chapter of some forty pages by E. van Raalta treats of the States General in the most recent period, 1918–1963, and is accompanied by tables showing the political party representation in both chambers during the period. The memorial volume prepared with scientific care is concluded by a list of the members of the earliest and of the most recent States General.—James B. Childs, Library of Congress.

Guía de la administración civil del Estado. By the Oficina de Información, Presidencia del Gobierno. (Madrid, [Boletín Oficial del Estado, Publicaciones], 1963. Pp. 375. Organization charts.)

In contrast with the provisional edition in 1960 under the title Guía de la administración española, the present Spanish government organization manual has organization charts for the central administration, Presidencia del Gobierno and each of the civil ministries. As changes occur, the charts are revised and reissued with Documentación administrativa, the monthly review of the Centro de Formación y Perfeccionamiento de Funcionarios. The three defense ministries (Army, Air, and Navv) are represented only on the chart of the Central Administration, and not otherwise treated. The hundred or so institutes of the Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas are itemized in full. Addresses are given for the various agencies, but no personal names are included. The Ministries are arranged in a hierarchical order seemingly similar to that followed in the national budget, and the subarrangement is in a like fashion. An index to agencies would do much to facilitate the use of the very helpful Guia.-JAMES B. CHILDS, Library of Congress.

Public relations in administration. I. Official publications. General report. By Suzanne Honoré. (Brussels, International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 1963. Pp. 83.)

The report by Suzanne Honoré, a conservateur of the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, was presented, originally in French, to the XIIth International Congress of Administrative Sciences at Vienna, 16–20 July 1962, and was based not only upon an international survey by questionnaire, (scheduled in 1960) but upon replies from National sections of the Institute, and on several previous regional round table discussions. One of the important sources used was the UNESCO publication edited in 1958 (and now being revised) by J. Meyriat under the title 'A study of current bibliographies of national official publications. A principal conclusion is "that official publications are a first-class source for the study of the administrative sciences, as for that of the political, economic and social sciences, which are developing rapidly." Part II of Public relations in administration on "the influence of the public on the operation of public administration, excluding electoral rights" is under preparation for the 1965 Congress with C. Mihcioglu of the University of Ankara as general rapporteur.—James B. Childs, Library of Congress.

A History of the Australian Country Party. By ULRICH ELLIS. (Melbourne, Australia: Melbourne University Press, 1963. Pp. ix, 359. $8.50.)

This book is a fine addition to the growing number of studies about Australian politics. It is a sympathetic treatment of the Country Party. The author explains: "It is written from a point of view—from the inside looking out—and must be accepted as an interpretation by one who cannot hope to be slightly objective or even unbiased." Although the author is too modest to admit it, he has had a great deal to do with both the policy and strategy of the Country Party. He worked very closely with Sir Earle Page and Sir Arthur Fadden, both of whom held a number of different federal ministries.

The book's title is somewhat misleading as there is only incidental reference to the Party's state branches. In part, this results from two facts. First, the state affiliations, according to Ellis, are inextricably bound to the national structure. Second, to do a detailed job on the state branches would have required several additional volumes.

Since Ellis writes from a point of view and is not an academic political scientist, his history does not incorporate methods of analysis which have become commonplace in our discipline. For instance, it would have been helpful if Ellis had included some tables indicating the kind and quantity of legislation introduced by Country Party members. It also would have been useful had he done some roll call analyses to determine the pattern of parliamentary solidarity and the Party's legislative relationships with other federal parties. But such omissions do not detract from the overall worth of the study. This is all the more true when one realizes that until recently there were very few reliable secondary sources on Australian politics. Ellis provides names, places, dates, and events which will be extremely helpful to future students of Australian politics. The appendices are particularly valuable in this regard.

One point which Ellis makes is that the federal Country Party, particularly since its entry into Commonwealth politics in 1917, has not been merely an extension of the three principal nonlabor parties-National, United Australian, and Liberal-which have successively vied with the Labor Party for control of the Commonwealth Government. The Country Party has never sought support in the metropolitan areas. It has entered into electoral arrangements and composite governments with non-labor parties whose strength lie in the urban centers. Through electoral arrangements there is an agreement on an allocation of seats to be contested by each partner. Critics of these arrangements contend that the Party's numerical strength, and hence its legislative power, is diminished by this strategy. The prolonged alliance with the Liberal Party, which dates from 1949 to the present, has probably sapped the Country Party's vitality both organizationally and legislatively. (From 1917 to 1964 the Country Party was involved in composite governments for 27 of the 47 years.) The Country Party has never withdrawn from a ministry. Ellis marshals evidence which indicates that this has contributed to the stability of the Commonwealth government.

Some less sympathetic students of the Country Party might conclude that it is the rural branch of the non-labor party. Such a conclusion would require investigation of Country Party participation in local governing authorities and state parliaments. Certainly, this suggestion is worthy of investigation for several reasons. First, it would provide insights into the nature of the "third party" in a three-party system. Second, and more important, it would enable us to refine our notions about party systems in general and the multiparty system in particular.—Conrad Joyner, University of Arizona.

The Second Soviet Republic: The Ukraine After World War II. BY YAROSLAV BILINSKY. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1964. Pp. xvii, 539, $12.50.)

This book is virtually encyclopedic in length: apart from the copiously annotated text, it contains twenty-two special notes in the appendix (the particularly interesting note on "The Jewish Question in the Ukraine" contains fourteen double-column pages) and a fifty-three page annotated bibliography. The value of the work as a compendium of hard-to-get information about a major portion of the U.S.S.R. is beyond question. But—in spite of the title—the author did not intend to write a handbook on the Ukraine. While his purpose might have been clearer to the reader if he had stated his problems at the beginning, the attentive reader soon learns that Professor Bilinsky is really concerned solely with the Ukrainian nationality question. The vast array of data he presents is designed to answer such problems as: What are the factors influencing Ukrainian national identification? How strong is national feeling today? How has Soviet policy sought to manipulate it? What are the prospects for separate national identity among Ukrainians?

The crucial problem, the present strength of Ukrainian nationalism, is the hardest to approach. The direct line of investigation pursued by Bilinsky is examination of resistance to Soviet efforts to integrate the West Ukraine (i.e., the portions acquired in 1939-46). Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the outside investigator to assess the degree of resistance to a totalitarian regime unless the totalitarian controls are at least temporarily lifted. Bilinsky has worked very diligently to collect the very incomplete information available; this reviewer, for one, is much indebted to Bilinsky for the evidence on the UPA (Ukrainian Insurgent [guerrilla] Army) which he originally presented in his Ph.D. dissertation. It is a reviewer's inescapable duty, however, to point out that Bilinsky (who spent his childhood in the wartime West Ukraine) does not take a thoroughly critical approach to the question of Ukrainian resistance. Bilinsky does not positively exaggerate the importance of the UPA; but he fails to undertake the badly needed task of critically analyzing the large body of émigré writing on the subject, particularly in regard to the territorial and chronological extent of guerrilla activities. Furthermore, Bilinsky glosses over the fratricidal conflicts which preceded and accompanied the formation of the UPA and the lasting imprint which these brutal episodes had upon the development of the nationalist movement.

On the other hand, the mere fact of Bilinsky's personal commitment makes him an especially useful source on some aspects of Ukrainian nationalism. This is especially true of the passages on contemporary relations between Ukrainian nationalists and the Vatican. An outsider could not have easily uncovered the extent and nature of nationalist resentment against what many Ukrainians regard as Vatican efforts to minimize the importance of the Ukrainian (Uniate) Catholic Church as a tactic in the effort to win over Russian Orthodoxy.

The main part of Bilinsky's book is wisely devoted, not to a direct assault on the problem of the strength of Ukrainian nationalism, but to an intensive examination of Soviet policies. He then tries to infer from the policies the nature of the national attitude which the regime hopes to influence. In pursuing this indirect approach, Bilinsky discusses in detail the hitherto largely neglected statistical data on nationality factors in education and mass media (however, his main analysis was made before the more detailed 1959 census data became available). Bilinsky wisely recognizes the impracticability of a comprehensive examination of Soviet manipulation of literary and historical symbols of Ukrainian national identity, Consequently, he approaches this facet of Soviet policy through intensive analysis of two crucial cases: the treatment of the poet Taras Shevchenko and of the "reunification" of the Ukraine and Russia in the Treaty of Pereyaslav. In analyzing the nationality aspects of Communist Party personnel changes, the author concentrates upon the period since Stalin's death. Here a good bit of speculation is unavoidable, but Bilinsky is rather too inclined to stress nationality factors in the recent power struggle. Similarly, his factually valuable discussion of the role of the Ukrainian S. S. R. in the United Nations probably overemphasizes the nationality question. In his concluding chapter Bilinsky relies heavily upon interviews with postwar defectors. He recognizes the hazards of using this uncontrollable data, but occasionally is extremely uncritical, as in his acceptance of one informant's assertion that "within a week or two, the entire city of Dneprepetrovsk, after German occupation began to speak Ukrainian." Such items are not allowed to distort Bilinsky's general findings, however, which are in accord with other scholars' conclusions. Basically, he finds, "Soviet Ukrainians tend to be so preoccupied with abolishing the ills of the regime that little thought is given to what precisely should be put in its place" and "the struggle for economic betterment occupies most of the attention of Soviet citizens, Ukrainians and non-Ukrainians alike." These findings necessarily lead to the conclusion that the future of Ukrainian national identity very probably depends upon developments which largely transcend the Ukraine itself.—John A. Armstrong, University of Wisconsin.

Economic Rationality and Soviet Politics or Was Stalin Really Necessary? By ALEC NOVE. (Frederick A. Praeger: New York, 1964. P. 316. $8.50.)

This is a collection of seventeen articles, essays and papers by the distinguished economist Alec Nove of the University of Glasgow. Their writing spans the last decade and all except two have previously appeared elsewhere.

Mr. Nove is not one of those too-frequent specialists in Soviet economics who insist always upon the primacy of their study and tend to disregard the significance of politics, literature, Russian tradition and so forth for Soviet developments. His interests as reflected in the entries in Economic Rationality and Soviet Politics cover a broad spectrum ranging from "Occupational patterns in the USSR and Great Britain" to "The Peasants in Soviet literature since Stalin."

However, Professor Nove is at his best in the chapters on Soviet planning and agriculture, areas where he has his special expertise. In those chapters the author provides a topical and valuable account of Khrushchev's economic misadventures, written, in some instances, a half-dozen years before October, 1964. Nove indicates the extent to which Nikita Sergeevich's attempts to deal with the economic necessity for local autonomy and the political demand for central control converted Soviet economic planning into an almost impenetrable tohu-bohu. In agriculture, he points out that Khrushchev, as his predecessors, had fallen victim to that same shturmoveshchina ("campaigning") psychosis, with which, incidentally, the Russians have often impugned Chinese comrades. Nove suggests that Khrushchev's ideas for using the virgin soil lands and the fallow areas and planting corn were all excellent-but not everywhere and under all conditions. "It is this chronic tendency to overdo a good idea, to impose it by decree," Nove writes, "which ruins its application and does so much harm to Soviet agriculture."

It is Nove's position that the Soviet planning system is not "economically" rational, since it operates on the basis of political not economic decisions, and that the present difficulties of the Soviet economy can in large part be remedied by a "big dose" of economic rationality. He further maintains that what prevents the Soviet Union from undertaking such a cure is not primarily Marxist ideology, but rather the "convictions of the political leaders and planners that they, and not any 'law of value,' are the regulators of economic life." Nove seems to believe that any major change in the style of Soviet planning must be predicated on significant alterations in the psychology of the leadership, which is a major reason for the labored and sometimes painful quality of the debates over Soviet planning policy which have broken out intermittently during the past few years.

One wishes that Mr. Nove's comments on the differences between "useful" economic growth and the growth of output as measured by statistics would be read by all of those who have been involved in the often meaningless debate over Soviet economic growth vis-à-vis that of the United States. His discussions of the mounting futility of the trudoden system and of the role and burden of agricultural officials at the raion and oblast levels are particularly enlightening.

As is almost bound to be the case in a collection such as this, there is a good deal of repetition of arguments and some of the materials are so outdated as to be of little more than historical interest. This is particularly so in Mr. Nove's chapter on "The purchasing power of the Soviet ruble," which first appeared in 1958. Too many of the conclusions reached here are no longer valid and there is the additionally irritating feature for the American reader of having figures given not only in old rubles but also in pounds, shillings and pence. Try converting old rubles to new, then say £1 5s 6d. to dollar and cents, then accounting for changes that have taken place in relative values since 1957, and it will quickly be seen why this chapter might have been better left out, in spite of the fact that it was at the time of its writing undoubtedly an intellectual tour de force.

Despite these minor shortcomings, the collection is justifiable and the time of any Soviet specialist would be well spent in reading its chapters on planning and agriculture. There is one further aspect of the book, which, though perhaps trivial and presumably not specifically attributable to Professor Nove, must nevertheless be mentioned, namely the alternate title: Was Stalin Really Necessary? Other than the introductory chapter, which is one of the least valuable in the collection, the book has almost nothing to do with this problem. One can only conclude that some sales-conscious editor decided that Economic Rationality and Soviet Politics would not sell, but Was Stalin Really Necessary? might; or perhaps that two titles are safer than one. The alternate title does the book no credit. Caveat auctor!-DAN N. JACOBS, Miami University (Ohio).

Nationalism and Communism, Essays 1946-1963. By Hugh Seton-Watson (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Publisher, 1964. Pp. x+253. $7.50.)

Hugh Seton-Watson, head of the Department of Russian History in the School of Slavonic and East European Studies of London University and author of well known books on Russian and Eastern European history and politics has assembled in this volume a collection of previously published articles and lectures. Using the rubric of nationalism and communism, the author has brought together a valuable collection of his essays under four main headings. These are twentieth-century history, eastern Europe after WWII, communism in eastern Europe and international problems. The last category deals with such international problems as Soviet foreign policy, strategy, and the Atlantic Alliance.

The author is at his best in analyzing the long range implications of twentieth century history in which the mass movements of nationalism and communism occupy principal places. Tracing how nationalism was first formulated in revolutionary France, Seton-Watson shows how it became a democratic and secular phenomena. Turning to nationalist movements in underdeveloped countries in the last hundred years, the author points out how these movements have been directed "by a modern secular elite or intelligentsia." The nineteenth century Russian liberal leaders were the first to be called the intelligentsia but as the author points out the intelligentsia are not solely a Russian phenomena. Intelligentsia were found in all the other components of the Romanov as well as the Ottoman and parts of the Hapsburg empires.

On the future of nationalism, Seton-Watson believes that it is not as predictable as some writers who advance the causes of larger free associations and world government might have us believe. The fall of the Romanov, Ottoman and Hapsburg empires did not result in the independence of national states but "the establishment of the empire of the Bolsheviks."

On the revolutionary movements of the first half of the twentieth century the author points out that the distinguishing feature of twentieth century revolutionary movements from those of the nineteenth century is that the twentieth century movements have arisen in culturally and economically backward countries. Nineteenth century revolutionary movements arose more in the advanced countries. But the interesting phenomenon is that the nineteenth century revolutionary movements did not develop into fully blown Marxist type revolutions as did those in the twentieth century. Moreover Marx has been repeatedly proved wrong in that his forecasts for an economic revolution in industrial countries coming before the revolution in less developed agricultural societies were not born out. In the agrarian societies which had revolutions, Russia, Yugoslavia and China, the revolutions came about only because outside forces had demolished the old state apparatus. It was not the inevitable economic laws of Marx which brought about an internal upheaval because of the contradictions in capitalism but the outside forces coupled with social and political disintegration in these countries which precipitated the successful revolutions.

Coming back to the intelligentsia, Seton-Watson rightly points out that the leaders of twentieth century revolutionary movements came chiefly from the intelligentisia. Western nations desiring to influence the historical course of the new emerging nations should pay more attention to the development and training of these leaders.

The section of the book which reflects the unique personal observations of the author is on Eastern Europe after WWII. Showing the results of extensive travels and intensive study Seton-Watson's essays on the Danube states right after the war, on the Czechoslovak turnover, the Hungarian uprising and the Greek civil war are most informative. His essays end with a relatively recent discussion of Soviet foreign policy followed by a very current final essay. "Commonwealth, Common Market and Common Sense" in which he correctly pleads for Great Britain entering the Common Market and for Europe entering the Atlantic Community.

Some of these essays were written ten or more years ago but they are still valid. The fact that the first of them was published in 1946 and the others in almost each successive year is not a drawback because their incisive analyses are still valid. Moreover there is an additional advantage in the timing of these articles because the essays reveal a well written chronology of significant developments on the world scene from 1946 to 1963. There is no perspective more enlightening than that of a brilliant historian and Seton-Watson has in every sense this.—William B. Ballis, The University of Michigan.

The Yemen: Imams, Rulers, and Revolutions. By Harold Ingrams. (New York and London: Fredrick Praeger, 1963. Pp. 164, no price indicated.)

There can be little doubt that all those who some twenty-two years ago were delighted by Harold Ingrams' Arabia and the Isles were equally dismayed by his announced intention at the time not to write another book. His account of quaint, far-away and little-known peoples and places revealed a fascinating world as well as a man full of warmth, wisdom and charm. Many readers, like this reviewer, must have hoped that Mr. Ingrams would one day change his mind. This hope has now been realized.

It must, however, be stated at once that Mr. Ingrams' new book, The Yemen: Imams, Rulers, and Revolutions, is very different from his Arabia and the Isles. The racy, loquacious, and often eloquent manner in which he spoke of the minutiae of everyday human existence, as well as of the larger issues of tribal peace, border warfare and imperial policy, has been replaced by a tone of somber seriousness.

Mr. Ingrams' new book presents a broad survey of al-Yemen's past and present rather than a systematic study of the country and its problems. It contains a wealth of information on the tribal and denominational composition of the population; on the rise of Zaydi Shi'ism in al-Yemen; on Yemeni political personalities, both Royalist and Republican; on British-Yemeni relations, including the Treaty of 1934 and the continuing conflict over frontier questions; and on such events as the assassination of Imam Yahya, the various plots against Imam Ahmad, and the 1962 revolution which overthrew the Imamic regime.

Mr. Ingrams writes soberly and with restraint. Nonetheless, as a dedicated British colonial official who spent many of the best years of his life in South Arabia, he is a deeply committed man. Love for his country and affection for the people among whom he labored for so many years must have indissolubly linked the imperial interests of the one with the welfare of the other in his mind. He can hardly be expected to view with equanimity the forces which have brought revolution and civil war to al-Yemen, and which now threaten to shatter the British position in South Arabia so laboriously established by persons like him.

One of the interesting facts that emerges from the pages of this book is the author's change of sentiment toward Imamic rule and Imamic policies as a result of recent developments in the area. Imamic claims to British South Arabia, which had received neither the sympathy nor the support of the author prior to the appearance of the UAR upon the South Arabian scene, now appear to find justification in his eyes. In searching for a way out of al-Yemen's difficulties, it is to the present Imam al-Badr that he turns. "Maybe it is not too extravagant to suppose that such a ruler as he might well be a better proposition for al-Yemen than a Nasserite Republic or the curious hybrid Federation of South Arabia."

There is a touch of regret, and perhaps a suggestion of remorse, in the manner in which Ingrams relates how the Imam, having unsuccessfully pressed his claims to British-controlled South Arabia, invoked outside help which now threatens to encompass his ruin and radically change the power relationships in the area.

The Shi'i-Sunni conflict, one of the lesser-known aspects of the current Republican-Royalist struggle in al-Yemen, is discussed in more than one place. Notwithstanding the fact that Arab Nationalist sources have accused the British of fomenting this conflict, Ingrams does not think it necessary to deny charges of British involvement. He gives the impression that the Zaydis, particularly the two great tribal confederations of the Hashid and the Bakil, regard the Imam's cause as their own. However, it is known that important elements of the Hashid, disgruntled by the execution of their paramount chieftain by Imam Ahmad in 1959, made common cause with the Republicans—a fact not mentioned by the author.

A few errors, perhaps inevitable in so comprehensive a survey, occur in this book. For example, the two children murdered by Mu'awiya's general, Busr Ibn Artat (pp. 20-21) were not the children of Abdullah Ibn Abbas, the ancestor of the Abbasids, but those of his younger brother, Ubaydullah Ibn Abbas. Ali was not the nephew of Muhammad (p. 20), but his cousin, as correctly stated on page 27. The Imamic title "Hamid ed-Din" does not mean "Defender of the Faith" (p. 58) but rather "He whose religion is praiseworthy."

Mr. Ingrams' concluding remarks, reiterating a theme that runs throughout the book, are a disappointing forecast of the future. The Yemenis, we are told, even after their present troubles are over, will remain as factious and disunited as ever; for like all other Arabs, they are torn between self-love and self-denial, this-worldliness and other-worldliness, individualism and desire for unity.

This slim volume contains a surprising amount of information, much of which is essential for an understanding of the present situation in al-Yemen. It is a valuable and timely contribution to the scant literature on Southwest Arabia.—Wadle Jwaideh, Indiana University.

Syrian Politics and the Military 1945-1958. By GORDON H. TORBY. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1964. Pp. ix, 438. $7.00.)

The tendency of recent studies to blame the military as agents of instability in the Middle East and other under-developed areas shows no sign of weakening. Studies on the role of the military in politics can be illuminating; they remain, however, a difficult task, requiring an intimate knowledge of a people, their history, traditions, institutions, and a personal contact with both civilian and military establishments. The analyst must be primarily concerned with local assessments of the system he is scrutinizing which, added to his own, will provide him with the tools he needs. He then may begin his analysis in the light of generally recognized axioms—a tedious and frustrating process which does not guarantee the success of his enterprise.

Any attempt to analyze a situation in the Middle East or Africa from a non-local viewpoint is bound to produce inaccurate hypotheses, let alone conclusions. A knowledge gained from the local press and politicians whose prejudices are complex and manifold leads equally to deceptive conclusions.

One seeks in Torey's Syrian Politics and the Military a systematic study of the conditions that brought military groups into political eminence in Syria, perhaps even an analysis of the mystique of the military's political behavior there—a book of the type and stature of P. J. Vatikiotis' The Egyptian Army in Politics and which might serve as a sequel to that work, by studying the Syrian army as a political group with interests of its own, whose understanding of what constituted the national interest inspired its attempts and subsequent failures to emerge as the leader of a national resurgence.

The title of the book is misleading for the author has not produced such a study. As he candidly announces in his preface, the "book is a journey into the wilcerness of contemporary Near Eastern history," a narrative based mainly on Syrian news releases and newspaper comments on the period. The lack of analysis or its superficiality whenever attempted makes the book a tiresome compilation of historical records for the area specialist and a confusing one for the layman.

Chapter I is a sketchy mélange describing such diverse topics as geography, people, historical background, society, culture, economy, education, political strikes, governmental organization, army, constitution, ministry of interior, legal system and the Syrian press. This is followed by a brief description of political parties up to independence and then by nine chapters of relatively detailed accounts of the political vicissitudes of the Syrian state. The disproportionately brief conclusion is a hasty and naive summation of "the factors which brought about the failure of democratic government in Syria," and is followed by an epilogue, appendices and bibliography.

A plethora of events are related en vrac without due consideration to minorities or economic and ethnic factors—so significant in Syrian politics; they are merely cited as existing and constituting crucial problems. Too much is left to the imagination of the reader: such a situation occurred "due to considerations of foreign policy," but such considerations are not spelled out. The author's conception of Nasir as a "patriarchal image" for the Arabs, moreover, is quite unwarranted. If Nasir represents anything to the Arabs it is youth, vigor and change.

Torey sees three distinct periods in Syria's political history from the end of World War Two to the abortive union with Egypt. From 1946 to 1949 parliamentary democracy was tried and found to be wanting; from 1949 to 1954 military dictatorship also failed to give the country the leadership it required; and in 1954 until February 1958 came "the return to a parliamentary regime."

Independent Syria's "entire life" is seen as "characterized by internal turmoil, near chaos at times, and continual governmental instability." But these circumstances, Torey remarks, are not peculiar to Syria, as they have characterized many other countries such as "Pakistan, Burma, Korea, Iraq, France and Argentina." What made Syria's political institutions too fragile to withstand such stresses and strains, according to the author, are its geographical position, lack of forsighted leadership, and its being part of a larger Arab nation. Moreover, Syria was not able "to weld its people into a compact and compatible nation" because it has "neither tradition nor past glories." And the leaders who struggled for Syria's independence having "fought against something all their political lives" have "become accustomed to thinking in a negative frame of mind." But, Torey thinks: "Perhaps in less demanding circumstances, they would have been equal to the challenge."

Syria's geographical situation, he finds, "continually worked against the country's survival." Because, "Set between two rival blocs, Syria became the pawn of Arab power politics, the target of the rival Hashemite and Saudi-Egyptian camps."

So the civilian failed because of an inability to provide the country with a patriarch that was also a modern innovator with a capacity to push the country forward. Later, the military also failed "largely because of their inability to mold the Syrian people into a viable nation; their being caught-up in inter-Arab rivalries; and their lack of recognition that radical socio-political ideology was becoming the order of the day in the Arab world." The military were followed by a parliamentary regime—"the golden years of the Ba'th"—which also failed while showing the "progressive officers the way to achieve their dreams."

By 1958, both democracy and army rule had failed; a new system was needed but could not be found; "perhaps it was not the Syrian people's fault." The political system they inherited was ill-suited to this oriental society "undergoing a rapidly accelerating 'Westernization'."

The four pages of epilogue are a digest of the facts of Syria's political union with Egypt which, according to Torey, failed because "Nasir's Egyptian background failed to give him the requisite understanding of the Syrian temperament and mentality."

This book is neither scholarly nor very helpful to the layman; it is informative only as are releases in a daily newspaper. Unpolished, hastily compiled and edited, it is no more than a "journey into the wilderness" of the Syrian press.—Alfred G. Gerteiny, St. John's University.

The City of God and the City of Man in Africa. By Edgar H. Brookes and Amry Vanden-Bosch. (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1964. Pp. vi, 138. $3.75.)

This small volume is composed of two lectures given by Dr. Brookes at the University of Kentucky in 1963 and a substantial introduction to each lecture by Professor Vandenbosch. Dr. Brookes is introduced as professor emeritus of history and political science at the University of Natal, but he is perhaps better known as former Native representative in the South African Senate, leader in the Liberal Party of that country, and fighter for non-European rights there generally.

Vandenbosch's introductory essays on the newly independent nations of Africa and the politics of the Republic of South Africa provide very good background material, although the former might have dealt more with internal rather than international factors. The two essays by Brookes constitute the core of the book, and the remainder of this review will examine them more closely.

In his first essay Brookes defends the European missionary enterprise as "the only way in which the faith of Christ could have been brought to Africa," a continent where lust, cruelty, and "an all-pervading fear of evil spiritual forces" were mixed with a wide variety of virtues. He stresses the missionaries' faults-especially their lack of humility-along with their virtues, and concludes that they brought the City of Man to Africa along with the City of God, a combination which he seems to imply is inevitable whenever human beings are involved. The weakness of African sexual mores, the total denunciation of colonial and missionary activities, and the messianic tendencies of African political leaders, however, are anti-Christian and consequently must be resisted totally. Thus the implementation of the City of God in Africa is the highest goal for Brookes, and evils are ranked by him according to the extent to which they impede the realization of this goal. However, his City of God is a conception developed entirely in the West, and which is to be "handed over" to Africa to defend with all her ability. It is extremely unfortunate that Brookes' failure to understand the unacceptability of this doctrine to most Africans blurs his otherwise keen insights into the contemporary African situation.

In discussing the problems of his native South Africa in his second essay Brookes once again stresses the intermixing of the City of Man and the City of God. No person or ethnic group is portrayed as the villain or the hero in this tragic situation, but rather all are shown to be caught in a struggle in which compromise is impossible, at least for the time being, although there are some signs indicating that change is taking place. Boer, Briton, and Bantu alike cannot escape the seemingly logical dictates of their cultural norms and power situations. This does not mean that Brookes is unaware of the extreme injustice that the present situation entails; he portrays this injustice vividly, but has no simple cure for it. Violence is the only way to put an end to white rule in the near future, and this is not an acceptable means because it would destroy almost everything that is good in South African society. Brookes concludes that individuals must do their duty by knowing and feeling the facts, thinking with integrity, and speaking with courage, and that they must "appeal to God with Whom all things are possible." This course of action is likely to fail to preserve South Africa, but it is the most effective way to serve the City of God, and that is what really matters. Those who do not share Brookes' faith will probably consider him a defeatist and an escapist, but of course they cannot really appreciate his position as he sees it.—James R. Scarrit, University of Colorado.

Tunisia: The Politics of Modernization. By Charles A. Micaud with Leon Carl Brown and Clement Henry Moore. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. xiii, 205. $6.00.)

This is a lucid, informed study of modernization when change takes place under relatively the best of terms. Such a touchstone is valuable for students of modernization regardless of area interest, especially since the authors succeed so well in clarifying the historical, social, and economic context of what is primarily a political task

Tunisia was fortunate in the sequence of its political development, as Brown demonstrates in a fine analytical synthesis of the effects of the first fifty years of French rule. To a small, culturally rather homogeneous country long open to Mediterranean influences, French conquest in 1881 came almost bloodlessly. A local elite, which had decades earlier already generated its own reform movements, at first accepted French rule for being modern and orderly. The established Muslim elite asked only for equal opportunities in modern education, bureaucracy, and business, or at least, perpetuation of its social status. In the 1930's, the Neo-Destour under Habib Bourguiba's leadership emerged to organize a movement among a growing mass uprooted by French-inspired modernization but without rights or, often, place, in the new society. Enough time had by now passed, however, for modern standards and skills of action and justice to infuse the cadre organizing the new mass movement. Not so much time had elapsed that the nationalist movement would suffer the fate of the Wafd in Egypt-where an elite of landowners and businessmen feared to let the masses participate in political action except promiscuously, as mobs, so that the principal nationalist organization disintegrated without direct heirs when the achievement of independence revealed the absence of a national society. By the thirties, the Neo-Destour could, in fact, already count on the integral support of a trade union movement in its dual fight against Tunisian backwardness and French domination.

Moore, in the second section of this book (drawing upon a larger study being prepared for separate publication) assesses the Neo-Destour's contemporary role. The party's solidarity and organizational effectiveness were tested by clandestine and sometimes violent struggle for 16 years prior to independence in 1956. Self-sacrifice and intellectual and practical flexibility continue to be joined to a commitment to the transformation of society by way of a centralized democracy. Two quotations may help to suggest the tenor of that tutelary transformation. Bourguiba: ". . . The governor, the executive agent of the government, does not undertake projects that the citizens have not been prepared to understand, and on the other hand, the [party] commissioner, informed of these projects, works to prepare the ground. . . . The governor and the commissioner are an emanation of my person." Moore: "In contrast to the national scene, a healthy democratic political process flourishes at the local level. . . . Through its decades of experience, the party has developed a network of branches that transcend local rivalries. . . . The branches do more than mobilize the people in support of government projects; they represent the people and give them the opportunity to manage many of their local affairs.'

In Tunisia, economic development was postponed while political and social change were given precedence for at least five years after independence. First came the movement of new men with new orientation into the government at all levels; the grant of legal equality to women; the secularization and expansion of education; and the redistribution of one-fourth of the arable land. Planned economic development, delayed until 1961, is now being supported by more foreign economic aid per capita than any other modernizing nation now receives. Micaud, in a concluding section, highlights Tunisia's social and economic accomplishments so far, especially in self-help and social justice, and its major remaining problems in economic investment and growth.

The three collaborators have provided us with a most useful and succinct case study in political modernization. They conclude that "so far, Tunisia has been successful in carrying out the three major tasks of modernization that are the preconditions for rapid economic growth. It has succeeded in maintaining national cohesion, in mobilizing and educating the masses, and in transforming values and structures—without losing sight of the ultimate goal of modernization, the liberation of man." But if this case study is actually to be incorporated in a broader, systematic body of knowledge, new questions will first need answers from studies yet to be made.

Since only two or three other countries in Africa and the Middle East have so far modernized themselves as successfully as Tunisia, is success dependent on all the good fortunes and deliberate policies that have marked Tunisia's transformation? That would indeed be cause for pessimism. What are the likely political costs of compensating for the possession of fewer social and economic prerequisites? Are we, perhaps, being prematurely optimistic even about Tunisia? Modernization requires a persistent will and capacity to generate and absorb continuing transformation. How can we assess the solidity of a party's commitment to such a permanent revolution, and its ability to withstand the temptation of becoming, like Mexico's ruling party, primarily an efficient instrument for political integration among new political oligarchs? For pursuing such further questions, this book also offers a very good start.-Manfred HALPERN, Princeton University.

The Afrikaner's Interpretation of South African History. By F. A. Van Jaarsveld. (Cape Town: Simondium Publishers Ltd., 1964. Pp. 199. R 2-80.)

The range of subjects touched upon in this collection of essays is somewhat broader than is indicated by the title, but the latter quite accurately portrays the central theme of the book. In the first essay the author describes the traditional Afrikaner ideology, emphasizing its religious themes of a mission and a calling. In subsequent essays he demonstrates the influences which this ideology has had on Afrikaans historical writing, with respect to specific works and to general trends in the form and content of this writing. There is also some discussion of the influence of history on ideology in South Africa, as a necessary background for the development of the principal theme.

Van Jaarsveld sees the Afrikaner ideology and the interpretation of history based upon it as being anti-British and defensive in orientation. Historically, the Afrikaner has had to defend both his independence and his treatment of the African (Bantu) against various kinds of British interference. In order to do so, however, he first had to mould his own people into a nation, so that they could react to the British as a self-conscious and united group. It was only during the last quarter of the nineteenth century that Afrikaansspeaking people became a nation, but in their historical image-making their nationhood stemmed from the "Great Trek" of 1836-1838. In fact, virtually all of their historical writing is concerned with the Trek, the Anglo-Boer War of 1899-1902, and the intervening years. As the above events were the first two great crises in Afrikaner history, Van Jaarsveld speculates that a large volume of historical material may soon be forthcoming on the third crisis—the attainment of political awareness by the non-white peoples of South Africa. Accompanying this, the author hopes, will be a great diminution of anti-English sentiment among Afrikaners, and the unity of the two white groups in South Africa.

Because the purposes of Afrikaans historical writing have been to create a national myth, and to justify the actions of the Afrikaner and condemn those of the British, this writing has tended to manifest certain stylistic characteristics. The form of many Afrikaans historical works is either a series of carefully selected documents, loosely linked by inadequate narrative, or a flight into phantasy based on virtually no reliable documentation. Also characteristic of many of these writings is the tendency to pay little attention to motives, or to the broader context within which the events being described are taking place. For example, the international situation and the role of the non-whites are usually ignored completely. The author is careful to distinguish "pre-scientific" and "scientific" historical writings, and he stresses that the latter are much less likely to commit these stylistic errors. Some subjectivity in historical writing is unavoidable, according to Van Jaarsveld, but the historian must do everything possible to eliminate avoidable subjectivity. British and Bantu historical writing in South Africa, as well as that of the Afrikaner, has generally failed to measure up to this standard.

There is nothing in this book in the way of startling or really new conclusions, but it is a well-written and cogent presentation of a theme which, as far as this reviewer knows, had not previously received the full treatment it deserves. Because the book is a collection of essays there is some repetition, as the author admits in the preface, but this detracts only in a small way from the quality of the book.—James R. Scarritt, University of Colorado.

The Center of the World, Communism and the Mind of China. By Robert S. Elegant. (New York: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1964. pp. xii, 396. $5.95)

Communist China since 1949 has perplexed all nations, large and small. Peking's relations with the Soviet Union and non-communist nations are dynamic, subtle, almost unpredictable and often explosive. Does the Chinese Communist leadership today pursue the ancient mission of "Middle Kingdom" to impose on neighbor nations its fiat and system of government? Does China simply struggle for its recognition by all free nations before it becomes less bellicose? Or is it dedicated to the ultimate universal victory of Communism with China at the center of such a protracted struggle against every nation? Mr. Elegant in his book attempts to conclude that "The Mind of China" based on Confucian ideology recognizes no equals and insists on dominating the entire world, whether China is under Chiang Kai-shek or Mao Tse-tung. The implication is that the ancient "Mind of China" repudiates and transcends Communism and the established nation-state system. This theme certainly raises a number of complicated arguments.

To suit his own purpose, the author discussed China's modern relations with the European nations since 1600 A.D. and succeeded in establishing the basis for the Chinese outrage against Western imperialism, which climaxed in the Boxer Rebellion of 1900. He also painted a picture of incredible and kaleidoscopic changes that have taken place in China since 1949. Mr. Elegant believes that "Mao and his intimates are impelled by transcendent idealism, not by blood lust" (p. 15) and it is "The Confucian state ideology which shaped the Chinese Mind" (p. 153) which is quite hospitable to Marxist utopia. Both insist that the individual is no more than a social unit molded by official indoctrination. Mao Tse-tung "Is the creature of his own past and China's past" (p. 149) and "Communism in China is as much a reaffirmation of Confucianism as it is a reaction against tradition" (p. 171). However, he believes that Mao is a "dedicated internationalist" who sees himself as the leader of the oppressed peoples everywhere and Mao insists on "Nothing less than creation of a new, world-wide political force centered on China, . . ." (p. 350).

To destroy this "Mind of China" he suggested that any Western policy towards China "should properly proceed from a realistic appraisal of the compulsion that drives China's political leaders whether they are Communists or non-communists" (p. 368). Having repudiated the current U. S. policy towards Peking, he proposed the familiar line that the U.S. should abandon Chiang Kai-shek, extend trade and diplomatic recognition to Peking and help Peking to get into the United Nations. Thus, the unconquerable "Mind of China," to this reviewer's surprise, would become suddenly curable if the Chinese Communists are "Given the opportunities to understand the nature of the real world, so that they may stop fighting the devils of their own imagining" (p. 374).

To this reviewer, there are in his book a number of inaccurate comparisons, assertions and conflicting contentions. First of all, the "Mind of China" based on Confucianism did not always require conquest of neighbor states. Nor did it imply China's concern for oppressed peoples around it. It was nothing more than a Chinese sense of superiority. For centuries, the Middle Kingdom sought peace among neighbors through its tributary system which was based on China's superior power to pacify the battling neighbors if necessary. It is, therefore, erroneous for the author to identify the "Mind of China" with the present Communist compulsion for conquest. Secondly, the "Mind of China," if it can be correctly defined at all, underwent many revisions and transformations. The dynastic-Confucian ideology came under many internal attacks and repudiations since at least the May 4th Movement in 1919. Mr. Elegant should not resurrect the long-desserted Confucian ideology to justify Mao Tsetung's compulsion for conquest. Confucian idealism and Marxist utopia are different in kind and degree, even though both are authoritarian and dogmatic.

It is self-contradictory for Mr. Elegant to consider Mao Tse-tung as both prudent and "Incapable of setting any limit to his ambitions" (p. 191). Recent facts have proved that the Chinese Communists are quite cautious but esoteric in their foreign policy strategy. For example, Peking has not provoked America in the Formosan Strait since 1958. Nor has it honored its announced revenge against the recent American action in the Bay of Tonkin in North Vietnam. In 1962, Peking narrowed its military action against India. It is, therefore, inaccurate to conclude that Mao "is incapable of setting any limit to his ambitions." In my mind, China today behaves just like any big resurgent nation until held back by a superior counterforce. Furthermore, it is grossly wrong for Mr. Elegant to lump together and in the same degree Professor Hu Shih, Chiang Kai-shek and Mao Tse-tung as products of the same "Mind of China." They have been very different in their thoughts and actions, even though all have registered protest against Western imperialism in China.

In the author's own words, if the Peking regime has produced an "Equality of deprivation" (p. 4) and the regime is "thwarted by its own inefficiency, by popular resistance and by the law of nature" (p. 191) and if the 1958 introduction of agrarian commune system did produce "The breakdown of authority demoralized- not only the masses, but the cadres, too" (p. 299), the Peking regime would seem quite weak internally, and similar crises may recur again. Internal failures will always discourage Mao's ambitions abroad. In short, the author is apparently deluded by his contention that through concession and appeasement the West can remove Mao's compulsion for revenge. Contemporary history has not verified such contention as presented.

Finally, the "Mind of China" does not exist any more. The hostile behavior of China can be fully explained by reasons that the author fails to see clearly. As a have-not but ambitious nation, China is not prepared to accept the international status quo within the context of cold war politics. The "Mind of China" is merely a sophisticated fiction created by the author.—David W. Chang, Wisconsin State University-Oshkosh.

A Curtain of Ignorance: How the American Public Has Been Misinformed about China. By Felix Greene. (Garden City: Doubleday & Company, Inc., 1964. Pp. xix, 340. $5.50.)

Felix Greene cogently denounces "the press, the experts, and ... public officials" for having transmitted to the American people a distorted picture of Communist China-a picture which "the best intelligence in our own country knows is not true," but which "governs our actions" (p. xiii). The major thrust of his attack on the press and the experts is that their reportage "was bound to increase our hostility and fear of China and could in no way deepen our understanding of her. . . . The standard in both these professions has been appalling" (p. 321). He reaffirms, for the total American reportage on China, the conclusions reached by Walter Lippmann and Charles Merz in 1920 concerning the treatment of the Russian revolution by the New York Times: that it has been "nothing short of disaster," that the net effect has been "almost always misleading, and misleading news is worse than none at all. . . . " No one can seriously disagree with his conclusions. Greene's role is that of the crusading prosecutor, and his polemic is frankly written to stimulate some improvement in the situation. He uses the horrible example rather than the controlled sample to support his argument, and in so doing invites some doctoral candidate in political science to bring scientific methods and techniques to bear for a more measured analysis of Greene's thesis.

Greene begins early in the century to show how missionaries and business men first shaped an American image of China, followed by the creation of a negative image of the China of Chiang Kai-shek's Kuomintang, which was subsequently reshaped by media under influence of the "China lobby" into a favorable image. For the Communist period, he deals with broad themes (recurrent "starvation" and "slavery," mythical representations of Chinese intentions with respect to territorial expansion, intentions with respect to nuclear weapons, etc.) and with specific issues (the wishful invention of secret codicils to the Sino-Soviet agreements of 1950, assumptions of Chinese "aggression" in Tibet and on the Indian borders, misrepresentations of life in the people's communes, etc.). As informal "controls," he uses the reportage from sources he considers more reliable, his personal judgments based on three visits to Communist China and a continuing correspondence with people in Peking, and the logic of reason and contradictions. In particular, he has searched out the patently loaded editorial judgments passed along as parts of news content. He summarizes the principal factors contributing to the prevalent American myths about China as follows: (1) preventing people from seeing for themselves; (2) ignoring accurate information that is available; (3) dissemination of editorialized or imagined "news" from such "listening posts" as Hong Kong and Tokyo; (4) the press practice of reporting official government pronouncements as statements of reality (i.e., "statements emanating from governments or political movements should not be taken as factually correct by an independent press" (p. 302)); (5) the use of headlines misrepresentative of actual story content; and (6) misrepresentative use of photographs, cartoons and captions (illustrated). The indictment is a formidable one, and Greene appeals to the conscience of the journalistic profession to set matters aright.

American, and to some extent British, scholars are also brought under fire. Passages are taken from the works of such men as John K. Fairbank, Robert C. North and A. Doak Barnett to illustrate the intermixing of editorial judgments with portrayals of factual and policy situations. China Quarterly (London) is taken to task for publishing Joseph Alsop's imaginings ("On China's Descending Spiral," July-September 1962), but Greene is even more pitiless in condemning the scholars who responded to the Alsop article in a later issue of China Quarterly: "All but one treated [it] . . . as a contribution worthy of scholarly discussion" (p. 186). Greene sets a high standard of objectivity for them; in effect, he is saying: "Write about what you know about, deal with the facts, avoid moralizing." Unfortunately, western academic specialists on China stand exposed to the cross fires of political environment and conflicting value systems, and some handle the data with greater discrimination than others: Greene insists they should eschew such adjectives as: "frightful," "diabolical," "brutal." "Machiavellian," "slavish," "totalitarian," etc., when they feel called upon to judge Chinese Communist actions. The leading scholars in the field (including many of those named by Mr. Greene) are fully cognizant of the problems of research on contemporary China, are deliberately working to develop schemata that will tighten research and make it more meaningful, and are painfully aware that they are often separated from the necessary sources of information and have no opportunities for field investigation. Even Mr. Greene's three visits to China have not saved him from occasionally misinterpreting what he saw. The scholars who read Greene will certainly question themselves, and the validity of his charges against individuals; but the blanket indictment may be too sweeping: many of the scholars named who have used the objectionable adjectives have also contributed to the "accurate information" that is too often ignored. Greene has searched for horrible examples, not for balances.—H. Arthur Steiner, University of California (Los Angeles).

An Instance of Treason: Ozaki and the Sorge Spy Ring. By CHALMERS JOHNSON. (Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1964. Pp. 278. $6.50.,

How timely! On September 4, 1964, the Soviet Union finally acknowledged the remarkable work of the Sorge spy ring which had been broken up by the Japanese police 23 years earlier. The task of Richard Sorge, Communist of German-Russian parents who posed as a Nazi and had become a correspondent and German Embassy confidant, had been successfully completed in the fall of 1941 before his arrest. He had assured the Soviet Union that Japan was about to strike south and not against Siberia. Earlier he had predicted Hitler's attack on Russia to within two days, had reported Japanese intentions during the critical Changkufeng and Nomonhan border clashes, and had supplied voluminous other valuable intelligence. There is much speculation as to why the Soviet Union should have acknowledged the ring at this time. One theory is that the Kremlin wants to court the Japanese intellectuals who have long admired Sorge and especially his Japanese collaborator Ozaki Hotsumi without whom he could not have succeeded. As the Asahi newspaper's brilliant China expert. Ozaki had become close to the figures surrounding Prince Konoye who headed the government during the crucial period before General Tojo took over. This book explains the Japanese intellectuals' admiration for Ozaki and Sorge and much more.

Although the Japanese authorities had made some public statements on the Sorge case as early as 1942, the Russians quashed any mention of it during the Tokyo war crimes trials. Since then, however, a flood of reminiscences, articles, and even novels and motion pictures have appeared. Foreign attention was attracted in 1949 by an American Occupation report, followed in 1952 by publication of Shanghai Conspiracy: The Sorge Spy Ring by Charles A. Willoughby, General MacArthur's intelligence chief, whose book displays biases typical of the McCarthyite period and contains numerous misromanizations and other inaccuracies pointed out by Dr. Johnson, who is an assistant professor at the University of California (Berkeley). Publication of the (almost) complete police and court records did not occur until 1962 when the first three volumes of the Gendai-shi Shiryo (Materials on Modern History), totaling 1,835 pages, were devoted to the Sorge incident by the reputable Misuzu Shobo publishing firm. Supplementing this with Ozaki's writings and other materials in Japanese, Chinese, German, Russian, and English, Dr. Johnson has written a reliable, objective, and, in fact, fascinating study.

Johnson explains the admiration for Ozaki from the fact that he was not only an outstanding political analyst but an influential participant in Japanese politics who sought to avoid the oncoming disaster for Japan. Ozaki's published articles and books on Japan's China policies and the rise of Chinese nationalism have amazingly withstood the test of time. Through them and through his high personal connections, Ozaki "tried to warn his government-as did many other Japanese intellectuals-of the folly of a policy of aggression; but he also took independent action, through Sorge, to affect international politics in a way he thought would cushion the probable failure of the liberals' efforts." (p. 128) Many Japanese since the war have felt guilty for not having done more to fight against the prewar trend toward war; they admire Ozaki for staking his life on what he believed. If he was a "traitor," it was for the most patriotic of reasons. (p. 3) And yet the painful irony of it was that, because he had to hide his true intentions, his writings may have helped the militarists.

Despite its comprehensiveness, Dr. Johnson's book is constructively controversial, for many implications and unanswered questions remain. It nevertheless goes a long way toward putting this important case in its proper place in studies on modern Japan, on Japanese-German-Soviet relations leading to the outbreak of war, and on the revaluation of espionage in terms of its context, objectives, and results.—George O. Totten, Eastern Michigan Universly.

The Political Institutions of Modern China. By WILLIAM L. TUNG. (The Hague, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1964. Pp. xiii, 408.)

Modern China for Professor Tung is 20th century China and political institutions are whatever their enabling acts—whether constitutions, organic laws, statutes, regulations or articles—say they are. After describing the erosion of Ch'ing authority in a brief introduction, he divides his attention in the body of his study in roughly a two-to-one ratio between the Republican (Nationalist) and Communist phases of Chinese politics. Attached to the study are sixty pages of appendixes that provide the reader eight constitutions (between 1908 and 1954) for easy reference.

Professor Tung clearly writes from first-hand as much as from second-hand knowledge. Like many of his compatriots during the hopeful years of Kuomintang ascendancy, he combined academic pursuits with government service at different levels and in various roles. He was, for instance, Chairman of the first Municipal Council in Peiping (1933). During World War II he was a Counselor of the Supreme National Defence Council, More recently he has been on several faculties in this country and presently teaches at Queens College, City University of New York. Given this background one senses the strictures within which the scholar and erstwhile government functionary of his generation writes about Chinese politics. He is to a degree literally—much more figuratively-surrounded by colleagues and echoes of the past that impinge on the present in ways Westerners cannot fully understand. History holds him, and others like him, hostage for a ransom that can probably never be paid. At the same time, he is detached enough to recognize the Communist incarnation of his nation and culture for what it is and to incline toward describing certain of its political features with a realism that is sure to raise the hackles of extreme anti-Communists. Both systems, Republican and Communist, are described with notable dispassion when one considers that the observer was a responsible official in one,

The study moves chronologically and systematically from "From Autocracy to Democracy" at the end of the Ch'ing to "The Government of 'Democratic Centralism' " under Mao's regime. The most recent reference is August 1962. The author sets forth the structural design of central. provincial, and local governments in considerable detail at every stage including opposition (Southern) regimes during the warlord era and Communist governments in the 20s and 30s. This record goes farther than most descriptions of modern Chinese political institutions in detailing rules and regulations. And it sets this full catalogue of constitutions and statutes in a framework of historical discourse that provides at least an impressionistic sense of development and a clue to reasons for changing political designs.

For this reviewer, however, the study serves mainly to reinforce the long-standing awareness among most students of modern Chinese history and politics that the relation between the formal structures and the actual dynamics of Chinese political development has been far more incidental than integral and causal. There is ample evidence of Chinese interest in both the theoretical and practical aspects of constitutionalism. It was a major theme in the declining years of the dynasty among "self-strengtheners" who thought they had found a key in Western constitutions to Western wealth and power. It was more a descant than a theme during the long years of the Peking government between 1912 and 1928, though it continued to be the only generally accepted mark of legitimacy for whoever claimed authority for the moment. Successive Chinese governments have stacked constitutions one upon another down to the present as public records of shifting schematic arrangements of authority and power. As they have been stacked, they have been studied. Witness the number of constitutional analyses by Chinese historians and students of government. In a sense, this descriptive analysis of Professor Tung's is one more attestation to the fascination constitutions seem to hold for Chinese social scientists.

But these studies also attest to one of the most fundamental differences between Western and Asian politics. The West has long held it axiomatic that constitutions, basically, confirm rather than create actual political arrangements. Western constitutions have evolved where there were already working relations among major community interests, where power was already tamed in some measure by responsibility, and, most important, where there was a reliable consensus on central values and social goals. The most durable constitutions have only given design to political substance already in being. By contrast, Chinese scholars like Chinese politicians seem to have assumed that constitutions could be imposed on political chaos with the expectation that order could thus be wrested from disorder, that constitutions could be relied on to create a consensus on goals and values where none existed. Professor Tung appears, at least, to support this misconception of the function of constitutions, particularly in his assessment of the Republic. He describes in meticulous detail how institutions were organized at all levels by organic laws, regulations, and constitutions. And he would have us infer that they worked-except in those instances where he acknowledges specifically that they did not. We are also left to infer that this institutional approach to Chinese politics gives us meaningful insights into their dynamics, though he gives us no help in spelling them out.

This is acutely disappointing in the face of teasing remarks here and there that suggest that he could, if he would, assist us rank outsiders very considerably in our efforts to understand Chinese politics, particularly of the turbulent era between 1912 and 1949. The farther this period recedes into history and the more we are forced to rely on archival records, the more distorted becomes our view of the Republican interlude. Herewith, then, an appeal to our Chinese colleagues of Professor Tung's generation and comparable experience: "Come out of the archives; forsake the sterile formalism of paper institutions; and tell us something about the politics of this fascinating and critically important transitional period!"—Melville T. Kennedy, Jr., Bryn Mawr College.

Indonesia. By BRUCE GRANT. (Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, Distributed in London and New York by Cambridge University Press, 1964. Pp. x, 190. $5.50.)

The journalist can ofttimes provide insights into political life which both add color and background to the more academic work of a political scientist. This is particularly true if he has spent considerable time in an area visited by the academician only sporadically. Southeast Asia has been well covered in recent years by journalists such as Ronald Stead of the Christian Science Monitor and David Halberstam of the New York Times. Most recently a number of books have appeared written by correspondents interpreting personal experiences (such as Robert Trumbull's The Scrutable East) or analyzing specific aspects of politics (such as Arnold Brackman's study of Indonesian Communism). In the book under review Bruce Grant, an Australian correspondent, has leaned on his fourteen trips to Indonesia to provide a very readable general survey of that nation's political attitudes and problems.

This is not a scholarly book and makes no pretence of being one. In his preface the author asserts that, "As I am not a scholar this is not a scholarly work. The information is often raw and the judgements made without reference to previous authority." (p. vi). Mr. Grant does not use footnotes although he does allude to authorities such as Geertz, Kahin and Feith. However, the basic inability of the reader to check sources, when combined with infrequent cases of an apparent mixture of fact and myth, limits the volume's usefulness to the scholar.

The book itself is a survey of Indonesia's history, politics and culture, mixing straight historical and biographical accounts with personal observations on policies and personalities. It is sympathetic to the Indonesian revolution, empathetic with its political leadership and rather hostile towards Dutch colonial rule. At the same time it is generally critical of contemporary Indonesian political and economic policies. Beyond providing a readable introduction to the country to the general public, it does have marginal value to the scholar in the field insofar as the material results from the author's personal background and files. In this vein, two particularly interesting chapters deal with Australia's relations with Indonesia and a compilation of interviews with six anonymous Indonesians. While the latter does not pretend to be a scientific sampling, the conversations in themselves are intriguing insights into the attitudes of various individuals in the Indonesian "elite."

This book will not provide much that is new to the student of Southeast Asia who will find its use primarily of an anecdotal nature. At the same time, the paucity of responsible information on Indonesia is such that we should welcome contributions of journalists such as Mr. Grant.—Fred R. Von der Mehden, University of Wisconsin.

Politics of Change in Latin America. EDITED BY JOSEPH MAIER AND RICHARD W. WEATHER-HEAD. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. x, 258. $6.00.)

The Challenge of Development in Latin America. By Victor L. Urquidi. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. xiv, 209. $6.00; Paper $1.95.)

Among the flood of recent books on Latin America a major theme running through a preponderance of them deals with political, economic, and social change. The long-time stagnation of so much of hemisphere life is being disrupted by efforts toward economic modernization. And the ascendancy to political power of groups bent on attacking traditionalism gains especial significance in the Chilean presidential elections of 1964 when the winning Christian Democrats promised "Revolution with Freedom." Thus, it seems certain that fundamental alterations of the old order are inexorable and the major uncertainty involves normative questions-what should be the methodology, the guide lines, and directions. In Politics of Change in Latin America the authors turn to various aspects of contemporary processes of change, while Víctor Urquidi, in his Challenge of Development in Latin America, seeks to outline the essentials of economic issues.

Urquidi, an outstanding Mexican economist of international reputation, combines the vital attributes of the theorist and activist. Unlike so many Latin American writers who view their economies with a certain hopelessness, Urquidi believes that, compared with central Africa and much of Southeast Asia, in Latin America there exist far more "positive than negative factors." But these positive factors primarily relate to Latin America as a whole rather than to single nations and the apparent economic divergencies among them. In other words, he makes a strongly insistent appeal to these countries to consider themselves as members of "a Latin America and a Latin American economy."

The components of similarity include a population that is essentially young and expanding faster than any other area of the world; a majority of the people living in rural environments and largely engaged in agriculture and livestock raising; an average living standard that is low—with a gross product per person about one-eighth of the United States in 1960 and on a par with Japan, though approximately four times greater than that of central Africa and five times more than that of underdeveloped Asia; an impressive acceleration in industrial output that lamentably has been offset by a slump in the growth of agricultural production; and severely uneven income distribution which acts as a drag on economic development.

Once he explores these characteristics, Urquidi uncovers the many facets of the Latin American economy in general. He points out and explains the uniqueness of this region with its long periods of financial confusion; the role of foreign capital which has been invested with visible results at the same time that Latin America "has employed part of its own resources in unproductive activities, consumer expenditures, and even exports of its capital to more developed countries"; development's retardation due to the instability of international market conditions for primary products: and the social and institutional conditions of development, economic integration, and planning. In his final chapter the author discusses the Alliance for Progress. Since his evaluations really apply to the pre-Alliance economies of Latin America—Urquidi's book being a translation of lectures given in 1961 at the Colegio Nacional of Mexico-his main observation is one of optimism. He reminds us that at Punta del Este the United States recognized Latin American concepts of what was needed without tying the rest of the hemisphere completely to itself. At the same time, the U.S. recognized the necessity of economic planning (rather than urging dependence upon private foreign capital) and for the first time accepted the premise that Latin America's overall problem of social and economic development begs integral solutions. He concludes by commenting on the possibility that "Latin America never before has enjoyed a combination of external circumstances so favorable to converting its utopias into reality."

For the most part, the thirteen contributions to Politics of Change in Latin America are outstanding and seek to shed some new light on the vital subject suggested in the title. In the first segment, "The Forces of Change and Continuity," Weatherhead opens with an excellent introduction to paradoxes in the Latin American tradition of conflict. He tackles such theses and antitheses by setting out four propositions: "(1) the ideal of hemispheric unity and the reality of particularistic disunity, (2) the quest for a distinct national character and the curse of insignificance in the modern world, (3) the nineteenth century legacy and the revolutionary mystique, and (4) the dream of democracy and the practice of tyranny." Richard Morse and Arturo Uslar-Pietri consider ontological questions regarding Latin America's search for self-identity—the latter stressing the wrongness in generalizing about Latin America (hence, running somewhat counter to Urquidi's insistence that Latin America must consider itself as a single economic entity).

In Part Two, "The Political Puzzle," Arthur Whitaker outlines the strength and universality of nationalism among the twenty republics: Robert Alexander defines modern political party systems using as his typology traditionalistic, foreigninspired, and indigenous parties of change; and two authors (Daniel Cosío Villegas and Stanley Ross) seek to unravel the perplexities of modern Mexico. Cosío Villegas contends that the Mexican Revolution developed built-in "forces of renewal and change," though the final revolutionary stage lies ahead. The fact that this last phase is still to come favors the Mexican Left just as the Left. albeit full of shortcomings, is indispensable to Mexican progress. Professor Ross also ponders the Revolution, but adds a special warning to the U. S. to understand our great neighbor's history and, above all, to "recognize what the Russians already appreciate—namely, that the Mexican Revolution, by its achievement of social progress while maintaining freedom, offers a meaningful alternative to revolution Communist-style."

Brazil dominates the third section. Gilberto Freyre reiterates his belief in the necessity of studying "the intimate past of a social group"in this instance, the role of the patriarchal family in Brazil's history. Charles Wagley picks up the threads from the point of the traditional family's deterioration and goes on to make a case for the still powerful function of kinship in contemporary economic, social, and political life. But it is Anthony Leeds who performs particularly valuable yeoman service by shattering myths current in the United States about Francisco Julião. Leeds argues with great persuasiveness that Julião does not hold the influence generally attributed to him, that he is in fact a latifundista himself and a member of the controlling class. Furthermore, his principal motivation in tying himself to the masses is not altruistic but instead an attempt to secure an electoral base that will strengthen his own political career as well as to use this base against the powerful coastal sugar interests and traditional local leaders.

Finally, in "Challenges to the Western Hemisphere," three chapters are devoted to the need for the United States to put its racial house in order so that our image will improve in Latin America (Joseph Maier), the importance of emphasizing the first word of "Alliance for Progress" in place of "aid" (Germán Arciniegas), and certain misunderstandings besetting the Alliance for Progress (Víctor Urquidi).

All in all, both of these books merit wide attention. Urquidi's has the advantage of continuity and an integrated thesis. Whereas sometimes it is difficult to ascertain the pertinence of a given chapter to Maier and Weatherhead's general theme and a couple of chapters merely rehash old stories. Nevertheless, it does comprise some exceptionally worthy discussions. Both books acknowledge the considerable contributions of Professor Frank Tannenbaum to Latin American scholarship. And in the aggregate, the writing style, content, and choice of theme fall in the dynamic Tannenbaum tradition.—Ben G. Burnett, Whittier College.

Cleavages, Ideologies and Party Systems: Contributions to Comparative Political Sociology. Transactions of the Westermarck Society, Vol. X. Ed. by Erik Allardt and Yrjö Littunen. (Helsinki: distributed by the Academic Bookstore, 1964. Pp. 463.)

Eighteen papers on the interplay of ideology, party system, and electoral systems in Scandinavian, European, African, Japanese, and American political cultures by such scholars as Seymour Martin Lipset, Warren E. Miller, Junnosuke Masumi, Pertti Pesonen, and Stein Rokkan.

A Review of Elections, 1961-1962. THE INSTITUTE OF ELECTORAL RESEARCH. (London: Villiers Publications Ltd., 1964. Pp. 104. 10/.)

A concise summary of national election results since 1957 in five Commonwealth, ten European, six Communist, seven Asiatic, six African, and fifteen American nations.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND CROSS-NATIONAL RESEARCH

RICHARD L. MERRITT, WITH ELLEN B. PIRRO Yale University

General

Borsa, G. Nationalism and the Beginning of Modernisation in Eastern Asia. Politico. 29:2 (June 1964), 320-36.

Friedland, W. H. For a Sociological Concept of Charisma (Tanganyika). Social Forces. 43:1 (October 1964), 18-25.

Kling, Merle. Area Studies and Comparative Politics. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:1 (September 1964), 7-10.

Packenham, R. A. Approaches to the Study of Political Development. World Politics. 17:1 (October 1964), 108-20.

Ratnam, K. J. Charisma and Political Leadership. Political Studies. 12:3 (October 1964), 341-54.

Robson, W. A. The Transplanting of Political Institutions and Ideas. Political Quarterly. 35:4 (October-December), 407:19.

Seligman, L. G. Elite Recruitment and Political Development. Journal of Politics. 26:3 (August 1964), 612-26.

Varain, Heinz J. Die Bedeutung des Mehrheitsprinzips im Rahmen unserer politischen Ordnung. Zeitschrift für Politik. 11:3 (1964), 239-50.

Walzer, Michael. The Only Revolution: Theories of Modernization. Dissent. 11:4 (Autumn 1964), 432-43.

Wood, D. M. Issue Dimensions in a Multi-Party System: The French National Assembly and European Unification. Midwest Journal of Political Science. 8:3 (August 1964), 255-76.

Cross-National Research

Clignet, R. P. and P. Foster. Potential Elites in Ghana and the Ivory Coast: A Preliminary Comparison. American Journal of Sociology. 70:3 (November 1963), 349-62.

Rokkan, Stein, with Karl W. Deutsch and Richard L. Merritt. International Conference on the Use of Quantitative Political, Social and Cultural Data in Cross-National Comparisons (Yale University, 10-20 September 1963). Social Science Information. 2:4 (December 1963), 1-20.

Wipper, Audrey. A Comparative Study of Nascent Unionism in French West Africa and the Philippines. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:1, Part I (October 1964), 20-55.

The United States and Canada

Bowman, L. and G. R. Boynton. Coalition as Party in a One-Party Southern Area: A Theoretical and Case Analysis. Midwest Journal of Political Science. 8:3 (August 1964), 277-97.

Hofferbert, R. I. Classification of American State Party Systems. Journal of Politics. 26:3 (August 1964), 550-67.

MacKay, R. H. To End or Mend the Senate. Queen's Quarterly. 71:3 (Autumn 1964), 287-96.

Latin America

Arciniegas, Germán. Twentieth-Century Political Trends in Latin America. Cahiers d'Histoire Mondiale. 8:2 (1964), 233-54.

Aspects of population growth and its Applications in Latin America. International Migration. 2:1 (1964), 5-16.

Carillo Flores, Antonio. Mexico and Latin America. Proceedings of the Academy of Political Science. 27:4 (May 1964), 121-30.

Chacel, Julian M. Land Reform in Brazil: Some Political and Economic Implications. Proceedings of the Academy of Political Science. 27:4 (May 1964), 56-77.

Deutschmann, P. J. and J. T. McNelly. Characteristics of Latin American Countries. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:1 (September 1964), 25-29.

Garza, David T. Factionalism in the Mexican Left: the Frustration of the MLN. Western Political Quarterly. 17:3 (September 1964), 447-60.

Guevara, Ernesto Che. The Cuban Economy: Its Past, and Its Present Importance. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 589-99.

Hillekamps, C. H. Brasilien bannt die Gefahr einer Linksdiktatur. Aussenpolitik. 15:8 (August 1964), 542-49.

——. Konservative Kräfte in Lateinamerika. Aussenpolitik. 15:9 (September 1964), 629-34.

Ianni, Octavio. Brazil in the Crucible: Political Process and Economic Development. New Left Review. No. 25 (May-June 1964), 39-52; and No. 26 (Summer 1964), 50-68.

Johnson, Kenneth F. Causal Factors in Latin American Political Instability. Western Political Quarterly. 17:3 (September 1964), 432-46.

Klein, Herbert S. American Oil Companies in Latin America: The Bolivian Experience. Inter-American Economic Affairs. 18:2 (Autumn 1964), 47-72.

Lacombe, Américo Jacobina. L'évolution Politique du Brésil au XXe Siècle. Cahiers d'Histoire Mondiale. 8:2 (1964), 255-80.

Martz, John D. Dilemmas in the Study of Latin American Political Parties. Journal of Politics. 26:3 (August 1964), 509-31.

Mexico: the Problem of People. Population Bulletin. 20:7 (November 1964), 173-203.

Mörner, Magnus. Race and Social Class in Twentieth-Century Latin America. Cahiers d'Histoire Mondiale. 8:2 (1964), 298-304.

Monbeig, Pierre. Les Ressources Naturelles de l'-Amérique Latine au XXe Siècle. Cahiers d'Histoire Mondiale. 8:2 (1964), 290-97.

Navarro, Moisés González. Social Aspects of the Mexican Revolution. Cahiers d'Histoire Mondiale. 8:2 (1964), 281-89.

Odell, Peter R. Oil and State in Latin America. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 659-73. Patch, Richard W. The Last of Bolivia's MNR?—Tensions Between Personalism and Party in Politics. American Universities Field Staff, Reports Service: West Coast South America Series. 11:5 (1964), 717-41.

Pike, Frederick B. The Old and the New APRA in Peru: Myth and Reality. Inter-American Economic Affairs. 18:2 (Autumn 1964), 3-45.

Rama, Carlos M. Los Movimientos Sociales en América Latina en el Siglo XX. Caheirs d'Histoire Mondiale. 8:2 (1964), 305-26.

Rowe, James W. A Note on Argentina. American Universities Field Staff, Reports Service: East Coast South America Series. 11:3 (1964).

Selucky, Radoslav. Spotlight on Cuba. East Europe. 13:10 (October 1964), 19-22.

Wagley, Charles. Brazil: Crisis and Change. Foreign Policy Association, Headline Series, No. 167 (1964).

——. The Dilemma of the Latin American Middle Classes. Proceedings of the American Academy of Political Science. 27:4 (May 1964), 1-10.

Wallace, Elisabeth. British Guiana: Causes of the Present Discontent. International Journal. 19:4 (Autumn 1964), 513-44.

Western Europe

Schneider, F. Les Grands Partis Chrétiens Européens (II). Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:749 (October 1964), 50-55.

The United Kingdom

Bow Group. Millstones for the Sixties: A Bow Group Memorandum on Labour Policy. London. (1964).

Buck, Philip W. First-Time Winners in the British House of Commons since 1918. American Political Science Review. 58:1 (September 1964), 662-67.

Legros, Claude-Robert. L'Angleterre à l'Heure Travailliste? Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:748 (September 1964), 27-34.

Nicholas, .H. G. The British Election: the Tides of '64. Modern Age. 8:4 (Fall 1964), 368-77.

Rasmussen, Jorgen. Problems of Democratic Development in Britain: An American View. Political Quarterly. 35:4 (October-December 1964), 386-96.

France

Bazelaire, M. Y. de. The Future of the French Navy. Military Review. 44:11 (November 1964), 50-54.

Clerc, Paul. Changement dans la Structure Socio-Professionelle de la France entre 1954 et 1962. Population. 19:4 (August-September 1964), 683-706.

Drago, Roland. Some Recent Reforms of the French Conseil d'Etat. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. 13:4 (October 1964), 1282-99.

Girard, Alain, Henri Bastide, and Guy Pourcher. Mobilité Géographique et Concentration Urbaine en France. Population, 19:2 (April-May 1964), 227-66.

Gordey, Michel. The French People and de Gaulle. Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 546-58. Kelly, George A. Algeria, the Army, and the Fifth Republic (1959-1961): a Scenario of Civil-Military Conflict. Political Science Quarterly. 79:3 (September 1964), 335-59.

Mayne, Richard, George Lichtheim, Anthony Hartley, John Weightman, and F. R. Allemann. French Affairs: A Symposium. Encounter. 23:5 (November 1964), 26-54.

Pulock, L. J. The Future of the French Army. Military Review. 44:11 (November 1964), 41-49.

Thorburn, Hugh G. The Realignment of Political Forces in France. International Journal. 19:4 (Autumn 1964), 486-95.

Tricot, B. Le Budget des Armées. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1691-1704.

West Germany

Behrendt, Gunther. The Agrarian Problem in the Federal Republic of Germany. German Economic Review. 2:2 (1964), 111-23.

Eichler, Willi. Staatsbürger in Uniform. Geist und Tat. 19:8 (August 1964), 225-28.

Kentler, H. Trendbericht über Jugendforschung. Frankfurter Hefte. 19:1 (January 1964), 37-46.

Ridley, F. The German Federal Railways: A State Administered System. Parliamentary Affairs. 17:2 (Spring 1964), 182-94.

Spencer, Robert. Germany in the "Erhard Era." International Journal. 19:4 (Autumn 1964), 458-73.

Italy

Borsa, Giorgio. Recent Trends in Italian Politics. International Journal. 19:4 (Autumn 1964), 474-85.

Farias, Giuseppe. Il Problema dell'Alto Adige dopo la Commissione dei 19. Mulino. 8:7-8 (July-August 1964), 750-766.

Rosen, Edgar R. Italy's Coalition Government. Current History. 47:280 (December 1964), 339-44.

Other

Eyck, F. Gunther. The Benelux Countries. Current History. 47:280 (December 1964), 355-61.

Quade, Quentin L. and Thomas J. Bennett. Shield for the Citizen. Modern Age. 8:4 (Fall 1964), 377-88. (The Ombudsman of Scandinavia)

Smith, Rhea Marsh. Spain Emerges from Isolation. Current History. 47:280 (December 1964), 345-49, 366.

The Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Barry, Donald D. The Specialist in Soviet Policy-Making: the Adoption of a Law. Soviet Studies. 16:2 (October 1964), 152-65.

Gollwitzer, H. Christliche Existenz in der "DDR." Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht. 15:1 (January 1964), 6-15.

Hahn, W. F. The Mainsprings of Soviet Secrecy. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 719-47.

Malinovsky, Rodion Y. The Role of the Soviet Political Officer. Muitary Review. 44:9 (September 1964), 94-98.

Mander, John. Beyond the Wall: 1964. Encounter. 23:3 (September 1964), 40-47.

Karpov, K. Some Problems Relating to the Economic Recovery of Backward Kolkhozes. Annals of Public and Co-operative Economy. 35:2-3. (April-September 1964), 181-95.

Rigby, T. H. Party Elections in the CPSU. Political Quarterly. 35:4 (October-December 1964), 420-43.

Schlesinger, Rudolf. Soviet Law: System and Institutions. Science & Society. 28:4 (Fall 1964), 453-60.

Skilling, Gordon H. Ferment Among Czechs and Slovaks. International Journal. 19:4 (Autumn 1964), 496-512.

Smolinski, Leon. What Next in Soviet Planning? Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 602-13.

The Soviet Union, 1964: A Symposium, Current History, 47:279 (November 1964).

Wädekin, Karl-Eugen. Zur Frage der regionalen Besonderheiten in der sowjetischen Landwirtschaft und Agrarpolitik. Osteuropa Wirtschaft. 9:3 (September 1964), 21-41.

Wilder, Emilia. Impact of Poland's "Stabilization" on Its Youth. Public Opinion Quarterly. 28:3 (Fall 1964), 447-452.

Middle East and North Africa

Ashford, Douglas E. Second and Third Generation Elites in the Maghreb. Washington: Bureau of Intelligence and Research, U. S. Department of State (1964).

Karpat, Kemal H. Society, Economics and Politics in Contemporary Turkey. World Politics. 17:1 (October 1964), 50-74.

Viennot, Jean-Pierre. Le Ba'th Entre la Théorie et la Pratique. Orient. 8:2 (1964), 13-26.

Africa

Berghe, P. L. van den. Toward a Sociology of Africa. Social Forces. 43:1 (October 1964), 11-17, Blanchet, André. La Démocratie Africaine. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1720-37. Da Silva Cunha, J. M. Political Aspects of the New Africa. African Affairs. 63:4 (October 1964), 270-80.

Erzuah, J. B. Comparative Study of Constitutional and Administrative Structures in Ghana. Civilizations. 14:1-2 (1964), 85-91.

Ferraris di Celle, Giuseppe. Malawi, già Niassaland. Civitas. 15:7-8 (July-August 1964), 53-69.

Flather, Horace. The Press and Politics in Africa. Optima. 14:3 (September 1964), 155-63.

Grundy, K. W. Political Power and Economic Theory in "Radical" West Africa. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 405-24.

Guerin, Daniel. Au Ghana, "Syndicalisme et Socialisme." Presence Africaine. No. 3 (September-November 1964), 14-23.

Hodge, Peter. The Ghana Workers Brigade: A Project for Unemployed Youth. British Journal of Sociology. 15:2 (June 1964), 113-28.

Imhoff, Christopher von. Malawi—ein Neuer Staat in Afrika. Aussenpolitik. 15:8 (August 1964), 550-56.

Kagonge, J. Ouganda. Tendences du Socialisme Africain Contemporain. Revue de la Société d'Études et d'Expansion. 63:211 (May-June 1964).

Kettlewell, R. W. Nyasaland: Whence and Whither? African Affairs. 63:253 (October 1964), 258-65.

Manning, Charles A. W. In Defense of Apartheid. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 135-49.

Mortimer, M. South African Native Government. Quarterly Review. 302:642 (October 1964), 416-21.

Mphahlele, Ezekiel. The Fabric of African Cultures. Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 614-27.

Pemberton, R. F. Africa: 1964. Royal Air Forces Quarterly. 4:3 (Autumn 1964), 221-26.

Rowland, H. R. Nyasaland General Elections, 1964. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. 3:4 (October 1964), 227-40.

Strauss, Bertram W. Malawi's Path as an Emerging Nation. Public Administration Review. 24:3 (September 1964), 166-69.

South and Southeast Asia

Baum, R. D. "Red and Expert": The Politico-Ideological Foundations of China's Great Leap Forward. Asian Survey. 4:9 (September 1964), 1048-57.

Brass, P. R. Factionalism and the Congress Party in Uttar Pradesh. Asian Survey. 4:9 (September 1964), 1037-47.

Chaudhury, N. C. B. Ray. Nehru's Unfinished Work. Political Quarterly. 35:4 (October-December 1964), 397-406.

Eckstein, Alexander. On the Economic Crisis in Communist China. Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 655-68.

Ginsburgs, G., and A. Stahnke. The Genesis of the People's Procuratorate in Communist China, 1949-1951. China Quarterly. No. 20 (October-December 1964), 1-37.

Gray, Jack. Political Aspects of the Land Reform Campaigns in China, 1947-1952. Soviet Studies. 16:2 (October 1964), 209-31.

Griffith, S. B. H. "The Glorious Military Thought of Comrade Mao Tse-tung." Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 669-74.

Kroef, Justus M. van der. Communism and Chinese Communalism in Sarawak. China Quarterly. No. 20 (October-December 1964), 38-66.

------. Singapore's Communist Fronts. Problems of Communism. 8:5 (September-October 1964), 53-61.

Joshi, Ram. The General Elections in Goa. Asian Survey. 4:10 (October 1964), 1093-1101.

Lee. R. W. III. General Aspects of Chinese Communist Religious Policy, with Soviet Comparisons. China Quarterly. No. 19 (July-September 1964), 161-73.

Leifer, Michael. Communal Violence in Singapore. Asian Survey. 4:10 (October 1964), 1115-21.

Lissak, Moshe. Social Change, Mobilization, and Exchange of Services between the Military Establishment and the Civil Society: The Burmese Case. Economic Development and Cultural Change, 13:1, Part I (October 1964), 1-19.

Pauker, E. T. Has the Sukarno Regime Weakened the PKI? Asian Survey. 4:9 (September 1964), 1058-70.

Sayeed, Khalid B. Pathan Regionalism. Duke University Commonwealth Studies Center. Reprint No. 13 (1964).

Shackleton, N. A. Communist China's Potential. Military Review. 44:9 (September 1964), 39-48.

Shah, S. A. A Statistical Estimate of the Class Structure of Contemporary India. Science & Society. 28:3 (Summer 1964), 275-85.

Sheridan, L. A. Constitutional Problems of Malaysia. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. 13:4 (October 1964), 1349-67.

Smythe, Hugh H. Thailand Minority Groups. Phylon. 25:3 (Fall, 1964), 280-87.

Far East and Oceania

Aikman, C. C. The New Zealand Ombudsman. Canadian Bar Review. 42:3 (September 1964), 399-432.

Caiden, N. J. The Ombudsman and the Rights of the Citizen. Australian Quarterly. 36:3 (September 1964), 69-77.

Darmstadter, M. V. Korean Minority in Japan. Contemporary Japan. 28:1 (September 1964), 138-

Encel, S. The Labor Party and the Future. Australian Quarterly. 36:3 (September 1964), 19-34.

Japan: An Economic Survey. Statist. 185:4511 (August 21, 1964), 1-48 (special section).

Kashin, A. The Defeat of the Pro-Soviet Faction of the Japanese Communist Party. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 11:11 (November 1964), 31-35.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON COMPARATIVE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

NIMROD RAPHAELI The University of Michigan

General Works

Belshaw, C. S. Anthropology and Public Administration. Canadian Public Administration. June, 1964.

Finan, William F. and Alan L. Dean, Procedures for the Preparation and Implementation of Administrative Reforms. NIPA Reporter. October, 1963.

Hebal, John J. Training and Development in the Pacific North-West: British Columbia, Oregon, and Washington. Canadian Public Administration. June, 1964.

Henderson, Keith M. A Preliminary Survey of 37 Schools and Institutes of Public Administration. Philippine Journal of Public Administration. January, 1964.

Hochschule für Verwaltungswissenschaften Speyer. Aktuelle Probleme der Kommunalaufsicht. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1963.

Klecatsky, Hans. Reflections on the Rule of Law and in Particular on the Principle of Administrative Action. Journal of the International Commission of Jurists. Summer, 1963.

Langrod, G. Vie Administrative a l'Etranger. La Revue Administrative. July-August, 1964.

L'E.N.A.: Situation et Perspectives. *Promo*tions. No. 70, 1964 (Special issue on E.N.A.)

Philip, Olivier. Pour la rehabilitation du technocrate. Promotions. No. 69, 1964.

Prakash, Kailash. Service at the Post Office Counters in the United Kingdom and India: A Comparative Review. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. January-March, 1964.

Bureaucratic Systems

Erzuah, J. B. Comparative Study of Constitutional and Administrative Structures in Ghana. Civilisations. No. 1-2, 1964.

Globerson, Aryeh. Problems of Public Administration in West African Countries. Public Administration in Israel and Abroad. No. 4 (1963).

Golomb, Naftali. Kibbutz Administration.

Horrell, Muriel. L'administration du Sud-Ouest Africain. Civilisations. No. 1-2, 1964.

International Review of Administrative Sciences.

Special Issue on Public Administration in Poland. No. 1 (1964).

Mackintosh, John B. Regional Administration: Has it Worked in Scotland. Public Administration (London). Autumn, 1964.

Mallick, S. A Unified (Central) Civil Service. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. January-March, 1964.

Reyers, Alvaro Rodriguez. Diagnosis administrative del Gobierno Federal. Revista de Administracion Publica (Mexico). Febroro-Marzo, 1964.

Venezuela—Comisión de Administración Pública. 23 preguntas sobre reforma administrativa. Caracas: CAP, 1963.

Personnel and Fiscal Administration

Boldue, Roch. Le Recrutement et la Selection dans la Fonction Publique du Québec. Canadian Public Administration. June, 1964.

Carson, William Morris and Loyd E. Grimes. Training: Suggested Guide Lines for Pakistan. NIPA Reporter. January-March, 1964.

Collins, D. J. Recruitment and Selection for Public Administration: The Last 10 Years. Canadian Public Administration. June, 1964.

EROPA (Eastern Regional Organization for Public Administration). Regional Seminar on Personnel Management and Administration; Record of Proceedings and Documentations. Secretariat General, Manila, Philippines, 1962.

Falla, F. Garrido. La nueva legislación sobre functionarios públicos. Revista de Administración Publica (Madrid). Enero-Abril, 1964.

Felizmena, Remedios C. Civil Service Examinations and Appointments Revisited. Philippine Journal of Public Administration. January, 1964.

Fellows, Erwin W. Merit System Trends and Problems: Some Underlying Cultural Values. Public Personnel Review. October, 1964.

Mueenuddin S.Pk., G. Public Administration Training in Pakistan. NIPA Reporter. January—March, 1964.

Overton, Edward W., Jr. Improving Trained Manpower Capabilities in the Middle East. NIPA Reporter. August, 1963.

Pujol, Hector Atilio. El Establecimiento del Servicio Civil y de la Carrera Administrativa. Caracas, Comisión de Administración Pública, 1963.

Sherwani, O. K. The Role of the Establishment Division in Personnel Administration. NIPA Reporter. January-March, 1964.

Smithies, Arther. The Theory of Budgeting and Government Organization. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. January-March, 1964.

Tsien, J. Les systemes d'examen pour le recrutement des fonctionnaires en Chine (de Confucius a nos jours). La Revue Administrative. Mai-Juin, 1964.

Administrative Responsibility and Control

Brewer, A. Randolp. Consideraciones sobre la iligalidad de los actos administrativos en el Derecho Venezolano. Revista de Administración Pública. Enero-Abril, 1964.

Caiden, Naomi. An Ombudsman for Australia? Public Administration. (Sydney). June, 1964.

Davis, A. G. The Ombudsman in New Zealand. Journal of the International Commission of Jurists. Summer, 1963.

Hochschule für Verwaltungswissenschaften Speyer. Probleme der juristichen Ausbildung in der Verwaltung. Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1963.

Kastari, Paavo. The Parliamentary Ombudsman: His Functions, Position and Relation to the Chancellor of Justice in Finland. NIPA Reporter. September, 1963.

Mathur, Ramesh Narain. Need for an Indian Ombudsman for Successful Planning. The Indian Journal of Political Science. October-December, 1963.

Puisoye, J. Le nouveau status particulier des membres des Tribunaux administratifs. La Revue Administrative. Mai-Juin, 1964.

Roberts, James S. An Ombudsman for Pakistan? NIPA Reporter. August, 1963.

Rowat, Donald C. The Parliamentary Ombudsman: Should the Scandinavian Scheme be Transplanted. NIPA Reporter. September, 1963.

Public Administration and Socio-Economic Development

Dror, Yehezkel. Public policy-making in avantgarde development states. Civilisations. No. 4, 1964.

Eisenstadt, S. N. Problems of Emerging Bureaucracies in Developing Areas and New States, in: Industrialization and Society. Bert F. Hoselitz and Wilbert E. Moore (eds.). Paris: UNESCO-Mouton, 1963.

Gable, Richard W. Development Administration and Assistance—An Annotated Bibliography. Washington, AID, 1963.

Muhammad, Faqir. Second Advance Management Course in Development and Administration—An Assessment. NIPA Reporter. August, 1963.

Naor, Gideon. Local Authorities in Development Areas in Israel. Public Administration in Israel and Abroad. No. 4 (1964).

Pai Panandiker, V. A. Development Administration: An Approach. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. January-March, 1964.

International Administration

Hayward, Richard. Le role des organismes paritaires dans la representation du personnel aupres des communautes Européenne, In: Institut International des Sciences Administratives, Deuxieme Colloque sur la fonction publique Européenne. Bruxelles: 1963.

Huvanandana, Malai and Woodworth G. Thrombley. Organization for What: The Case of EROPA. The Chinese Journal of Administration. July, 1964.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW AND ORGANIZATION

The Law of International Waterways—With Particular Regard to Interoceanic Canals. By R. R. BAXTER, WITH THE RESEARCH ASSISTANCE OF JAN F. TRISKA. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1964. Pp. vii, 371. $9.50.)

This is an important and impressive book. While it is not a book to skim, it is likewise not one to abandon before completion. Professor Baxter of the Harvard Law School, with the research assistance of Dr. Jan F. Triska of Stanford University, has succeeded in presenting with authority and clarity the results of an intensive study of an intricate subject. The reader's interest is stimulated by attention to major crises rooted in conflicting national interests concerning international waterways. Interest is maintained by skillful reference to other pertinent events as well as by citation of a wealth of documentary material. Not only is this the first comprehensive overview of the subject; for some time to come it is likely to remain the definitive work. Had the book existed at the time of the 1956 Suez affair, it can be hazarded that confusion, official and unofficial, would have been less. It is to be hoped that the work will contribute to formulation of sophisticated proposals and policies in disputes and difficulties looming on the horizon.

In the context of existing international law concerning navigation through international rivers and straits Professor Baxter focusses on the law and institutions devised to operate or supervise interoceanic canals, in particular the three major canals: Suez, Panama and Kiel. That law he sees as the outgrowth of state practice, treaties and adjudication. With the objective of maintaining free passage through these important commercial channels the developing law has placed restrictions on territorial sovereigns, operating or supervisory agencies, and users. Believing the time ripe for codification of these rules in the interests of greater precision and more widespread acceptance, Professor Baxter in an Appendix puts forth the essentials of such a code. Though he examines the organization, range of competence and functions of a possible international administering agency for interoceanic canals, he concludes that the continuing, gradual development of a body of customary international law is a more hopeful means of pursuing the objective of maximum free passage than is internationalization in the present political environment.

The elements of Professor Baxter's proposed code are probed in successive chapters concerned with the operation of interoceanic canals, passage in time of peace and in time of war, fiscal controls, and technical problems (dredging, maintaining locks, pilotage, towage, traffic control, and labor).

The suggested draft regulations are pragmatic and conservative. Admitting the difficulty of enforcing them in crises, Professor Baxter relies on self-interest to induce compliance. Crises are however, rooted in the conflicting interests of territorial sovereign, operator and users, when these are or involve different states as in the cases of Suez and Panama. It is this fact plus the political and military interests of states in none of these categories that establish the concern of the international community not only in the just resolution of differences but also in the uninterrupted flow of traffic through these vital arteries. The Suez crisis clearly showed the inadequacy of existing international institutions in both these respects and a Panama crisis may repeat the lesson.

Professor Baxter's cautious look to the future is undeniably solidly grounded in past experience. He is probably realistic in depreciating expectation of accomplishment by international organs under present conditions. But tomorrow's law is necessarily a response to today's problems. Increasingly effective institutions and the growth of community consensus are no less interrelated internationally than domestically. From so comprehensive and meticulous a study a few imaginative guideposts to more effective community organs and procedures might not unreasonably have emerged.—Ruth C. Lawson, Mount Holyoke College.

Maroc 1943-1956: Le Conflit Franco-Marocain. By Stéphane Bernard. (Brussells: Institut de Sociologie de l'Université Libre de Bruxelles, 1963. 3 vols. 390, 286, 402 pages. 900 FB for the 3 vols.)

This ambitious work is the second of a series of four monographs sponsored by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in an effort to contribute on a general theory of international conflicts. The author has divided his study into three parts: the first book is a history of the Franco-Moroccan conflict, the second a description of institutions and social groups involved in the conflict, and the third, the "pièce de résistance" that concerns us here, is an attempt to extract from the Moroccan experience a political theory of colonial conflicts.

The theory is based on both a functional analysis (the inability of a colonial system to solve crucial problems) and an analysis of the relations between key variables-situations, attitudes, political decisions. Underlying it is the acceptance of a political determinism that stresses the "simple cleavage" separating the anticolonialism of the subjected people and the conservatism of the "colons"—the only anomalous elements being the conservatism of Moroccan "notables" and the liberalism of a small fraction of the French settlers. The deterministic sequence can be briefly summed up: new conditions create new attitudes and ideologies, all of which tend to restrict the potential authority of the government. Past a certain point, this authority lapses, as it becomes impossible to use force as a substitute for the lost consensus. The incapacity of the French government and of the "Résidence," prisoner of the colons and the colonial administrators, to find constructive solutions to the crisis soon led to an impasse that forced the nationalists to armed opposition. The author wisely points out that the revolutionary war alone could not force a decision; "elle n'est que l'argument central de la constellation de forces matérielles, politiques et morales qui finiront par décider la métropole à abandonner la lutte, mais qui seraient inopérantes si le nationalisme local reconçait à l'usage de la force" (p. 124).

To this reviewer, the major drawback of Mr. Bernard's methodology is that it does not give him a particularly useful framework for selecting and integrating relevant data. It even seems to relieve him from carefully examining some basic assumptions and from marshalling facts to support his argumentation. Thus the assumption of a deterministic sequence is complemented by the convenient concept of the appearance of "virtual" nationalist attitudes as the result of new conditions. These virtual attitudes need to be translated into actual ones by leaders and organizations, but their very existence makes the role of leadership and organization secondary and allows the author to avoid analyzing the mechanics of the acquisition of new attitudes by various social groups.

Very little is being said about the composition of the revolutionary elites and their roles in converting urban, and much later, rural masses. Only scant allusions are made to the "complex sociological structure" of the first activist nucleus, to the entry upon the scene of Western educated leaders or to the role of the trade unions. Urban nationalism is briefly characterized as the specific protest of those groups most directly affected by the consequences of colonialism. But nothing specific is said about the "new conditions" that were to create new attitudes.

The basic error of the colonialists, according to the author, is their belief that the determinant factor in the situation was the action of revolutionists on politically neutral masses incapable of spontaneous action. The colonialist thesis thus called for the elimination of the legal fictions of the Treaty of Fez and the imprisonment of the nationalist leaders. "L'erreur de l'autorité francaise est d'avoir cru que les révolutions sont faites par des chefs . . . En révolution, l'adversaire n'est pas le chef révolutionnaire, c'est la masse organisée" (p. 99). But what are the "organized masses"? Are they to be identified with what is otherwise described as elites, "noyau irréductible," "minorité active"? Why assume the spontaneous reflex of a "masse en mal de révolution"? It was not, after all, until 1955, when victory seemed assured by the return to power of Mohammed V that the rural masses, some 80 per cent of the population, began to follow the nationalist leaders.

Mr. Bernard rightly points out that the logic of the situation favored the growth of a revolutionary nationalist movement in Morocco and at the same time the successful holding operation of the conservatives in both France and, for obvious reasons, in Morocco. But why dismiss the concept of consensus, that is central to his explanation of the political evolution of Morocco, when it comes to explaining the political impotence of the French Left and why replace it with the questionable concept of "social integration" to account for the absence of a powerful left wing movement of decolonization? According to the author decisions favorable to the status quo and to the recourse to force were inevitable in the French context, the crisis of the regime playing only a minor role. Yet a decision was easily found in 1956 to both the Moroccan and the Tunisian crises with a minimum of resistance from the Right. This decision was not due, as the author suggests, solely to the admission of defeat and to the need to concentrate French military efforts in Algeria.

The bibliography ignores most of the relevant non-French sources.—Charles A. Micaud, University of Denver.

The Universal Postal Union: Coordinator of the International Mails. By George A. Codding, Jr. (New York: New York University Press, 1964. Pp. xiii, 296. $6.50.)

Although even today one occasionally hears it suggested that the United States Post Office should be turned over to private enterprise, it appears that the delivery of the mails is among the oldest of government enterprises dating back at least to about 2000 B.C. in ancient Egypt. Throughout the centuries it became generally recognized as an appropriate government function, and finally, more than 100 years ago, became established everywhere as a government monopoly. The necessity for special arrangements to expedite the delivery of mail across national borders was also recognized early, the first postal treaty (between France and Spain) being negotiated in 1601; this was followed by numerous bilateral postal conventions between the various states, but their lack of uniformity made it evident that something more was needed to bring order out of chaos. Various individuals and groups made proposals for an international postal system, but it was Lincoln's Postmaster General, Montgomery Blair, who initiated the procedures that brought agreement in 1863 on the basic principles and finally the creation in 1874 of the General Postal Union (later called the Universal Postal Union).

The detailed story of these developments and of the operation of the Universal Postal Union is told in this book, in seven chapters. The author spent considerable time at the UPU headquarters in Geneva, he is also something of an expert in the field of international communications, and his account may be considered authoritative as well as interesting. The Universal Postal Union is particularly significant as the second oldest international governmental organization, being preceded only by the International Telegraph Union (now the International Telecommunications Union). It had therefore to be set up without experience as a guide, and its experience has become over the years a useful guide for other international organizations. It has grown in membership from 21 in 1874 to 123 in 1964, exceeded only by the World Meteorological Organization (125), another even more technical organization. Its size and its persistence are, no doubt, due to these somewhat unique features of its organization and operation: (1) It is technical and administrative in its purposes and functions, and about as nonpolitical as it is possible to be. (2) Colonies and overseas territories have been admitted to membership on an equality with sovereign states. This was changed in 1947 to permit generally only sovereign states in the future, but with dependent areas still admissible by special action, all of which is in conformity to the rapid dwindling away of colonial or non-self-governing territories. (3) The procedure of admission has been very easy, a simple declaration of adherence only being required until this also was changed in 1947 to the requirement of two-thirds approval by the members. (4) The organization has been quite simple, with no continuing organs whose activities could be seriously curtailed by war or other international conflict. On the other hand, the UPU was, of course, affected by both World Wars, the free flow of mail being restricted in various ways by the belligerents. But the existence of UPU and its location in neutral Switzerland made it possible for its International Bureau (or secretariat) to function continuously throughout the wars and for the Organization to renew its activities immediately after the cessation of hostilities.

The author examines also the relationship of the UPU to the League of Nations and the United Nations, respectively. In the case of the former, Article 24 of the Covenant clearly contemplated that the UPU, as well as other existing international organizations, should be brought under the direction of the League. This was not accomplished for various reasons, the most important being that consent of the contracting parties was required. The author manages to avoid direct mention of the United States in this connection. but the implication is pretty clear that we were the chief obstacle. With the establishment of the United Nations, the UPU could no longer hold out against absorption into the larger organization as a Specialized Agency, but it did secure provisions that maintain its relative independence over that of most other Specialized Agencies. The problems, advantages, and disadvantages that arise under the system are fully examined by the

This is a good book, scholarly and readable. There are four annexes of useful information, an extensive bibliography, and an index.—Clarence A. Berdahl, University of Illinois.

The Role of Domestic Courts in the International Legal Order. By Richard A. Falk. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1964. Pp. xvi, 184. $6.50.)

Professor Falk's carefully reasoned book is a contribution to the work in the Procedural Aspects of International Law under the auspices of Syracuse University School of Law's International Legal Studies Program. It is "a search for a conception of domestic judicial function that is broad enough to acknowledge the national setting and to explain the duty of upholding international law" (p. 170). This conception must come within a framework which is based on the following two factors: (1) "International law exists in a social system that possesses weak central institutions" (p. ix), and (2) "Domestic courts must struggle to become their own masters in international law cases" (p. x).

He develops the dual responsibility of national courts: the status of domestic courts as national institutions, and the status of domestic courts as agents upholding the international order. In the domestic field the court is a national institution maintaining the legal order. In the international field the domestic court is an international agent applying international law in order that the international legal order may be maintained. The domestic court, however, may be bound by the Act of State doctrine when it has a case under its jurisdiction involving international law. The author desires to have the domestic court divorced from an executive decree when it acts as an international agent. He thinks the act of state doctrine must apply to the courts only in those situations where there is no global concensus in making a substantive rule of law. When there is a global concensus, the court must be free of the act of state doctrine. He says, "The courts must not play dead when the executive chooses to act" (p. 160). It is his viewpoint that "A domestic court operates at that peculiarly sensitive point where national and international authority intersect. The character of this intersection is closely connected with the role that can be given to law in world politics" (p. 170).

National courts, acting as agents, have an added responsibility in upholding the international legal order because "States continue to be unwilling to entrust international tribunals with reliable and regular adjudicatory competence; the result is that domestic courts are often the only judicial institution likely to adjudge the legality of important controversies about the application of international law" (p. 172). He directs his argument primarily at the judicial behavior of the courts in the United States, and he thinks that if the national courts were free to apply the rules of international law without restraint, it would involve some sacrifice on our part but it would be trivial in comparison with the sacrifice we appear so ardently to make in order to uphold our obligations of self-defense. Numerous cases are discussed in depth, and special attention is given to such landmarks as: Banco Nacional de Cuba vs. Sabbatino (a significant portion of his book is devoted to a critical evaluation of the majority and minority opinions of this case), Rich vs. Naviera Vacuba S.A., Bernstein vs. Van Heyghen Societe Anonyme, and United States vs. Pink. (See the excellent list of cases, pp. 179-181.)

In addition, the United States, because of her peculiar position in world affairs, has a definite responsibility as well as a golden opportunity to lead the way toward the settlement of controversies involving international law in domestic courts with the courts acting more like international than national agents in upholding the international legal order. It is the duty of our courts to help fill the institutional vacuum, and it is essential for our courts to work toward a common methodology that would lead to a uniform pattern of outcomes and explanations. This is possible because "Domestic Courts have extensive experience with problems of balancing the claims of the forum against the claims of foreign states that have an interest in the outcome of a legal dispute" (p. 173). It is the author's argument in his book that particular attention must be given to the horizontal structure of international society, to a dominant convergence of values, especially in the human rights field, and to a dominant divergence in the area of economic policy. He concludes his work with the plea that domestic courts accept as their role: "First, as complete an independence of executive policy as possible; second, an extensive deference in areas of diversity, together with a considerable aggressiveness in areas of concensus" (p. 177).

This book is coolly reasoned, carefully documented, and scholarly written. In his concern with judicial deference to executive authority in American courts he has the satisfaction of seeing his reasoning primarily accepted by the Supreme Court in the famous case Banco Nacional de Cuba vs. Sabbatino. In fact, a deserving tribute is contained in the statement by Rickard B. Lillich, in his Foreword to the book, when he suggested, "After reading the book, re-read the Supreme Court's opinion in Sabbatino to see Professor Falk's jurisprudence in action" (p. ix).—James A. Gathings, Bucknell University.

Empire by Treaty: Britain and the Middle East in the Twentieth Century. By M. A. FITZSIMONS. (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1964. Pp. xiv, 235. $6.00.)

Professor Fitzsimons' title is hardly descriptive of his work, on several scores. In the first place, the time specification is misleading, for the work is primarily concerned with the post World War II years, from 1945 to the present. Thus most of the Twentieth Century is considered only in a cursory fashion.

More important, the term "Empire by Treaty" is, according to the author, presumed to refer to British relationships with Middle Eastern states in the between-the-war years; again, this subject is, by his own choice, summarily treated.

Most important of all (p. ix), "The title is intended to suggest the characteristic form of British relationship with many Middle Eastern countries. By treaties Britain sought to gain the assent, notably of Arab rulers, to concessions and bases that Britain believed to be essential for the protection of British interests and the maintenance of a British order. The antecedents of the Treaty Empire, a half-way house of British imperialism, go back to Britain's early impact on the Persian Gulf sheikhdoms." As a corollary, this empire retreated after World War II; but Professor Fitzsimons is (p. 225) "less surprised at the ending of British influence and more impressed by the fact that for so long a time it remained formidable beyond the magnitude of its supporting power."

In one sense, the author, having stated his hypothesis, then ignores it. There is no way to determine, from the evidence he presents, whether or not this Empire was indeed unique, different from that which preceded it, as he assumes this without examining the question. Further, neither his time span nor his approach permit him to deal with the question of whether treaties were indeed significant in British relationships, or whether he is really confusing the dignified with the efficient. His more detailed analysis of the retreat from Empire indicates that this is indeed the case.

In yet another sense the author ignores his hypothesis: rather than examining British relationships with specific power structures in the relevant areas, he is giving an overall view of diplomatic history. One may, as Professor Fitzsimons has done, make inferences from the recital of events of diplomacy; this reviewer finds the evidence strangely unsatisfying.

The final corollary—that Britain, by utilizing "treaties" rather than other techniques, "slowed" (to quote the blurb on the dust jacket) "the tide of history"—is equally undeterminable. Evidentally, if there was an "Empire Treaty," it lasted from twenty to twenty-five years—hardly a durable arrangement, either in terms of human history or British imperial history. Again, the evidence is unimpressive, or indeed, contrary to the stated thesis.

Perhaps these strictures are unfair, as basically the author is not attempting in any systematic fashion to test a hypothesis. He is relating a narrative of a series of events: selected aspects of the international politics of the Middle East in the post war years with a focus on British actions. With this more modest goal, the author is more successful. While a political scientist might yearn for a modicum of conceptualization of such terms as "power," "influence" and "interest," this again would be asking the author to do a study he did not intend doing—John H. Millett, Wichita State University.

Western Europe Since the War: A Short Political History. By Jacques Freymond. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. vii, 236. $5.50.)

"France and Great Britain shall no longer be two nations, but one Franco-British Union... Every citizen of France will enjoy immediately citizenship of Great Britain; every British subject will become a citizen of France." It is not always easy today to recall this proposal made by Winston Churchill on July 16th, 1940, less than twenty-five years ago. Nor does one readily remember that on March 18th, 1944 General de Gaulle in Algiers evoked a vision of post-war Europe: "as inclusive as possible... established on an economic basis... The English Channel, the Rhine, and the Mediterranean would be the arteries of this grouping, which would extend outward to Africa and the Orient."

The great virtue of this little book by the Director of the Graduate Institute of International Studies at Geneva is that Professor Freymond takes a historian's perspective and thus reminds us of the whole complex background of current European developments. Occasionally, a single comment on the past is as illuminating as a beacon. On p. 63, Professor Freymond asserts, "The Western Europe of 1945 was socialist, despite the fact that no one could say what kind of socialism it was." This is true, and it is equally true that in 1964 Western Europe is anything but socialist. In most reviews of post-war European developments, insufficient attention has been given to the fact that Western Europe has not only resisted aggression from the East, recovered economically and culturally, and has made several supra-national experiments, but that Western Europe has also been less and less influenced by those socialist movements which contributed the major political initiatives of the 1930s and 1940s within the Western European democracies. It may well be that the most durable impression left by the now receding years of de facto American dominance of Western Europe is not economic recovery per se, but rather the diffusion of a pragmatic approach to politics that owes more to Roosevelt's New Deal and its exponents than to the ideas of Marx, Kautsky and Jaurès. There is in fact reason to hope that Western Europeans understand the United States far better today than they did during and just after the War. Misunderstandings of course continue, and an event such as President Kennedy's tragic assassination still shakes the faith in this country of even the most sympathetic European observer, but blindly dogmatic anti-Americanism is no longer in vogue among European youth. It may be a paradox, but even the France of de Gaulle appears in terms of public understanding to be far closer to America than was the France of Bidault, Blum and Ramadier.

Again, on p. 72, Professor Freymond concludes his review of the founding of NATO by stating, "In fact, nothing cemented this newly created alliance but the Soviet Union." This is also true. and it is a most useful reminder that the present crisis of NATO is inevitably a product, less of newly diverging purposes among the United States and her allies than of a drastic general reduction of the threat which Soviet aggression today is believed to represent. Aside from the mutual desire for a common defense against Russian attack, no greater consensus on positive common goals and policies existed among the NATO allies at its founding than exists today. If there are aspects in which NATO has been a disappointment, surely the most poignant of these is the failure to implement during the past decade its potential for generating a positive content.

Because Professor Freymond's comprehensive review is full of such helpful and stimulating reminders, it is a great pity that it is in part spoiled by inexcusably careless editing. To be useful, a short history must at least be accurate. Despite the author's penetrating analysis, it is hard to put one's faith in a book that, for example, refers to R. A. Butler in both text and index as Sir Harold Butler (pp. 37, 115, 229); that dates the East German uprising on June 17th, 1954 instead of 1953 (p. 104); that dates a crucial minute from Ernest Bevin which contributed to the founding of NATO from 1949 rather than 1948 (p. 55); and which refers to Lester Pearson as Prime Minister of Canada in 1949 (p. 61).—Steven Muller, Cornell University.

The McNamara Strategy. By WILLIAM W. KAUF-MANN. (New York: Harper & Row, 1964. Pp. ix, 339. $5.95.

Robert S. McNamara's tenure as Secretary of Defense since January 1961 has been an extraordinary era in the administration of that extraordinary establishment, the U.S. Department of Defense. The McNamara tour de force is a fit subject for detailed and thoughtful examination, and Professor William W. Kaufmann has produced what we may properly presume to be an authoritative exposition of what has happened in this period. Professor Kaufmann has been close to Secretary McNamara and to many of his most influential subordinates since the beginning of the administration and this book therefore is by an insider. It is not, however, a book for insiders.

By letting "McNamara describe what he has been doing in his own words whenever possible," Professor Kaufmann has developed a sophisticated justification rather than a profound examination of the changes which have occurred in the department and its activities under McNamara. This is not a study of organization, however. The thematic structure of the book is to be found in the means by which Secretary McNamara has gone about implementing the strategy of flexible response and multiple options.

The strategy of flexible response is a strategy of nuclear deterrence based on the premise that the best deterrence is the ability to fight and "win" the war you want to deter. At the level of thermonuclear war, this strategy enters the realm of the "unthinkable" since it contemplates the various ways in which strategic nuclear weapons might be exchanged. From this contemplative act, certain conclusions may be drawn as to the ways damage might be "limited" within the fires of war.

An extension of the thermonuclear strategy of flexible response is the quest for a structure of forces-nuclear and non-nuclear-which permits "multiple options" in the face of a multiplicity of threats and commitments. Much of the effort and perhaps the most profound controversies of the McNamara Department have been directed toward a national and multilateral capability for "conventional" and "unconventional" warfare. Within the U.S. defense establishment these two elements have been symbolized in the organization of STRICOM and the build-up and redirection of Special Forces. Internationally, the focuses of these two efforts have been the controversy within NATO about a buildup of conventional forces on the one hand, and the intervention in South Vietnam on the other.

The forces to attain each new strategic option cost something more and characteristically cost is the central theme in the McNamara era. The secretary is an accountant at some level of existence and a principal contrast between him and his predecessors may follow from that fact. Particularly in the administration of Charles Wilson the budget ceiling was the effective control device and the outcome was summarized as a "bigger bang for a buck." Typically McNamara has started with a strategic goal and by comparison shopping and cost accounting looked for suitable weapons at lowest cost. The difference, according to Professor Kaufmann, comes about through the procedures of planning-programmingbudgeting, and the technique of cost-effectiveness analysis. By these means strategic requirements and budgeting constraints are brought into meaningful inter-action and consideration is given to alternative means (presumably at different costs) to attain an objective.

Professor Kaufmann's book is good without being very exciting for students of the Department of Defense. It is a record of McNamara's views on what McNamara has been trying to do. For that reason other views on some of the questions hardly see the light of day. For example, the author effectively dismisses rather than discusses the admittedly very subtle question of whether or not military judgment has been eliminated in decisions on weapons systems, and gives few of the arguments opposed to the conventional build-up in NATO, or the hasty MLF agreements.

Moreover, the highly personal focus of the book, which has stimulated at least one characterization of it as a campaign document, tends to distort the fact that reorganizations of the DOD and other events in the Eisenhower administration made it possible for McNamara to implement his methods, that the strategic ideas originated with others such as Maxwell Taylor, Albert Wohlstetter, Herman Kahn, and even W. W. Kaufmann, and that the procedural ideas were developed by Charles Hitch, Roland McKean, Alain Enthoven, Henry Rowen, et al.

In a somewhat Panglossian chapter on tests of effectiveness of the McNamara defense establishment, Professor Kaufmann discusses the Berlin crisis, the Cuban affairs, and South Vietnam. His general summation is that the outcome of these various events could have been worse, that with a choice of means the President could also require his antagonists to make choices, and that given the need for fighting there has been a selection of forces at hand. One may question whether it is this sort of conclusion which is relevant to the effectiveness of the McNamara department or whether the long run effect of the kind of decisions symbolized by Skybolt, TFX, nuclear powered aircraft, or communication satellites would be more to the point.—David A. Wilson, University of California at Los Angeles.

New Nations in a Divided World, The International Relations of the Afro-Asian States. EDITED BY KURT LONDON. (New York: Frederick Praeger, 1963. Pp. 336. $6.50 cloth, $2.25 paper.)

Les Nouveaux Etats dans les Relations Internationales. Edited by Jean-Baptiste Duroselle and Jean Meyriat. (Paris: Armand Colin, 1962. Pp. 495. No price given.)

Anyone concerned with the so-called "third world" must, if he tries to keep up with the literature, become increasingly frustrated and confused. The trickle of books and articles on the subject has become a roaring flood, and the company of scholars and "experts" in the field has grown to an army. Thus not only has the number of individual studies increased tremendously, but increasingly, anthologies, symposia, conferences, group discussions, seminars, have come to publication. Unfortunately, the need to swell the flood all too often takes precedence over coherence and clarity. Sometimes, however, a symposium may result in the publication of a well organized, intelligently edited collection. The two books under question, although dealing ostensibly with the same general theme, are excellent examples of this very difference.

Les Nouveaux Etats was the result of a symposium sponsored by the Centre d'étude des relations internationales (C.E.R.I.) of the Fondation nationale des sciences politiques, and appeared in its Cahiers series. The scholars represented in the volume initially worked from two separate but related questions: What are the distinctive characteristics of the foreign policies of the new states? How have the "older" countries, in particular the "great powers" in the traditional sense, been affected by the appearance of an increasing number of new states on the world scene? With guestions of such magnitude, the temptation to be prolix and global in scope must have been enormous. The editors and authors showed exemplary restraint, and the result was a series of wellintegrated essays grouped under three main rubrics. The first includes three studies dealing with the effect of external models of political. social, and economic development-particularly the Soviet and Chinese examples—upon the new states. Of the three essays, "Les pays sousdeveloppés devant les modèles marxistes; U.R.S.S. et Chine," by the USSR-China section of the C.E.R.I., is noteworthy as one of the best explorations of the subject in print. The second group of essays examine several aspects of the influence of the old colonial powers—les anciennes metropoles-upon their former wards. Of particular interest is Raymond Barré's excellent survey of the persistence of economic ties, "L'indépendance a l'epreuve des réalites économiques." The essay complements rather neatly Elliot Berg's now almost classic "The Economic Basis of Political Choice in French West Africa," published in the American Political Science Review, June 1960. The third rubric groups three articles dealing with the role of the new states in international affairs, with their attitudes vis-àvis such questions as non-engagement, and neutralism, and with their participation in international organizations. The rush of events has already made much of the material in these last three essays out of date, but they remain useful as thoughtful explorations of the adjustments faced by the new states as they confront a world in which they find their problems considered peripheral, rather than central preoccupations of statesmen and international organizations. In all, the eleven essays in this book are of high quality, and together they present a coherent whole. A useful index completes the book.

In contrast, the collection edited by Kurt London exemplifies the perils of the anthologist's craft.

It includes some twenty of the fifty-seven papers submitted to the International Congress on "The Non-Aligned Afro-Asian Countries in a Divided World," held in Athens in September, 1962. Judging from London's introduction-probably the most interesting piece in the book-the conference must have been extremely lively, involving as it did Europeans, Americans, Africans, and Asians in a stimulating, apparently often emotional series of discussions. It is unfortunate, therefore, that the papers are of such uneven quality and that they reflect so little of the apparent vigor of the conference. Most appear as little more than position papers, and only a handful explore their subject with any thoroughness. One would have wished that the editor had used his prerogatives fully and selected a smaller number of pieces, had them expanded, and then reprinted them along with some of the discussions that followed. This reviewer would, for example, have liked to have seen expanded versions of such papers as Walter Laqueur's "'Neo-Colonialism'-the Soviet Concept," B. G. D. Folson's "The Communist View of Colonialism-An African Interpretation," Kalu Ezera's "The Role of a Constitution in Developing Political Systems: The Nigerian Example," and W. Edward Blyden (III)'s "The Idea of African Neutralism and 'Non-Alignment.' " Finally, there is the question of emphasis. If the papers are any evidence, then the conference must have been "haunted by the specter of Communism." Fifteen of the papers reprinted by London deal explicitly with the Soviet Union, Communist China, and the Communist world's relations with the new nations. The Conference's Cold War preoccupation is perhaps understandable, but somewhat difficult to explain, since most of the new nations' relations are with the West and, increasingly, with each other. The picture presented by the book is, therefore, an unhappily distorted one. The three major rubrics under which the papers are organized testify to this: (1) Colonialism and Communism-seven papers; (2) New Nations in Transition-four papers; (3) Communist Policies in Non-Aligned Countries—nine papers.

In sum, the contrasts between the two books bespeak both the dangers and the possibilities of such enterprises. The Duroselle-Meyriat volume deserves to be read and pondered over, and—hopefully—translated into English. The London volume is simply not worth the price of purchase.
—Victor T. Le Vine, Washington University, St. Louis.

Foreign Aid and Foreign Policy. By Edward S. Mason. (New York: Harper and Row, 1964. Pp. ix, 118. $3.50.)

The recent frustrations and agonizing debates in Congress have prompted the writing of several sophisticated works on foreign aid, of which this book is an outstanding example. Dr. Edward S. Mason, Lamont University Professor at Harvard, has a long and intimate connection with his subject, including membership on the recent Clay Committee. The substance of this thoughtful little book was originally presented as the Elihu Root Lectures at the Council on Foreign Relations in May, 1963.

Naturally there is no attempt in a work of necessarily limited scope to cover all aspects of foreign aid. Professor Mason directs his efforts primarily to a thoughtful examination of the most pressing questions which have recently been troubling the Congress and the public. While there is much support for foreign aid on the basis of a disinterested desire to help other peoples, as evidenced by the popularity of the Peace Corps, congressional support is closely related to the political objective of security, and some special economic interests are also served, as in the disposal of surplus agricultural commodities. Professor Mason believes experience has demonstrated that many of the instruments of foreign aid "are not likely to be subtle, flexible, and convenient tools adapted to tactical use and rapid maneuver." He feels that aid employed to win votes at the United Nations or to bolster unstable governments is likely to be less productive than aid based on a long term strategy of security. That objective, too, should be realistically limited. Consequently, he rejects the creation of a community of free nations based on the consent of the governed, supporting economic and social justice, and cooperating on matters of mutual concern, as unrealistic goals productive of bitter disillusionment.

Instead, foreign aid should support a will and capacity for economic development and a desire for independence in the recipient country, thereby offering its people real alternatives to communism and to the necessity for mobilizing internal resources by totalitarian methods. It has been found that in many countries a program of foreign aid can move towards such reasonable objectives. In some of these, however, progress is limited. External assistance cannot be fully utilized unless internal reforms are undertaken. In an interesting discussion, Professor Mason explores the limitations and possibilities of utilizing foreign aid as leverage for reforms by intervening in domestic affairs. He concludes that it can be done successfully under certain circumstances, and preferably by multi-lateral agencies such as the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

A separate chapter is devoted to the problem of sharing equitably the aid burden, a matter especially troublesome for Congress in view of recent balance-of-payments difficulties. Progress in this complex field is reviewed, and some thoughtful observations are made on the alternative courses available and the limitations of the methods for determining equitable shares. In a critical examination of America's major current aid obligation, the Alliance for Progress, Professor Mason recommends better coordination of policy in Washington and the creation of a regional organization in which the Latin American countries will have an effective voice and through which they will be able to promote domestic reforms essential to economic development in a number of countries.

The perspective of this book is pragmatic rather than doctrinaire, and essentially American. One hopes that Professor Mason will find the opportunity to analyze many points in greater detail. For example, certain responsibilities attach to the country or international agency which applies outside pressure for internal reforms. How do they avoid the real dangers of domination, paternalism, and lack of continuity of interest and effort? What if the reforms prove inadequate or produce harmful political and economic results? Then what are the responsibilities of the outsider? Does not the fostering of independent states by outside intervention assume some form of international interdependence? It would be helpful if scholars in the recipient countries would be stimulated to add to the current discussion of foreign aid by frank presentations from their own perspectives.—Alfred Fernbach, University of Virginia.

A Strategy of Interdependence: A Program for the Control of Conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. By VINCENT P. ROCK. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1964. Pp. 399. $7.50.)

At some point in the life of every human organization, the environment becomes so threatening as to make continued success in coping with it increasingly improbable. In that contingency, several options are available. The organization may deny its incompatibility with that environment by exaggerating its own capabilities, downgrading the extent of the threat, or converting an objective relationship into a purely ideological confrontation. A more adaptive response, of course, would be to appraise the nature of the incompatibility and then search for ways of modifying either the organization or its environment, in order to increase the probability of survival. A Strategy of Interdependence points very clearly toward the latter, more adaptive, response. The author recognizes—and articulates in a most compelling fashion—the inadequacy of strategic deterrence as a sole or primary means of pursuing our national interests and assuring our survival.

He does not, however, espouse any leap from the frying pan of military capability to the fire of trust in the goodwill of our adversaries. Rather, the study is an effort to dove-tail short-run defense policies with longer-run policies of collaboration based on mutual confidence.

As Rock sees it, the bridge between these two orientations is the recognition of existing elements of Soviet-American interdependence and the creation of additional ones. His proposed alternative to current American policy is "first, to devise and to invest in areas which will provide understanding and common actions in order that. . . the common interest will prevail over parochial ... purposes: and, second, to seek by a variety of approaches to restrain and limit the means and occasions of violent conflict" (p. 21). Though he never quite comes to grips with the distinction between the recognition and the creation of interdependence, the emphasis seems to be heavily on the latter, with comprehensive and suggestive chapters on: (a) space, atmosphere, and oceans; (b) spread and application of technology; (c) communication, education and culture contact; and (d) the developing regions, as areas in which greater interdependence might be generated.

Since the policy proposals are by no means as "startling" as the jacket blurb implies (including the by-now-conventional emphasis on tacit and informal bargaining) let me turn to the research base from which they derive; this is the most interesting and unorthodox aspect of the volume. Both in the text itself and in a meaty 22 page Appendix, the author summarizes and builds upon a fairly impressive segment of the sociological and social-psychological literature, especially that which deals with conflict as a dependent variable. In addition, in his role as coordinator of an Institute for Defense Analyses project conducted for the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, he consulted with and received reports from perhaps three dozen of the nation's leading Soviet specialists, military analysts and behavioral scientists.

As might be feared, however, his rich experience in government and little academic immersion was insufficient to assure that all these empirical and conceptual inputs would be systematically distilled and meaningfully synthesized. Thus, the sampling often lacks discrimination, effective integration is infrequently achieved, and redundancy abounds. Moreover, the absence of tight and disciplined organization of his material further accentuates the ethereal impression. Even if the author lacks any coherent theory with which to structure his many excellent ideas—as do, unhappily, those of us with whom he consulted—he might nevertheless have gone further in developing his taxonomy, however static.

Though this is clearly the sort of interdisciplinary effort that ought to be encouraged, and its policy proposals are of the sort with which few serious international relations scholars would quarrel, the reviewer must concede that its major value probably lies in the extent to which it advanced the education of its author.—J. David Singer, University of Michigan.

The Soviets in International Organizations: Changing Policy Toward Developing Countries, 1953–1963. By Alvin Z. Rubinstein. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1964. Pp. xx, 380. $7.50.)

The notion that was held strongly after the failure of the League by some scholars and the planners of the United Nations was that a broad economic and social cooperation was essential to have political collaboration among nations. Emphasizing this notion, David Mitrany in 1944 even hypothesized that functionalism will gradually lead nations toward political integration. In fact, the economic and social activities in the U.N. have been one of the most growing and active areas of the Organization. Needless to say, these activities have been interwoven into a political fabric of the U.N. This trend has been largely due to the fact that underdeveloped countries have increased their bargaining power and used that power in the reality of Cold War politics. The primary aim of the book under review is neither to test the hypothesis of political integration nor to examine the role of economic and social forces affecting the Organization as such; but rather it attempts to answer a general question: Why the Soviets became actively involved in the specialized agencies and regional economic commissions of the U.N.? The book focuses on Soviet attitude and policy toward developing nations within the limit of technical and economic activities.

Unlike many books on Soviet foreign policy, this case study rightly rejects an a priori position. More than two-thirds of the book is devoted to describing and to analyzing Soviet relationships with underdeveloped countries in the field of technical and economic activities, with a view to examining the determinants of Soviet policy changes. While Rubinstein holds that the core of Soviet ideology remains unchanged, its policies and attitudes have been flexible and will still be changed in order to achieve a better political climate in international organizations. Having become convinced of the political significance of underdeveloped and neutralist countries, the Soviet Union, the author points out, reversed its attitude toward international organizations from one of merely attempting to forestall the formation of anti-Soviet coalitions to active participation in functional activities. Largely through this new position, the Soviets have increased their prestige and confidence among these dramatically growing countries both in number and influence and thus have been able to command more influence.

Thus the changing policies of the Soviets have been a means of achieving goals and objectives. However, this manipulative consideration of Soviet participation in international organizations, as in the case of the other Great Powers, may lead, in the long run, to "the most promising hopes for the consequent erosion of Soviet ideology." (p. 356) The proposition here is that any genuine international stability must stem from the world-wide basis and that the nations, including the Soviet Union, will cooperate as long as they are convinced of the possibility of advancing their interests. The result might be a system whereby political climate can be controlled. This assumption, it should be pointed out, was made without clear assessment of the role of economic and social forces in international organizations.

Like many policy-oriented books, this one has some "proposals" to offer. It argues that the West (1) should not manipulate international organizations for temporary political victory of dubious merits; (2) should initiate and challenge the Soviets to join programs of helping needy countries within the institutional framework; (3) should elect a Soviet citizen as the head of a Specialized Agency; and (4) should not only establish the headquarters of a Specialized Agency in Moscow but also meet sessions of the General Assembly alternately in New York and Moscow.

Owing to these proposals, the book should be read by policy makers and the thinking public. For political scientists, it does demonstrate a methodologically interesting suggestion; namely, the determinants of Soviet policy-for which there is a lack of authentic records of policy formation-may be explored by resorting to a comparative analysis of relevant speeches, actions, internal Soviet professional and scholarly commentaries, and interviews. Unfortunately, however, the book often fails to document interpretations of data and it provides neither explanatory notes nor descriptions of survey research which constitute a major portion of its source materials. Thus, lacking clear methodological assistance, political scientists are left without being convinced of the validity of the data nor of the soundness of the interpretations.—Sungjook JUNN, Mercer University.

Walter Lippmann's Philosophy of International Politics. By Anwar Syed. (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1964. Pp. 348. $6.00.)

It is probably safe to argue that the Laws of Plato and the Politics of Aristotle are the works from which we learn the most about the principles of politics. A reading of Professor Syed's book supports the argument that from these same two authors we can learn the most about the political ideas and ideals of Walter Lippmann, for in fifty years of public writing during which he was, as often as not, far from the opinions of others and far from what he himself had written a book or two back, he was never far from his classical mentors. It is not so much that Lippmann has on occasion stated the obvious, but rather that he has consistently re-stated the Greeks. The "dead but sceptered sovereigns" rule his public and himself.

For Walter Lippmann the good society is a civilized society, a society under control. This means that decision making will be in the hands of men who are practical, realistic, and rational, men who will be making decisions for the benefit of their fellow citizens who lack these required characteristics and are hence uncivilized. Civilized men do what is right, he argues, because to do so is natural for them. Only such men can be trusted to do important jobs well. Lippmann combines, however, this approach of Plato with the Aristotelian view that the function of governors is to issue commands and give decisions, but with educated public support as a base to all action. The idealistic foundation for this realistic philosophy is the concept that man is answerable to a higher law than man's own average nature can comprehend. The supremacy of reason is not given to all but only to some. Theirs is the civilizing mission.

But the world is not yet the good society nor has it ever been. Men live in squabbling nations and not in the world at large. The real question is how do civilized men as leaders of nations deal with one another. Can a substantive theory of international politics be made of this relationship? Does not the tension between international theory and international reality make illusory any concept of the good society? Has not the hydrogen bomb made us all brothers in the one sense of naked survival but in little else?

According to Professor Syed, Lippmann accepts the struggle for power as a fact of international politics. In this sense Lippmann follows the thinking of Hobbes. The goal of the statesman is national self-interest, properly understood, which for Lippmann means prudently understood, for he would not have us take life and death stands in places that are "muddy and marshy and full of jungles." But man, says Lippmann, is obligated to pursue an ideal beyond mere power politics. This ideal is the comity of nations, which for Lippmann is something akin to the peace and wisdom of the philosopher kings. Indeed, for Lippmann, it is something akin to the peace and wisdom of Anglo-American philosopher kings. Such an Alliance would be the first step toward a "civilized world," the structural principle of public international order. Professor Syed has done a good job of researching this point, even to showing how Walter Lippmann walked in the path cut by Andrew Carnegie!

Necessarily, the author refers to major events and developments in international politics over the past half century, and it is interesting to see him drag Mr. Lippmann through some rather prickly thickets of Mr. Lippmann's own making. The only trouble with this approach is that there will be some who will count the changes of opinion that Mr. Lippmann has made without understanding that the world has changed, too. One will have to let such critics feast away, I suppose.

This reviewer has but one major quarrel to pick with the author. To know a man's philosophy one should first know the man, or at least something about him. Professor Syed makes no facts on this score known to his readers, and thus we are left to guess that family, religion, education and experience—beyond the recounting of a few Harvard professors that Mr. Lippmann knew as a student—are of little consequence to the study of Walter Lippmann's views of man and the world. But noting this, the reviewer wants to go on record that this is a good book that will enlighten readers and that does justice to a notable American who has talked a lot of commonsense in his time.—Milton Colvin, Washington and Lee University.

The Philippines and the United States: Problems of Partnership. By George E. Taylor. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 311. $6.95.)

The Philippines and the United States: Problems of Partnership is an important and stimulating book which contributes much to the American's otherwise inadequate understanding of Philippine affairs. This is a provocative, analytical discussion of the big issues in Philippine-American relations. Its author, Professor George Taylor, who prepared this study for the Council on Foreign Relations, reminds us that "it is not generally understood that U.S. policies in Southeast Asia today depend in great measure on political and military partnership with the Republic of the Philippines. . . . " He adds, "The success of the partnership however, can no longer be taken for granted." This salient fact, of course, helps explain the timing of the book's publication.

Taylor's own special contribution is that he has focused his attention on the major cause for recent changes in Philippine-American relations, the Filipino nationalist renaissance. He presents an historical survey of the development of Philippine nationalism and explains why the Filipino nationalist today views certain important events of the past as he does. Taylor here shows real empathy for the Philippine nationalist position. His book should be required reading for Americans participating in the formulation of U. S. policy toward the Philippines.

Despite its broad coverage, however, this book is not as useful a reference in the field of Philippine-American relations as might be hoped. It is without bibliography, and in many passages footnotes are an inadequate guide to students wishing to do further reading on the topics covered. Occasionally the sources upon which the author relied are not appropriately noted. A few footnotes are marred by gross inaccuracies, such as the incorrect title for Golay's, The Philippines: Public Policy and National Economic Development on page 215. Inaccuracies have also crept into the body of the text, for example, "the Philippine action [making claim to North Borneo] opens up the possibility of claims to British Borneo coming from Indonesia, which actually has a more plausible case here than it had in West Irian." (p. 267. Italics added.) Nor were the first two presidents of the Philippines Protestants (p. 160), though they were Masons.

While Taylor's ready willingness to accept and understand nationalism as a valid, even desirable, expression of contemporary Filipino political thinking is refreshing, in Chapter 13 he tends to blur unnecessarily the distinctions between anti-American nationalism, intellectual Marxism, and "the parliamentary tactics of the Communist Party of the Philippines." The sweeping, unsubstantiated accusations of Communist infiltration in the press, universities, labor unions, and political organizations would seem to inhibit the author's own appeal for appreciating the native mainsprings of the nationalist revival, and for distinguishing spontaneous nationalist sentiment from Communist "tactical devices." (p. 265) Furthermore, though there is undoubtedly some Communist infiltration, the urgency of the alarm which he sounds is not convincing.

The author says, for example, "Even though the parallel is far from being an exact one, the rapid transformation of China between 1946 and 1949 provides the warning of what can happen in the briefest span of years... Although the military power of the Huks, unlike that of the Chinese Communists, has been broken, the Communists in the Philippines are relentlessly carrying out the war by methods that are potentially just as dangerous, such as the manipulation of political symbols and the creation of a new intellectual climate. As in China in 1946, there is little to indicate today that events could move so rapidly and so disastrously for the government in power."

(pp. 272-273) This reviewer would consider the parallel with China of 1946 neither exact nor meaningful. And the author has been unable to marshall evidence that would make it so.

Taylor also contends (p. 173) that in the election of 1961 the "left-wing" delivered union support to President Garcia in "impressive amounts"; yet the most careful studies of voting patterns in that election do not indicate that union leaders of any persuasion were able to deliver substantial blocks of votes to any national candidate. While citing the Roman Catholic Church as a staunchly anti-Communist organization, the author adds that "secularizing tendencies" in Philippine society have "tended to neutralize the influence of the Church in politics." Other commentators have, on the contrary, noted the very significant political revival of the Church in the last decade.

In presenting supposed examples of Communist infiltration into a variety of social and political organizations, mention is made of the "Council of Elders, an informal group of highly respected citizens whose Action Committee was dominated by left-wing individuals." As a result, so Taylor thinks, the Council denounced the Government's ban on travel to the Communist-sponsored World Youth Festival in Vienna. Previously (p. 190) the Council of Elders had been identified as "a political body that the president uses on occasion to approve high policy decisions, such as a request for missile bases, when he wishes to avoid further discussion." Were the Council in fact under the "left-wing" influence which the author suggests, it would not be very useful for the purpose mentioned.

Despite shortcomings, however, this book is a much needed survey and analysis of the increasing tensions in Philippine-American relations. Addressed primarily to the policy-maker, it is interspersed with a number of imminently sound policy recommendations. Taylor urges the U. S. (pp. 288-299) to "take this nationalism very seriously." He argues convincingly that it is the only sentiment capable of providing the political dynamism to bring about important social changes, that it is the most effective weapon against the Communist movement, and that it is a necessary part of the Philippine drive to seek a new cultural identity, the necessary foundation for a mature and self-reliant nation.

While Taylor says he believes that it is wise for the U.S. to anticipate and encourage change in the Philippines, he recognizes (p. 298) that "such a policy calls for considerable U.S. participation in the internal affairs of the Philippines, always a dangerous business." But, he says, "the risks must be taken unless we are willing to let our military and political alliance disintegrate." He contends that U.S. policy should be "directed in fact and theory to the task of imaginative participation in the political and economic development of the Philippines." (p. 4) Yet his careful attention to the resurgence of Filipino nationalism leads him to throw caution on his own recommendations. He had already noted that (p. 220), "Possibly the direct involvement of the United States in the domestic politics of the Philippines has reached the point of diminishing returns." Taylor here has been caught on the horns of a dilemma which has impaled other Americans sincerely concerned about the most appropriate role for the United States in assisting economic development in a new nation.—David Wurfel, University of Singapore.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

RICHARD L. MERRITT Yale University

ARTICLES

International Politics

Theory and General

Fischer, Per. Vom Wert und Unwert politischer Konsultationen. Aussenpolitik. 15:9 (September 1964), 589-94.

Gelber, Lionel. Peaceful Coexistence or a Durable Peace? Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 316-31.

Groth, A. J. On the Intelligence Aspects of Personal Diplomacy. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 833-48

Haas, E. B. Toward Controlling International

Change: A Personal Plea. World Politics. 17:1 (October 1964), 1-12.

James, Alan. Power Politics. Political Studies. 12:3 (October 1964), 307-26.

Kawalkowski, Al. Vers la fin d'une double hégémonie. Politique Étrangère. 29:3 (1964), 260-

Mandel, Ernest. Contemporary Imperialism.

New Left Review. No. 25, (May-June 1964), 17-23

Morass, Frank. The Importance of Being Black; an Asian Looks at Africa. Foreign Affairs.

43:1 (October 1964), 99-111.

Rapaport, Anatol. How to Talk with the Russians. Etc. 21:3 (September 1964), 331-50.

Riga, P. Pacem in Terris: An Analysis. World Justice. 6:1 (September 1964), 20-49.

Shinjirō, Tanaka. Collective Rationality in the Nuclear Age. Japan Quarterly. 11:4 (October-December 1964), 427-33.

Treviranus, Hans-Dietrich. Aussenpolitik und Innenpolitik. Aussenpolitik. 15:9 (September 1964), 685-44.

Political Sociology and Behavior

Biraben, Jean-Noël, Yves Péron, and Alfred Nizard. La situation démographique de l'Europe occidentale. Population. 19:3 (June-July 1964), 439-84.

Chesler, Mark, and Richard Schmuck. Student Reactions to the Cuban Crisis. Public Opinion Quarterly. 28:3 (Fall 1964), 467-82.

Lifton, Robert Jay. Individual Patterns in Historical Change: Imagery of Japanese Youth. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 6:4 (July 1964), 370-83.

Mosely, Philip E. The Soviet Citizen Views the World. Review of Politics. 26:4 (October 1964), 451-72.

Moskos, Charles C., Jr. and Wendell Bell. Emergent Caribbean Nations Face the Outside World. Social Problems. 12:1 (Summer 1964), 24-41

Shelton, A. J. Behaviour and Cultural Value in West African Stories: Literary Sources for the Study of Culture Contact. Africa. 34:4 (October 1964), 353-59.

Tedeschi, J. T., and E. T. Malagodi. Psychology and International Relations. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:2 (October 1964), 10-13.

Williamson, R. C. University Students in a World of Change: A Colombian Sample. Sociology and Social Research. 48:4 (July 1964) 397-413.

War, Defense, and Arms Control

Brown, Neville and W. F. Gutteridge. The African Military Balance. London, Institute for Strategic Studies, 1964.

Buchan, Alastair. The Multilateral Force—A Study in Alliance Politics. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 619-37.

Clemens, W. C. Jr. Soviet Disarmament Proposals and the Cadre-Territorial Army. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 778-99.

Gallois, P. M. Les conséquences militaires et politiques de l'existence des armes nouvelles. Revue de la Société D'Études et d'Expansion. 63:209 (January, February 1964).

Hartsook, E. H. "Overkill": Theories and Implications. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 709-18.

Horn, H. O. and J. Ponturo. Stable Deterrence

Proposals: Some Questions. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 821-32.

Joksch, H. C. Wirtschaftstheoretische Methoden der Rüstungsplanung. Zeitschrift für die Gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 120:3 (July 1964), 464-91.

Martin, André. L'armée de l'air dans le contexte nucléaire. Revue de défense nationale. 20:10 (October 1964), 1499-1517.

Miksche, F. O. The Nuclear Deterrent and Western Strategy. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 221-37.

O'Ballance, Major Edgar. Multi-National or Multi-Lateral. Army Quarterly. 89:1 (October 1964), 46-52.

Roustide, P. La force de frappe européene: mythe ou possibilité? Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:748 (September 1964), 35-41.

Stone, J. J. Bomber Disarmament. World Politics. 17:1 (October 1964), 13-39.

Ward, C. C. The "New Myths" and "Old Realities" of Nuclear War. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 255-91.

International Community Development

Political Integration and Disintegration

Haas, Ernst B., and Philippe C. Schmitter. Economics and Differential Patterns of Political Integration: Projections about Unity in Latin America. International Organization. 18:4 (Autumn 1964), 705-737.

Ornstein, Jacob. Patterns of Language Planning in the New States. World Politics. 17:1 (October 1964), 40-49.

The Atlantic Community; and Western European Integration

Bonnaud-Delamare, R. Strutture regionali nell' Europa di domani. Civitas. 15:7-8 (July-August 1964), 15-51.

Camps, Miriam. The Six and Political Union. World Today. 20:11 (November 1964), 473-80.

Grabowski, K. Polish-German Relations and European Integration. Poland and Germany. 8:3 (July-September 1964), 19-27.

Haaland, Arild. Et Tilslørt dilemma i norsk politikk: Høyre mellom NATO og den innenrikspolitiske nød. Samtiden. 73:7 (1964), 450-58.

Jarny, A Problèmes du Marché Commun: La Grèce dans l'Europe. Les Cahiers de la République. No. 52 (February 1963), 119-128.

Marazzi, Alessandro. La non discriminazione dei lavoratori fondata sulla nazionalità nella CEE. La Comunità Internazionale. 19:3 (July 1964), 424-31.

Rey, J. Renaissance des nationalismes en Europe. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:748 (September 1964), 22-26.

Rosegger, G. Austrian Neutrality and European Integration. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 849-60.

Schopflin, George A. EFTA: The Other Europe. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 674-84.

Vedovato, G. L'associazione alla C.E.E. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. 31:1 (January-March 1964), 42-118.

——. Politica comune dell'energia. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. 31:1 (January-March 1964), 119-22.

Vialon, F. K. Zehn Jahre keine Europa-Armee. Aussenpolitik. 15:9 (September 1964), 595-600.

Yokas, P. La Grèce et le Marché commun. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:748 (September 1964), 53-56.

The Soviet Bloc

Binder, David. The Rumanian-Yugoslav "Special Relationship." East Europe. 13:9 (September 1964), 2-7.

Cadart, Claude. La crise des relation sino-sovietiques. Revue Française de Science Politique. 14:5 (October 1964), 845-876.

Chen, King. North Vietnam in the Sino-Soviet Dispute, 1962-64. Asian Survey. 4:9. 1023-1036.

Gajzágó, Olivér von. Die Problematik der Integration im Rahmen des Rats für Gegenseitige Wirtschaftshilfe. Osteuropa. 14:9 (September 1964), 617-624; 14:10 (October 1964), 712-723.

Hindley, Donald. The Indonesian Communist Party and the Conflict in the International Communist Movement. China Quarterly. No. 19 (July-September 1964), 99-119.

Kerbonski, Andrzej. COMECON. International Conciliation. No. 549. 1964.

Lechat, Jacques. Le conflit sino-sovietique et ses implications possibles pour l'occident. Politique Étrangère. 29:3 (1964), 283-303.

Montias, John M. Background and Origins of the Rumanian Dispute with Comecon. Soviet Studies. 16:2 (October 1964), 125-151.

Osten, Walter. Der Konflikt Moskau-Peking und seine Auswirkung auf den Weltkommunismus (II). Osteuropa. 14:9 (September 1964), 646-665.

Polaris, Jean. The Sino-Soviet Dispute: Its Economic Impact on China. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 647-58.

Rumanian Recipe. Economist. No. 212 (September 19, 1964), 1119-1125.

Scalapino, R. A. Sino-Soviet Competition in Africa. Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 640-654.

Simon, H. Paul. The Warsaw Pact and East Germany—Provocation or Response? Queen's Quarterly. 71:3 (Autumn 1964), 345-364.

Takenami, Schoichiro. Some Problems of Socialist "Economic Integration." Economic Review. 15:4 (October 1964).

Other Regional Arrangements and Developments

Bialer, Seweryn. How Russians Rule Russia. Problems of Communism. 8:5 (September-October 1964), 45-52.

Cardosi, G. Movimenti di integrazione economica in Africa. Rivista Internazionale di Scienze Sociali. 35:5 (September-October 1964), 473-86.

Cochrane, James D. U. S. Attitudes Toward Central American Integration. Inter-American Economic Affairs. 18:2 (Autumn 1964), 73-91.

Dales, John H. Some Historical and Theoretical Comments on Canada's National Policies. Queen's Quarterly. 71:3 (Autumn 1964), 297-316.

Griffith, William E. Quebec in Revolt. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 29-36.

Massell, Benton F. East African Economic Union: an Evaluation and Some Implications for Policy. Rand Corp. Research memorandum RM-3880-RC, 1963.

Meier, Victor. Georgia: Individualism in the Soviet Union. Swiss Review of World Affairs. 14:9 (September 1964), 11-13.

Proctor, J. H. Jr. Constitutional defects and the collapse of the West Indian Federation. Duke University Commonwealth Studies Center, Reprint no. 14. (1964).

Succession States of Federation: A Symposium. Round Table. No. 216 (September 1964), 360-69.

Tapp, E. J. "An Australia-New Zealand Community"—An Appraisal. Australian Outlook. 18:2 (August 1964), 143-50.

Thomson, Dale C. Crisis in Canada. World Today. 20:10 (October 1964), 431-440.

X.X.X. La nationalisme du Québec. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:10 (October 1964), 1592-1601.

International Law and Organization

International Law

Caemmerer, Ernst von. The Problem of the Unification of Private Law in Europe. University of Colorado Law Review. 36:3 (Spring 1964), 307-320.

Gross, Ernest A. The South West Africa Cases: on the Threshold of Decision. Columbia Journal of Transnational Law. 3:1 (1964), 19-25.

Li, Victor H. Legal Aspects of Trade with Communist China. Columbia Journal of Transnational Law. 3;1 (1964), 57-71.

Lorens, Werner. General Priniciples of Law: Their Elaboration in the Court of Justice of the European Communities. American Journal of Comparative Law. 13:1 (Winter 1964), 1-29.

The United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Haekkerup, Per. Scandinavia's Peace-Keeping

Forces for U. N. Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 675-681.

Jacobson, H. K. ONUC's Civilian Operations: State-Preserving and State-Building. World Politics. 17:1 (October 1964), 75-107.

The International Economy

International Economic Problems and Policies

Armengaud, André. Economie et coexistence. Politique Étrangère. 29:3 (1964), 231-47.

Binswanger, Hans C. Die Pläne zur Konsolidierung der Weltwährungsordnung. Aussenwirtschaft. 19:3 (September 1964), 276-88.

Klinkmüller, Erich. Zur Strategie des Ost-West-Handels. Osteuropa Wirtschaft. 9:3 (September 1964), 1-20.

Kuznets, Simon. Quantitative Aspects of the Economic Growth of Nations: IX. Level and Structure of Foreign Trade: Comparisons for Recent Years. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:1. Part II (October 1964), 1-106.

Mackay, D. I. Exporters and Export Markets. Scottish Journal of Political Economy. 11:3 (November 1964), 205-17.

Marczewski, Jean. Le rôle des États-Unis et de l'-Europe occidentale dans la conjoncture mondiale. L'Actualité Économique. 40:2 (July-September 1964), 213-43.

Mládek, J. V. Evolution of African Currencies, Part I: the Franc Area. Finance and Development: the Fund and Bank Review. Vol. 1 (September 1964), 81-88.

Momtchiloff, N. I. The IMF and the Ten: Surveillance instead of reform. World Today. 20:11 (November 1964), 497-502.

Sonnenhol, G. A. Industrieländer nach der Welthandelskonferenz. Aussenpolitik. 15:9 (September 1964), 601-12.

Swerling, B. C. Financial Alternatives to International Commodity Stabilization. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. 30:4 (November 1964), 526-37.

Willmann, Joachim. La Negociation Kennedy au GATT. Politique Étrangère. 29:3 (1964), 248-59.

Economic Development

Berg, E. J. Socialism and Economic Development in Tropical Africa. Quarterly Journal of Economics. 77:4 (November 1964), 549-73.

Brandenburg, Frank. Development of the Small Countries: Lessons from Central America. World Affairs. 127:3 (July-September 1964), 88-93.

Eisermann, Gottfried. Die Bedeutung des Fremden für die Entwicklungsländer. Schmollers Jahrbuch für Gesetzgebung, Verwaltung und Volkswirtschaft. 84:3 (1964), 301-22.

Espártaco. Alternativa política en el desarrollo latinoamericano. Trimestre Económico. 31:124 (October-December 1964), 605-18.

Herrera, Felipe. The Inter-American Bank: Catalyst for Latin American Development. World Today. 20:11 (November 1964), 480-87.

Hesse, Kurt. Die atlantische Gemeinschaft und die Entwicklungshilfe. Wehr-Wissenschaftliche Rundschau. 14:8 (August 1964), 468-78.

Huehne, Lothar H. Trends in der Entwicklungshilfe der amerikanischen und internationalen Finanzinstitutionen. Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 120:3 (July 1964), 526-35.

Kerremans, R. Paesi ricchi e terzo mondo. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. 31:1 (January-March 1964), 123-27.

Knall, Bruno. Grundfragen der Entwicklungshilfe: Wie können sich Wirtschaftshilfe und Bildungshilfe in einer kohärenten Entwicklungspolitik ergänzen? Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenschaft. 120:3 (July 1964), 536-52.

Mills, J. C. Development Policy and Regional Trading Arrangements: The Case of Latin America. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:1, Part I (October 1964), 56-68.

Murphy, George G. S. On Staging. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:1, Part I (October 1964), 69-79.

N'Gom N'Goudi, Prosper. L'expérience israélienne et le développement en Afrique. Presence Africaine. No. 51 (1964), 62-86.

Rhein, Eberhard. Hilfe für Afghanistan aus Ost und West. Aussenpolitik. 15:8 (August 1964), 557-64.

Röpke, W. European Prosperity and its Lessons. South African Journal of Economics. 32:3 (September 1964), 187-98.

Rottenberg, Simon. Economic Instruction for Economic Growth. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:1, Part I (October 1964), 95-99.

Wit, D. A New Strategy for Foreign Economic Aid. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 800-20.

Wolf, Charles. Savings and the Measurement of "Self-Help" in Developing Countries. Rand Corporation Research memorandum RM-3586-ISA, 1963.

Yang, Shu-Chin. Foreign Trade Problems in Economic Development. Scottish Journal of Political Economy. 11:2 (June 1964), 116-35.

Zoll, Werner. Der Block der 75 Entwicklungsländer. Aussenpolitik. 15:8 (August 1964), 517-23.

National Policies and Issues

The United States

Adam, Robert. Die Auslandshilfe der Vereinig-ten Staaten. Aussenpolitik. 15:8 (August 1964), 524-31.

Burton, William L. Protestant America and the Rebirth of Israel. Jewish Social Studies. 26:4 (October 1964), 203-14.

Humphrey, H. H. U. S. Policy in Latin America. Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 585-601.

Kolodziej, E. A. Rational Consent and Defense Budgets: The Role of Congress, 1945-1962. Orbis. 7:4 (Winter 1964), 748-77.

Maresca, Adolfo. La Convenzione consolare russo-americana del 1° giugno 1964. La Comunità Internazionale. 19:3 (July 1964), 409-23.

Morris, B. S. Ideology and American Policy. Virginia Quarterly Review. 40:4 (Autumn 1964), 531-41.

Moulton, H. B. The McNamara General War Strategy. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 238-54.

Pace, Eric. Laos: Continuing Crisis. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 64-74.

Stoner, John, Jr. Problems of the Panama Canal. Military Review. 44:9 (September 1964), 69-78.

Latin America

Fournier, Roger. L'Amérique Latine face au Communisme. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1800-19.

United Kingdom

Goldberg, Alfred. The Military Origins of the British Nuclear Deterrent. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 600-18.

Toynbee, Arnold. Britain and the Arabs—The Need for a New Start. International Affairs. 40:4 (October 1964), 638-46.

Watt, D.C. Britain and the Future of the Persian Gulf States. World Today. 20:11 (November 1964), 488-96.

Western Europe

d'Harcourt, Robert. Gaullisme et Antigaullisme en Allemagne. Revue des Deux Mondes. No. 20 (October 15, 1964), 481-91.

Faust, Fritz. Viermächte-Bindung und Wiedervereinigung. Aussenpolitik. 15:8 (August 1964), 532-41.

Fresnoy, Claude. Une Force Nucléaire Indépendante. Revue des Deux Mondes. No. 19 (October 1, 1964), 385-92.

Haedke, Karl-Ludwig. Die Rechtsstellung der Gaststreitkräfte in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland. Wehr-Wissenschaftliche Rundschau. 14:8 (August 1964), 443-67.

Magathan, Wallace C., Jr. West German Defense Policy. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 292-315.

Massigli, René. La politique britannique. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:10 (October 1964), 1518-1539

Schmitt, Hans A. Germany's Search for Identity. Current History. Vol. 47 (December 1964), 326-31

The Independent Deterrent: A Symposium. Round Table. (September 1964).

West Europe, 1964: A Symposium. Current History. 47:12 (December 1964).

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Berg, Michael von. Der sowjetische Aussenhandel in den Jahren 1955-1962. Osteuropa Wirtschaft. 9:3 (April 1964), 38-51.

Guins, George C. Challenge to the Soviets in Asia and Africa. Russian Review. 23:4 (October 1964), 341-51.

Kossyghin, A. N. Lo sviluppo dell'economia del l'URSS e i rapporti economici internazionali. Comunità Internazionale. 19:3 (July 1964), 399-408.

Tinbergen, J. The Evolution in Communist Views on International Trade. World Justice. 6:1 (September 1964), 5-8.

Vlekke, B. The Communist States in World Politics: A Retrospect. World Justice. 6:1 (September 1964), 9-19.

Wolfe, Thomas W. Soviet Strategic Thought in Transition. Rand Corporation Paper: P-2906, 1964.

The Middle East

Abu-Lughod, Ibrahim. The Islamic Factor in African Politics. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 425-44.

Arabia Felix and the Indian Ocean: a Study of Political Strategy. Round Table. No. 216 (September 1964), 343-51.

Bentwich, Norman. Shade and Light in Israel-Arab Relations. Quarterly Review. 302:642 (October 1964), 371-77.

Crawshaw, Nancy. La question de Chypre. Politique Étrangerè. 29:3 (1964), 217-30.

Weems, Miner L. The Middle East and the Role of Gamel Abdel Nasser as the Leader of Arab Nationalism—A Current Assessment. Southern Quarterly. 3:1 (October 1964), 9-20.

Africa

Doxey, G. The High Commission Territories and the Republic of South Africa. Royal Institute of International Affairs, Oxford University Press. 1963.

Fyfe, Christopher. The Legacy of Colonialism—Old Colony, New State. Phylon. 25:3 (Fall 1964), 247-53.

Richard, Pierre. L'énigme Congolaise. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1765-1777.

Terray, Emmanuel. Les revolutions au Congo et au Dahomey. Revue Française de Science Politique. 14:5 (October 1964), 917-42.

South and Southeast Asia

Bacci, V. La Cina comunista nel mondo asiatico. Rivista di studi politici internazionali. 31:1 (January-March 1964), 16-29.

Burke, S. M. Sino-Pakistani Relations. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 391-404.

Crabb, Cecil V., Jr. The Testing of Non-Alignment. Western Political Quarterly. 17:3 (September 1964), 517-42.

Jacobini, H. B. Fundamentals of Philippine Policy Toward Malaysia. Asian Survey. 4:11 (November 1964), 1144-1151.

Khoman, Thanat. Which Road for Southeast Asia? Foreign Affairs. 42:4 (July 1964), 628-39.

Kroef, Justus M. van der. The Sino-Indonesian Partnership. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 332-56.

Lee, J. J. Communist China's Latin American Policy. Asian Survey. 4:11 (November 1964), 1123-34.

Marchand, General Jean. La Chine populaire et l'Afrique noire. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:10 (October 1964), 1552-66.

Murray, D. P. Chinese Education in South-East Asia. China Quarterly. No. 20 (October-December 1964), 67-95.

Oosten, Fernand. Das Generalskarussel in Südvietnam. Aussenpolitik. 15:9 (September 1964), 619-28.

Prybyla, J. S. Communist China's Economic Relations with Africa 1960-64. Asian Survey. 4:11 (November 1964), 1135-43.

Rigg, Robert B. Red China's Military Posture. Army. 15:3 (October 1964), 49-52, 54.

Satyapalan, C. N. The Sino-Indian Border Conflict. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 374-90.

Sihanouk, Prince Norodom. Cambodia, China and S.E. Asia. Survival. 6:5 (September-October 1964), 242-43.

Stein, Arthur. India's Relations with the USSR, 1953-1963. Orbis. 8:2 (Summer 1964), 357-73.

Sukarno. A Talk with Sukarno: "I am Indonesia." Newsweek. Vol. 64 (October 5, 1964), 84.

Tai, Tsien. China and the Nine Power Conference at Brussels in 1937. New York: St. Johns University Press, 1964. 37pp.

Thornton, Thomas Perry. Communist China and weapons. Military Review. 44:9 (September 1964), 31-38.

Far East and Pacific

Anderson, Nancy. Australia's Voluntary Foreign Aid Activities. Australian Outlook. 18:2 (August 1964), 127-42.

Hellmann, D. C. Japan's Relations with Communist China. Asian Survey. 4:10 (October 1964), 1085-92.

Mendel, D. H., Jr. Japan's Taiwan Tangle. Asian Survey. 4:10 (October 1964), 1073-84.

Miller, J. D. B. Future Australian Security. Australian Outlook. 18:2 (August 1964), 170-88.

Murthy, P. A. N. The Kurile Islands in Japan's Relations with the Soviet Union. India Quarterly. 20:3 (July-September 1964), 281-311.

Tamura, Koaku. Japan's Foreign Relation. Contemporary Japan. 8:1 (September 1964), 33-52.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

ABRAMS, RICHARD M., Conservatism in a Progressive Era. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. xiv, 327. $6.95.)

Adney, Edwin Tappan and Chapelle, Howard I., The Bark Canoes and Skin Boats of North America. (Washington, D. C.: United States Government Printing Office. 1964. Pp. xiv, 242. $3.25.)

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, Tax Overlapping In the United States, 1964. (Washington, D. C.: United States Government Printing Office. 1964. Pp. x, 235. $1.50, paper.)

AKERS, CHARLES W., Called Unto Liberty: A Life of Jonathan Mayhew, 1720-1766. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 285. $6.50.)

ALEXANDER ROBERT J., The Venezuelan Democratic Revolution: A Profile of the Regime of Romulo Betancourt. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 1964. Pp. xiii, 345. $9.00.)

ALLEN, DONNA, Fringe Benefits: Wages or Social Obligation? (Ithaca: Cornell University. 1964. Pp. ix, 273. $4.75, cloth; $2.50, paper.)

ALLEN, STEVE, et. al., Dialogues in Americanism. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company. 1964. Pp. 148. $3.95.)

ARENSBERG, CONRAD M. AND NIEHOFF, ARTHUR H., Introducing Social Change: A Manual for Americans Overseas. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Company. 1964. Pp. vii, 214. $4.95.)

Aufricht, Hans, The International Monetary Fund. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 126, cloth.)

BAILEY, HUGH C., Americanism Vs. Communism. (Northport: American Southern Publishing Company. 1964. Pp. vi, 186. $3.00.)

Balazs, Etienne, Chinese Civilization and Bureaucracy. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1964. Pp. xix, 309. $8.50.)

- Bennett, Edward, Degan, James, and Spiegel, Joseph, Editors, Military Information Systems. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xi, 180. $5.00.)
- Bergson, Abram, The Economics of Soviet Planning. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1964. Pp. xvii, 394. $7.50, cloth; $2.45, paper.)
- Bernstein, Harry, Venezuela & Colombia. (Englewood cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1964. Pp. viii, 152. $4.95, cloth; $1.95, paper.)
- Borts, George H. and Stein, Jerome L., Economic Growth in a Free Market. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1964. Pp. 235. $7.50.)
- Bowle, John, Politics and Opinion in the 19th Century. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. 512. $2.50, paper.)
- BOYCE, RONALD R., Editor, Regional Development and the Wabash Basin. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1964. Pp. xi, 224. $6.95.)
- Brand, Carl F., The British Labour Party: A Short History. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1964. Pp. 340. $7.50.)
- BRIGGS, ELLIS, Farewell to Foggy Bottom. (New York: David McKay Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. xii, 306. $4.95.)
- Bromage, Mary C., Churchill and Ireland. (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press. 1964. Pp. xiv, 222. $5.00.)
- Brown, Charles V., Government and Banking in Western Nigeria. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. ix, 141. $1.20, paper.)
- Brown, Robert Craig, Canada's National Policy, 1883-1900. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1964. Pp. xi, 436. $9.00.)
- BRYAN, GORDON K., County Revenues and Expenditures in Mississippi, 1960. (State College: Mississippi State University. 1964. Pp. iv, 53, paper.)
- Buechner, John C., City Managers and Councils: Charter Provisions in Colorado Home-Rule Cities. (Boulder: University of Colorado. 1964. Pp. vii, 37, paper.)
- BUREAU OF THE BUDGET, EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, Measuring Productivity of Federal Government Organizations. (Washington, D. C.: United States Government Printing Office. 1964. Pp. 370. $1.25, paper.)
- Burke, Edmund, Selected Writings and Speeches on America. (Indianapolis, New York, Kansas City: Bobbs-Merrill Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. xxvii, 296. $1.45, paper; $5.00, cloth.)
- Burke, Edmund, Speech on Conciliation with the Colonies. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1964. Pp. 150. $.95, paper.)
- BURNETT, EDMUND CODY, The Continental Congress. (New York: W. W. Norton & Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. xii, 757. $2.95, paper.)
- Buss, Claude A., Asia in the Modern World.

- (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1964. Pp. xiii, 767. $8.50.)
- CAIRNS, JOHN C., Editor, The Nineteenth Century, 1815-1914. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe. 1964. Pp. vii, 263. $1.95, paper.)
- CARNEGIE ENDOWMENT EDITORIAL STAFF, Issues Before the Nineteenth General Assembly. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1964. Pp. 205. $1.00, paper.)
- CARY, JOYCE, The Case for African Freedom and Other Writings on Africa. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1964. Pp. xiv, 241. $2.45, paper.)
- CATTANEO, MARIO A., Il Partito Politico Nel Pensiero Dell'illuminismo e Della Rivoluzione Francese. (Milano: Pubblicazioni Della Facolta di Gierisprudenza. 1964. Pp. 127. Lire 1000, paper.)
- CHRISTENSON, REO M., Challenge and Decision: Political Issues of our Time. (New York: Harper & Row, Publishers. 1964. Pp. viii, 247. $2.95, paper.)
- CLABAUGH, SAMUEL F., AND ALLEN, RICHARD V., East-West Trade: Its Strategic Implications. (Washington, D. C.: Georgetown University. 1964. Pp. viii, 103. ?, paper.)
- COLETTA, PAOLO E., William Jennings Bryan. (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press. 1964. Pp. x, 486. $6.50.)
- CURRIE, DAVID P., Editor, Federalism and the New Nations of Africa. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1964. Pp. 440. $8.50.)
- D'ANTONIO, WILLIAM V., AND PIKE, FREDRICK B., Editors, Religion Revolution and Reform. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. x, 276. $5.95.)
- DICKENS, A. G., The English Reformation. (New York: Schocken Books, Inc. 1964. Pp. x, 374. $8.50.)
- DILLON, CONLEY H., The Area Redevelopment Administration: New Patterns in Developmental Administration. (College Park: University of Maryland. 1964. Pp. ix, 110. $2.00, paper.)
- Dolan, Paul, Adaptability of Local Government in Newark, Delaware, Newark Special School District, Ashbourne Hills, Brookside. (Pennsylvania: Penjerdel. 1964. Pp. xvi, 79. $1.00, paper.)
- Dommen, Arthur J., Conflict in Laos: The Politics of Neutralization. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xiv, 338. $5.95.)
- Downs, Robert B., Famous Books Ancient and Medieval. (New York: Barnes & Noble. 1964. Pp. xx, 329. $1.95, paper; $3.95, colth.)
- DUNNER, JOSEPH, Links- Und Rechtsradikalismus in der Amerikanischen Politik. (Frankfurt Am Main: Athenaum Verlag. 1964. Pp. 77, paper.)
- Effross, Harris, I., Adaptability of Local Government in Six Municipalities in New Jersey Por-

- tion of Penjerdel Region. (Pennsylvania: Penjerdel. 1964. Pp. xvii, 114. $1.00, paper.)
- ELSNER, GARY H., AND SOSNICK, STEPHEN H., Municipal Expenditures in California: Statistical Correlates. (Davis: University of California. 1964. Pp. 27. $2.00, paper.)
- ENGEL, SALO AND METALL, R. A., Editors, Law, State, and International Legal Order. (Knoxville: The University of Tennessee Press. 1964. Pp. ix, 365. $10.00.)
- ESPOSITO, VINCENT J., BRIGADIER GENERAL, Editor, A Concise History of World War I. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xiv, 414. $6.95, cloth; $2.95, paper.)
- ESPOSITO, VINCENT J. BRIGADIER GENERAL, Editor, A Concise History of World War II. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xiv, 434. $6.95, cloth; $2.95, paper.)
- FALL, BERNARD B., Street Without Joy. (Harrisburg: The Stackpole Co. 1964. Pp. 408. $7.95.)
- FERGUSON, JAMES M., Editor, Public Debt and Future Generations. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1964. Pp. 234. $6.75.)
- FLORINSKY, MICHAEL T., Russia, A Short History. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1964. Pp. xi, 653. $7.95.)
- FOGELMAN, EDWIN, Hiroshima: The Decision to use the A-Bomb. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1964. Pp. ix, 116. $2.50, paper.)
- FRENCH, E. L., Editor, Melbourne Studies in Education: 1961-1962. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1964. Pp. xi. 307. $9.50.)
- FRIEDHEIM, ROBERT L., The Seattle General Strike. (Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1964. Pp. 224. $5.00.)
- FRIEDLAND, WILLIAM H., AND ROSBERG, CARL G. Jr., Editors, African Socialism. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1964. Pp. xi, 313. $6.75.)
- Furtado, Celso, Development and Underdevelopment. (Berkeley & Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1964. Pp. ix, 181. $5.00.)
- Galligan, David J., Politics and the Businessman. (New York: Pitman Publishing Corporation. 1964. Pp. xix, 126. $3.50.)
- GEIGER, GEORGE R., John Dewey in Perspective: A Reassessment. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1964. Pp. vi, 248. $2.45, paper.)
- GIDE, ANDRE, Return from the U.S.S.R., (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1964. Pp. xvi, 94. $1.75, paper.)
- GILMORE, ROBERT L., Caudillism and Militarism in Venezuela. (Athens: Ohio University Press. 1964. Pp. vi, 211. $5.00)
- GINZBERG, ELI, Editor, The Negro Challenge to the Business Community. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. 1964. Pp. 111. $1.65, paper; $4.95, cloth.)

- GOLDWATER, BARRY, Where I Stand. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1964. Pp. 126. $.75, paper.)
- GOLDWATER, WALTER, Radical Periodicals in America, 1890-1950. (New Haven: Yale University Library, 1964, Pp. xv, 51, $5.00.)
- GOLDWIN, ROBERT A., Editor, 100 Years of Emancipation. (Chicago: Rand McNally & Co. 1964. Pp. 217, paper.)
- GOTT, RICHARD and MAJOR, JOHN AND WARNER, GEOFFREY, Editors, Documents on International Affairs 1960. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. xx, 630. $16.00.)
- GOTTWALD, NORMAN K., All the Kingdoms of the Earth. (New York: Harper & Row, Publishers. 1964. Pp. xiii, 448. $7,00.)
- GRADUATE SCHOOL OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION, Philippine Journa! of Public Administration, Vol. 8 #1 and Vol. 8 #2. (Manila: University of the Philippines. 1964. Pp. 154. $2.00, paper.)
- GRAEBNER, NORMAN A., Editor, Ideas and Diplomacy: Readings in the Intellectual Tradition of American Foreign Policy. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. xix, 892. $8.50; $12.50, trade edition.)
- Green, M. M., Ibo Village Affairs. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Publishers. 1964. Pp. xvii, 262. $6.00, clozh; $2.25, paper.)
- Guild, Frederic H., Legislative Councils after Thirty Years. (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University. 1964. Pp. vii, 47, paper.)
- HALAPPA, G. S., et. al., The First General Elections in Goa. (Dharwar: Karnatak University. 1964.
 Pp. iii, 119. Rs 3/-, paper.)
- HALL, GEORGE R., AND PHILLIPS, CHARLES F., JR., Bank Mergers & the Regulatory Agencies. (Washington, D. C.: Federal Reserve System. 1964. Pp. xii, 260. $1.00, paper.)
- HALLOWELL, JOHN H., Editor, Development: For What? (Durham: Duke University Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 241. $6.00.)
- Hambidge, Gove, Editor, Dynamics of Development: An International Development Reader. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xxi, 401. $7.50, cloth; $2.95, paper.)
- Hamilton, Howard D., Editor, Legislative Apportionment: Key to Power (New York: Harper & Row, Publishers. 1964. Pp. viii, 181. $1.95, paper.)
- HARCAVE, SIDNEY, Russia. A History, 5th Edition. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company, 1964. Pp. xv, 784. $7.50, text edition.)
- HARRIS, CURTIS C., JR., A Scientific Method of Districting (Reprint). (Davis: University of California. 1964. Pp. 219–225, paper.)
- HARVEY, J., AND BATHER., L., The British Constitution. (New York: St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. xii, 572. $4.95.)
- HEINZ, GRETE AND PETERSON, AGNES F., (Com-

- piled by), NSDAP Hauptarchiv: Guide to the Hoover Institution Microfilm Collection. (Stanford: The Hoover Institution. 1964. Pp. xi, 175. $4.50, paper.)
- HICKEY, GERALD CANNON, Village in Vietnam. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1964. Pp. xxvii, 325. $10.00.)
- Hobhouse, L. T., Liberalism. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. 130. $1.25, paper.)
- HOFFMAN, FREDERICK J., The Modern Novel in America, Revised Edition. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1964. Pp. xviii, 275. $1.45, paper.)
- Holcombe, Arthur N., Securing the Blessings of Liberty: The Constitutional System. (Chicago: Scott, Foresman and Co. 1964. Pp. 198, paper.)
- Holleman, J. F., et al., Editors, Problems of Transition. (Pietermaritzburg: Natal University Press. 1964. Pp. xvii, 284, cloth.)
- HOLLEY, IRVING BRINTON, JR., United States Army in World War II. (Washington, D. C.: United States Government Printing Office. 1964. Pp. xviii, 643. $4.75.)
- Honnold, John, Editor, The Life of the Law. (New York: Free Press of Glencoe. 1964. Pp. xiv, 581. $10.00.)
- Hook, Sidney, Editor, Law and Philosophy: A Symposium. (New York: New York University Press. 1964. Pp. xiii, 344. $6.50.)
- HORIE, SHIGEO, The International Monetary Fund. (New York: St Martin's Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. xii, 209. $6.00.)
- Hubert-De Perrot, Francine, La Suisse et la Cooperation Avec Les Pays En Voie De Développement. (Genève: Librairie Droz. 1964. Pp. 245, paper.)
- Hunsberger, Warren, Japan and the United States in World Trade. (New York: Harper & Row, Inc. 1964. Pp. xvii, 492. $9.95.)
- IKRAM, S. M., Muslim Civilization in India. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1964. Pp. x, 325. $6.00.)
- INSTITUTO DE ESTUDIOS POLITICOS, Revista de Estudios Políticos, 134. (Madrid: Instituto de Estudios Políticos. 1964. Pp. 453, paper.)
- Jackson, Senator Henry M., Editor, The Secretary of State and the Ambassador. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xii, 203. $4.50, cloth; $1.95, paper.)
- Janowitz, Morris, The Professional Soldier: A Social and Political Portrait. (New York: Free Press of Glencoe. 1964. Pp. xiv, 464. $2.45, paper.)
- Janowitz, Morris and Marvick, Dwaine, Competitive Pressure and Democratic Consent. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc. 1964, 2nd edition. Pp. xii, 123.)
- JAPAN INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, The Japan Annual of International Affairs, No.

- 2, 1962. (Tokyo: The Japan Institute of International Affairs. 1964. Pp. 284. ¥2,000, paper.)
- JENSEN, JAMES R., Legislative Apportionment in Texas. (Houston: University of Houston Press. 1964. Pp. vii, 181. $2.00, paper.)
- JOHNSON, E. A. J., Editor, The Dimensions of Diplomacy. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 135. $3.95.)
- JOHNSON, JOHN J., Editor, Continuity and Change in Latin America. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1964. Pp. xiii, 282. $6.75.)
- Jucker-Fleetwood, Erin E., Money and Finance in Africa. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 335. $10.00.)
- KAHN, C. HARRY, Business and Professional Income under the Personal Income Tax. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1964. Pp. xx, 188. $4.00.)
- KAPLAN, A. D. H., Big Enterprise in a Competitive System. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1964, revised edition. Pp. xv, 240. $5.00.)
- Karlen, Delmar, The Citizen in Court. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc. 1964. Pp. viii, 211. $2.95, paper.)
- KIM, C. I. EUGENE, A Pattern of Political Development: Korea. (Kalamazoo: The Korea Research and Publication, Inc. 1964. Pp. xi, 200. $2.15, paper.)
- KIMBROUGH, RALPH B., Political Power and Educational Decision-Making. (Chicago: Rand McNally & Co. 1964. Pp. ix, 307. $6.00.)
- KING, ROMA A., JR., The Bow and the Lyre: The Art of Robert Browning. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press. 1964. Pp. 162. $1.75, paper.)
- KINNANE, DERK, The Kurds and Kurdistan. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. 85. $1.95, paper.)
- KINEESE, ALLEN V., The Economics of Regional Water Quality Management. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 215. $5.00.)
- Korbonski, Andrzej, COMECON. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1964. Pp. 62. $.50, paper.)
- KORNBLUH, JOYCE L., Editor, Rebel Voices. (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 419. $12.50.)
- KORWIN-RHODES, MARTA, The Mask of Warriors: The Siege of Warsaw, September, 1939. (New York: Libra Publishers, Inc. 1964. Pp. 191. $4.95.)
- KRAMER, LEONARD J., Editor, Man Amid Change in World Affairs. (New York: Friendship Press. 1964. Pp. 175. $1.95, paper.)
- Kust, Matthew J., Foreign Enterprise in India. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1964. Pp. vi, 498. $10.00.)

- KUZNETS, SIMON, Postwar Economic Growth: Four Lectures. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. 148. $4.25.)
- LARUS, JOEL, Editor, Comparative World Politics. (Belmont: Wadsworth Publishing Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. ix, 273, paper.)
- LEFEBURE, GEORGES, The French Revolution from 1793-1799. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1964. Pp. xiv, 430. $7.50.)
- LENSEN, GEORGE ALEXANDER, Editor, Revelations of a Russian Diplomat: The Memoirs of Dimitrii I. Abrikossow. (Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1964. Pp. xxi, 329. $6.95.)
- LIBRACH, JAN, The Rise of the Soviet Empire. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. viii, 382. $7.50.)
- LONDON INSTITUTE OF WORLD AFFAIRS. The Year Book of World Affairs, 1964. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xvii, 415. $12.50.)
- LORANT, STEFAN, Pittsburgh: The Story of an American City. (Garden City: Doubleday & Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. 520. $10.00.)
- LUARD, EVAN, Editor, The Cold War: A Re-Appraisal. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 347. $8.50.)
- MACRIDIS, ROY C. AND BROWN, BERNARD E., Comparative Politics: Notes and Readings. (Homewood: The Dorsey Press, Inc. 1964. Revised Ed. Pp. xiii, 692. $6.75.)
- MANNERS, ROBERT A., Editor, Process and Pattern in Culture. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Company. 1964. Pp. ix, 434. $8.75.)
- Manning, Bayless, Federal Conflict of Interest Law. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. xv, 285. $6.95.)
- Mantoux, Paul, Paris Peace Conference, 1919: Proceedings of the Council of Four. (Genève: Librairie Droz. 1964. Pp. xxi, 227, paper.)
- MARTIN, CURTIS AND GOMEZ, RUDOLPH, Colorado Government and Politics. (Boulder: Pruett Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. 194. $3.95, paper; $5.50, cloth.)
- MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS, The Supreme Court from Taft to Warren. (New York: W. W. Norton & Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. 250. $1.55, paper.)
- MAYER, HENRY, The Press in Australia. (Melbourne: Lansdowne Press. 1964. Pp. xiv, 281. 75s.)
- McCLELLAN, Woodford D., Svetozar Markovic and the Origins of Balkan Socialism. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1964. Pp. viii, 308. $7.50.)
- McVitty, Marion H., A Comparison and Evaluation of Current Disarmament Proposals as of March 1, 1964. (New York: World Law Fund. 1964. Pp. x, 43. $.50, paper.)
- MENDEL, ARTHUR P., Editor, The Twentieth Century: 1914-1964. (New York: The Free

- Press of Glencoe. 1964. Pp. vi, 242. $1.95, paper.)
- MILLER, DELBERT C., Handbook of Research Design and Social Measurement. (New York: David McKay Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. xiv, 332. $3.50, paper.)
- MILLER, ERNEST G., AND CAMIL, WILLIAM, Municipal Financial Inducements to Industry and Attracting Industry into California Cities. (Davis: University of California. 1964. Pp. 20, paper.)
- MILLS, C. WRIGHT, Sociology and Pragmatism: A Study in American Higher Learning. (New York: Paine-Whitman Publishers. 1964. Pp. 475. $12.50.)
- MINAR, DAVID W., Ideas and Politics: The American Experience. (Homewood: The Dorsey Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. xii, 435. $7.50.)
- MIYAKAWA, T. SCOTT, Protestants and Pioneers. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1964. Pp. 306. $7.50.)
- Montgomery, John D. and Smithles, Arthur, Public Policy. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. xi, 432, cloth.)
- MORRIS, ROBERT, Editor, Centrally Planned Change: Prospects and Concepts. (New York: National Association of Social Workers. 1964. Pp. 149. $2.25, paper.)
- NASH, GERALD D., State Government and Economic Development. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 379, cloth.)
- NATIONAL MANPOWER COUNCIL, Government and Manpower. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1964. Pp. xvi, 470. $8.50.)
- NEF, JOHN U., The Conquest of the Material World. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 408. $8.95.)
- NEVINS, ALLAN, Editor, Lincoln and the Gettysburg Address: Commemorative Papers. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1964. Pp. 133. $2.95.)
- NEWMAN, DAVID, AND BENTON, ROBERT, Extremism. (New York: The Viking Press. 1964. Pp. not numbered, cloth.)
- OLIVA, L. JAY, Misalliance: A Study of French Policy in Russia During the Seven Years' War. (New York: New York University Press. 1964. Pp. viii, 218. $6.00.)
- OWEN, WILFRED, Strategy for Mobility. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1964. Pp. xii, 249. $5.00.)
- OWENS, JOHN R., Management Analysis in California State Agencies. (Davis: University of California. 1964. Pp. 31, paper.)
- PARET, PETER, French Revolutionary Warfare from Indochina to Algeria: The Analysis of a Political and Military Doctrine. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Publishers. 1964. Pp. vi, 161. $4.95.) PATON, GEORGE WHITECROSS, A Text-Book of

- Jurisprudence, 3rd Edition. (Oxford: The Clarendon Press. 1964. Pp. xv, 600. 55s.)
- Peabody, James Bishop, Editor, The Holmes-Einstein Letters. (New York: St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. xxvi, 377. $12.50.)
- Pennock, J. Roland, and Smith, David G., Political Science: An Introduction. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1964. Pp. x, 707. $7.50.)
- Pennsylvania Economy League, Adaptability of Local Government in Thirteen Municipalities in Southeastern Pennsylvania. (Pennsylvania: Penjerdel. 1964. Pp. xxiii, 381. $2.00, paper.)
- Pennsylvania Economy League, Local Government in a Regional Setting: Adaptation to Change. (Pennsylvania: Penjerdel. 1964. Pp. x, 39. $1.00, paper.)
- Perkins, Bradford, Castlereagh and Adams. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1964. Pp. viii, 364. $7.95.)
- PERKINS, DEXTER AND VAN DEUSEN, GLYNDON G., The American Democracy: Its Rise to Power. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1964. Pp. xvi, 687. $7.95.)
- Perle, Richard Norman, The National Security Debate. (Los Angeles: California Debate Research Bureau. 1964. Pp. 133, paper.)
- PHILLIPS, DAVID GRAHAM, The Treason of the Senate. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc. 1964. Pp. 256. $5.95.)
- Pollock, James K., and Lane, John C., Source Materials on the Government and Politics of Germany. (Ann Arbor: Wahrs Publishing Co. 1964. Pp. viii, 404, paper.)
- Polsby, Nelson W., Congress and the Presidency. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1964. Pp. viii, 120. $1.50, paper; $3.95, cloth.)
- POLYNESIAN SOCIETY, New Guinea's First National Election: A Symposium. (Wellington: The Polynesian Society. 1964. Pp. 54. 5 shillings, paper.)
- Power, Paul F., Neutralism and Disengagement. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1964. Pp. vii, 169. $2.50, paper.)
- Powers, Patrick W., Lt. Col., A Guide to National Defense: The Organization and Operations of the U.S. Military Establishment. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xiii, 326. $6.95.)
- RANDALL, JAMES G., Constitutional Problems under Lincoln. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press: 1964. Pp. xxxiii, 596. $2.95, paper.)
- RANKIN, KARL LOTT, China Assignment. (Seattle: University of Washington Press. 1964. Pp. xix, 343. $6.95.)
- RAYMOND, JACK, Power at the Pentagon. (New York: Harper & Row, Publishers. 1964. Pp. xiv, 363. $6.50.)
- ROBINSON, E. A. G., Editor, Economic Development for Africa South of the Sahara. (New York:

- St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. xvi, 744. $2.00.)
- ROBINSON, HOWARD, Carrying British Mails Overseas. (New York: New York University Press. 1964. Pp. 327. $7.50.)
- Rostow, W. W., View from the Seventh Floor. (New York: Harper & Row. 1964. Pp. xi, 178. $4.00.)
- Schmitthoff, Clive M., Editor, The Sources of the Law of International Trade. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xxvi, 292. $12.00.)
- Schreiber, G. R., The Bobby Baker Affair: How to Make Millions in Washington. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1964. Pp. 190. $.75, paper.)
- Schubert, Glendon, Editor, Judicial Behavior: A Reader in Theory and Research. (Chicago: Rand McNally & Co. 1964. Pp. 603, cloth.)
- Scott, Robert E., Mexican Government in Transition. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1964. Revised Edition. Pp. 345, $2.25, paper.)
- Sellin, Thorsten, Editor, The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science. (Philadelphia: The American Academy of Political and Social Science. 1964. Pp. x, 243. $2.50, paper.)
- SHADGETT, OLIVE HALL, The Republican Party in Georgia from Reconstruction through 1900. (Athens: University of Georgia Press. 1964. Pp. ix, 210. $6.00.)
- Shriver, Sargent, Point of the Lance. (New York: Harper & Row, Publishers. 1964. Pp. xi, 240. $4.95.)
- SMITH, GADDIS, Britain's Clandestine Submarines, 1914-1915. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1964. Pp. vi, 155. $4.50.)
- SMITH, GORDON S., A Selected Bibliography on International Peace-Keeping. (Ottawa: Dept. of National Defence, Canada. 1964. Pp. 24, paper.)
- SMITH, PAUL H., Loyalists and Redcoats. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 199. $5.00.)
- STERN, C. A., Golden Republicanism. (Ann Arbor: Edwards Brothers, Inc. 1964. Pp. ix, 118. $1.50, paper.)
- STERN, C. A., Republican Heyday. (Ann Arbor: Edwards Brothers, Inc. 1962. Pp. vii, 97. $1.25, paper.)
- STERN, C. A., Resurgent Republicanism. (Ann Arbor: Edwards Brothers, Inc. 1963. Pp. vii, 96. $1.25, paper.)
- STEWART, CHARLES F., The Economy of Morocco, 1912-1962. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. ix, 234, paper.)
- TAUBENFELD, Howard J., Editor, Space and Society. (Dobbs Ferry: Oceana Publications, Inc. 1964. Pp. xviii, 172. $5.95.)

- TELEVISION INFORMATION OFFICE, Television in Government and Politics: A Bibliography. (New York: Television Information Office. 1964. Pp. 62, paper.)
- TELLER, JUDD L., AND GUTTMAN, NAHUM, Editors, The Free World and the New Nations. (New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1964. Pp. 176. $4.50.)
- Texas Election Research Project Committee, Texas Votes: Selected General and Special Election Statistics 1944-1963. (Austin: University of Texas. 1964. Pp. vii, 33. $1.50, paper.)
- THERNSTROM, STEPHAN, Poverty and Progress: Social Mobility in a Nineteenth Century City. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 286. $5.95.)
- THORTON, THOMAS PERRY, Editor, The Third World in Soviet Perspective. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1964. Pp. xx, 355. $7.50.)
- Tompkins, Dorthy C., (Compiled By), Bail in the United States: A Bibliography. (Berkeley: University of California. 1964. Pp. vii, 49. $2.00. paper.)
- TRUMBULL, ROBERT, The Scrutable East. (New York: David McKay Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. ix, 275. $4.95.)
- TSCHEBOTARIOFF, GREGORY P., Russia My Native Land. (New Yrok: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1964. Pp. xxvi, 384. $6.95.)
- Turner, Arthur C., and Freedman, Leonard, Editors, Tension Areas in World Affairs. (Belmont: Wadsworth Publishing Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. x, 389, paper.)
- UNITED NATIONS, Everyman's United Nations. (New York: United Nations. 1964. 7th Edition. Pp. x, 638. $5.00.)
- VANCE, JAMES, JR., Geography and Urban Evolution in the San Francisco Bay Area. (Berkeley: University of California. 1964. Pp. 89. $1.50, paper.)
- VAN DEN BOSCH, GOVERT, Editor, Political Issues and Business in 1964. (Ann Arbor: Foundation for Research on Human Behavior. 1964. Pp. ii, 59. $3.00, paper.)
- VOGT, HANNAH, The Burden of Guilt: A Short History of Germany, 1914-1945. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. xviii, 318. $6.00.)
- WALTON, CLARENCE C., AND CLEVELAND, FREDERICK W., Jr., Corporations on Trial: The Electric Cases. (Belmont: Wadsworth Publishing Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. xiv, 138, paper.)
- WARLIMONT, WALTER, Insider Hitler's Head-

- quarters: 1939-45. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. xi, 658. $9.95.)
- WARNER, HOYT LANDON, Progressivism in Ohio, 1897–1917. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press. 1964. Pp. xiii, 556. $10.00.)
- WARREN COMMISSION Report on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. (Garden City: Doubleday & Company, Inc. 1964. Pp. xxviii-a, xxiv, 888. $4.95.)
- WASSON, DONALD (Compiled By), American Agencies Interested in International Affairs, 5th Ed. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 200. $5.50.)
- Wedgwood, C. V., Poetry and Politics under the Stuarts. (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. 1964. Pp. 219. $1.95, paper.)
- Wells, Donald T., The TVA Tributary Development Program. (University: University of Alabama. 1964. Pp. ix, 153, paper.)
- WESTERN GOVERNMENTAL RESEARCH ASSOCIA-TION, Twenty-Third Annual Conference, 1963 Proceedings. (Berkeley: Institute of Governmental Studies. 1964. Pp. iii, 91. $1.00, paper.)
- WHEELER-BENNETT, J. W., The Nemesis of Power: The German Army in Politics, 1918– 1945. (New York: St. Martin's Press, Inc. 1964. Pp. xxii, 831. $15.00.)
- WHITAKER, ARTHUR P., Argentina. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1964. Pp. viii, 184. $4.95.)
- WHITAKER, ARTHUR P., The United States and the Independence of Latin America, 1800-1830. (New York: W. W. Norton & Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. 630. $2.95, paper.)
- WHITAKER, PHILIP, Political Theory and East African Problems. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1964. Pp. 116. $1.99, paper.)
- WILLIAMS, WILLIAM APPLEMAN, The Great Evasion. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books. 1964. Pp. 189. $4.50.)
- Wolfers, Arnold, Editor, Changing East-West Relations and the Unity of the West. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1964. Pp. xiii, 242. $2.45, paper; $6.00, cloth.)
- WORLD LAW FUND, Current Disarmament Proposals as of March 1, 1964. (New York: World Law Fund. 1964. Pp. xx, 195, paper.)
- ZEBOT, CYRLI A., The Economics of Competitive Coexistence. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. ix, 262. $6.50.)
- ZIMMER, BASIL G., Rebuilding Cities. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc. 1964. Pp. xi, 363. $7.50.)

NEWS AND NOTES

WASHINGTON OFFICE NEWSLETTER

Seminar for Freshman Congressmen. In early January, the Association co-sponsored, with a bipartisan group of eight members of the House, the second Seminar for Freshman Congressmen. This week-long series of meetings is designed to acquaint new members with the workings of the House, with such problems as organizing a Congressional office, dealing with pressure groups and effective committee service.

The meetings are conducted by experienced Representatives and a wide range of Congressional staff personnel, political scientists and other outside experts. As an adjunct to the 1965 seminar, a draft copy of An Introduction to Legislative Service, a 225-page manual prepared by the Association, was distributed to serve as a text. The book will undergo final revision and eventually be published in an appropriate manner, serving as a permanent reference for Congressmen and others interested in the workings of the House.

Reaction to the comprehensive program offered in this year's seminar was again uniformly favorable; between 50 and 60 of the new Members attended each of the sessions, held January 5-8 in the House Judiciary Committee Hearing Room.

Congressional Fellowship Program. There are 30 participants in the 1964–65 Congressional Fellowship Program, which is now in its 12th year of operation under Association sponsorship. The group is composed of seven journalists, one law school faculty member, eight political scientists—including one selected in cooperation with the Canadian Political Science Association—an Asian Fellow sponsored by the Asia Foundation, 11 Federal Service Fellows, a Harkness Commonwealth Fund Fellow from London, England, and a Middle Eastern Fellow sponsored by American Friends of the Middle East.

Winners of the 1965-66 Fellowship awards sponsored by the Association were announced in mid-February and included:

Journalists winners:

John M. Berry, 27, reporter, Providence (R.I.) Journal-Bulletin.

Conrad Christiano, 38, reporter, Rochester (N.Y.) Democrat & Chronicle.

Ted G. Kolderie, 35, editorial page staff writer, Minneapolis (Minn.) Star & Tribune.

Dale D. Pullen, 36, city editor, Hollywood (Fla.) Sun Tattler.

Donald W. Robinson, 27, reporter, Eugene (Ore.) Register-Guard.

Edward K. Shanahan, 29, reporter, Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, Mass.

Political science winners:

Carl Baar, 25, Ph.D. candidate, University of Chicago.

Michael Lipsky, 25, Ph.D. candidate, Princeton University.

David L. Paletz, 31, Ph.D. candidate, University of California, Los Angeles.

Armin Rosencranz, 28, Ph.D. candidate, Stanford University (currently in London on Fellowship-sponsored research)

Stephen L. Wasby, 28, assistant professor, Moorhead (Minn.) State College.

Ruth Widmayer, 39, professor of political science, Colorado Woman's College.

Law school faculty member winners:

Ian R. Macneil, 36, professor of law, Cornell University.

George B. Trubow, 32, associate professor, John Marshall Law School, Chicago.

Psychologist winner:

Frank I. Moore, 27, project director, legislative council study of mental illness and retardation, Oklahoma City.

Alternates:

William C. Baum, 34, assistant professor, Creighton University, Omaha.

William L. Morrow, 30, assistant professor, DePauw University, Greencastle, Ind.

Wesley G. Pippert, 31, reporter, United Press International, Chicago.

Paul R. Wieland, 27, reporter, Buffalo (N.Y.) Evening News.

United States Senate Youth Program. The Third Annual Senate Youth Program was held this year from January 31 to February 6. The Program, authorized by Senate resolution and financed by a grant from the William Randolph Hearst Foundation, brings to Washington two outstanding high school student leaders from each of the 50 states and District of Columbia.

The Association, by developing and conducting the week's agenda, introduced the students to the workings of their Federal government with particular emphasis on the Senate. Highlights were provided by a meeting with President and Mrs. Johnson, luncheon with Vice President Humphrey, comprehensive seminars produced by the Departments of State and Defense, and an interview with Justice Arthur Goldberg.

The Association's work on this program falls within the framework of its Social Studies Project.

Seminar in Legislative Operations. Another in a series of seminars conducted jointly by APSA and the U.S. Civil Service Commission for 20 Federal executives in grades 15 to 18 was held March 15-19. Patterned after the Seminar for Freshman Congressmen, the sessions were conducted by political scientists, members of both houses of Congress, and staff personnel from both the Legislative and Executive branches.

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The Southern Political Science Association held its annual meeting in Durham, N. C., November 12-14, 1964. The Nobel Peace Prize winner, Martin Luther King, was an honored guest during the proceedings. John H. Hallowell, President of the SPSA and chairman of Duke University's department of political science, gave his presidential address on November 13. David B. Truman, President of the American Political Science Association, delivered the opening day address. Those who gave papers and their topics were: Charles G. Hamilton, Pikesville College: "Mississippi: Resistance and Consequent Politics"; Normal L. Parks, Middle Tennessee State College: "Post Kefauver Politics in Tennessee"; Arpad von Lazar, Vanderbilt University: "Human Resources and the Dilemma of Political Development"; and Robert O. Tilman, Tulane University: "Political Development as an Integrative Process: Concepts, Theories and Directors for Research."

The joint meeting of the Western and Pacific Northwest Political Science Associations took place in Victoria, B. C., March 17-20, 1965. The program chairman for the conference was Maure L. Goldschmidt of Reed College.

A three-day conference on political development was held at the University of Pennsylvania on November 11-13, 1964. Participants included about 20 scholars and officials from other universities, private institutions and government agencies. At the three general sessions papers were presented by Marion Levy, Princeton University; Arthur Smithies, Harvard University; and Lucian Pve. Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Discussants were Kalman Silvert, Dartmouth College; Howard Wiggins, Department of State; Wilfred Malenbaum, University of Pennsylvania; H. Field Haviland, Brookings Institution; and Karl von Vorys, University of Pennsylvania. At the closing luncheon, David E. Bell, Administrator of the Agency for International Development, delivered an address on "Foreign Assistance and Economic Development."

Southern Methodist University will be host to a second conference on "Mathematical Applications in Political Science." The conference is scheduled for July 18 to August 7, 1965. It is designed to serve political science faculties active in teaching and research. Stipends of $300 plus travel allowances of 4 cents a mile will be available for thirty participants. Applications will be accepted through April 15. Inquiries should be directed to: Joseph L. Bernd, Director, Conference on Mathematical Applications in Political Science, Box 1099, Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Texas 75222.

The annual meeting of the New England Political Science Association was held on Saturday, April 24, 1965, at Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts. Officers for 1964-65 are: president, Laurence I. Radway (Dartmouth); vice president, Karl Deutsch (Yale); secretary, Gerald Grady (University of Massachusetts); members of the executive committee, Lawrence Fuchs (Brandeis), Fred Green (Williams), and Alona Elizabeth Evans (Wellesley).

The department of government at Indiana University was host to the Midwest Conference of Political Science in Bloomington, April 22-24, 1965

The XIIIth International Congress of Administrative Sciences will meet in Paris, July 19–23, 1965. Papers will deal with public relations in administration; the influence of the public in the operation of public administration; new techniques of budget preparation and management; and administrative management of public enterprises. Special meetings of representatives of schools and institutes of public administration will meet to discuss the role of their institutions in development administration. For further information write: The International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 25 rue de la Charite, Brussels 4, Belgium.

The 1965 conference of the World Association for Public Opinion Research will be held in Dublin, Eire, from September 6-10, 1965. Direct all inquiries to: Dr. Irving Crespi, The Gallup Organization, Inc., 53 Bank Street, Princeton, New Jersey.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

For the eighteenth consecutive year, the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan will hold a summer institute in survey research techniques. The institute is designed to meet some of the education and training needs of persons engaged in business and governmental research and other statistical work, graduate students and university instructors interested in quantitative research in the social sciences.

The 1965 institute will be presented in two fourweek sessions, the first from June 28 to July 24, and the second from July 26 to August 21. They may be taken independently or successively. For further information write to: Survey Research Center, The University of Michigan, P. O. Box 1248, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106.

The Comparative Administration Group of the American Society for Public Administration has established a national committee on comparative urban studies. The committee is planning a program of meetings and conferences, a summer research seminar, and the distribution of a newsletter. The executive committee of the new group consists of Victor Jones, University of California (chairman); Fred Cleaveland, University of North Carolina; William Gore, University of Indiana; Wallace Sayre, Columbia University; Frank Sherwood, U. S. C.; and Frank Smallwood, Dartmouth.

A Midwest Universities Consortium for International Activities, Inc. was organized in 1964 by the Universities of Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana and Michigan State University. The purpose of the new organization is to enable the institutions to render more effective technical aid abroad and to gain from their overseas operations the maximum of academic benefit on their respective campuses. Of the eight members of the board of directors of the corporation four are political scientists: Edward H. Buehrig, Indiana University; Leon Epstein, University of Wisconsin; Ralph Smuckler, Michigan State University; and Royden Dangerfield, University of Illinois.

In celebration of its fiftieth anniversary, the department of government at Indiana University held a series of six lectures, November 5-7. The lectures, which will be published, were as follows: "The Uses of Theory in the Study of Politics," Anatol Rapoport; "The Representative Function in Western Systems," David B. Truman, Columbia .University; "Political Parties in Western Democratic Systems," Leon D. Epstein, University of Wisconsin; "The Making of Foreign Policy in the United States," Charles Burton Marshall, Washington Center for Foreign Policy Research;

"Problems in the Study of Local Politics," James Q. Wilson, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University, and "Approaches to the Understanding of International Politics," Quincy Wright, University of Virginia.

The Ford Foundation has announced a renewal grant of $250,000 for five years to continue support of the program of the Comparative Administration Group of the American Society for Public Administration. Fred W. Riggs, Indiana University, will continue to serve as chairman of the CAG, with the support of an executive committee containing the following members: Fred Cleaveland. North Carolina; Ferrel Heady, Michigan; John Montgomery, Harvard; Clarence Thurber, Penn. State; Dwight Waldo, California; Edward Weidner, East-West Center, Hawaii: and Don Bowen, ASPA executive director. The CAG will conduct summer seminars in 1965 at Pittsburgh, under the direction of James Heaphey, and at California, with Dwight Waldo as director. A workshop for career development training of overseas program officers will be conducted at Pittsburgh in conjunction with the CAG seminar. under the direction of Edgar Shor, chairman of the political science department at Colgate University. The themes of the Pittsburgh and California seminars will be the spatial and temporal aspects of development administration, respectively.

The Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania have announced that three awards, each of $5,000, may be made for distinguished work in the humanities and the social sciences, to appear as succeeding volumes in the Haney Foundation Series. The first volume has just been published.

Statements of interest, or inquiries, should be addressed to Mr. Bernard J. Ford, Secretary, Haney Foundation Series Committee, Charles Patterson Van Pelt Library, University of Pennsylvania, 3420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania 19104. The deadline of the submission of manuscripts is August 1, 1965.

The Conference on Communist Studies, an autonomous unit of the American Political Science Association, recently completed arrangements to include China and other Communist nations in Asia in its activities. Established in 1958, the Conference until now dealt with Soviet affairs and Eastern Europe. The change in scope is reflected by a modification in the name (formerly the Conference on Soviet and Communist Studies) and the election of a specialist on China, A. Doak Barnett of Columbia University, as Conference chairman for 1965-66. Conference membership henceforth will not require annual dues and will consist of all individuals who are identified as specialists in the politics of Communist nations by the appropriate organizations, e.g., the American Political Science Association, the Association for Asian Studies, and the American Association for the Advancement of Slavic Studies.

The activities of the Conference on Communist Studies center on the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association. The Conference organizes the Comparative Politics panels on Communist nations, and sponsors a luncheon with a guest speaker and election of officers.

George Fischer, Cornell University, is Conference chairman for 1964-65; A. Doak Barnett, Columbia University, is vice-chairman; and Allen B. Ballard, Jr., City College of New York, is secretary-treasurer.

The Institute of Advanced Projects of the East-West Center at the University of Hawaii sponsored a conference during 1964 on "Communications and Innovation in Development Policy." Papers emphasized the experience of mainland China, India and the Philippines. The major papers are now being edited for publication as a single volume by Wilbur Schramm, Stanford University, and Daniel Lerner, MIT, co-chairman of the conference. Other APSA members who participated were Lucian Pye, MIT; Lawrence Fuchs, Brandeis University; and V. K. N. Menon of India.

A month-long institute on Comparative Communist Systems and Ideology, jointly sponsored by the School of Education and the Oregon State Board of Education was held on the campus of the University of Oregon during 1964. Joseph Fiszman, department of political science at the University of Oregon, served as director.

The eighth annual institute on United States foreign policy was held at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, March 21, 1964, sponsored by the Department of State in collaboration with various agencies in Milwaukee. It was the first such regional conference in Wisconsin under State Department auspices. Speakers included Mrs. Kate Louchheim, Robert Manning, Richard Davis, Walt W. Rostow, Marshall Green, and Ben S. Stephansky, all of the State Department.

The fifth annual Governor's conference on the United Nations was held at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee, May 2, 1964, sponsored by the Wisconsin Governor's Committee on the U. N. and the university's Institute for World Affairs Education. The U.S.S.R. ambassador to the U.N., Nicolai Federenko; Sidney Yates of the United States delegation; Zenon Rossides, Cyprus ambassador to the U. N.; and José Rolz-Bennett of the U. N. Secretariat participated in the conference.

The University of Denver has established a graduate school of international studies. It will engage in programs which encourage research and cooperative efforts in international relations in the Rocky Mountain-Great Plains region.

The American Historical Association, at its annual convention in Washington, D.C., December 29, 1964, awarded its Watumull Prize, $500, for a work on the history of India, jointly to two political scientists: to Charles Drekmeier, associate professor at Stanford University, for his Kingship and Community in Early India (Stanford University Press), and to Charles Heimsath, associate professor of South Asian studies, The American University, for his Indian Nationalism and Social Reform (Princeton University Press).

Ten scholars met at the Rockefeller Foundation's Villa Serbelloni at Bellagio, Italy, in September, 1964, to plan a series of volumes on the smaller European democracies. The editors of this series, financed by a grant from the Ford Foundation, are Hans Daalder, University of Leiden, Netherlands; Robert Dahl, Yale University; Val R. Lorwin, University of Oregon; and Stein Rokkan, Christian Michelsen Institute, Bergen, Norway. The discussions at Bellagio concerned the "common core" elements of all these volumes, which would deal with such essentially durable features of each system as the qualities of the citizenry, their loyalties, apathies, and alienations, the qualities of the elites, the role of consensus and conflict in historical changes, and the direction of long-run changes.

Henry J. Abraham, University of Pennsylvania, participated in the sixth World Congress of the International Political Science Association in Geneva in September, 1964.

CHARLES BACKSTROM, University of Minnesota, directed a state-wide faculty workshop in December on the 1964 election. The workshop was a project of the Minnesota Council for Education.

James D. Barber, Yale University, has a junior faculty fellowship and is spending the year at the Brookings Institution.

ERNEST R. BARTLEY, University of Florida, has been elected to full membership in the American Institute of Planners.

Thad Beyle is on a year's leave of absence from Denison University on an NCEP fellowship. He is serving as an assistant to the Governor of North Carolina.

HUGH A. BONE has been appointed by Governor Albert D. Rosellini to be chairman of the Washington State Commission on Registration and Voting Participation.

DAVID P. CALLEO, Yale University, is on research leave in France for 1964-65.

HAROLD W. CHASE has returned to the University of Minnesota after a two-year absence during which he served as visiting professor at Columbia University (1963-64) and engaged in research at the Brookings Institution during 1962-63.

FREDERICK N. CLEAVELAND, University of North Carolina, has been elected President of the Southern Political Science Association for 1964-65.

ORVILLE COPE, University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee, spent the 1964 summer doing research in Chile.

James T. Crown, New York University, visited the University of Poland in December, 1964, to make arrangements for a seminar in Warsaw for American graduate students to be held in the summer of 1965.

JAMES C. DAVIES, University of Oregon, spent the spring term of 1964 in Brazil.

Paul Dolan, University of Delaware, will be on sabbatical leave during the spring semester, 1965.

JEDON EMENHISER, Utah State University, is a Fulbright professor at the University of Saigon in South Vietnam during 1964-65.

DAVID FARRELLY, UCLA, continues as director of the University of California's Education Abroad program in Padua, Italy, for 1964-65.

James W. Fesler, Yale University, is engaged in European research during the current academic year.

Russell H. Fifield, University of Michigan, has been appointed Secretary General of the XXVII International Congress of Orientalists to be held in August, 1967.

EDWARD B. GLICK has resigned from the System Development Corporation to become senior staff political scientist with the Washington branch of the Bendix Corporation's Arms Control Projects Office.

LEE S. GREENE, University of Tennessee, has been named Distinguished Service professor at that institution.

ARTHUR M. HANHARDT, JR., University of Oregon, was in Germany in July, 1964, as a guest of the cultural exchange division of the Federal Republic of Germany.

MURRAY C. HAVENS, University of Texas, has been named Secretary of the Southern Political Science Association for 1964-65.

FERREL HEADY has received a faculty distinguished achievement award at the University of Michigan. He is a senior specialist in residence at the Institute of Advanced Projects, East-West Center, University of Hawaii, January to July, 1965.

James Jarvis has returned to Wayne State University from San Jose State College where he was visiting professor of public administration for the past two years.

CONRAD JOYNER, University of Arizona, has been appointed co-ordinator of the university's Peace Corp training center.

ROY E, JUMPER has resigned from Wake Forest College to continue as consultant to the Ford Foundation in Lebanon.

GLADYS KAMMERER has received a citation for distinguished teaching and research at the University of Florida.

RAVI KAPIL has returned to the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee following a year of research in Somalia.

Kemal Karpat, New York University, addressed the Conference on Democracy in Asia held in Turkey in November, 1964.

MALCOLM KERR is on leave from UCLA for the period 1964-66. During 1964-65 he is a fellow at the American Research Center in Egypt. He will be a visiting associate professor at the American University of Beirut during 1965-66.

JOHN H. KESSEL returned in January to the University of Washington from a year's leave of absence during which he served as an NCEP fellow with the Republican National Committee.

Kenneth Kofmehl, Purdue University, has been appointed consultant to the Committee on Science and Public Policy of the National Academy of Sciences, Washington, D. C.

NORMAN KOGAN, University of Connecticut, is on leave during 1964-65 and is residing in Rome.

STUART A. MACCORKLE, director of the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Texas, received an honorary doctor of laws degree from Washington and Lee University in June, 1964.

Henry Mason, Tulane University, will be a Fulbright professor at the Otto Suhr Institut of Free Berlin during the summer session of 1965.

ROGER D. MASTER, Yale University, is spending 1964-65 in France under a junior faculty fellowship.

DOUGLAS MENDEL, JR., University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee, has been appointed Far Eastern representative of the Roper Public Opinion Research Center at Williams College.

STEPHEN R. MITCHELL, Washington State University, was an NCEP fellow at the Democratic national convention in Atlantic City.

PHILLIP MONYPENNEY, University of Illinois, is serving a two-year appointment as member of the Illinois Commission on the problem of cities, villages and towns.

JAMES N. MURRAY, JR., State University of Iowa, is teaching at the University of Istanbul on a Fulbright award.

JOHN NORMAN, Fairfield University, Connecticut, was one of the two bi-partisan plaintiffs in Buttersworth v. Dempsey. The case, involving reapportionment and redistricting of the legislative districts of Connecticut, was upheld by the U. S. Supreme Court.

CHARLES B. NEFF is on leave from the University of Hawaii to direct the Peace Corps operation in Bogotá, Colombia.

THOMAS PAGE, University of Illinois, is serving as secretary to the personnel advisory board of the Department of Personnel in Illinois state government.

Belden Paulson has returned to the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee from research in southern Italy.

RALPH MIWA, on leave from the University of Hawaii, has been promoted to the position of administrative assistant to Senator Daniel Inouye of Hawaii.

CARL H. LANDÉ, Yale University, is conducting research in the Philippine Islands during the current academic year.

Walter Laves, University of Indiana, was appointed by President Johnson to serve as an alternate delegate to the 13th General Conference of UNESCO held in Paris October 18-November 19, 1964.

WERNER LEVI, University of Hawaii, is in India on a grant from the American Institute of Indian affairs.

WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON, University of Texas, has been named book review editor of the Journal of Politics.

ROBERT E. LORISH, Ohio Wesleyan University, is on leave during 1964-65 to serve as an administrative intern in the office of the provost of Michigan State University.

NORMAN PALMER, University of Pennsylvania, presented a paper at the Sixth World Congress of the International Political Science Association in Geneva in September, 1964.

R. N. ROSECRANCE, UCLA, was a visiting fellow in international relations at the Australian National University in Canberra during the spring term, 1964. He is currently a Rockefeller research fellow in the department of war studies, Kings College, University of London.

JOSEPH S. ROUCER, University of Bridgeport, has been elected president of the Honorary Social Science Society. He has also been appointed to the editorial boards of the Revista de Ciencias Sociales (Spain) and Sociologia Internationalis (Berlin).

STUART A. SCHIENGOLD is on leave from the University of California at Davis and is spending the year at Harvard's Center of International Affairs as a research associate.

FRED SONDERMAN, professor of political science and associate dean at Colorado College, was invited by the British Foreign Office to participate in a conference in February, 1965. The conference dealt with the economic, political and defense problems of the Atlantic Community.

ROBERT S. STAUFFER has returned to the University of Hawaii from a year spent at the University of the Philippines under a Fulbright award.

James A. Steintrager has been awarded a research grant by the University of Texas.

WILLIAM L. STRAUSS has been granted a threeyear leave by the Arizona State College to become the executive director of the United States Education Commission in Korea.

OSCAR SYARLEIN, University of Florida, has been elected to a two-year term on the executive council of the American Society for International Law.

JOHN E. TURNER AND ROBERT HOLT, University of Minnesota, did field research in England prior to the 1964 British elections.

PEDRO C. M. TEICHERT has returned to the University of Mississippi from a four-month stay at the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina, where he was a visiting professor under a Fulbright-Hayes grant.

PETER A. Toma, University of Arizona, is participating in an inter-university consortium of social scientists who are engaged in research mapping for AID's Food for Peace Program.

Rocco J. Tresolini, chairman, department of government, Lehigh University, was one of two recipients of the R. R. and E. C. Hillman award. The award is given annually by the university to faculty members who have contributed most toward the advancement of the interest of the university.

RICHARD W. VAN WAGENEN has returned to his post as dean of the Graduate School at American University after two years with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

ELLIS WALDRON, Montana State University, studied at Harvard Law School during 1963-64 under a Carnegie Foundation fellowship.

ROBERT WARREN has returned to the University of Washington from a year spent with Resources for the Future, Inc., in Washington, D. C.

HENRY WELLS, University of Pennsylvania, read a paper at the Sixth World Congress of the International Political Science Association in Geneva.

T. P. WRIGHT, JR., has returned to Bates College after a year's absence spent in India under a Fulbright award.

STAFF CHANGES

NEW APPOINTMENTS

CHARLES F. ANDRAIN, assistant professor, San Diego State College

ANDREW BAGGS, instructor, University of Florida

Howard Ball, instructor, Rutgers—the State University

THEODORE BECKER, University of Hawaii

DENNIS E. BELLER, instructor, Miami University (Ohio)

WILLIAM J. BLOUGH, University of Houston

Leroy L. Bradwish, assistant professor, Drake University

DOYLE BUCKWALTER, instructor, Brigham Young University

RONALD F. BUNN, associate professor, Louisiana State University

RONALD H. CHILCOTE, assistant professor, University of California at Riverside

WILLIAM COPLIN, assistant professor, Wayne State University

EDMOND COSTANTINI, lecturer, University of California at Davis

PHILLIP COULTER, instructor, University of Massachusetts

LAWRENCE J. DENARDIS, assistant professor, Albertus Magnus College

JOEL R. DICKERSON, instructor, Millikin University

JOHN P. EAST, assistant professor, E. Carolina College

JAMES F. ENGEL, assistant professor, New Mexico State University

LEE W. FARNSWORTH, assistant professor, Brigham Young University

JACK D. FLEER, assistant professor, Wake Forest College

J. LEIPER FREEMAN, professor, Vanderbilt University

ROBERT FRIED, assistant professor, University of California at Los Angeles

STERLING HALE FULLER, professor and chairman, University of Missouri at Kansas City, effective September, 1964

Douglas S. Gatlin, assistant professor, Florida Atlantic University

WILLIAM GERLACH, associate professor, Eastern Kentucky State College

DONALD GERTH, professor, Chico State College

Louis Gold, instructor, Oberlin College

JOHN GUNNELL, assistant professor, Graduate School of Public Affairs, the State University of New York at Albany

MICHAEL HAAS, University of Hawaii

Harlan Hahn, assistant professor of political science and research associate in the School of Health, University of Michigan

FRED HANGA, JR., associate professor, Graduate School of Public Affairs, the State University of New York at Albany

CHARLES M. HARDIN, professor, University of California at Davis; formerly associate director for Humanities and Social Sciences of the Rockefeller Foundation

MARTIN J. HAUSER, instructor, University of Minnesota

DUANE W. HILL, associate professor, Colorado State University; also research associate of the Social Science Foundation of the University of Denver

Douglas Hobbs, assistant professor, UCLA

JOHN A. HOBBS, assistant professor, San Diego State College

GEORGE C. HOFFMAN, assistant professor, Butler University

JOHN HUTCHINSON, associate professor and research associate of Industrial Relations at UCLA

DAVID E. INGERSOLL, assistant professor, University of Delaware

LESTER JACKSON, instructor, Newark College of Arts and Sciences, Rutgers University

GEORGE JENKINS, assistant professor, University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee

James E. Jernberg, assistant professor, University of Minnesota

Kenneth F. Johnson, assistant professor, Colorado State University, and research associate in the Social Science Foundation of the University of Denver

W. LANDIS JONES, Waynesburg College

JOYCE K. KALLGREN, lecturer, University of California at Davis

HENRY S. KARIEL, associate professor, University of Hawaii

BOYD R. KEENAN, professor and head of the department of political science, Purdue University; formerly associate director of the Committee on Institutional Cooperation and visiting professor at Purdue

Samuel Krislov, associate professor, University of Minnesota

ROGER A. KVAM, assistant professor, University of Akron

EVERETT C. LADD, Jr., assistant professor, University of Connecticut

JOSEPH LAPALOMBARA, professor, Yale University

Paul M. Leary, instructor, Rutgers—the State University

MICHAEL LOFCHIE, assistant professor, UCLA

STUART A. MACKOWN, instructor, Washington College, Chestertown, Maryland

RICHARD L. McAnaw, Western Michigan University

ROBERT McNeill, associate professor, Wayne State University

R. M. Mahood, assistant professor, Memphis State University

FRANK E. MEYERS, instructor, State University of New York at Stony Brook

DIANE Monson, assistant professor, Brigham Young University; formerly of Connecticut College for Women

CARL C. Moses, associate professor, Wake Forest College; formerly of Virginia Polytechnic Institute

DAN D. NIMMO, University of Houston; formerly of Texas Technological University

JOSEF PATYK, assistant professor, University of Dayton; formerly Consul-General of Poland

J. JOHN PENIKIS, instructor, University of Minnesota

MICHAEL D. REAGAN, professor, University of California at Riverside; formerly of the University of Syracuse

JON M. REINHARDT, instructor, Wake Forest College

David E. RePass, assistant professor, University of Minnesota

HAROLD V. RHODES, assistant professor, Wake Forest College

ALLAN RICHARDS, professor and director of the Bureau of Public Administration, Louisiana State University, effective February, 1965

WILLIAM L. RICHTER, instructor, University of Hawaii

CAREY G. RICKABAUGH, instructor, University of Maryland, effective January, 1965

ROBERT E. RIGGS, associate professor, University of Minnesota; formerly of Brigham Young University

EDWARD T. ROWE, instructor, University of Connecticut

LEONARD I. RUCHELMAN, assistant professor, Alfred University

Rudolph J. Rummel, assistant professor, Yale University

Mary Clarke Santopolo, associate professor, Eastern Kentucky State College

ASHLEY L. SCHIFF, associate professor, University of New York at Stony Brook; formerly at the School of Public Administration of the University of Southern California

CARL L. SCHWEINFURTH, assistant professor, Bethany College

RICHARD D. SEARS, instructor, Wake Forest College

Josef Silverstein, associate professor, Rutgers—the State University

ROBERT SMITH, Western Michigan University

WILLIAM STANDING, assistant professor, Wayne State University

MURRAY S. STEDMAN, professor and chairman of the department of government at Trinity College, Connecticut

BARBARA B. STEVENS, assistant professor, University of Connecticut

PHILLIPPA STRUM, instructor, Newark College of Arts and Sciences at Rutgers University

Kirk Thompson, assistant professor, Reed College

WOODWORTH G. THROMBLEY, associate professor, Institute of Public Administration, University of Indiana; for the last three years, principal advisor to the Indiana University-Thammasat Public Administration program in Bangkok

REXFORD G. TUGWELL, research professor, Southern Illinois University, effective March, 1965

Manfred Vernon, chairman of political science, Western Washington State College at Bellingham; formerly of the University of Alabama

LARRY L. WADE, assistant professor, Charlotte College, North Carolina

J. RICHARD WAGNER, instructor, University of Arizona

JOSEPH WILLARD, associate professor, University of Toledo

FRED W. WILLHOITE, assistant professor, Louisiana State University

CARWIN C. WILLIAMS, Brigham Young University

WILLIAM R. WILLOUGHBY, senior professor, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, N. B.; formerly of St. Lawrence University

CALVIN WOODWARD, lecturer, University of New Brunswick

Amos Yoder, lecturer, University of California at Davis

VIRGIL B. ZIMMERMAN, associate professor, Graduate School of Public Affairs, the State University of New York at Albany; formerly head of the Bologna program of the University of California

Temporary and Visiting Appointments, 1964-65

DAVID BANE, U. S. Foreign Service Officer: visiting lecturer, University of Iowa

EUGENIO BENEDETTI, University of Padua: visiting assistant professor, Ohio Wesleyan

CLARENCE A. BERDAHL, professor emeritus, University of Illinois: distinguished visiting professor, University of Delaware, spring semester, 1965

LOWELL W. CULVER, assistant professor, Pacific Lutheran University

HOWARD DEAN, Portland State College: visiting professor, University of Washington, autumn, 1964

RUPERT EMERSON, Harvard University: visiting professor, UCLA, spring semester, 1965

ROBERT H. FERRELL, University of Indiana: visiting professor, University of Connecticut

Gerald Friedberg, acting assistant professor, University of California at Davis

EMMETT GRAYBILL, instructor, Allegheny College

CLAUDE H. HEYER, visiting instructor, University of Idaho

JAMES HURLEY, instructor, Dennison University

RAGHAVAN IYER, lecturer, UCLA

Yung-Hwan Jo, assistant professor, Colorado State University

CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON, Washington State University: visiting professor, Montana State University, 1963-64 and winter and spring quarters, 1965

RALPH JOHNSON, lecturer, Allegheny College

A. D. H. KAPLAN, Brookings Institution: distinguished visiting professor, Graduate School of Political Affairs, State University of New York at Albany

Todd R. LaPorte, University of Southern California: visiting assistant professor, Stanford University

EDWARD G. LEWIS, University of Illinois: Chester W. Nimitz professor of social and political philosophy, Naval War College

DENNIS A. LIVINGSTON, acting assistant professor, University of California at Davis

James S. Nyman, University of California at Davis: visiting assistant professor, University of Arizona

KAN ORI, visiting professor, University of Minnesota

DAVID F. PAULSEN, JR., University of Washington: visiting assistant professor and research specialist, Institute of Government Research, University of Arizona

DE VERE PENTONY, San Francisco State College: visiting professor, University of Iowa

Walford H. Peterson, Bethel College (St. Paul): visiting professor, University of Minnesota

BHAGWATI P. K. PODDAR, assistant professor, Illinois State University

KARL M. SCHMIDT, Syracuse University: visiting professor, University of Hawaii

DAVID SCOTT, Southwest Missouri State College: visiting professor, Southern Illinois University

ALAN SELTZER, acting assistant professor, UCLA

ELI SILVERMAN, lecturer, Allegheny College

LEA H. WILLIAMS, Brown University: visiting lecturer, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University

DAVID WILSON, acting assistant professor, UCLA

JAVAN TABIBIAN, lecturer, UCLA

Louis F. Wechsler, acting assistant professor, University of California at Davis

BYONG-MAN YOON, assistant professor, Colorado State University

SEPHER ZABIH, assistant professor, Oberlin College

Paul E. Zinner, University of California at Davis: visiting professor, National War College

OTHER APPOINTMENTS

BRUCE ADKINSON, Hofstra University: assistant dean of faculty

TOTTEN J. ANDERSON, UCLA: chairman of the department of political science

CAROL E. BAUMANN, University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee: director of the Institute of World Affairs Education

RONALD CHILCOTE, University of California at Riverside: coordinator of the program on Latin American research

Manning J. Dauer, University of Florida: director of the Division of Social Sciences at the University of Florida

DONALD R. GERTH, Chico State College: dean of students

M. JUDD HARMON, Utah State University: chairman, department of political science

HERBERT KAUFMAN, Yale University: chairman, department of political science

Young W. Kihl. Juniata College, chairman, department of political science

Gerard J. Mangone, Syracuse University: associate dean for academic programs, Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University

NORMAN MELLER, University of Hawaii: chairman of the department of political science

GENE EDWARD RAINEY, American University: assistant dean of the Graduate School

James R. Roach, associate professor, University of Texas: coordinator of international and foreign area programs

Donald R. Shea, University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee: dean of international studies and programs

ROBERT STEPHENS, formerly Chief of Eastern and Southern African Office of African Programs, State Department: assistant director of East Asian Studies, Syracuse University

JAMES A. STORING, Colgate University: provost

ROBERT WILLIAMS. East Carolina College: associate dean of the College and dean of the School of Arts and Sciences

PROMOTIONS

To the rank of assistant professor:

Albert L. Gastman, Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut

MARSHALL N. GOLDSTEIN, University of Oregon

RAY C. HILLAM, Brigham Young University

JAMES E. NADONLY, Western Michigan University

KNUD RASMUSSEN, Colgate University

THOMAS M. SCOTT, University of Minnesota

To the rank of associate professor:

JAMES E. ANDERSON, Wake Forest College

CHARLES H. BACKSTROM, University of Minnesota

BEN G. BURNETT, Whittier College

ALFRED B. CLUBAK, University of Florida

ROLAND H. EBEL, Western Michigan University

AHMAD R. HAFFAR, State University of New York at New Paltz

CLARKE HAGENSICK, University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee

ROBERT KAUFMAN, Western Michigan University

SAMUEL C. PATTERSON, University of Iowa

Gerald M. Pomper, Rutgers—the State University

ROBERTA S. SIGEL, Wayne State University

H. Frank Way, University of California at Riverside

T. P. WRIGHT, Bates College

G. Ross Stephens, University of Connecticut

To the rank of professor:

GEORGE S. BLAIR, Claremont Graduate School

J. LEO CEFKIN, Colorado State University

LANE DAVIS, University of Iowa

STEPHEN T. EARLY, DePauw University

STANLEY H. FRIEDELBAUM, Rutgers—the State University

PHILIP O. Foss, Colorado State University

CHARLES D. FARRIS, University of Florida

MILTON GREENBERG, Western Michigan University

ROBERT HOLT, University of Minnesota

KAREL HULICKA, State University of New York at Buffalo

FRED KORT, University of Connecticut

Manoucher Vahdat, Northwestern State college

RETIREMENTS AND RESIGNATIONS

PHILIP W. Buck will reach emeritus standing at Stanford University in August of 1965, after thirty years in the department of political science.

MARSHALL KNAPPEN, H. Fletcher Brown professor of history and political science at the University of Delaware, retired on February 1, 1965.

CHARLES M. KNEIER, professor of political science at the University of Illinois since 1930, has retired.

MYRON R. RUBINOFF of the University of Toledo has resigned.

Walter Sharp, professor of political science at Yale University since 1951, retired in June, 1964.

LLOYD SHORT, professor of political science, University of Minnesota, will retire in June, 1965.

JOSEPH E. BLACK has resigned as chairman of the department of government at Miami University (Ohio) to become director of Humanities and Social Studies with the Rockefeller Foundation.

The Inter-University Consortium for Political Research will sponsor seminars in Quantitative Political Analysis, Community Political Analysis, and Methods of Historical Analysis at Ann Arbor, Michigan, this summer, with expenses of participants partially borne by grants of the National Science Foundation. Information may be obtained from the ICPR, P. O. Box 1248, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106.

IN MEMORIAM

EVERETT SOMERVILLE BROWN, Professor Emeritus of Political Science at The University of Michigan, died at Ann Arbor, Michigan, on December 19, 1964, at the age of 78. He is survived by his wife, May Morgan Brown.

He was born in Corralitos, California, a son of Peter C. and Katis S. Brown. He received his B.L. degree in 1907, his M.L. degree in 1908, and his Ph.D. in 1917, all from the University of California. He came to The University of Michigan in 1921 as assistant professor of political science, was promoted to be an associate professor in 1924, and professor in 1931. He served as Acting Chairman and Chairman of the Department from 1942 to 1947, and was given the title of Professor Emeritus at the time of his retirement in 1956.

During his long period of faithful service to the University, Brown published four substantial books, and some sixty articles in scholarly journals. His earlier writing was largely historical and included William Plumer's Memorandum of Proceedings in the United States Senate, 1803–1807 and The Missouri Compromises and Presidential Politics, 1820–1825. For fifteen years he regularly contributed articles to the American Yearbook on "The President and His Policies." His Manual of Government Publications: United States and Foreign, is still a basic reference in the field.

In his period of service he instructed more students, both graduate and undergraduate, than any other member of the department. His insistence on high standards of performance, his careful attention to thoroughness and detail, and his wise and sympathetic guidance of students have left several generations of Michigan men and women deeply in his debt. There is not a single administrative task in the department, however heavy or laborious, which he did not perform—from being lecturer in large introductory courses, to being graduate adviser and chairman of the department during the difficult war and immediate post-war years. Because of his robust health his record for class attendance may be equalled but never broken.

Before coming to Michigan, Brown served as assistant to Herbert Hoover when the former President was head of the American Relief Administration in 1918-20. His colleagues and students will long remember him as a true friend, and as a genial and kindly colleague.—James K. Pollock

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

DAVID B. TRUMAN Columbia University President-Elect

GABRIEL A. ALMOND Stanford University

Vice Presidents

SAMUEL H. BEER Harvard University Marian D. Irish Florida State University James L. McCamy University of Wisconsin

Secretary

MALCOLM E. JEWELL University of Kentucky Treasurer

MAX M. KAMPELMAN Washington, D.C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK 1726 Massachusetts Ave., N.W. Washington, D.C., 20036 Assistant Director

Don Tacheron

Managing Editor, APSR
HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officiis

BYRUM CARTER
Indiana University
FREDERIC CLEAVELAND
University of North Carolina
KARL W. DEUTSCH
Yale University
LEON EPSTEIN
University of Wisconsin
LAWRENCE HERSON
Ohio State University
ROBERT McCLOSKEY
HARVARD NEUSTADT
Columbia University

LUCIAN PYE

James S. Coleman
University of California, Los Angeles
David Easton
University of Chicago
Charles D. Farris
University of Florida
Ernst B. Haas
University of California, Berkeley
Warren E. Miller
University of Michigan
Joseph Tanenhaus
New York University
John C. Wahlke
State University of New York, Buffalo

MARVER H. BERNSTEIN

Princeton University

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW ALBERT SHAW FREDERIC N. JUDSON JAMES BRYCE A. LAWRENCE LOWELL WOODROW WILSON SIMEON E. BALDWIN ALBERT BUSHNELL HART W. W. WILLOUGHBY JOHN BASSETT MOORE ERNST FREUND JESSE MACY MUNROE SMITH HENRY JONES FORD PAUL S. REINSCH LEO S. ROWE WILLIAM A. DUNNING HARRY A. GARFIELD JAMES W. GARNER

CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD WILLIAM B. MUNRO JESSE S. REEVES JOHN A. FAIRLIE BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH EDWARD S. CORWIN WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY ISIDOR LOEB WALTER J. SHEPARD FRANCIS W. COKER ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE THOMAS REED POWELL CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA CHARLES GROVE HAINES ROBERT C. BROOKS FREDERIC A. OGG WILLIAM ANDERSON ROBERT E. CUSHMAN LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS WALTER F. DODD ARTHUR W. MACMAHON HENRY R. SPENCER QUINCY WRIGHT JAMES K. POLLOCK PETER H. ODEGARD LUTHER H. GULICK PENDLETON HERRING RALPH J. BUNCHE CHARLES McKINLEY HAROLD D. LASSWELL E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER V. O. KEY, JR. R. TAYLOR COLE CARL B. SWISHER EMMETTE S. REDFORD CHARLES S. HYNEMAN CARL J. FRIEDRICH C. HERMAN PRITCHETT

GRANTS FOR ASIAN POLITICAL SCIENTISTS

The American Political Science Association again has received from The Asia Foundation a grant for encouraging closer relations between Asian and American political scientists. The funds will be used in three ways:

- 1) To enable Asian political scientists to become members of The American Political Science Association for a one-year period at greatly reduced rates. Membership includes subscription to The American Political Science Review. To be eligible, applicants must reside in one of the Asian countries listed below.
- 2) To enable libraries, university departments, and research institutes in Asia, who have heretofore been unable to do so, to subscribe to The American Political Science Review at greatly reduced rates.
- 3) To supplement travel expenses of Asian political scientists who are in the United States and who wish to attend meetings of The American Political Science Association. The next meeting will be held September 8-11, in the Sheraton-Park Hotel, Washington, D.C.

(Applicants must be at least at the graduate student level and may come from any of the following Asian countries: Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Japan, Korea, Laos, Malaysia, Nepal, Pakistan, the Philippines, the Ruyukyus, the Republic of China (Taiwan), Thailand, and Vietnam. Applicants who have not previously received grants will be given first consideration. Application forms may be obtained from The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20036.)

Notice

Resolutions at Annual Business Meeting

In accordance with ARTICLE VIII of the Constitution, this is to call attention of members of the Association to the provision of the APSA constitution that:

"All resolutions shall be referred to the Council for its recommendations before submission to the vote of the Association at its Annual Business Meeting."

The Council of the Association will meet all day September 7, 1965, in the Wilmington Room, Sheraton-Park Hotel, Washington, D.C.

1964 ANNUAL MEETING PANEL PAPERS AVAILABALE

A limited number of the following mimeographed panel papers presented at the 1964 annual meeting in Chicago are still available for 75¢ each. Checks should be made payable to The American Political Science Association and orders should be sent to the Association office at 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036.

ALKER, Hayward

BANKS, Arthur BARBER, James D.

BISCO, Ralph L.

BLACKWOOD, George D.

BOOTH, David Alan

BURKE, Fred G.

CAHILL, Robert and

FRIEDMAN, Harry

CHASE, Francis S.

CHASE, Harold W.

CUMMINGS, Milton

DEAN, Alan L.

DIAMOND, Martin FAGEN, Richard R.

FOLTZ, William J. GALANTER, Marc

GARVEY, Gerald

GILBERT, Charles GLICKMAN, Harvey GOODNOW, Henry F.

GRASSMUCK, George HAMMOND, Paul

HARSANYI, John C.

HERMANN, Charles F.

HOLT, Robert T.

"Long Road to Mathematical Theories of International Politics: Problems of Statistical Nonadditivity"

"A Cross-Polity Survey: Preliminary Analysis"

"Dimensions and Determinants of Influence: Analysis of Data from Twelve Local Government Committees"

"Information Services for Political Science: Progress and Prospects"

"Civil Rights and Direct Action in the Urban North"

"Leadership and Ideology in the Danish Party System"

"Local Governance and Nation Building in East Africa"

"A Strategy for the Comparative Study of Local Government"

"Teacher Education for Effective Teaching of the Bill of Rights"

"Federal Judges: The Appointing Process"

"Southern Congressional Elections"

"The Federal Aviation Agency Field Organization Configuration Study"

"On the Relationship of Federalism and Decentralization"

"International Politics and the Making of Citizens: The Case of Cuba"

"Social Structure and Political Behavior of Senegalese Elites"

"Hindu Law and the Development of the Modern Indian Legal System"

"Methodological Problems in Democratic Consensus Theory: The Theory of Party Equilibrium"

"Administrative Responsibility in Public Welfare"

"Traditional Pluralism and Democratic Processes in Tanganyika"

"The Influence of British Administrative Process and Practices on Public Administration in Pakistan"

"Emerging Republicanism in the South"

"Dilemmas of Control and Strategy in a Pluralistic Democracy: A Discussion of the Administrative Politics of National Security Policy-Making in a Democratic Political System"

"A Bargaining Model for Social Status in Informal Groups and Formal Organizations"

"A Validity Problem: Crises in Simulated Foreign Policy Organization"

"Contrasting Approaches to the Study of Comparative Politics"

HUDSON, Michael HUITT, Ralph JUVILER, Peter

KENDRICK, Marvin KOVENOCK, David

LAPALOMBARA, Joseph LANDAU, Martin LEISERSON, Avery LEVINE, Donald LIEBESNY, Herbert LINDBERG, Leon N. LIPSITZ, Lewis McMURRAY, Carl

McPHERSON, William MILBRATH, Lester and JANDA, Kenneth NAJJAR, Fauzi M. NEAL, Fred Warner PIERCE, Roy PLOSS, Sidney PRICE, H. Douglas

*PRITCHETT, C. Herman RASMUSSEN, Jorgen S.

REGENSTREIF, Peter SHERWOOD, Frank

SPAETH, Harold SPIRO, Herbert STOKES, Donald TARR, David TOTTEN, George

WASBY, Stephen
WATSON, Richard,
DOWNING, Rondal and SPIEGEL, Frederick
WEIKER, Walter F.

* presidential address

"Pluralism, Power, and Democracy in Lebanon"

"Congressional Reorganization: The Next Chapter"

"Family Reforms on the Road to Communism: A Case Study of Policy Formation in the USSR"

"The Reform of the British Civil Service"

"Communications and Influence in Congressional Decision-Making"

"Decline of Ideology: Myth, Reality or Selective Perception?"

"Political Theory and Due Process of Inquiry"

"Scientists and the Policy Process"

"Legitimacy in Ethiopia"

"Legal Processes: Stability and Change: Islamic Law"

"Decision-Making and Integration in the European Community"

"Work Life and Political Alienation"

"Some Problems in the Application of Factor Analytic Techniques to Roll Call Votes, Judicial Decisions, and Survey Responses"

"Lobbying and Communication Processes"

"Computer Applications to Abstraction, Storage, and Recovery of Propositions from Political Science Literature"

"Caliphate-Sultanate"

"The Republics in Yugoslavia"

"Ideological Politics: French Theory and Practice"

"Political Conflict and the Soviet Press"

"Southern Politics in the Sixties: Notes on Economic Development and Political Modernization."

"Equal Protection and the Urban Majority"

"Leadership and Ideology in a Parliamentary Third Party: The British Liberals"

"Ideology and Leadership in the Canadian Party System"

"Industrialization and Urbanization in Brazil: Local Government Implications"

"Unidimensionality and Item Invariance in Judicial Scaling"

"Contrasting Approaches to Comparative Politics"

"Ideological Competition of British Parties"

"American Military Presence Abroad"

"Factionalism: The Problem of Leadership and Ideology among the Japanese Socialists"

"The Supreme Court, Obscenity, and Oregon Policy"

"Lawyers and Judicial Selection under the Missouri Plan"

"The Ottoman Bureacracy: Modernization and Reform"

Announcement

CONFERENCE ON MATHEMATICAL APPLICATIONS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

at

Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Texas

July 18—August 7, 1965

The conference is conceived as a forum for high level discussion of the future of mathematics in political study. Original papers and lectures will examine representative techniques: game theory, factor analysis, scaling, variance and covariance measurements, correlation and regression, systems models, decision-theoretic models.

Staff: Instructor-consultants: William H. Riker, Political Science, U. of Rochester; Paul D. Minton, Statistics, S.M.U.

Visiting Lecturers, Political Science faculties: Hayward R. Alker, Jr. and Richard L. Merritt, Yale U.; Gerald H. Kramer, U. of Rochester. Other faculties: Otto A. Davis, Economics, Carnegie Inst. of Tech.; Carl F. Kossack, Computer Sciences, Grad. Res. Center of SW; Winton H. Manning, Psychology, T.C.U.; Frank S. Scalora, Mathematics, IBM.

Thirty conference grants ($300 and a travel allowance each) are available to teachers of Political Science.

How to Apply: Participants are limited to Ph.D's (or M.A.'s with special credentials). There are no age limits. Participants will be chosen and stipends awarded without regard to race, color, or creed and solely on an evaluation of evidence as to past competence and future potential.

Application requests, or inquiries, should be sent to:

Joseph L. Bernd, Conference Director Box 1099, Southern Methodist University Dallas, Texas 75222

The deadline for applications is April 10, 1965. Recipients of awards will be notified on or about May 1, 1965.

SPONSORED BY THE NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

GUMULATIYE INDEX

to the AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Vols. 1-57: 1906-1963

Individual subscribers, political science departments, and libraries wishing to pinpoint information in their volumes of the American Political Science Review will find this Index indispensable. This is the first cumulative index of the Review in almost forty years, and it covers Vols. 1–57: 1906–1963. After completing a pilot study on the uses of KWIC indexing, Kenneth Janda of Northwestern University supervised this project which has produced a cumulative index and at the same time has increased our knowledge of the potential uses of KWIC indexing in political science.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY PRESS · Evanston, Illinois

THE AUSTRALIAN NATIONAL UNIVERSITY

Research Scholarships in Political Science including Public Administration.

Applications are invited for scholarships in Political Sciences, including Public Administration.

Applicants should be postgraduate students with capacity for research. Scholars will normally enrol for a Ph.D. degree, the course for which extends over three years. A scholar-ship is awarded initially for two years but will normally be extended for the whole period of the approved course.

The basic scholarship allowance is £A1,065 per annum. Married scholars with dependent children receive additional allowances. Fares to and from Canberra are paid.

Application forms and further particulars are available from the University. Applications should reach the University by 30th April or 31st October in any year, although special consideration may be given to applications at other times. Scholarships may be taken up at any time after award, subject to agreement of the Head of Department concerned.

D. K. R. HODGKIN

Registrar
Institute of Advanced Studies.

Box 4 P.O., CANBERRA, A.C.T.

PART-TIME WORK AVAILABLE

PH.D. PREFERRED, M.A. CONSIDERED, as a field interviewer for a market research organization specializing in interviewing "highly educated audiences."

In the course of an average year, Mendota interviewers see about one of ten of the nation's physicians and a large proportion of its lawyers, engineers, editors, administrators, business executives and school principals.

HIGH INTERVIEW RATE PLUS BONUS FOR COMPLETE ASSIGNMENTS. MERIT RAISES WITH EXPERIENCE. WORK ASSIGNMENTS ADJUSTABLE TO AVAILABLE TIME. ANY LOCATION IN THE UNITED STATES, WITH PREFERENCE GIVEN TO LARGER METROPOLITAN AREAS.

If you are interested and meet these qualifications, please write for application forms. Address inquiries to:

MENDOTA RESEARCH GROUP

31 Sylvan Avenue ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, NEW JERSEY

NEW! Quick-Reference Guide to the controversial 1963-64 Term

DECISIONS OF THE U.S. SUPREME COURT,

1963-64 TERM, will give you a quick grasp of the Court's activities—a fascinating survey of everything the Court did during the Term. Includes summaries of each decision. Describes the manner in which the case came before the Court, facts involved and issues presented, the holding of the Court and the reasons supporting that holding. Names of the Justice who wrote majority opinion plus those who concurred and dissented are included, together with pictures and biographical sketches of each Justice serving during the Term. Additional features: a layman's-oriented glossary, table of cases by popular name, and a detailed alphabetical index. Planned for annual publication.

Order direct from

Aqueduct IIII

Division of The Lawyers Co-operative Publishing Co. Books

3 BANK PLACE, ROCHESTER, N. Y. 14603

Just Published

Source Materials on the Government and Politics of Germany

James K. Pollock, The University of Michigan John C. Lane, State University of New York at Buffalo is designed as a source book for courses and seminars on contemporary Germany and as a reference work for all who are interested in present-day German affairs;

SOURCE MATERIALS ON THE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF GERMANY

SOURCE MATERIALS ON THE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF GERMANY

comprises a comprehensive and up-to-date collection of primary sources, intended to supplement and complement the growing volume of writings on German politics;

SOURCE MATERIALS ON THE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF GERMANY

assembles significant and diverse materials, many of which are not easily accessible and most of which have not been previously translated into English; as, for example, the standing orders of a parliamentary Fraktion, the Bundestag Defense Commissioner Act, or the use of a "constructive vote on non-confidence;"

SOURCE MATERIALS ON THE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF GERMANY

presents a balanced collection of a variety of source materials, including statutes and ordinances; standing orders, programs and reports of political parties and interest groups; important decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court; and charts and tables on matters ranging from election results and social insurance statistics to the organization of a Federal ministry and public opinion polls;

SOURCE MATERIALS ON THE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF GERMANY

includes materials on a wide range of German politics and government: the establishment of the Federal Republic; the Federal legislature, executive, administration, judiciary and armed forces; the operation of the federal system; political parties; interest groups and public opinion; major policies of the Federal Republic in foreign relations, social and economic affairs and civil rights; the government of Berlin; and the government and policies of the East German regime.

404 Pages including charts and tables. Price $8.00	plus 20¢ postage	Total $8.20
THE GEORGE WAHR PUBLISHING COMPAI 316 South State Street Ann Arbor, Michigan	NY	ORDER FORM
Enclosed find $ for cop	oies of Source Materials on the	Government and Politics of Germany
Name	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •

THE DORSEY SERIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Dr. Norton E. Long of Brandeis University and the Joint Center for Urban Studies of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Harvard University, Consulting Editor.

IDEAS AND POLITICS, The American Experience

By David W. Minar, Associate Professor of Political Science, Northwestern University
435 pages $7.50

THE ELEMENTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW: A Casebook

By Gerard J. Mangone, Professor of Political Science and Executive Assistant to the Dean, The Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University
411 pages $6.50

INTERNATIONAL LAW: A Text

By H. B. Jacobini, Associate Professor of Government, Southern Illinois University 337 pages $6.95

CONGRESS AND FOREIGN POLICY-MAKING

By James A. Robinson, Associate Professor of Political Science, *The Ohio State University*272 pages $5.50

COMPARATIVE POLITICS: Notes and Readings, Revised Edition

Edited by Roy C. Macridis, Chairman, Department of Political Science, and Bernard E. Brown, Associate Professor of Political Science, both of the State University of New York at Buffalo
705 pages $6.75

THE DE GAULLE REPUBLIC: Quest for Unity

By Roy C. Macridis and Bernard E. Brown 409 pages plus 149 page supplement

$6.75

MAJOR EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS

By Alex N. Dragnich, Professor of Political Science, Vanderbilt University 465 pages $7.50

PATTERNS OF SOVIET POLITICS

By Richard C. Gripp, Associate Professor of Political Science, San Diego State College
376 pages $7.00

Write today for 90-day examination copies

1818 RIDGE ROAD

HOMEWOOD, ILLINOIS

We dug and refilled a 4000-mile trench to protect 9300 communications circuits against disaster

We split the continent with a trench four feet deep to give the United States its first blast-resistant coast-to-coast underground communications cable system.

More than four years ago when the first of 2500 giant reels of coaxial cable started unrolling in New York State, we began an important project that will give added protection to the nation's vital communications.

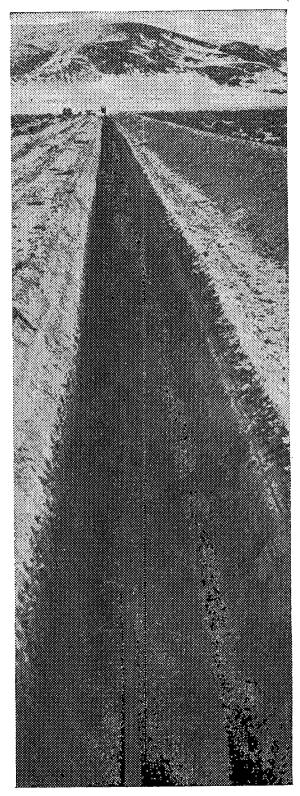

Today, 9300 circuits—available for voice, data, teletypewriter, telephoto—are included on this route. It stretches across 19 states and has 950 buried reinforced concrete repeater (or amplifying) stations.

Spotted strategically along the route about 50 feet below ground level are 11 manned test centers. Also of reinforced concrete, they have automatic air filtration and ventilation and living quarters stocked with emergency food and water.

This vital transcontinental link will serve the needs of government agencies, businesses and individuals.

This is a job that needed the Bell System's unified research, manufacturing and operating capabilities. It is another implementation of a basic Bell System policy: "In communications, the defense of the nation comes first."

From Harcourt, Brace & World

THE CHIEF EXECUTIVE

by LOUIS W. KOENIG, New York University

This incisive and comprehensive study offers the first full-scale treatment of the office of the Presidency. It examines the work of the Presidency in all its complexity, considering in detail the varied legal, political, and administrative aspects of the office. In particular, the author analyzes the continual tension between the loosely defined powers ascribed to the President and the real instruments of power that are available to him during his term of office.

"The most comprehensive treatment we have of the Presidency, rich in historical materials and acute in understanding of the nuances of the office."—James MacGregor Burns, Williams College. "A major contribution to our knowledge of the American Presidency."—Arnold A. Rogow, Stanford University, in Book Week. Text Edition: 435 pages, $6.95. Just published

MAJOR FOREIGN POWERS: Fourth Edition

by GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, Northwestern University, and JOHN H. HERZ, The City College of New York

A complete revision of the leading text in comparative government, the Fourth Edition offers a comprehensive survey of the political heritage and social background, the party systems, the foreign policies, and the legislative, executive, and judicial structures of Great Britain, the Soviet Union, Germany, and France. With new maps and charts, and extensive, up-to-date bibliographies. ". . . this classic is still the best."—James M. Clark, University of Maine. 692 pages, $8.95 Now available: two complete sections from Major Foreign Powers, reprinted with all the maps, charts, and illustrations in separate paperbound editions:

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

by Gwendolen M. Carter. 209 pages, $1.95

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE SOVIET UNION

by Gwendolen M. Carter. With a new 54-page section of seven principal Soviet constitutional documents. 181 pages, $1.95

POLITICAL PATTERNS IN TODAY'S WORLD

by D. W. BROGAN, Cambridge University, and DOUGLAS V. VERNEY, York University

This distinguished text-supplement offers a fresh and thoroughly objective appraisal of the political processes of democracy and totalitarianism as they operate in five selected countries: the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Sweden, and the USSR. "... an outstanding book which should be of use in a variety of political and social science courses."—Herbert J. Doherty, University of Florida. Paperbound. 274 pages, $2.95

Books for Political Science Courses

POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES National, State, and Local Edition

by EMMETTE S. REDFORD, University of Texas, DAVID B. TRUMAN, Columbia University, ANDREW HACKER, Cornell University, ALAN F. WESTIN, Columbia University, and ROBERT C. WOOD, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

This major new text for the American government course, written by five distinguished scholars, presents a comprehensive survey of the workings of American democracy. The first part introduces the student to the government as it functions today and gives him some of the historical background he needs for a full understanding of these functions. Each of the following five parts treats a major area of government and politics.

Part Two is a lively and colorful treatment of the political process: political parties, public opinion and interest groups, voting behavior, nominations, and elections. Part Three deals with the elected officials of the national government, the President and the members of Congress, as well as with the executive branch, the regulatory agencies, and the bureaucracy. Penetrating analyses of the legislative and executive branches highlight this section.

Part Four treats of law and its enforcement, covering such vital issues as civil liberties, civil rights, and judicial review. These subjects are approached dynamically, not merely as lists of facts, organizations, and figures. Part Five considers the economics of government, regulation of business, fiscal policy, welfare, conservation, foreign policy, and national defense. The last two topics are given special attention, with emphasis on the process of decision-making as well as on the mechanisms and organization of policy. Part Six brings original research and fresh insight to the subject of state and local government.

Illustrated. 1016 pages, $8.95 (probable). Publication: March. This book will also appear in a National Edition. 888 pages, $7.95 (probable). Publication: August

POLITICS IN EUROPE: 5 Cases in European Government

Edited by GWENDOLEN M. CARTER, Northwestern University, and ALAN F. WESTIN, Columbia University

Five vividly reconstructed case studies explore the implications of contemporary European political systems in their theoretical and practical contexts. Each case tells a unique story that brings in a wide range of information about the workings of a particular system; contrasts the case event with the norm of events in that particular area; and analyzes pressures, policies, and power in Great Britain, Germany, the Common Market, and the USSR. Paperbound. 224 pages, $2.95 (probable). Publication: March

Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc.

New York / Chicago / Burlingame

The Lawmakers

RECRUITMENT AND ADAPTATION TO LEGISLATIVE LIFE

by James David Barber

Why does a person decide to become a politician? How do his image of himself and the political environment affect his performance in office? Drawing on political science, sociology, and psychology, as well as intensive interviews with first-term Connecticut legislators, Mr. Barber illustrates the interplay of motives, resources, and opportunities that produces four distinct types—Spectators, Advertisers, Reluctants, and Lawmakers.

An African Bourgeoisie

RACE, CLASS, AND POLITICS IN SOUTH AFRICA

by Leo Kuper

Mr. Kuper analyzes the deep imbalance between the high occupational status and the low civic status of African professionals and merchants that drives them toward violence. He concludes that racial war is by no means inevitable, and that there are appreciable forces within South African society that would contribute to a peaceful solution.

cloth $12.50; paper $2.95

Boswell's Political Career

by Frank Brady

Here is the tragicomic story of the literary Boswell's unsuccessful efforts to establish the political Boswell. With schemes, flattery, and insults of a particularly Boswellian twist, he pursues what he considers to be the main goal in his life—a seat in the House of Commons. $5.00

From French West Africa to the Mali Federation

by William J. Foltz

Why was the Mali Federation formed? What predispositions toward federation existed? What interests were served? Why did it break up? In seeking answers to these questions, Mr. Foltz also analyzes present and probable future trends in African unity movements. $6.50

Between Two Empires

THE ORDEAL OF THE PHILIPPINES, 1929-1946

by Theodore Friend

The first study in depth of the Philippines' relationship with the United States and with Japan during the most crucial period of Philippine history. The fight for independence led by Quezon, Osmeña, and Roxas is delineated in fascinating detail. $7.50

Yale University Press New Naven and London

CANADIAN ORDERS: McGILL UNIVERSITY PRESS

ACHIEVER

If you called this General Motors development engineer "moon-struck," he'd probably agree with you. For he's a member of the team whose objective is to put a man on the moon by 1970.

Together with several hundred other engineers, scientists and technicians, he is contributing to the development, fabrication, assembly, integration and testing of the guidance and navigation system for the Apollo spacecraft. His mind is literally on the moon—and how to get three men there and back safely.

Educationally, he is highly qualified, but fast-changing technology requires his constant study. If he does not have two degrees already, chances are that he is working on a second right now under GM's tuition refund plan.

Throughout General Motors there are hundreds of professionals like him working on projects relating to our nation's space and defense programs. Like their counterparts who are developing commercial products, they are dedicated General Motors people.

GENERAL MOTORS IS PEOPLE ...

Making Better Things For You

Looking for Your Best Buy in Life Insurance?

Ticici announces . . .

New LOWER Life Insurance Rates

Plus "QUANTITY SAVINGS" DIVIDENDS, which reflect the economies of issuing larger policies.

For example,

A $50,000 POLICY COSTS ONLY $98

at age 30. Here's how:

$50,000 20-Year Home Protection Policy
Age at Issue	25	30	35	40
Annual Premium (Including Disability Waiver)	$134.00	$159.00	$206.50	$290.00
Cash Dividend End of First Year*	55.50	61.00	70.50	88.00
First Year Net Premium *These dividends are based upon the 1965 dividend	$ 78.50 I scale and	$ 98.00 are, of course	$136.00 , not guaran	$202.00 teed.

This is a plan of level premium Term insurance which provides its largest amount of protectic initially, reducing by schedule each year over a 20-year period to recognize decreasing insurance needs. Premiums are payable for only 16 years. There are several other insurance periods meet any need that requires a great deal of life insurance coverage at very low cost. Home Pretection policies are available at all ages under 56.

ARE YOU ELIGIBLE FOR TIAA? Yes, if you are employed by a college, university, private school, or othe nonprofit educational or scientific institution that qualifies for TIAA eligibility.

Send the coupon for the new Life Insurance Guide and a personal illustration of TIAA policies for your age. TIAA is nonprofit and employs no agents.

TEACHERS INSURANCE AND ANNUITY ASSO 730 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017	OCIATION G
Please send the new Life Insurance G	vide and personal illustrations.
Name	Date of Birth
Address
Dependents' Ages	PARAMETER STATE OF THE STATE OF Nonprofit Employer
	ity, or other educational or scientific institution

= Reprints =

OF SIGNIFICANT JOURNALS & REFERENCE WORKS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

AVAILABLE NOW

INTERNATIONAL SOCIAL SCIENCE		•
JOURNAL. (UNESCO).*
Vols. 1-12 (1949-1960).	cloth	$225.00
UNITED NATIONS DOCUMENTS INDEX.	-1-4-	#225 AA
Vols. 1-13 (1950-1962).	cloth	$325.00
PAPERS RELATING TO THE FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES. (U. S. Dept. of State)
1861-1870 bound in 20 vols.	cloth	$396.00
PUBLIC AFFAIRS INFORMATION SERVICE. BULLETIN. (PAIS).
Vols. 1-42 (1915-1956).	cloth	$1070.00
BIBLIOGRAPHIE
DER SOZIALWISSENSCHAFTEN.
(Bibliography of Social Science). Vols. 1-39 (1905-1943).	cloth	$1000.00
ACADEMY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE,		a ·
N. Y. PROCEEDINGS.
Vols. 1-25 (1910-1954).	cloth	$283.50
POLITICAL SCIENCE QUARTERLY.
Vols. 1-10 (1886-1895).	cloth	$248.50
Vols. 11-20 (1896-1905). Available Fall, 1965	cloth	$248.5 0
PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION REVIEW.	cloth	#200 00
Vols. 1-20 & Gen. Ind. 1-12. (1940-1960).	Ciotn	$390.00
REVIEW OF POLITICS. Vols. 1-20 (1939-1958).	cloth	$369.00
SOCIAL RESEARCH.	Cloth	Ψ507.00
(An International Quarterly of Political and Social Science).
Vols. 1-27 (1934-1960).	cloth	$450.00
INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL
(Quarterly of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs). Vols. 1-12 (1946-1957).	cloth	$189.00
·		a

* Available May 1965

These reprints available singly and also paperbound. Please request detailed catalogue listing other reprints in Political and Social Science. When ordering refer to Dept. PS-1.

KRAUS REPRINT

16 East 46th Street, New York 10017

Just published

THE CONTEMPORARY MIDDLE EAST

Tradition and Innovation

Edited by BENJAMIN RIVLIN, Brooklyn College and JOSEPH S. SZYLIOWICZ, American Research Institute in Turkey

This important new anthology contains more than fifty articles dealing with the process of political, social, and economic transition in the Middle East today. The editors have contributed an extensive introduction, comprehensive reading lists, and a useful glossary.

1965; 608 pages; $7.95

THE MIGHT OF NATIONS

World Politics in Our Time Second Edition, Revised by JOHN G. STOESSINGER, Hunter College Foreword by Arthur N. Holcombe

Awarded the 1963 Bancroft Prize in International Relations, THE MIGHT OF NATIONS is a systematic analysis of contemporary world politics. The new edition brings the text up to date, taking account of such developments as the Sino-Soviet split, the liquidation of African colonies, recent disarmament negotiations, the nuclear test ban treaty, trends in regional organization, and the UN financial crisis.

March 1965: 480 pages: $6.75

A paperbound reissue

COVERNMENT BY CONSTITUTION

The Political Systems of Democracy

The United States of America · Canada · Great Britain France · Germany · Italy · Switzerland · Sweden by HERBERT J. SPIRO, Amherst College

512 pages; $2.95 paperbound

In preparation

CRISIS AND CONTINUITY IN WORLD POLITICS

Edited by GEORGE A. LANYI and WILSON C. McWILLIAMS, both of Oberlin College

An important new anthology of extraordinary range and scope, offering significant readings on the abiding great issues of international relations by writers from More and Machiavelli to the foremost contemporary scholars and commentators.

Fall 1965; about 512 pages; about $4.95

For further information, write to:

RANDOM HOUSE

The College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 10022

In preparation

AMERICA'S FOREIGN POLICY

Revised Edition

Edited, with Introductions and Notes, by HAROLD KARAN JACOBSON, The University of Michigan

While reflecting changes on the international scene since 1960, in particular the consequences of the United States-Soviet détente, this revision retains the general organization and aims of the original edition.

Spring 1965; 768 pages; $3.95 paperbound

A SURVEY OF MARXISM

by A. JAMES GREGOR, University of Kentucky

A survey of Marxist thought from the time of Karl Marx to the present. The author presents the various components of Marxism as both a philosophy and a theory of history, with an analysis of attending problems.

September 1965; about 350 pages; about $3.50 paperbound

RANDOM HOUSE STUDIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

A SUPREME COURT JUSTICE IS APPOINTED

by DAVID J. DANELSKI, Yale University PS46 $2.95

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS IN AFRICA SOUTH OF THE SAHARA Third Edition, Revised

by THOMAS R. ADAM, New York University PS28 $1.95

In preparation

WIRETAPPING ON TRIAL A Case Study in the Judicial Process by WALTER F. MURPHY, Princeton University The judicial history of Olmstead vs. United States, a landmark case in the history of decisions on both federal-state relations and wiretapping. Summer 1965; PS50; $1.95

BIG CITY POLITICS A Comparative Guide to the Political Systems of Nine American Cities by EDWARD C. BANFIELD, Harvard University A guide to the political systems of nine large American cities by a foremost student of urban government. Summer 1965; PS48; $1.95

THE REAPPORTIONMENT REVOLUTION Representation, Political Power, and the Supreme Court by GORDON E. BAKER, University of California at Santa Barbara A review of the history of legislative apportionment in America and a survey of the whole range of issues involved in the current controversy, with excerpts from key court decisions. Summer 1965; PS20; $1.95

MARXISM AND COMMUNISM Essential Readings by ROBERT V. DANIELS, University of Vermont Summer 1965; PS49

For further information, write to:

RANDOM HOUSE The College Department 501 Madison Avenue New York 10022

VINTAGE BOOKS

THE ESSENTIAL LIPPMANN

Edited by Clinton Rossiter and James Lare V267 $2.45

THE FOURTH BRANCH OF GOVERNMENT

By DOUGLASS CATER V272 $1.45

VOLTAIRE'S POLITICS The Poet as a Realist

by PETER GAY V277 $1.95

THE PROPHET ARMED

Trotsky: 1879-1921 V746 $2.45

THE PROPHET UNARMED

Trotsky: 1921-1929 V747 $2.45

THE PROPHET OUTCAST

Trotsky: 1929-1940 V748 $2.45

all by ISAAC DEUTSCHER

CHALLENGE TO AFFLUENCE

by GUNNAR MYRDAL V274 $1.45

NINE MEN

A Political History of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1790 to 1955 by FRED RODELL, Yale University Law School V523 $1.95

EUROPEAN ALLIANCES AND ALIGNMENTS 1871-1890

by WILLIAM L. LANGER, Harvard University V522 $2.95

THE ORGANIZATIONAL SOCIETY

by ROBERT PRESTHUS, Cornell University. A full-scale analysis of large organizations and their effect on individual behavior. V528 $1.95

PROGRESS AND POWER

by CARL BECKER

The author surveys the four major stages in man's development and sets forth his thesis on the interrelation of power and progress in the sweep of human history. V529 $1.45

For further information, write to:

RANDOM HOUSE The College Department 501 Madison Avenue New York 10022

POLITICS AMONG NATIONS

The Struggle for Power and Peace

by HANS J. MORGENTHAU, The University of Chicago

... a superb book, indispensable to students of the field.

-Henry J. Abraham, University of Pennsylvania

Third Edition; 660 pages; 5 maps; $7.50

Just published

BRITISH POLITICS IN THE COLLECTIVIST AGE by SAMUEL H. BEER, Harvard University

This assessment-in-depth of contemporary British political life focuses on the role of parties and interest groups in the formation of public policy. The author discusses present-day British politics—Labour and Conservative—in terms of the historical evolution of political behavior in Britain since the sixteenth century.

April 1965; 384 pages; $5.95

In preparation

READINGS IN SOVIET POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT

Edited, with introductory notes, by RANDOLPH L. BRAHAM, The City College

A comprehensive collection of readings on Soviet government and politics featuring articles from both leading Western scholars and commentators, and Soviet writers.

Summer 1965; about 500 pages; about $3.95 paperbound

THE STAGES OF POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT by A. F. K. ORGANSKI, Brooklyn College

A study of comparative government which follows the modern nation from birth to death, showing how and why political institutions change from age to age, and concentrating in particular on the contribution of politics to economic development.

Summer 1965; about 250 pages; about $3.95

For further information, write to:

ALFRED A. KNOPF. Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 10022

PAPERBACKS IN CONTEMPORARY GOVERNMENT

This paperback series offers concise, accurate analyses of various governments, written for the undergraduate courses in comparative government, advanced study of a particular country, or programs in area studies. Each volume in the series is the work of an author who knows his country well, both by research and residence, and is unusually well qualified to discuss the constitution and legal foundations as well as the operation of the government in question.

THE GOVERNMENT OF REPUBLICAN ITALY John Clarke Adams and Paolo Barile

	John Clarke Adams and Labo Darne
245 pages	1962 Impression	$1.95
BR	TTISH PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY—Second Edition Sydney D. Bailey	on
281 pages	1962	$2.25
	THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF SWITZERLAND George A. Codding, Jr.
174 pages	1961	$1.95
	GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS IN ISRAEL Oscar Kraines
246 pages	1961	$1.95
	CONTEMPORARY GOVERNMENT OF JAPAN Theodore McNelly
228 pages	1963	$1.95
	THE INDIAN POLITICAL SYSTEM Norman D. Palmer
277 pages	1961	$1.95
	CONTEMPORARY GOVERNMENT OF GERMANY Elmer Plischke
248 pages	1964 Impression	$1.95
	SOUTH VIETNAM—Nation Under Stress Robert Scigliano
227 pages	1963	$1.95
	NORWEGIAN DEMOCRACY James A. Storing
246 pages	1963	$1.95

Cases in Comparative Politics

JAMES B. CHRISTOPH, Ohio State University

This comparative politics casebook seeks to concretely illustrate the workings and main elements of political power in Great Britain, France, West Germany, the U.S.S.R., and India, and to show the interaction of traditional, institutional, and personal power in politics. By focusing on similar problems and institutions in these various major countries (such as leadership and succession, social and economic policy-making, and other topics) the cases give the student the opportunity to use comparative methods. The several contributors are all experts in the field: Gerard Braunthal, University of Washington; Bernard E. Brown, State University of New York, Buffalo; Gene D. Overstreet, Institute for Sino-Soviet Studies, George Washington University; John E. Turner, University of Minnesota; and James B. Christoph, the editor.

in paper

 $5\frac{3}{8} \times 8\frac{1}{4}$

500 pages

$3.95

World Perspectives On International Politics

WALTER C. CLEMENS, Center for International Studies, M.I.T.

Here is a collection of significant pronouncements on key issues by world leaders from three distinct camps—the Western, the Communist, and the non-aligned. Gleaned from original sources, these readings reflect the unifying and divisive factors at work within these three "worlds." This juxtaposition of materials gives the student the chance to determine what operating forces unite and divide international relations. Included are case studies of three recent confrontations between major powers of each camp and an introduction which offers a provocative field theory of international relations.

in paper

480 pages

$3.50 (t)

 $5\% \times 8\%$

Justice In America

Courts, Lawyers, and the Judicial Process

HERBERT JACOB, University of Wisconsin

Justice in America is the first text about the American judiciary which examines the work of courts at all levels. It shows how the courts are linked to the political system by the policy-making and norm-enforcement functions they must perform. Participants in the judicial process are examined—the lawyers and the judges, the interest groups, the jury panels, and others. The structure of American courts and the restraints which limit court action are discussed. Throughout, the author avoids excessive legal discussion using instead the methods of social science research to describe and analyze American courts.

in paper and in cloth

$2.95 and $5.00

224 pages

 $5\% \times 8\%$

Little, Brown and Company
34 Beacon Street
Boston, Massachusetts

Introductory Readers in American Politics

In paper

 $5\frac{3}{8} \times 8\frac{1}{4}$

245 pages (t)

$1.95

Legislative Politics, U.S.A. Second Edition

THEODORE J. LOWI, Cornell University

19 important and provocative readings on representative government and the American legislative process. The new edition of this widely adopted reader focuses on the entire political process, and shows how Congress affects and is affected by all of the other political participants and forces.

Bureaucratic Power in National Politics

FRANCIS E. ROURKE, Johns Hopkins University

This reader concentrates on that growing "problem child" in the U.S. government today: the power of the bureaucracy. It shows that this power is rooted in the expertise of the bureaucrat as well as the political support which administrative agencies muster to advance their goals or to ward off attack. The 16 selections point up the sources of bureaucratic power, the strategies by which it is sustained, and the forces that set limits on it. These readings provide the student with comprehensive material, covering, for the first time, all aspects of this central problem of modern democracy.

Foreign Policy in American Government

BERNARD C. COHEN, University of Wisconsin

Professor Cohen has carefully selected 12 readings which explore the various ways and means by which foreign policy questions are handled in the American political system. Substantive aspects of American foreign policy are considered in a general way in an opening essay by the editor and some problems are pinpointed in a pro and con discussion of the merits of the test ban treaty.

Little, Brown and Company
34 Beacon Street
Boston, Massachusetts

American Government: Readings and Cases

Second Edition

PETER WOLL, Brandeis University

This widely adopted text of basic readings and cases in American Government has been revised considerably to include examples of the most recent thinking in the areas of:

- the nature and origins of constitutional theory and practice-including new cases
- · the relationship between the national government and the states
- · civil rights and civil liberties
- · the organization and functions of political parties and interest groups
- · the responsibilities, powers, and limitations of the President
- · the structure and function of Congress and congressional decision making
- · the judicial process
- · selected problems of governmental policy making

The introductory material and connecting comments provide the continuity necessary to guide the student but they do not overshadow the readings.

in paper

 $5\frac{3}{8} \times 8\frac{1}{4}$

592 pages

$3.95

Politics in the American States

A Comparative Analysis

HERBERT JACOB, University of Wisconsin Kenneth N. Vines, Tulane University

Politics in the American States utilizes the knowledge of a dozen well-known political scientists to present, for the first time, a comparative politics approach in a state politics text. Systematic analysis of data comes from all 50 states rather than just a few, and provides unusually thorough coverage of such important topics as political participation, interest groups, and the politics of important state programs: education, welfare, taxation, and highways.

Contributors to this new text include the two editors as well as:

- · Richard E. Dawson, Washington University of St. Louis
- . Thomas R. Dye, University of Georgia
- Daniel J. Elazar, Temple University
- · Robert S. Friedman, University of Michigan
- · Lester W. Milbrath, Northwestern University
- · Clara Penniman, University of Wisconsin
- Austin Ranney, University of Wisconsin
- · James A. Robinson, Ohio State University
- Robert H. Salisbury, Washington University of St. Louis
- Joseph A. Schlesinger, Michigan State University
- · Harmon L. Ziegler, Jr., University of Oregon

in cloth

6 × 9

500 pages

$7.00 (t)

Little, Brown and Company 34 Beacon Street Boston, Massachusetts

LAWYERS AND JUDGES: THE ABA AND THE POLITICS OF JUDICIAL SELECTION

By JOEL B. GROSSMAN, University of Wisconsin. An analysis of the roles played by the Senate, the President, the Attorney General, lawyers as individuals and the American Bar Association in the selection of federal judges. Coming in March. Approx. 248 pages. Prob. $6.75.

A SYSTEMS ANALYSIS OF POLITICAL LIFE

By David Easton, University of Chicago. A major work that constructs a general theory, shows how these concepts can be applied and indicates some of their major relationships. In developing this theory, Easton has provided the beginning for the construction of a general theory for the whole field of political science. Easton's framework isolates and names the critical variables and dimensions common to all political systems. His model interprets life in dynamic terms—it shows the way in which demands and supports flow into a system, the way in which the system works on these and converts them into policies, decisions and actions. This theory applies to all political systems, modern or primitive, industrialized or present, large or small, national or international, traditional or transitional, democratic or totalitarian. Ready in February. Approx. 548 pages. Prob. $9.25.

THE AMERICAN VOTER, AN ABRIDGMENT

By Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes, all of the Survey Research Center at Michigan. Now available in paperback form, this classic work shows what leads the American voter to his decision at the polls. Containing all of the findings presented in the original book, this abridged edition presents the results of political surveys conducted from 1948 through 1958 and analyzes their meanings. 302 pages. Paper: $2.95.

REFLECTIONS ON COMMUNITY STUDIES

Edited by ARTHUR J. VIDICH, New School for Social Research; JOSEPH BENS-MAN, C.C.N.Y.; and MAURICE R. STEIN, Brandeis. Contains eleven essays by prominent social investigators on the methodology of community study. Each investigator shows how his studies have evolved and illustrates a spectrum of methodology issues. 359 pages. $7.50.

THE RULERS AND THE RULED

By ROBERT E. AGGER and DANIEL GOLDRICH, both of Oregon, and BERT E. SWANSON, Sarah Lawrence College. Describes and compares the political systems of four American communities throughout the postwar period. It shows how traditional democratic ideals in both community and national life have been influenced and affected by political realities such as distribution of power, illegitimate sanctions and leadership ideologies. 789 pages. $7.95.

new Science Editions paperbacks . . .

THE SERVANTS OF POWER. By Loren Baritz. $1.65. JAPANESE PEOPLE AND POLITICS. By Chitoshi Yanaga. 408 pages. $2.25. SYSTEM AND PROCESS IN INTERNATIONAL POLITICS. By Morton A. Kaplan. 283 pages. $1.65.

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE DYNAMICS OF THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY

Compiled and edited by Donald Bruce Johnson, University of Iowa, and Jack L. Walker, University of Michigan. A collection of views and opinions on the Presidency ranging from the Federalist Papers to John F. Kennedy. The many activities of the President from party leader through administrator to Commander-in-Chief are explored—his relationships with Congress and the Courts are discussed—the office and the man are viewed in terms of nominations, elections, voting behavior, concepts of office, Presidential tenure, and disability. Throughout the book the President is regarded as a man as well as an institution. 355 pages. $6.75.

AMERICAN DIPLOMACY DURING THE SECOND WORLD WAR, 1941-1945

By GADDIS SMITH, Yale University. Presents the policies and events of this wartime period from the viewpoint of what American leaders of the time thought significant. Dealing with American policies in all corners of the globe, the author discusses the influence of individual personalities, national experience and military strategy on diplomatic decisions. 194 pages. Cloth: $4.95. Paper: $1.95.

THE RELUCTANT BELLIGERENT: AMERICAN ENTRY INTO WORLD WAR II

By ROBERT A. DIVINE, The University of Texas. Deals with American foreign policy from the early 1930's until the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. The author carefully probes the isolationist mood of the '30's to show the withdrawal of the United States from the world at a time when it was moving into war. The neutrality legislation of the time is analyzed and the author concludes that the U.S. was Hitler's silent partner. 172 pages. Cloth: $4.95. Paper: $1.95.

THE GREAT DEPARTURE: THE UNITED STATES AND WORLD WAR I

By DANIEL SMITH, University of Colorado. Discusses American diplomacy after entering the war and at the subsequent peace conference—and demonstrates how American self-interest harmonized with American ideals. The book examines the confusion and drifting that led the Americans not only into the war but also into a rejection of the Versailles Treaty, showing America in transition from an era of isolationism to one of vigorous internationalism. Approx. 208 pages. Cloth: $4.95. Paper: $1.95.

THE CROWD IN HISTORY, 1730-1848

By George Rudé, University of Adelaide. A powerful synthesis of popular movements in eighteenth and nineteenth century France and England. It discusses specific incidents of crowd action and analyzes general aspects of crowd behavior and composition. A book in NEW DIMENSIONS IN HISTORY—ESSAYS IN COMPARATIVE HISTORY. 291 pages. Cloth: $5.95. Paper: $2.95.

EXCHANGE AND POWER IN SOCIAL LIFE

By Peter M. Blau, University of Chicago. Uses concepts of exchange, reciprocity, imbalance and power to analyze social life and to derive the more complex processes in social structure from the simpler ones. 352 pages. $7.75.

605 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

6 FREE PRESS books that break new ground...

THE POLITICAL SYSTEMS OF EMPIRES: The Rise and Fall of the Historical Bureaucratic Societies by S. N. EISENSTADT, Hebrew University in Jerusalem

Winner of the 1964 MacIver Award! Combines a broad historical sweep with insights gained from classical sociological work. Analyzes the social and political structure of the major historical empires, and traces the causes of their development, continuity, and fall. "...the most successful historical-sociological study to appear since Max Weber...."

—American Sociological Review
"...constitutes a major contribution to sociology, political science, and comparative history."

—American Historical Review $15,00

LAW AND POLITICS IN THE SUPREME COURT by MARTIN SHAPIRO, Stanford University

Martin Shapiro shows that the United States Supreme Court, as much as any important legal institution, has its "clients" too. Who are they? What services are performed for them? How big a role do politics play in the Court's decisions? The author answers these absorbing questions in this thorough, profound study. $6.95

THE MANAGING OF ORGANIZATIONS: The Administrative Struggle by BERTRAM M. GROSS, Syracuse University

What is it really like to live and work inside large organizations? What must the administrator do to get action? This encyclopedic work brings together aspects of the administration of organizations here-tofore dealt with separately — the techniques of budgeting, accounting, personnel and production management. It provides a realistic analysis of the actual behavior of people in various organizations and of the special problems faced by managers.

In 2 boxed vols.: $25.00

THE INTELLIGENCE OF DEMOCRACY: Decision Making Through Mutual Adjustment by CHARLES E. LINDBLOM, Yale University

Must we resign ourselves to a dismal choice solely between democratic but inefficient decentralization, and efficient but tyrannical centralization? Employing the economists' concepts of decision-making in the marketplace, the book examines the various bargaining and mutual adjustment processes of political life by which are accomplished more-or-less sound rulings and, in fact, feats of coordination beyond the competence of central planners. $7.50

COUNTERINSURGENCY WARFARE

by MAJOR JOHN S. PUSTAY, U.S. Air Force Academy

Major Pustay's purpose is to design an effective policy for the prevention of insurgency warfare, and to facilitate American assistance to states already combatting this type of Communist operation. He distinguishes four stages in the growth of insurgent activity: infiltration-subversion, small armed-band operations, insurrection, and civil war. A strategy is outlined that can be employed by the beleaguered regime and United States missions to defeat the insurgents. $6.95

AMERICAN NATIONAL SECURITY: A Reader in Research and Theory Edited by MORTON BERKOWITZ, Brooklyn College, and P. G. BOCK, Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences

Brings together for the first time the writings of outstanding social scientists in the field of national security theory, research, and policy. Designed to give a sense of the field's unity, its breadth is so great that virtually all the more recent work of leading social scientists is presented, though the political aspects of national security are emphasized. $9.95

Order from your bookseller or directly from Dept. APS-1

THE FREE PRESS

A Division of The Macmillan Company

60 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

6 Volumes from the important new Free Press series, History and Sources in Western Political Thought

IN SEARCH OF AUTHORITY: Twentieth-Century Political Thought by HENRY S. KARIEL, Bennington College

No mere synthesis of current political theory, In Search of Authority analyzes the work of such figures as Nietzsche, Mannheim, Sorel, and Lenin, in light of the author's general proposition that political philosophy's traditional aims no longer satisfy the needs and purposes of modern society.

SOURCES IN TWENTIETH-CENTURY POLITICAL THOUGHT

Edited by HENRY S. KARIEL

The paperback companion volume to In Search of Authority, this is an exhaustive collection of primary sources and writings illustrating the origins and development of today's political thought. Each selection is introduced by a note providing biographical and bibliographical information. The volume includes, among others, works by Nietzsche, Sorel, Lenin, and Mannheim. $1.95

CONFLICT AND COMPROMISE: History of British Political Thought, 1593-1900 by WILFRID HARRISON, University of Warwick

An eminent English political historian discusses the origins and development of modern British political thought from Elizabethan to Victorian times. Specifically, British contributions to present-day thinking are spotlighted and discussed in terms of their continuity, their variations, and their influence.

SOURCES IN BRITISH POLITICAL THOUGHT, 1593-1900

Edited by WILFRID HARRISON

Includes passages not only from such widely known authors as Hobbes, Locke, and J. S. Mill, but also from others whose work is less readily accessible. These include Richard Hooker, James Harrington, Viscount Bollingbrooke, Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, Sir Henry Maine, and F. H. Bradley. $1.95

THE GREAT DIALOGUE: History of Greek Political Thought from Homer to Polybius

by DONALD KAGAN, Cornell University

Beginning with an examination of the Homeric world and continuing with a discussion of the political ideas of the lyrical poets from Hesiod to Pindar, the author moves on to an analysis of the pre-Socratic philosophers, and the tragedians. In the end, the political writings of Cicero are examined as a key to understanding the assimilation of Greek political thought into the mainstream of Roman thought. $5.95

SOURCES IN GREEK POLITICAL THOUGHT FROM HOMER TO POLYBIUS

Edited by DONALD KAGAN

The stages in the growth and development of Greek political institutions are carefully documented. Such important factors as the emergence of the polis, the dialogue between aristocratic and democratic themes, and the eternal problem of war and peace are presented in the words of the most profound and influential thinkers of ancient Greece. $1.95

Order from your bookseller or directly from Dept. APS-1

THE FREE PRESS

A Division of The Macmillan Company

60 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

Free Government in the Making:

Readings in American Political Thought Third Edition

By ALPHEUS T. MASON, Princeton University

The influential and divergent views that have shaped the great issues in American political thought, from precolonial times to the present, are set forth in 180 readings in this book. Substantial introductions precede each chapter and place the source materials in their historical and political context. Thoroughly revised and brought up to date, the Third Edition includes new or enriched materials on many topics, among them the struggle for the Bill of Rights, slavery, the Progressive era, and on the contemporary scene, civil rights, poverty and abundance, freedom and national security, and the strain of violence in our culture. "An excellent revision of one of the basic works in the field. The additions increase its usefulness for courses emphasizing the current period."—James E. Dornan, Jr., Purdue University

1965 952 pp. $7.50

The Democratic Civilization

By LESLIE LIPSON, University of California, Berkeley

A fresh, general appraisal of the democratic record, its achievements and limitations, interpreted within the framework of a general analysis of politics. "Perhaps no book does such a thorough job explaining the institutions of modern government in terms of their social, ideological, and historical bases. Many recent writers tend to look at politics too narrowly; i.e., purely in terms of legal institutions or political theory. Lipson's systematic approach to modern democracy treats each of these elements as it relates to the other. Professor Lipson has restored Aristotle's comparative method as a device for unifying theory with fact, and has thus made a notable contribution to the integration of the discipline."

—Theodore McNelly, University of Maryland

1964 632 pp. $7.50

The Springtime of Freedom:

The Evolution of Developing Societies

By WILLIAM McCord, Stanford University

In this study of the newly developing nations, Professor McCord attempts to show that democracy can better promote rapid economic, social, and political development than can totalitarianism—by no means an undisputed thesis even in democratic countries. Some scholars believe that totalitarianism can be more efficient. Drawing on historical examples and firsthand observations, the author argues convincingly against this interpretation and for his own view.

1965 344 pp. paperbound $2.25 clothbound $6.00

Elements of Democratic Government

Fourth Edition

By J. A. CORRY, Queen's University, and HENRY J. ABRAHAM, University of Pennsylvania

Expertly integrating theory and fact, this leading textbook affords an up-to-date comparative description of American and British government, with reference as well to France and the Soviet Union. A brief sketch of political ideals underlying liberal democracies and modern dictatorships serves as a framework for the more detailed discussion that follows. "An admirable revision of an already excellent book."—PAUL G. STEINBICKER, St. Louis University

1964

848 pp. illus. $7.75

Democracy in France Since 1870 Fourth Edition

By DAVID THOMSON, Cambridge University

This study, widely recognized as one of the best standard works on modern France, has been brought up to date in the Fourth Edition with two chapters on Gaullism and the Fifth Republic. Revisions have been made throughout the text and in the bibliography and index. "The clearest treatment of a complex subject available in English."—ROBERT L. BAKER, Kenyon College 1964 352 pp. paperbound $2.00

Men at the Top: A Study in Community Power

By ROBERT PRESTHUS, Cornell University

An exhaustive social survey of two small communities (pop. 6000 and 8500) in New York State, undertaken to measure the traditional democratic values of pluralism in an age of concentrated political and economic power. "An important addition to our knowledge and literature about community 'power,' especially because of its comparative approach. Its theoretical sections present a balanced review in which the community power problems are related to political theory and sociological tradition."—Charles E. Gilbert, Swarthmore College

1964
496 pp. paperbound $2.95 clothbound $8.50

Equality in America:

Religion, Race, and the Urban Majority

By ALAN P. GRIMES, Michigan State University

A study of the struggle for racial equality in the United States and of ways in which it relates to the struggles for religious and political equality. "Because of the author's clear style and felicitous use of pertinent historical anecdotes, the average layman will enjoy the book, and any professional student of the problems will gain fresh insight. The copious annotations to the text make it especially valuable."—James B. Donovan in the New York Herald Tribune

1964

144 pp. paperbound $1.50 clothbound $4.00

Bechuanaland

Pan-African Outpost or Bantu Homeland?

By Edwin S. Munger, California Institute of Technology. Bechuanaland's borders with South Africa, South West Africa and Southern Rhodesia, and its proximity to Angola and Zambia give it a highly strategic position. It is in the process of becoming both a nation and a battleground between the Republic of South Africa and northern Pan-Africanism. Black African nations see it as an important outpost for action against the white-controlled states, while the Republic of South Africa considers it a territory which should be included in her borders. In this frank analysis of Bechuanaland, Dr. Munger examines and evaluates the various problems besetting this emerging nation.

1.R.R. Paper, $1.55

Zanzibar

Its Society and Its Politics

By John Middleton, Northwestern University, and Jane Campbell. In April, 1964, the former Protectorate of Zanzibar became part of the United Republic of Tanganyika and Zanzibar (now known as Tanzania), five months after a dramatic revolution in which Communist powers were rumored to have played a part. In this volume the authors provide a background to these and other recent events which have had such wide repercussions in both East African and world politics.

1.R.R. Paper, $1.40

Changing Perspectives in British Foreign Policy

By Kenneth Younger, Director of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. With the rejection of Britain's application to join the European Common Market a great many questions have been raised about her current position in the world. The author considers the various options which are now open to Britain. He analyzes the possibilities of an American-European partnership, in which Britain is recognizably part of Europe, and explains why it would be the best form of Western alliance. He believes that Britain could bring about such a partnership if she decided to work wholeheartedly for it, but needs to be more realistic toward both the Commonwealth and her own role in nuclear strategy. Chatham House Essays, Number 7.

Politics in Ghana 1946-1960

By Dennis Austin, Institute of Commonwealth Studies, University of London. The author follows the course of events which brought the British colony of the Gold Coast to independence in 1957 under a People's Party recruited largely from a new class of elementary school graduates. Mr. Austin focuses on the shift from party competition to the single-party system: Nkrumah's attitudes to power and how the CPP's multiple struggles—anticolonial and local—influenced its philosophy.

R.I.I.A. $10.10

World Communism

The Disintegration of a Secular Faith

By RICHARD LOWENTHAL, Free University, West Berlin. "A penetrating analysis of the intellectual decay and political disintegration which have befallen Communism during the last decade. . . . Nothing better has been written on the subject, and it is hard to imagine that it ever will. Professor Lowenthal combines a deep understanding of Marxism and of the ways Marxists think, with a sensitivity to the subtler realities of power politics. More particularly, he understands the interplay of Marxist ideology and power politics in the minds of the Communist leaders."—Hans Morgenthau, New York Review of Books. $6.00

The Burden of Guilt

A Short History of Germany, 1914-1945

By Hannah Voct, translated by Herbert Strauss, The City College of The City University of New York, introduction by Gordon A. Craig, Stanford University. This short history of Germany from Kaiser Wilhelm II to Hitler, written for the postwar generation of Germans, effectively punctures the myths on which previous generations had been raised. "This is the finest, simplest, fairest account of the last thirty years in Germany which I have ever read."—Edgar Ansel Mowrer. "Remarkable for its emphases and for the candor with which it reports the facts . . . well organized and precise."—N. Y. Times Book Review.

122 halftones, 3 maps. $6.00

Freedom or Secrecy

Revised Edition

By James Russell Wiggins. The critics said of the first edition: "Required reading for every official or politician who ever faced a reporter."—Saturday Review. "Mr. Wiggins has written a clear, scholarly, eloquent and alarming book."—N. Y. Times. The question of secrecy in the conduct of public affairs is now even more in the news than when the first edition of this book was published in 1956. The charges that the administration has "managed" the news during times of crises is of great concern to government officials, managers of communications media, citizens and voters. In this new edition Mr. Wiggins deals authoritatively with recent problems and considers the results of the Administrative Procedures Act.

One Nation Indivisible

The Union in American Thought, 1776-1861

By Paul C. Nagel, University of Kentucky. "Nagel has, for the first time, brought the concept of Union into full historical focus. . . . He has given us, as never before, a straight and complete answer to a complex question which appeared so deceptively simple that all too often we did not recognize how long and how badly it had needed answering: what did men mean when they spoke of Union? The extensive learning, the insight and vigor of conceptualization with which this answer is given, and most of all, the textual richness with which it is illustrated, all combine to make this analysis a fresh and important contribution."—David M. Potter, Journal of American History.

$7.00

SELECTED TITLES

THE STATE OF THE UNION: Commentaries on American Democracy. Robert B. Dishman, University of New Hampshire. Organized around key phrases of the Preamble to the Constitution, this book contains sixty-four readings on major issues in American life. The volume's comprehensive range, both of topic and opinion, makes it an ideal text for basic courses in American government. The articles are by prominent people in political science, history, economics, politics, education, sociology, and the arts. The variety of backgrounds represented affords the student a broad base on which to evaluate the various aspects of American government. Throughout the book, twenty-eight essays by the editor objectively introduce the subjects to be discussed and elucidate the chief issues and problems involved. 576 pages. Paper. About $4.85. March, 1965

PROXIMATE SOLUTIONS: Case-Problems in State and Local Government and INSOLUBLE PROBLEMS: Case-Problems on the Functions of State and Local Government. Edited by G. Theodore Mitau of Macalester College and Harold W. Chase of the University of Minnesota. Each book contains fifty cases—from nearly every state court as well as the Supreme Court—dealing with the constitutional powers and responsibilities of state courts, state legislatures, governors, cities, counties, and special district authorities. Basically, Proximate Solutions makes institutions the focus of case-problems whereas Insoluble Problems emphasizes case-problems involving some of the important functions of state and local government. Each major section in these volumes is preceded by a lucidly written essay which gives the constitutional background and poses policy dilemmas inherent in each case. Supplementary materials. An Outline of Suggested Assignments is available upon request. Each, 352 pages. Paper. Each, $3.50. 1963

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS: Strategies of American Electoral Politics. By Nelson W. Polsby of Wesleyan University and Aaron Wildavsky of the University of California. The purpose of this book is to give interested students the knowledge of American politics they need in order to understand Presidential elections and conventions. The authors explain the context within which the battle for Presidential office is waged and the strategies of contending parties and contestants. Abundant examples from many different elections are cited. A whole chapter is devoted to discussion of electoral reform. Supplementary materials. 218 pages. Paper. $2.50. 1964

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

College Department • 597 Fifth Avenue • N.Y.

COLUMBIA

FEDERALISM AND CIVIL RIGHTS

Burke Marshall

Foreword by Robert F. Kennedy

"The Kennedy Administration made a great record on civil rights. Much of the credit is Mr. Marshall's, and the quality of this book indicates why. The book is calm yet deeply engaged, realistic but hopeful, judicious and yet vigorously purposive."—The New Republic $3.50

THE QUEST FOR PEACE THE DAG HAMMARSKJÖLD MEMORIAL LECTURES

Andrew W. Cordier and Wilder Foote, Editors

Foreword by Grayson Kirk

The contributors to this volume all knew and admired Dag Hammarskjöld. Their contributions offer a fitting memorial to a man selflessly devoted to the cause of international peace. The topics covered include: the political problems of peace-keeping and international organization, and the economic and social problems of the new and developing nations. Among the contributors: Ralph J. Bunche, Dean Rusk, Adlai Stevenson, and U Thant. $7.95

POLITICS OF SOCIALIST AGRICULTURE IN POLAND: 1945-1960

Andrzej Korbonski

How does a socialist country approach the problem of individually owned farms within its ideological and political framework? This study of Polish agrarian economy attempts to answer this important question by examining the political and economic position of the peasants prior to World War II and the struggle for political supremacy between the Communists and the peasants during the war. $7.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

2960 Broadway New York, N. Y. 10027

Father Coughlin and the New Deal

by Charles J. Tull. This first scholarly study of the radio priest and political spellbinder of the 1930's traces his rise to national prominence, his quarrel with FDR, his role in the National Union for Social Justice and the Christian Front, the Church's attitude toward his activities, and the events that brought about his retirement from public life in 1942.

Men and Movements Series, 7

Illustrated. $6.50

■ Politics in New York State, 1800-1830

by Alvin Kass. The evolution of popular democracy is examined in this revisionist study. The author thoroughly documents, chiefly from primary sources, his thesis that democratic reforms in New York resulted from political expediency rather than ideology, and that the state was an equal-rights democracy well before the ascendancy of Andrew Jackson.

$4.95

■ Hostages of Fortune: Child Labor Reform in New York State

by Jeremy P. Felt. This book reviews the bitter struggle for child labor regulation from mid-nineteenth century through the 1930's. The previously unexamined records of the New York Child Labor Committee, which spearheaded reform in this century, were made available to the author for this study.

Illustrated. $6.95

The Roosevelt-Litvinov Agreements: The American View

by Donald G. Bishop. This detailed and sober analysis of the Soviet record of fulfillment of the commitments made to the U.S. in 1933 as a condition of American recognition considers non-interference in internal affairs, freedom of worship, legal protection for American nationals, Soviet debts, Soviet claims and assignments, and economic espionage. The evidence indicates a pattern of unprecedented duplicity on the part of the U.S.S.R. $7.50

In May-

■ Community of Fate: German-Soviet Diplomatic Relations, 1922-1928

by Kurt Rosenbaum. Based on captured German Foreign Office files, this study examines the problems encountered by the first major country to establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union.

$6.75

From your bookseller or

Syracuse University Press / Syracuse, New York 13210

NEW DOUBLEDAY ANCHOR BOOKS

THE FIRST NAME IN QUALITY PAPERBACK PUBLISHING

DECISIONS IN SYRACUSE

by Roscoe C. Martin, Frank J. Munger, and others.

This "Metropolitan Action Study" presents significant case histories of inter-governmental decisions within the metropolitan area of Syracuse, New York—showing how a single county deals with the whole range of community problems. $1.45

TWENTIETH-CENTURY CUBA

The Background of the Castro Revolution

by Wyatt MacGaffey and Clifford R. Barnett.

The most complete and objective study now available of Cuba's history, economy, and culture. Concentrating upon the internal situation, the authors provide the facts and analyses necessary for intelligent judgments and predictions. $1.95

WINNING WITHOUT WAR

by Amitai Etzioni.

The author of The Hard Way to Peace realistically assesses recent history, proposing that the United States replace its strategy of containment and deterrence with a strategy of non-armed competition with the Communist bloc. $1.25

BAGEHOT'S HISTORICAL AND POLITICAL ESSAYS

Edited with an Introduction by Norman St. John-Stevas.

This collection of essays by Walter Bagehot, 19th-century British political scientist and man of letters, includes his superb and revealing articles on the British, French, and American constitutions, and on such prominent statesmen as Peel, Gladstone, and Disraeli. An Anchor Original. $1.95

PEACE AND WAR IN THE MODERN AGE:

Premises, Myths, and Realities

Edited by Frank R. Barnett, William C. Mott, and John C. Neff.

In 26 essays, Dwight D. Eisenhower, Dean Acheson, Robert Strauss-Hupe, Hans Morgenthau, Dean Rusk, and others examine the struggle between communist and capitalist ideologies, in a sequel to American Strategy for the Nuclear Age (Anchor, $1.45). An Anchor Original. $1.45

DOUBLEDAY & COMPANY, INC.

Garden City, New York including LAIDLAW BROTHERS, River Forest, Illinois, publishers of textbooks for primary and secondary schools.

Two Outstanding New Editions . . .

BASIC ISSUES OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY, 5th Ed.

By Hillman M. Bishop, City College of New York; and Samuel Hendel, City College of New York

This highly successful text is a collection of authoritative readings dealing with the fundamental values and persistent issues of our democracy. Enlarged and brought up to date, the revision includes a discussion of vital new issues that have developed since 1961, as well as of important continuing problems. All pertinent material from the previous edition has been retained and, as before, conflicting points of view are represented. New to this edition are two sections, The Separation of Church and State and What Policy for America, and articles on such timely topics as religion in the schools, legislative apportionment, civil disobedience, and the Supreme Court. The book is recommended as a basic text for courses in Problems of Democracy, or as supplementary reading for courses in American Government.

603 pp., paper, $3.25

AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT, 2nd Ed.

By Clyde F. Snider, University of Illinois; in collaboration with Samuel K. Gove, University of Illinois

Thoroughly revised and updated, this basic text provides a comprehensive analysis of the nature, organization, and operation of all governmental institutions below the national level. The book features an integrated treatment of state and local governments, giving attention to all principal local units—counties, municipalities, towns, townships, and special districts. A substantial new section on metropolitan adjustments has been added to the chapter on local government reorganization, and the discussion of natural resources has been expanded to include a section on state and local planning. The new second edition retains the original chapter organization and continues to carry out the author's descriptive and analytical approach.

735 pp., illus., $7.50

Two Distinguished New Texts . . .

CASES IN PUBLIC FINANCE

By John H. Wicks, Montana State University
Helen A. Cameron, The Ohio State University
Francis O. Woodard, The Ohio State University

This new supplementary text embodies the latest concept for courses in public finance—short hypothetical cases for use in a problem-solving approach to the subject. Cases included cover virtually all areas in public finance, emphasizing the fact that there is no single answer to any case in point, and encouraging a comprehensive awareness of the numerous valid solutions to each problem. The cases can form a strong foundation for class discussion or may guide the student to rigorous case analysis outside of class. Since the topics included embrace all areas affected by policy decisions, the book is an excellent companion volume to any standard text.

119 pp., paper, $1.75

THE SOVIET SYSTEM IN THEORY AND PRACTICE:

Selected Western and Soviet Views

By Harry G. Shaffer, University of Kansas

The selections assembled here, published primarily since 1960, acquaint the student with the most significant aspects of the Soviet system. The book is exceptional in that it confronts, topic for topic—theory and practice—the views of Western experts with those of the Soviet. The contributions by articulate scholars, analysts, and writers represent a wide range of areas: historical, political, economic, and social. The readings are reprinted without change to provide for comparison and contrast, while the editorial framework assures continuous perspective. An invaluable text for basic courses in Soviet government and comparative government.

470 pp., paper, $4.50

APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS

Division of Meredith Publishing Company

HARPER & ROW BOOKS FOR THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT COURSE

Peter H. Odegard Hans H. Baerwald

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC: Its Government and Politics

Primarily concerned with political power, with the ideas, values, and theories which have served to give direction and purpose to government in the United States, the text is a comprehensive analysis of the spirit and structure of the American Republic. "A superb and original job." Henry J. Abraham, University of Pennsylvania. Instructor's manual and 16-page supplement on the Johnson administration. 851 pp. $8.50.

William C. Havard

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES

A brief, sophisticated description of the background and operation of the government of the United States, with a critical evaluation of its organization, functions, and policies. The book provides a comprehensive treatment of the working system of American politics at all levels, and shows their interrelationships. Intended as a basic text for use with supplementary paperbacks. 245 pp. $2.95. Paper.

Reo M. Christenson

CHALLENGE AND DECISION: Political Issues of Our Time

Presents and analyzes both the liberal and conservative stands on major domestic political issues—civil rights, labor regulation, farm surplus and subsidy policies, federal aid to education, public health insurance, the welfare state and its implications, and full employment problems. 247 pp. $2.95. Paper.

Peter H. Odegard

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Readings and Documents

A collection of 157 readings and documents, edited to accompany any basic text in American government. Selections from books and journals, speeches, memoirs, court cases, presidential messages and other sources. 616 pp. $4.75. Paper.

Loren P. Beth

POLITICS, THE CONSTITUTION, AND THE SUPREME COURT: An Introduction to the Study of Constitutional Law

A concise description of the judiciary—what its role is and why—and how it performs. The author traces the historical background of American constitutionalism, and analyzes, in detail, judicial review—in theory and practice. Illustrative material and case references. 166 pp. $2.25. Paper.

Benjamin M. Ziegler

THE SUPREME COURT AND AMERICAN ECONOMIC LIFE

An annotated collection of 37 landmark Supreme Court cases pertaining to the American economy, expressing the attitude of the Court toward fundamental changes in our social and economic structure as they have emerged and developed from the beginning. 273 pp. $2.40. Paper.

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS • 49 E. 33d St., New York 10016

NEW FROM BLAISDELL

CONSTITUTIONALISM IN AMERICA:

Origins and Evolution of Its Fundamental Ideas

by Arthur E. Sutherland, Harvard University

Professor Sutherland has taken as his subject the aspirations of men for constitutional government—meaning government that reconciles order and freedom—through seven centuries in England and America. Basic concepts such as majority will, governmental intervention, and writ of the law are dealt with in detail.

1965. 640 pages. Tentatively, $9.50

AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

by Stephen T. Early, Jr., De Pauw University

Intended for introductory one-semester courses in American national government, this book's frankly legalistic approach features an abundance of primary source material and a fully annotated bibliography.

1964. 512 pages. Illustrated. $6.50

BLAISDELL PUBLISHING COMPANY

A Division of Ginn and Company, 135 West 50th Street, New York, New York 10020

Flexible, Comprehensive, Scholarly

SCOTT, FORESMAN American Government Series

Edited by Joseph C. Palamountain, Jr., Wesleyan University

The Scott, Foresman AMERICAN GOVERNMENT SERIES answers the need for continuity and flexibility in the American government course by offering interlocking books which cover broad basic topics and, to permit a choice of emphasis, auxiliary books which treat more specialized topics. Like our system of government, the series strikes a balance between unity and diversity. The rationale of democracy and the contemporary processes of American government receive special emphasis. Each book is written by a different author, thereby tapping the expertise and experience of distinguished scholars in the fields of their special competence.

The following AMERICAN GOVERNMENT SERIES books will be available in 1965:

SECURING THE BLESSINGS OF LIBERTY: The Constitutional System

Arthur N. Holcombe, Harvard University Emeritus Introduction by Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey

OFFICIAL MAKERS OF PUBLIC POLICY

Louis W. Koenig, New York University

JUDICIAL POLICY MAKING

Glendon Schubert, Michigan State University

THE PEOPLE IN POLITICS

John H. Fenton, University of Massachusetts

FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Laurence I. Radway, Dartmouth College

PROMOTING THE GENERAL WELFARE

Lloyd D. Musolf, University of California-Davis

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Thomas A. Flinn, Oberlin College

CONGRESS

Ralph K. Huitt, University of Wisconsin

THE UNITED STATES AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Daniel S. Cheever, University of Pittsburgh

Scott, Foresman and Company

Chicago

Atlanta

Dallas

Palo Alto

Fair Lawn, N.J.

NEW DODD, MEAD BOOKS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

MODERN GOVERNMENT: A Survey of Political Science—Second Edition

By Dell G. Hitchner and William H. Harbold, both of the University of Washington. 1965. Probable price $9.50. (Instructor's Manual available free to teachers upon request.)

This new edition will be widely hailed. First published only three years ago, the book at once created a new standard for the beginning course in political science. It was adopted in 40 of our 50 states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and in a number of Canadian universities, Australia, Sudan, etc. Many chapters have been completely rewritten and the whole book thoroughly revised and reset.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: Problems and Readings in Political Analysis—Second Edition

By Thomas H. Eliot, William N. Chambers, Robert H. Salisbury, and Kenneth Prewitt, all of Washington University. 1965. Paperback. Probable price $3.50

Long the Number One Best Seller in its field, this highly successful book has now been revised in light of suggestions made by its many satisfied users in hundreds of schools and colleges. Deeper concentration on fewer topics has been achieved by reducing the number of problems to twenty-seven and at the same time greatly enlarging the selection of readings to illustrate in depth the points at issue.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE SUPREME COURT—Second Edition

By Wallace Mendelson, University of Texas. 1965, Probable price $8.00

This thoroughly revised and reset volume is a case-text for the college course in constitutional law. A large selection of Supreme Court cases and numerous related materials provide a usable picture of the law today and stress the organic role of the judiciary in the total process of American government.

GOVERNING AMERICA: The Politics of a Free People—Second Edition

By THOMAS H. ELIOT, Washington University

1964 National, State, and Local Government 1024 pp. $8.75

1964 National Government 832 pp. $8.25

(Instructor's Manual available free to teachers upon request.)

This enormously popular beginning textbook has been reissued in a 1964 Second Edition containing new tables, new illustrations, more headings, and an expanded treatment in a number of places (e.g. the chapters on the equal protection of the laws, voting behavior research, etc.).

THE COSTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS: Facts, Trends, Myths

By Frederick C. Mosher and Orville F. Poland, both of the University of California, Berkeley. 1964. 208 pp. Paperback. $3.50

Here is an incisive profile of the trends of American public finances over the last several decades. By relating governmental revenues and expenditures to such factors as inflation, population increase, economic growth, and defense and military expenditures, etc., the authors contribute to an informed public discussion of a key topic.

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY, INC.

432 PARK AVENUE SOUTH, NEW YORK, NEW YORK 10016

CANADIAN BRANCH: 2 Hollinger Road, Toronto 16, Canada

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS IN A REVOLUTIONARY AGE

W. W. KULSKI, Duke University

Focusing on the tensions reshaping world politics in this century, the author analyzes the ideological conflicts, discordant national interests and the social and economic factors that underlie today's revolutionary transformations. Close attention is given to the problems of the underdeveloped nations—the "Third World"—and their role in today's power struggle. The problem of power as a factor in international relations is analyzed with skill and sophistication. Extensive bibliographies.

672 Pages

$6.95

THE MAKING OF FOREIGN POLICY: EAST AND WEST

KURT LONDON, George Washington University

The author scans the policy machinery of the main protagonists of the East-West conflict—United States, Russia, China, Great Britain, France—and shows how each power creates and implements its foreign policy in conformity with the basic elements that determine its course. Special emphasis is given to the vital roles of intelligence and propaganda in the making and implementation of policy, and the agencies and media employed are carefully defined.

368 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

THE INTEGRATION OF POLITICAL COMMUNITIES

KARL W. DEUTSCH, Yale University; PHILIP E. JACOB, HENRY TEUNE, JAMES V. TOSCANO, WILLIAM L.C. WHEATON, University of Pennsylvania

Integrated political behavior at the metropolitan and international levels is explored in ten essays that result from an interdisciplinary seminar held at the University of Pennsylvania in 1961-62. Findings are based on empirical studies in a wide range of fields, including communications, international relations, planning and regional science, local government, social structure, social psychology and cultural anthropology.

220 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

A CENTURY OF RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY. 1814-1914

BARBARA JELAVICH, Indiana University

From the highpoint of 1814 to the catastrophe of 1914 the remarkable continuity of the Russian course is traced as successive rulers developed and extended guidelines originally laid down by Peter the Great. An introductory chapter surveys the period from Peter through Napoleon, and a concluding chapter points to the survival of certain drives and objectives in the foreign policy of Soviet Russia today. Maps and bibliographies.

320 Pages

Paperbound

$1.85

JUSTICE AND THE SUPREME COURT

ROCCO J. TRESOLINI, Lehigh University

Majority or dissenting opinions in eight celebrated cases are skillfully measured against the minds and personalities of the justices who wrote them. Centers mainly on the civil rights aspects of the Court's work not covered by most texts. Clearly and simply written; excellent supplementary reading for courses in American Government, Constitutional Law and Civil Rights.

"Tresolini, in his eight cases, writes an entrancing story in terms of majority opinions and dissents as to the growth of our precious liberties."

—Morris L. Ernst

205 Pages

Paperbound

$1.45

Write for Examination Copies

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

College Department, East Washington Square, Philadelphia, Pa. 19105

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

THE POLITICS OF DISCRETION

Pufendorf and the Acceptance of Natural Law By LEONARD KRIEGER

The author describes Pufendorf's struggles to accommodate the ideal demand of natural law to the reigning institutions of his time, and summarizes the trends and controversies that formed the background for Pufendorf's own views. This study rightly places the emphasis on Pufendorf himself, on the fundamental coherence that underlies the diversity of this thought and establishes the unity of thought and existence.

320 pages $6.50

STATESMANSHIP AND PARTY GOVERNMENT

A Study of Burke and Bolingbroke

By HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, JR.

This study of Edmund Burke analyzes his pamphlet war with the followers of Bolingbroke, whose contempt for parties stimulated Burke to his most eloquent advocacy of the party system. Mansfield cogently shows where Burke was led by his intentions and argues that modern parties must be understood in the light of their founding.

288 pages $7.50

STANDARDS OF AMERICAN LEGISLATION

Bu ernst freund

With a new Introduction by FRANCIS A. ALLEN

This classic discussion of the possibilities and limitations of legislation, although written a half-century ago, is still the outstanding study of the subject. The author is not concerned with technical problems of legislation but seeks to identify and express certain broad standards or principles to guide the devising of legislative regulation.

384 pages $5.50

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF EDMUND BURKE

General Editor, THOMAS W. COPELAND

Volume V

Edited by HOLDEN FURBER

All of Burke's known letters, as well as a selection of letters to him, from July, 1782, through June, 1789, are included in this fifth volume of the complete edition of his correspondence. Of the 256 letters by Burke, 130 are printed here for the first time.

Spring, 1965

THE PAPERS OF JAMES MADISON

Volume 4

Edited by WILLIAM T. HUTCHINSON and WILLIAM M. E. RACHAL

The more than two hundred documents reproduced in this volume date between 1 January and 31 July 1782. The first three volumes in this definitive edition of the Papers appeared in 1962 and 1963. Their publication was acclaimed both for excellence of editing and for the contribution made to a wider knowledge of Madison.

528 pages $12.50

THOMAS JEFFERSON

American Humanist By KARL LEHMANN

New paperbound edition. "This penetrating essay, urbane in style, rich in erudition is by far the most comprehensive and satisfying analysis yet made by Jefferson's lifelong contemplation of ancient civilizations."—JULIAN P. BOYD, New York Times.

Paper $2.45

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Chicago and London

THE UNITED STATES AND JAPAN

Third Edition
By EDWIN O. REISCHAUER

A completely revised and enlarged edition of a book Political Science Quarterly considered "by far the most important interpretation of Japan written since the war." The U.S. Ambassador to Japan presents a vivid, incisive analysis of Japan's relations with the West, and defines the changes being wrought by a new generation. American Foreign Policy Library. $6.50

GOVERNOR THEODORE ROOSEVELT

The Albany Apprenticeship, 1898-1900 By G. WALLACE CHESSMAN

In his two years as Governor of the State of New York, Theodore Roosevelt arrived at the more important positions he would later take as President. Mr. Chessman reviews Roosevelt's nomination and campaign for governor, and then, in absorbing detail, discusses the conflicts, crises, and achievements of his political apprenticeship. Coming in April. $7.95

THE RALLIEMENT IN FRENCH POLITICS, 1890-1898

By ALEXANDER SEDGWICK

Based on sources often neglected in studies of this period, here is an intensive examination of the political problems confronting French Royalists, Catholics, and conservative Republicans in their attempt to form a conservative party, within the framework of the Republic, in the decade dominated by the Panama Scandal and the Dreyfus Affair. Harvard Historical Studies, 74. $4.95

HOBBES STUDIES

Edited by K. C. BROWN

These studies, the work of established scholars in widely diverse fields, reflect a number of different approaches to Hobbes' thought. Together they offer both an effective guide to the mass of literature on the subject and a unique collection of complementary analyses. Here is a broader, and hence more accurate, picture of the range of the postwar Hobbes debate than has hitherto been available. $6.75

THE NATIONAL GUARD IN POLITICS

By MARTHA DERTHICK

Here is a lucid, precise, and thoroughly documented analysis of the power of the National Guard, one of America's most successful pressure groups. The author describes in detail the Guard's relations with the federal and state governments, and the tactics employed in quest of its political goals. Harvard Political Studies. $4.95.

THE SOVIET YOUTH PROGRAM

Regimentation and Rebellion

By ALLEN KASSOF

In the first sociological study of the monolithic Soviet youth organizations, the Komsomol and the Pioneers, the author analyzes their structure and political role, the grave problems confronting them, the rising tide of cynicism and apathy among the rank-and-file membership, and the techniques employed in the effort to produce the "New Soviet Man." Russian Research Center Studies, 49. $5.50

SOVIET STRATEGY AT THE CROSSROADS

By THOMAS W. WOLFE

"There can be little doubt but that the disputes considered here played a key role in Moscow's recent political explosion."—Harry Schwartz in The N. Y. Times. "... the most perceptive, sophisticated and balanced view of Soviet military strategy and doctrine yet available.... It must be read."—Donald S. Zagoria in The Washington Post. A RAND Corporation Research Study. $5.95

HOW THE SOVIET SYSTEM WORKS

By RAYMOND A. BAUER, ALEX INKELES, and CLYDE KLUCKHOHN

"... a most valuable statement of the operation of the Soviet system..."—American Political Science Review. "... a valuable assessment of the nature, strengths and weaknesses of the Soviet system..."—Foreign Affairs. Russian Research Center Studies, 24. Fourth printing, $5.50

New and Recent Titles From The Macmillan Program in Political Science

A New Paperback Series of Original Works Government in the Modern World

General Editors, Paul Y. Hammond, the Rand Corporation, and Nelson W. Polsby, Wesleyan University

ALKER / MATHEMATICS AND POLITICS

by Haywood R. Alker, Jr., Yale University

Professor Alker demonstrates how mathematics is used to describe, analyze, and predict the principal facts and processes of politics. Assuming the student's knowledge of elementary algebra, he pursues his subject from historical backgrounds to contemporary political affairs. May, 1965, 160 pages, $1.50

IONES/THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

by Charles O. Jones, The University of Arizona

This critical analysis of the Republican Party provides a vivid depiction of what the party is, how it developed, how it is organized, and what its future holds. Concerned largely with problems of the present, the text includes results of the 1964 National Convention and discussion of conservatives, moderates and liberals within the party. April, 1965, 160 pages, $1.50

RUSSETT/TRENDS IN WORLD POLITICS

by Bruce M. Russett, Yale University

Focussing first on NATO, then on the United Nations, this study delineates the changes affecting modern international relations. Through recently compiled data, the book provides a basic outline of trends and an example of how modern quantitative methods are used in social science. April, 1965, 160 pages, $1.50

KRISLOV/THE SUPREME COURT IN THE POLITICAL PROCESS

by Samuel Krislov, University of Minnesota

The political nature of the Court is the basis of this text, as Professor Krislov examines the nature of the office, recruitment of judges, selection of cases, and the controversies which surround decisions. Discussions of civil rights, reapportionment, and civil liberties are outstanding. May, 1965, 160 pages, $1.50

PENNOCK-SMITH / POLITICAL SCIENCE: An Introduction

by J. Roland Pennock and David G. Smith, both of Swarthmore College

In its thorough coverage of the processes and institutions in democratic, semidemocratic, and non-democratic countries, this text relates political science to many other disciplines. There is discussion of developing states and an unusual analysis of the process of nation-building. 1964, 850 pages, $7.50

RIKER / DEMOCRACY IN THE UNITED STATES, Second Edition

by William H. Riker, University of Rochester

In the revised edition of this interpretative introductory text, the author develops a theoretical definition of democracy from which he examines specific government institutions. May, 1965, 450 pages, $3.50

SCOTT-WALLACE / POLITICS, U.S.A.:

Cases on the American Democratic Process, Second Edition by Andrew M. Scott and Earle Wallace, both of The University of South Carolina

Actual cases, as well as essays and other sources, are contained in this book of readings. Approximately 70% of the material is new in this edition, including a chapter on the Context of American Politics and one entitled "Political Parties."
Among the contributors are Clinton Rossiter, Alan F. Weetin, Stewart Alson, Judge Harold R. Medina, Michael Harrington, and Senator Clifford Case. March, 17965, 576 pages, prob. $3.95

OWENS-STAUDENRAUS / THE AMERICAN PARTY SYSTEM:
A Book of Readings
by John R. Owens, University of California at Davis, and P. S. Staudenraus, The State University of New York at Stony Brook

This inexpensive and comprehensive collection can be used with almost any text. The readings present both the traditional approaches and the new political behavior studies. The following topics are covered: The Nature of Politics/Political Farties and the Party System, The American Two-Party System, Party Organization, Convenients of the Party System. 1765, 400 pages, paper, 33.95

LIVINGSTON-THOMPSON / THE CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED by John C. Livingston and Robert G. Thompson, both of Sacramento State College

That American democracy faces a crisis of meaning is the thesis of this basic text; it is based upon analysis of the traditional, liberal, and conservative theories, and the new theory of "border" or "minorities" rule. 1963, 473 pages, $5.95

BERMAN / IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED:
The Legislative Process in the National Government by Daniel M. Berman, The American University of the legislative branch, Professor Berman reveals how pressures and unovitten rules influence or prevent legislation. While the explains the formal rules of both bouses, the author of the stages at which key decisions are made, and the various participants in the legislative struggle. 1964, 447 pages, $6.50

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies

Additional Textbooks From The Macmillan Company

TRESOLINI / AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, Second Edition

by Rocco J. Tresolini, Lehigh University

Concise enough for a one-semester course, the revised edition of this text now contains material sufficient for two semesters. Through selected cases ranging from Marbury v. Madison to Wesberry v. Sanders, and through numerous concurring and dissenting opinions, the text provides a thorough and interesting introduction to constitutional law. Thirty-six new cases appear in this edition, among them Cohen v. Virginia, Luther v. Borden, and Dred Scott v. Sandford. Cases concerning controversies such as reapportionment, school prayers, Bible readings, Sunday closing laws, and sit-ins are included. Included are biographical sketches of all present members of the Court and a new chapter dealing with the political nature of the courts. Teacher's Manual available gratis to those adopting the text: 1965, 832 pages, $8.95

TRESOLINI / CONSTITUTIONAL DECISIONS IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

by Rocco J. Tresolini

This brief text contains 25 important constitutional law cases, arranged to parallel the major areas covered in an American Government course. An introductory chapter explains how cases reach the Supreme Court and explains how to find and read cases; brief introductions accompany each section and case. In addition to recent pronouncements of the Court, the collection contains cases which are important historically. Numerous concurring and dissenting opinions show the areas of conflict, politics, and change which surround law. 1965, 160 pages, $1.95

REDFORD / AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND THE ECONOMY

by Emmette S. Redford, The University of Texas, with contributions by Charles B. Hagan, University of Illinois

Nearly every field of government legislation is covered in this comprehensive survey for advanced or graduate study. The author provides a remarkably broad perspective of how and why we have arrived at our present state of affairs, and he indicates what the problems of the future will be. 1965, 672 pages, $8.95

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

Additional Textbooks From The Macmillan Company

VON GLAHN/LAW AMONG NATIONS: An Introduction to Public International Law

by Gerhard von Glahn, University of Minnesota

Discussion and 45 case abstracts are provided in this introductory text, eliminating the need for a separate casebook. Traditional in approach, the text follows what are essentially the modified positivist and monist positions. The author contends that the rules and principles embodied in international law represent law among nations, jus inter gentes, rather than law above nations. On the assumption that war will continue to be a policy instrument, there is discussion of the law of war. Included are treatments of the Cuban crisis, the test-ban treaty, the U-2 incident, recent decisions by the International Court of Justice, and recent conferences on the law of the seas. Documentation, footnotes, and suggested readings are numerous. 1965, 800 pages, $9.95

SCOTT-DAWSON/READINGS IN THE MAKING OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

by Andrew M. Scott and Raymond H. Dawson, both of the University of North Carolina

The only text which emphasizes policy formulation rather than content, this supplementary volume presents both the formal and informal influences which shape foreign affairs. Areas covered include United States foreign policy and the World Revolution; The Policy-Making Environment; Congress and Foreign Policy; The Executive Establishment; and The Overseas Administration of American Foreign Policy. Non-governmental groups are included. Contributors include Hubert Humphrey, McGeorge Bundy, Richard Neustadt, Joseph Alsop, W. W. Rostow, Paul H. Nitze, and Dean Acheson. March, 1965, 554 pages, $7.95

MULLER / DOCUMENTS ON EUROPEAN GOVERNMENT

by Steven Muller, Cornell University

This collection of documents provides the first readily available translations of the German electoral laws and the basic statements of major German and French parties. Readings are divided into three sections: 1) The Constitutions of the French Fifth Republic, the Federal Republic of Germany, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; 2) Programs and Statutes of Major Political Parties; 3) The Regulation and Conduct of Elections. 1963, 266 pages, paper, $2.25

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

ANNOUNCING

Harper's Comparative Government Series

EDITED BY MICHAEL CURTIS

HARPER'S COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT SERIES is now being prepared by a distinguished group of specialists. The Series will cover all significant political systemstheir historical background, political processes and institutions, and current functioning-in comprehensive, yet concise, paperbound volumes. Designed for undergraduate courses in comparative government and politics, the books will also be useful in upper-division courses and in area study programs. As well as providing fresh insights into the systems customarily forming the basis of comparative government courses, the Series breaks new ground in covering such areas as Communist China, East-Central European nations, and the political and economic integration of Western Europe.

THE FIRST THREE VOLUMES ARE NOW IN PRODUCTION

LATIN-AMERICAN POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT

The State University

Robert J. Alexander The text presents the formal governmental structure of 20 Latin American nations and the relationships between national and local administrations. Stressing the realities of Latin American political life, the author discusses the roles of political parties, the armed forces, the Church, organized labor, industrialists, the peasantry, and students, and examines such problems as agrarian reform, industrialization, education, and labor legislation. June.

WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION

Rutgers, The State University

Michael Curtis Emphasizing the military, economic, and political aspects of the movement toward Western European integration, the author traces developments since World War II. He analyzes the structure and operation of the Council of Europe, NATO and Western European Union, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the European Coal and Steel Community, the European Economic Community, Euratom, and the European Free Trade Association. June.

GOVERNMENTS OF THE COMMONWEALTH

Josephine F. Milburn Simmons College

All sections of the governmental processes are covered—constitutional background, citizen and interest group participation, and cabinet, legislative, administrative, judicial, regional, and local governmental activities. As well as making a truly comparative analysis of governments throughout the Commonwealth, Dr. Milburn discusses the use of similar political institutions in different social and economic situations. tions. For historical purposes, the text also covers South Africa. October.

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

FORTHCOMING 12 VOLUMES

COMMUNIST CHINA

Howard L. Boorman Columbia University

S. Bernard Thomas

EAST-CENTRAL EUROPE

George Stambuk George Washington University

Andrew Gyorgy Boston University

Vaclav Benes Indiana University

FRANCE

Roy Pierce

University of Michigan

GERMANY

Robert G. Neumann University of California, Los Angeles

GREAT BRITAIN

Douglas V. Verney York University

ISRAEL

Yehezkel Dror The Hebrew University

CONTEMPORARY ITALY

Dante Germino Wellesley College

Steffano Á. Passigli University of Florence

JAPAN

Warren M. Tsuneishi Yale University

NORTHERN EUROPE

Marvin Rintala Boston College

SOUTHEAST ASIA

Millidge P. Walker
The American University

THE SOVIET UNION

Abraham Brumberg United States Information Agency

Seweryn Bialer Columbia University

WEST AFRICA

J. Gus Liebenow Indiana University

Harper & Row, Publishers

49 East 33d Street • New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Significant STUDIES IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS from the Institute of International Studies University of South Carolina

THE PRESS IN JAPAN TODAY: A Case Study by Edward P. Whittemore A journalist on the scene analyzes forces contributing to the 1960 Japanese mob protests against the signing of the security pact with the United States. Particular attention is paid to coverage of the demonstrations by Asahi, the Mainichi, and the Yomiuri. "A thorough case study" Literature East and West. Reprinted in Japan.

91 pp. Illus.

$2.50 cloth, $1.00 paper

- THE UNITED NATIONS RECONSIDERED, edited by Raymond A. Moore

 A collection of evaluations by responsible international authorities on the present status and problems of the United Nations with an incisive introductory essay. It "... helps to place in proper perspective the criticisms leveled at that
- 3 DESTINY OF A DYNASTY: The Search For Institutions In Morocco's Developing Society by I. William Zartman body . . . "Military Review. 158 pp. Illus. $3.00 cloth, $1.00 paper

Historical background and recent development of Morocco's governmental organizations and an analysis of the direction of movement of present institutions. Points of emphasis are the Hassan Constitution and patterns of change during a period of transition.

108 pp. $3.00 cloth, $1.00 paper

4 A TIME TO BUILD - Military Civic Action: Medium For Economic Development and Social Reform by Harry F. Walterhouse

The role of armies in improving conditions in underdeveloped countries and in preventing future wars is explored in this first full-length treatment of a concept of defense which has received increased emphasis in the 1960's. The author draws on active experience in the field. 150 pp. $3.50 cloth, $1.50 paper

THE UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA PRESS Columbia, S. C. U.S.A.

St. Martin's Series in American Politics

General Editor, Earl Latham, Amherst College

Just published:

THE CONVENTION AND THE CONSTITUTION

Political Ideas of the Founding Fathers

By David G. Smith, Swarthmore College

1965. 128 pp. Paper. $1.75

College Department

St. Martin's Press

175 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10010

To be published:

Introduction to Politics

Earl Latham

The Presidency

Grant McConnell

Political Parties

Allen P. Sindler

Congress

Stephen K. Bailey

The Study of Political Theory

George Kateb

And Others

TWO WORLDS

By Casimir C. Gecys

Contents: .

Main Features of the Constitution of the USSR

Equality of Soviet Citizens

Equality of Rights of Soviet Women

Equality of Rights of Soviet Nationalities

Freedom of the Press, Speech, Assembly, Street Processions, and Association

Freedom of Cultural Activity

Freedom of Conscience and Religious Worship

Inviolability of Person and the Home and Privacy of Correspondence

Political Rights of Soviet Citizens

Right of Education

The Right to Work

The Rights to Social Insurance and Welfare Benefits

Appendix—Being a Comparison of the Constitutional Rights and Duties of the Soviet Citizens with those of the Citizens of the USA

XVI + 414, clothbound $6.50 net

Obtainable—CASIMIR C. GECYS

Fordham University

Box 690

Bronx, N.Y. 10458

COMPARATIVE WORLD

POLITICS
Readings in Western and

Premodern Non-Western International Relations

NEW FROM WADSWORTH

"This seems to me to be an unusually important contribution to the teaching materials of international politics... brings the comparative approach definitely within the reach of students." Harold Sprout, Princeton University / "An excellent compilation of useful materials drawn from a wide range of sources. Valuable as supplementary readings in courses on international relations, particularly those in which attention is given to non-Western conceptions." Oliver J. Lissitzyn, Columbia University / "This collection of readings is very useful both for courses in international relations and for introductory courses on Asia," Ardath W. Burks, Rutgers State University.

edited by JOEL LARUS, Brandeis University

PUBLIC OPINION

Focuses on the measurement of public opinion, its nature, and its importance to industrialized democracies. The text gives further stress to such basic ingredients of public opinion as the psychological equipment of the human being and the social institutions with which he interacts. Also provides in-depth coverage of dynamics of small-group communication and the mass media, attitude and opinion change, and policy change." To be published: Summer, 1965.

The author: BERNARD HENNESSY, Director of the National Center for Education in Politics

ISSUES OF THE SIXTIES

Second Edition

Over sixty statements on the dominant public issues of our time. Drawn from a variety of academic fields and from government and politics, the selections are juxtaposed to present contrasting viewpoints together with authoritative information and analysis. This second edition is entirely new, comprising recent materials which point to the emerging issues of the second half of the nineteen-sixties. To be published: Summer, 1965.

edited by LEONARD FREEDMAN, University of California, Los Angeles.

For further information, write to BOX WP

WADSWORTH PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC. BELMONT, CALIFORNIA

ALLYN AND BACON, INC.

Since 1868 . . . Leading Publishers of Textbooks

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

COMMUNISM IN PERSPECTIVE

by ANDREW GYORGY, Boston University

Stressing knowledge and objectivity, this text is intended for college introductory courses, junior colleges, and extension programs. The careers and impact of Marx, Lenin, Stalin, Khrushchev, and Mao Tse-tung are focused upon, and a practical examination is made of Communist Party structure and function, and Soviet life and government. A comprehensive survey of international Communism and an analysis of the "Cold War" and the Sino-Soviet conflict conclude the study. Illustrations, diagrams, maps, and charts enrich the text. Paperbound, 269 pp.

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT IN AMERICA

by DANIEL R. GRANT, Vanderbilt University, and H. C. NIXON, Professor Emeritus, Vanderbilt University

The authors effectively present the latest research findings in state legislative behavior, urban and metropolitan politics, and intergovernmental relations. Such topical subjects as metropolitics and civil rights are investigated.

439 pp.

APRIL 1965

THE JUDICIARY: The Supreme Court in the Governmental Process

by HENRY J. ABRAHAM, University of Pennsylvania

This book is part of the ALLYN AND BACON SERIES IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, under the General Editorship of William M. Beaney, Professor of Politics, Princeton University.

The text explores the judiciary in general, and the Supreme Court in particular, as a participant in the legal, governmental, and political process. Conveying an introductory view of a vital but little understood governmental institution, the text explains, evaluates and ventures conclusions.

Paperbound, est. 128 pp.

For further information write to: Arthur B. Conant, K 1

ALLYN AND BACON COLLEGE DIVISION

150 Tremont Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02111

THE JUDICIAL MIND

The Attitudes and Ideologies of Supreme Court Justices, 1946-1963

by Glendon Schubert

This is a study of the human elements that underlie the many major changes in national public policy which have come about as a result of decisions handed down by the Supreme Court during the middle decades of the twentieth century. Professor Schubert has undertaken a rigorous examination of the Court's decision-making records between 1946 and 1963, subjected them to factor analysis and cumulative linear scaling, and constructed a composite multi-dimensional model of the group decision-making function for the Supreme Court.

Coming in July 350 pages $10.00

THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS IN A CHANGING WORLD: Law, Politics, and Prospects

by Zelman Cowen

The Dean of the Faculty of Law at the University of Melbourne here describes the emergence of the contemporary multiracial, multilingual, and multicultural British Commonwealth, and seeks to provide a better understanding of some of its problems and tensions, such as the South African race policies and the issue of British entry into the Common Market.

150 pages $3.50

DATA PROCESSING

Applications to Political Research by Kenneth Janda

This handbook is designed as an introduction to the use of modern data processing technology in political research, specifically for the beginner. Particular attention is paid to ways in which information can be recorded, organized, and manipulated in punchcard form. Handbooks for Research in Political Behavior.

Coming in May.

175 pages $6.00, cloth $2.45, paper

EXPERIMENTATION

An Introductory Handbook for Political Scientists by Richard A. Brody

This book is an attempt to introduce the political scientist to the logic and philosophy of experimentation as a technique for the confirmation of scientific hypotheses. The author reviews the pertinent literature in the philosophy of science, and examines a variety of political science experiments. Handbooks for Research in Political Behavior.

Coming Fall, 1965 220 pages $6.00, cloth $2.45, paper

Handbooks for Research in Political Behavior already published: Survey Research by Charles H. Backstrom and Gerald D. Hursh ($5.00 and $1.95), and Content Analysis: A Handbook with Applications for the Study of International Crisis by Robert C. North, et al. ($6.00 and $2.95)

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY PRESS

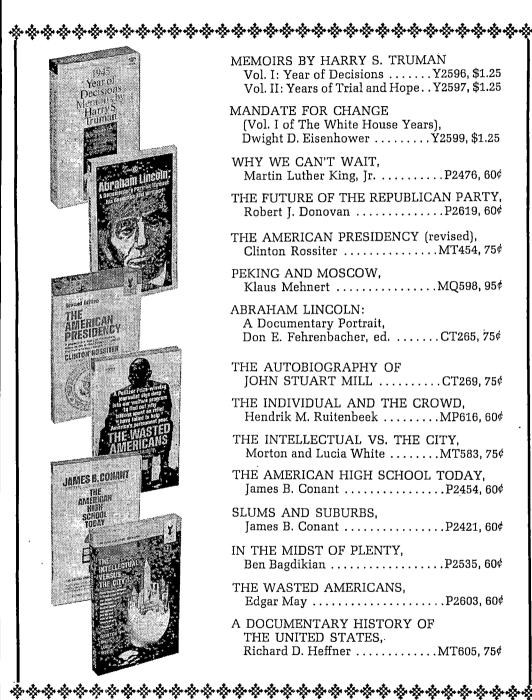

1735 Benson

Evanston, Illinois

60201

For Students of the Social Sciences...

SIGNET and MENTOR BOOKS

For further information on these and other paperbound books in your field, write to The Education Division

THE NEW AMERICAN LIBRARY

501 Madison Avenue, New York 10022

Railroads and Regulation, 1877-1916

By GABRIEL KOLKO. This is a case study of the relationship of the economy to the political process in the United States during the years from 1877 to 1916. Gabriel Kolko shows to what extent the railroad industry, with insoluble internal difficulties, encouraged and relied on national political solutions to its economic problems. "Every student of the Progressive Movement must take account of Kolko's findings."—Robert A. Lively

264 pages. $6.00

The Antislavery Vanguard:

New Essays on the Abolitionists

Edited by MARTIN DUBERMAN. These essays, by a younger generation of historians and writers offer some new points of view on the abolitionist movement as a part of the broader antislavery movement. Though the contributors have not seen their function as one of "vindication," their analyses point toward a more sympathetic evaluation of the motives, tactics, and effects of the movement.

450 pages. $10.00

The Spanish Republic and the Civil War, 1931-1939

By GABRIEL JACKSON. While recognizing the international aspects of the Civil War, Professor Jackson has chosen to relate the history of the Second Republic and the Civil War as seen from within Spain. He emphasizes the significance of events—the church burnings, the battle of Madrid, the bombing of Guernica—as the Spaniards saw them rather than as foreign journalists, poets, and diplomats saw them.

565 pages. $12.50

Revolution in Bavaria, 1918-1919

The Eisner Regime and the Soviet Republic

By ALLAN MITCHELL. The tangled affairs in Bavaria at the close of World War I constitute an important part of the history of the early Weimar Republic. This is a study of the 1918 revolution which overthrew the Bavarian monarchy—its causes, nature, results. "Most informative on Bavarian history in general."—Gordon Craig. "Many balanced judgments about long-controverted questions . . . adds greatly to our understanding of the Weimar Republic."—Klaus Epstein.

365 pages. $8.50

A Sterner Plan for Italian Unity:

The Italian National Society in the Risorgimento

By RAYMOND GREW. Drawing upon unpublished materials from archives and libraries throughout Europe, the author presents a comprehensive picture of the social, political, and intellectual climate of the period in which Italy became a nation. Winner of the Unita d'Italia prize, 1963, Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

504 pages. $10.00

Education and Political Development

No. 4, "Studies in Political Development"

Edited by JAMES S. COLEMAN. The knowledge and experience of nineteen specialists is brought to bear on the subject of the relationship of education and political development in at least ten countries around the world. The contributors both discuss theoretical matters and present the results of empirical research. Education and Political Development is the fourth of a series of seven books entitled "Studies in Political Development," sponsored by the Committee on Comparative Politics of the Social Science Research Council. 600 pages. $10.00

- 1. Communication and Political Development, edited by Lucian W. Pye. $6.50
- 2. Bureaucracy and Political Development, edited by Joseph La Palombara. $8.50
- 3. Political Modernization in Japan and Turkey, edited by Robert E. Ward and Dankwart A. Rustow. $8.75

Politics in the Congo:

Decolonization and Independence

By CRAWFORD YOUNG. This is a study of the process of decolonization, the development of the nationalist movement, and the salient aspects of the emerging post-independence policy in the Congo since 1945. The author considers the forces set loose by the Leopoldville explosion that uprooted a history of colonial rule. He distinguishes the elements of this experience and evaluates its impact on the African.

616 pages. $12.50

Underdeveloped Areas Within the Common Market

By SERGIO BARZANTI. The serious threat of the underdeveloped areas of the Common Market, particularly southern Italy and certain regions of France, to European unity is considered and constructive means to alleviate this danger are presented in this book. A careful analysis is made of the regional economies of the underdeveloped areas.

456 pages. $10.00

Conflict and Decision-making in Soviet Russia:

A Case Study of Agricultural Policy 1953-1963

By SIDNEY I. PLOSS. Using specialized methods of analysis and calling upon a wide range of sources, the author undertakes to offer new insights into the political processes in the Soviet Union. Agricultural policy from 1953 to 1963 has been selected as a case example of Soviet conflict and decision-making because it has been a constant preoccupation of the Soviet leadership and it impinges at many levels on the crucial questions of how to govern and how to allocate resources.

320 pages. $6.50

Princeton University Press

Selected Problems Suitable for Political Science from Two Distinguished Series

PROBLEMS IN EUROPEAN CIVILIZATION

Ralph W. Greenlaw and Dwight E. Lee, General Editors

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION AND BOLSHEVIK VICTORY—Why and How? Arthur E. Adams, Michigan State University

THE VERSAILLES SETTLEMENT—Was It Foredoomed to Failure? Ivo J. Lederer, Yale University

THE STALIN REVOLUTION—Fulfillment or Betrayal of Communism? Robert V. Daniels, University of Vermont

THE ETHIOPIAN CRISIS—Touchstone of Appeasement? Ludwig F. Schaefer, Carnegie Institute of Technology

THE NAZI REVOLUTION—Germany's Guilt or Germany's Fate?

John L. Snell, Tulane University

THE BRITISH IN INDIA—Imperialism or Trusteeship?

Martin Deming Lewis, Sir George Williams University, Montreal, Canada

THE OUTBREAK OF THE SECOND WORLD WAR—Design or Blunder?

John L. Snell, Tulane University

THE COLD WAR—Ideological or Power Struggle? Norman A. Graebner, The University of Illinois

PROBLEMS IN AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

George Rogers Taylor, General Editor

WILSON AT VERSAILLES

Theodore P. Greene, Amherst College

THE NEW DEAL—Revolution or Evolution?, Revised Edition Edwin C. Rozwenc, Amherst College

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AND THE SUPREME COURT

Alfred Haines Cope, Fred Krinsky, Syracuse University

PEARL HARBOR—Roosevelt and the Coming of the War, Revised Edition George M. Waller, Butler University

THE YALTA CONFERENCE

Richard F. Fenno, Jr., University of Rochester

D. C. HEATH AND COMPANY

Home Office: Boston, Mass. 02116 Sales Offices: Englewood, N.J. 07631 Chicago, Ill. 60616 San Francisco, Calif. 94105 Atlanta, Ga. 30303 Dallas, Tex. 75201 London W. C. 1 Toronto 2-B

New in 1965 from HR & W . . .

Now Available, 3rd Edition of . . .

American Democracy in Theory and Practice:

Essentials of National, State and Local Government

Robert K. Carr, President, Oberlin College, Marver H. Bernstein and Walter F. Murphy, both of Princeton University

Designed to cover succinctly the most important aspects of American national, state and local government, this edition includes a new chapter on political behavior and a new chapter on political parties. Incorporates data on the 1964 election campaigns, on campaign contributions, as well as election results.

March 1965

672 pp. $8.50 tent.

American Government Annual, 1965-66

Edited by Donald C. Herzberg, Executive Director, Eagleton Institute of Politics, Rutgers University

Reviews the major events of the past year and defines principles of American government through a study of specific topics:

Religion and Government, Murray Stedman American Foreign Policy, Gerard J. Mangone The American Courts, Rocco Tresolin Politics, 1964, Charles Jones The Presidency . . . 1964, Donald H. Riddle

Congress . . . 1964, Mark Ferber April 1965 160 pp.

$2.50 tent., paper

POLITICAL UNIFICATION

Amitai Etzioni, Columbia University

"...a sophisticated manuscript and firmly placed in the vanguard of political science... moves in a direction slightly ahead of its time." Kenneth Prewitt, Washington and Stanford Universities

April 1965 352 pp. $3.50 tent.

PENNSYLVANIA POLITICS, Revised

Edward F. Cooke, University of Pittsburgh Edward G. Janosik, University of Pennsylvania

Designed to acquaint every interested citizen with the election laws and procedures of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the politics and practices of Pennsylvania political parties.

January 1965

128 pp. $1.95, paper

Holt, Rinehart and Winston, inc.

383 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10017

In Canada: 833 Oxford Street, Toronto 18, Ontario

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL PROCESS

By CHARLES R. ADRIAN and CHARLES PRESS, Michigan State University. 720 pages, $7.95.

This vital new text is designed to introduce your students to the basic political processes and institutions of American national government. It is not a collection of current events nor an encyclopedia of facts. Rather, the authors concentrate on the nature of governmental and other political decisions and on the function of interest groups and ideologies in making these decisions. Their object is to provide the student with meaningful tools for the analysis of political events that affect him and his society.

The book is primarily eclectic in approach. It utilizes empirical evidence available from the behavioral sciences, supplemented by historical materials and data gathered through traditional political science research. Contemporary behavioral research is presented in a style that is clear and free from jargon.

Important features

- a clear, systematic treatment of the decision-making process and its component parts—institutions, actors, ideology, the legal framework, interest groups, and the communications process.
- m contains more sociological, cultural, and ideological background material than most introductory works.
- incorporates recent studies on how Congress and the President perform in the political process.
- a STUDY GUIDE and an INSTRUCTOR'S MANUAL will be available with the

McGRAW-HILL BOOKS

AMERICAN POLITICS AND THE PARTY SYSTEM, Third Edition

By HUGH A. BONE, University of Washington. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. Available in April.

Provides the reader with both a theoretical and practical understanding of the role and significance of political parties with special reference to the American system.

THE MAKERS OF PUBLIC POLICY: American Power Groups and Their Ideologies

By JOSEPH MONSEN, University of Washington; and MARK CANNON, Brigham Young University. 368 pages, $6.95

Outlines and documents the position and ideology of the major power groups in this country that determine our public policy.

MAN AND HIS GOVERNMENT: An Empirical Theory of Politics

By CARL J. FRIEDRICH, Harvard University. 737 pages, $13.50 (trade) 752 pages, $9.95 (text)

Based on a distinguished lifetime of research, reflection, and writing on politics, this empirical analysis encompasses the data of all men's political experience.

POLITICAL THOUGHT: from Plato to the Present

By M. JUDD HARMON, Utah State University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 584 pages, $7.95.

A stimulating, clearly written introduction to the history of Western political thought—from ancient Greece to the 20th century totalitarian regimes of Italy, Germany, and the Soviet Union.

IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

FOUNDATIONS OF AMERICAN GOV-ERNMENT AND POLITICAL SCIENCE

JOSEPH P. HARRIS, University of California, Berkeley, Consulting Editor.

GOVERNING OUR FIFTY STATES AND THEIR COMMUNITIES. By CHARLES R. ADRIAN, Michigan State University. 144 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

POLITICS AND VOTERS. By HUGH A. BONE, University of Washington, and AUSTIN RANNEY, University of Wisconsin. 144 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN MOD-ERN SOCIETY. By JOHN J. 'CORSON, Princeton University, and JOSEPH P. HARRIS. 168 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS. By ROWLAND EGGER, University of Virginia, and JOSEPH P. HARRIS. 136 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

THE STUDY OF POLITICS: The Western Tradition and American Origins. By ANDREW HACKER, Cornell University. 112 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

AMERICA IN WORLD AFFAIRS. By CHARLES LERCHE, Jr., The American University. 128 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM. By C. HERMAN PRITCHETT, The University of Chicago. 144 pages, $3.50 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

LIBERTY IN THE BALANCE: Current Issues in Civil Liberties. By H. FRANK WAY, University of California at Riverside. 136 pages, $4.95 (hard cover), $1.50 (soft cover).

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT, Eighth Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, Pennsylvania State University, and DEAN E. Mc-HENRY, University of California, Santa Cruz. Available in April.

A thorough revision of this well-known political science text. The authors have again presented a reliable factual account of government at all levels—national, state, and local. Emphasis throughout the book is on major questions of public policy and current political problems.

There will be a Fourth Edition of the Holloway and Ader STUDY GUIDE IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT and a new improved Instructor's Manual.

THE AMERICAN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT, Eighth Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON and DEAN E. McHENRY. Available in April.

Exactly the same as THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT, except that it omits the concluding chapters which deal with state and local government. Designed for basic courses in national government.

Send for examination copies today

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

Allyn & Bacon, Inc.	307
American Telephone & Telegraph Co	257
Appleton-Century-Crofts, Inc	284, 285
Aqueduct Books	255
American Telephone & Telegraph Co	253
-Blaisdell Publishing Company
University of Chicago Press	291
University of Chicago Press	281
Dodd, Mead & Company, Inc.	289
Dorsey Press	256
Dorsey Press	200
The Error Bross	274 275
The Free Press
Casimir Gecys
General Motors Corporation
Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc.	258, 259
Harper & Row, Publishers Inc	1, 286, 298, 299
Harvard University Press	292, 293
D. C. Heath & Co	312
Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc	313
Houghton Mifflin Company	268
Oscar Ibele	Cover III
Kraus Reprint Corporation
J. B. Lippincott Company	290
Little, Brown & Company	269, 270, 271
McGraw-Hill Book Company	314 315
Macmillan Company	6 294 295 296 297
Mendota Research Group	254
New American Library	300
Northwestern University Press	252 308
Oxford University Press	276 277 278 270
Frederick A. Praeger	Cover II
Prederick A. Praeger
Prentice-Hall, Inc.	301, 302, 303, 304
Princeton University Press
Rand McNally & Company	4, 5
Random House—Alfred A. Knopt	264, 265, 266, 267
St. Martin's Press, Inc.
Scott, Foresman and Co
Charles Scribner's Sons	280
University of South Carolina Press	300
Syracuse University Press	282
Teachers Insurance & Annuity Assn	262
D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc	Cover IV
D. Van Nostrand Company, Inc	306
George Wahr Publishing Co	255
John Wiley & Sons, Inc	272, 273
Yale University Press

Vol. LIX

June, 1965

No. 2

Electoral Myth and Reality: The 1964 Election	Philip E. Converse, Aage R. Clausen and Warren E. Miller	321
Safe Seats, Seniority, and Power in Congress	Raymond E. Wolfinger and Joan Heifetz	225
Character and Mission of a United Nations Peace Force,		337
Under Conditions of General and Complete Disarmament	Charles Burton Marshall .	350
The 1914 Case	Ole R. Holsti	365
Law, Society and the Domestic Regime in Russia, in Historical Perspective	George L. Yaney	379
The Significance of Void Ballots in West German Elections	Rodney P. Stiefbold	391
Scientists and the Policy Process	Avery Leiserson	408
Democracy, Organization, Michels	John D. May	417
Christian Thomasius: Enlightenment and Bureaucracy	Frederick M. Barnard	430
Communications		439
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography	Austin Ranney (ed.)	448
News and Notes	Leo B. Lott (ed.)	543

(For list of books reviews, see Lage 448)

Published quarterly by

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University

OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University

HAROLD STEIN, Princeton University

Andrew Hacker, Cornell University

ROWLAND EGGER, Princeton University

J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College

STANLEY HOFFMANN, Harvard University ROBERT E. LANE, Yale University

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

Austin Ranney, Book Review Editor, University of Wisconsin

LEO B. LOTT, News and Notes Editor, Ohio State University

Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland

S. Sidney Ulmer, University of Kentucky

JUDITH SHKLAR, Harvard University

RICHARD L. MERRITT, Yale University

CORINNE SILVERMAN, Philadelphia

NIMROD RAPHAELI, University of Michigan

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus, Ohio 43210

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy; for back issues address Johnson Reprint Corp., 111 5th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10003.

Applications for membership, orders for the Review, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the Review to Harvey C. Mansfield, 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus, Ohio 43210; books intended for review, to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.; News and Notes items, to Leo B. Lott, 216 N. Oval Drive, Columbus, Ohio 43210; advertising, reprint and circulation correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the Review before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the Review, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan. A Cumulative Index of the Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963, may be obtained from Northwestern University Press, 816 University Place, Evanston, Illinois.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1965, by The American Political Science Association.

The Metropolis: Its People, Politics, and Economic Life JOHN C. BOLLENS • HENRY J. SCHMANDT

Here is a comprehensive analysis of the metropolis as a dynamic system of interacting relationships among people, organizations, and institutions. The text covers many phases of the metropolitan community: government and politics, social characteristics and trends, economic developments, and physical and land use considerations. The authors utilize a broad range of empirical investigations into metropolitan and urban phenomena and the relevant theory that has emerged. They analyze problems of metropolitan growth and efforts being made to solve them, and appraise the complex whole of metropolitan life and its future. Just published. 609 pp. $8.95

The War-Peace Establishment ARTHUR HERZOG

An authoritative examination of the role of the United States in the thermonuclear age. The author explores the views of the most influential groups and individuals responsible for the formulation of national policy. Among those whose viewpoints are examined are Robert Strausz-Hupé, Edward Teller, Henry Kissinger, Thomas Schelling, Albert Wohlstetter, and Herman Kahn. "Mr. Herzog has provided a useful layman's guide through some of the most important and provocative research in the country today."—ELIOT FREMONT-SMITH, in The New York Times.

271 pp. Text Edition $3.50. Paper

Harper & Row 18 7 Publishers

THE JOHN F. KENNEDY MEMORIAL AWARD

• for biography or history, including current history o

The Judges:

McGEORGE BUNDY ROBERT F. KENNEDY ALLAN NEVINS

The John F. Kennedy Memorial Award will be given to that book of general interest which, in the opinion of the judges, best illuminates the influence on his times of an individual—or several individuals—and thereby fosters an understanding of this country or its role in the world. To the winner of the award Harper & Row will pay the sum of $10,000, of which $2000 is an outright grant and $8000 is a minimum guarantee of royalties. The publishers and the judges hope to make the first award to a manuscript received prior to December 31, 1965. The publishers expect the award to be made at regular intervals in the ensuing years. The award has been established with an endowment representing the publishers' entire profit from the sale of the Memorial Edition of PROFILES IN COURAGE by John F. Kennedy. A brochure providing all necessary information may be obtained by writing to The John F. Kennedy Memorial Award; Harper & Row, Publishers; 49 East 33d Street, New York, N.Y. 10016.

49 EAST 33d STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from the college department of

RAND MCNALLY & COMPANY

History of Political Philosophy

Edited by LEO STRAUSS and JOSEPH CROPSEY

University of Chicago

Main elements of political philosophy from Plato to John Dewey are woven into a comprehensive, scholarly, and highly readable survey text. Carefully selected political theories are objectively treated not only as history but as factors which lead to an understanding of present society. Christian, Jewish and Muslim contributions to political theory are examined along with work of authors not generally recognized as political philosophers. The text guides the student through the readings of the tradition and encourages him to seek additional sources.

1963 • 790 pages • 6 x 9 inches • $8.50

New Perspectives on the House of Representatives

Edited by ROBERT L. PEABODY

The Johns Hopkins University

and NELSON W. POLSBY

Wesleyan University

The intricate, ritualistic traditions and policies of the House of Representatives are exposed and explained in thirteen essays. Grouped into four areas of House influence, the essays portray the politics of the House as well as its variety and diversity. The essays, four of which have never before been published, will be particularly useful for courses on legislative process, behavior, and political parties.

1963 • 392 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $3.50 paper • $6.50 cloth

Political Parties: A Behavioral Analysis

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD

University of Michigan

A functional theory of political parties developed from a thorough investigation of party systems in a large metropolitan area. Interviews with leaders from three different echelons of the parties analyze their personal characteristics, ideologies, motivations and perspectives. Four critical theories about party structures are developed and tested; both sociological and psychological factors are used in explaining party leadership and organization. The book concentrates on the environmental conditions to which the party must adapt and emphasizes the motivational basis of leadership.

1964 • c. 624 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $8.00

Information, Analysis, Opinions, Conclusions

Rand McNally Public Affairs Series

Edited by ROBERT A. GOLDWIN

University of Chicago

The most important political issues of the times are discussed in depth. Varied approaches and opposing points of view from government, industry, and the academic world provide thought-provoking questions and offer possible solutions for such problems as political parties, emancipation, and foreign aid. The essays in the 5 books of the series were originally presented to the Public Affairs Conference Center of the University of Chicago.

America Armed:

Essays on United States Military Policy

Six essays treat the "unthinkable"—thermonuclear war. 1964 • 140 pages • 5½ x 8½ inches • $1,50 paper

A Nation of States:

Essays on the American Federal System

An examination of the federal system as it appears in civil rights, the farm program and welfare programs.

1964 • 148 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $1.50 paper

Why Foreign Aid?

Facts, theories, pros, cons of foreign aid programs presented through eight essays.

1964 • 140 pages • 5½ x 8½ inches • $1.50 paper

Political Parties, U.S.A.

Seven essays describe the sense of confusion and dissatisfaction shared by observers of the American political process.

1964 • 158 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches • $1.50 paper

100 Years of Emancipation

Treats primarily the question of why slavery problems exist 100 years after the Emancipation Proclamation.

1964 • 217 pages • 51/2 x 81/2 inches

to order, write: Room 200 The College Department; Rand McNally & Company, Box 7600, Chicago, 60680

A masterful, prophetic analysis of force in the modern world, and of the potential deliverance of mankind from the rule of force, by one of America's most influential social scientists

"His work conveys a better sense of political realities than that of almost any other political scientist, and his methods of moral persuasion meet the most rigorous standard of clarity and candor....The moral aim of all his books is central and consistent; to explain and defend the theory and practice of democratic government."

-The New York Review of Books

"Robert MacIver...has put his gifts to good purpose. He has enlivened and clarified a large subject and extracted its main meaning."

-The New York Times Book Review

"A summing-up by one of America's greatest students of man and society.... A deep sense of concern for the individual, for society...motivates Power Transformed."

-Book Week

At all bookstores $5.00

POWER TRANSFORMED

by Robert M. MacIver author of The Web of Government

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

The American Political Science Review

VOL. LIX

JUNE, 1965

NO. 2

ELECTORAL MYTH AND REALITY: THE 1964 ELECTION

PHILIP E. CONVERSE, AAGE R. CLAUSEN, AND WARREN E. MILLER University of Michigan

On Election Day, 1964, the aspirations of Senator Barry Goldwater and the conservative wing of the Republican Party were buried under an avalanche of votes cast for incumbent President Lyndon Johnson. The margin of victory, approaching 16 million votes, was unprecedented. Historical comparisons with other presidential landslides are left somewhat indeterminate by the intrusion of third parties. However, it is safe to observe that Johnson's 61.3 percent of the two-party popular vote put him in the same general range as the striking victories of Franklin Delano Roosevelt in 1936, Harding in 1920, and Theodore Roosevelt in 1904.

Before the fact, the election was also expected to be the most intensely ideological campaign since 1936, in no small measure because of Goldwater's reputation as a "pure" conservative. After the fact, doubts existed as to whether this expectation had been fulfilled. Goldwater supporters, in particular, expressed disappointment that President Johnson had refused to join battle on any of the fundamental ideological alternatives that were motivating the Goldwater camp. However, as we shall see, the mass public had some sense that "important differences" between the two major parties were heightened in 1964 compared with parallel data from either 1960 or, as is more impressive, the relatively tense election of 1952.1 And certainly no one questioned the importance of ideological differences in the factional dispute that split the Republican Party along liberalconservative lines with an enduring bitterness unmatched in decades.

¹ The collection of data from a national sample of the electorate around the 1964 election was made possible by a grant to the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan from the Carnegie Corporation of New York, which had also supported the 1952 election study.

Indeed, these three prime elements of the 1964 election—faction, ideology and the contest for votes—became intertwined after the manner of a classic script. That is, the "outer" ideological wing of a party captures its nomination, leaving a vacuum toward the center of gravity of national opinion. This vacuum is gleefully filled by the opposing party without any loss of votes from its own side of the spectrum. The outcome, logically and inexorably, is a landslide at the polls.²

With a script so clearly written in advance, the outsider would naturally ask why any party controlled by rational strategists should choose a course likely to lead to such massive repudiation in its name. The answers to this question in the 1964 case are not particularly obscure, although they can be made at numerous levels. One answer, of course, is that Republican Party strategists were themselves in deep disagreement as to just what script was relevant: many recognized the classic script and predicted the eventual outcome, with all of its attendant losses for other Republican candidates, in deadly accuracy.

For the factional dispute within Republican ranks involved not only an ideological clash, but also major differences in the perception of that political reality which becomes important in winning votes and elections. The Goldwater faction was told by its Republican adversaries, as the conservative wing had been told for years, that a Goldwater could not conceivably defeat a Democratic President, and would instead greatly damage the party ticket at all levels. The Goldwater group countered that a victory for their man was entirely plausible despite the danger signals of the spring polls and the normal difficulties of challenging an incumbent. It is not clear how sincere or widespread this confidence was: some statements sounded as though the Goldwater candidacy had little chance of winning but would at least provide a forum for the conservative philosophy, along with control of the Republican Party. But even in their more pessimistic moments, the Goldwater people would argue that while victory might be difficult, they certainly saw no reason to believe that Goldwater would do worse than any other Republican challenger, or encounter the electoral disaster the liberals were predicting.

² The most fertile elaboration of this classic script is of course contained in Anthony Downs, An Economic Theory of Democracy (New York, 1957).

Similarly, at the San Francisco nominating convention, his opponents vehemently charged that Goldwater was a "minority candidate," even among Republicans in this country. In another direct clash of perceptions, Senator Goldwater is said to have remarked to a group of Midwestern delegates, "What the minority [the convention liberals] can't get through their heads is that this is a true representation of the Republican Party."3

In this article we wish to examine the relationship between such conflicting perceptions and what is known of the relevant reality in the context of the 1964 election. Our information comes primarily from sample survey studies of the mass public that formed the electorate in 1964, and whose reactions represent one level of political reality about which so many conflicting opinions and predictions were made. While the most important aspect of that reality was unveiled by the election outcome, there remained some of the customary latitude of interpretation as to its full significance. And with respect to the interplay between the stratagems of party elites on one hand and the grass-roots American voters on the other, the chronology of the 1964 election does indeed provide a fascinating composite of sheer myth, genuine but discrepant reality worlds, and self-fulfilling prophecies.

I. THE MYTH OF THE STAY-AT-HOME REPUBLICANS

The first theory of electoral reality on our agenda may be rapidly disposed of, for it lies more simply and unequivocally in the realm of myth than any of the others we shall treat. It should not be overlooked, however, both because of its historical persistence and because of its enshrinement in the battle cry of 1964 Goldwater supporters: "A choice, not an echo!"

In the quadrennial competition between liberal and conservative wings of the Republican Party for the presidential nomination throughout the 1940s and 1950s, the conservatives were consistently bested. One of the prime contentions of the liberals was that all of the entries of the conservative wing were so distant from the "middle-of-the-road" that they had no hope of attracting the independent votes necessary for victory over the Democrats. At an ideological level, the conservative wing coined the epithet "me-tooism" to ridicule the liberals for their refusal to reject Democratic innovations of the New and Fair Deal eras root and branch. The liberals, it was charged, were slowly selling out the fundamental principles on which earlier days of G.O.P. ascendancy had been based.

This accusation of ideological "flabbiness" was not, however, compelling of itself without some further comment on the problem of winning votes. As a consequence, a theory became widely current among conservative Republicans that G.O.P. difficulties in maintaining much contact with the White House were in fact directly tied to the "me-tooist" flavor of its presidential candidates. Republicans running for that office tended to lose not because there was any lack of potential Republican votes (as the superficial observer might have thought), but because many of the "real" Republicans were sufficiently offended by "metooism" that they simply didn't bother to vote at all. Nominate a true Republican rather than a Tweedledee, the theory went, and enough of these stay-at-homes would return to the polls to put him into the White House.

As such theories go, this contention was remarkably verifiable. That is, the critic need not argue that few Republicans were disappointed by the nominees of their party, for disappointment in itself is irrelevant for argument. The question is simply whether or not Republicans, however disappointed, did continue to turn out and vote even for "me-tooist" candidates through this period—a matter much easier to ascertain. Nor is there any point in arguing that there were never any stray Republicans who in the last analysis vented their frustrations by refusing to go to the polls. Undoubtedly there were. But the theory hinges less on the question as to whether such people existed, than on the contention that they existed in significant numbers: not merely several hundred or several thousand or even a few hundred thousand, but in the millions needed to overcome the persistent Democratic majorities.

Such a pool of potential voters would be large enough to be discriminated reliably in most sample surveys. And we know of no reputable sample surveys at any time in this period that gave any shred of reason to believe that this significant pool of stay-at-home Republicans existed. Indeed, such findings as were relevant pointed massively in the opposite direction. From 1944 on, for example, one can contrast turnout rates between Democrats and Republicans of comparable strengths of identification. And over election after election featuring "me-tooist" Republican nominees, one finds that turnout rates are consistently higher -and often much higher-on the Republican side. Indeed, each time we isolate that polar minority who not only have an intense commitment to the Republican Party, but whose commitment is of a highly sensitive ideological sort, turnout typically reaches proportions staggering for the American system: 96 percent, 98 percent—levels almost implausible in view of registration difficulties, travel, sickness and other accidents which can keep the most devoted American from the polls upon occasion. More impressive still, we find that in 1952 those Republicans who reported during the campaign that they would have preferred the "conservative" Taft over the "liberal" Eisenhower-exactly those Republicans to whom the theory refers-actually turned out at much higher rates to vote for Eisenhower in the November election (94 percent) than did the set of Republicans who indicated satisfaction with Eisenhower's nomination (84 percent).4

³ The New York Times, July 19, 1964.

These brief observations do not begin to exhaust the evidence, none of which lends any support whatever to the theory of a silent pool of frustrated conservative Republicans. Hence it is scarcely surprising that the Goldwater cause in 1964 was not buoyed up by some sudden surge of new support at the polls which other strategists had overlooked; for the hitherto silent people expected to provide such a 4 This datum is not as absurd as it might appear if the reader has failed to grasp the import of the preceding text. That is, in 1952 it was the most intense and ideologically "pure" Republicans who tended to prefer Taft to Eisenhower, much as 12 years later their counterparts chose Goldwater over the other Republican alternatives. It was the less ideologically committed (either by persuasion or by lack of ideological sensitivity) who were more satisfied with the Eisenhower candidature. The erstwhile Taft supporters did not perversely turn out at higher rates because they were disappointed in the convention choice, but because their striking commitment to Republicanism compelled them to more ardent support of its candidate whatever his ideological position.

surge existed principally in the imaginations of conservative strategists who in time of adversity needed desperately to believe that they were there. It is less of a wonder that this theory was generated, particularly before sample survey data took on much scope or stature in the 1940s, than that it persisted with greater or lesser vigor into the 1960s in the face of repetitive contradictory evidence readily available to any proponents with an edge of interest as to what the facts actually were.

II. THE MINORITY CANDIDATE OF A MINORITY PARTY

On the eve of the Republican nominating convention, an irate Goldwater supporter wrote to the Paris edition of the Herald Tribune, upbraiding it for the doubts it had expressed as to the extent of Goldwater sentiment beyond the convention delegates themselves, and pointing out that a massive groundswell of support had built up for Goldwater throughout the country "west of Madison Avenue."

The charge of the liberal wing of the G.O.P. that Goldwater not only was unattractive to Democrats and Independents but was not even the majority preference of Republicans was a particularly severe allegation in view of the constraints under which the Republican Party has been obliged to operate in recent years. It has been the consensus of observers for quite some time that the Republican Party is a minority party in the affections of the American public. Our relevant data collections at frequent intervals since 1952 have left little question in our minds both as to the minority status of the Republicans, and as to the stability of that status during this epoch. For most of this time, our estimates would suggest that in terms of underlying loyalties, the Democrats could expect to receive, all other things equal, something in the neighborhood of 54 percent of the national popular vote; and if any change has been occurring in this figure in the past 15 years, it is that this Democratic majority is slowly increasing.5 In practical terms, this means that a Democratic candidate need not have much attraction for grass-roots Republicans: he can win easily if he can but carry the votes of a reasonable share of independents, and has general appeal for Democrats. A Republican candidate, on the other hand, can only win at the national level by drawing nearly monolithic support from Republicans, attracting the votes of a lion's share of independents, and inducing unusual defection among the less committed Democratic identifiers as well. The latter was the Eisenhower formula, and one which Nixon had nearly succeeded in following in 1960. More generally, the liberal wing of the Republican Party had sought candidates with this kind of broad appeal throughout this period. In this light, the question of Goldwater's popularity was serious: for if a minority party nominates a figure enjoying only minority support within his own party, it is an obvious invitation to disaster.

⁵ See "The Concept of a 'Normal Vote,' "ch. 1 in A. Campbell, P. Converse, W. Miller and D. Stokes, Elections and the Political Order (New York, 1965.)

In the spring and early summer of 1964, the opinion polls lent much weight to the contention that Goldwater enjoyed no broad support even among Republicans. The Goldwater supporters tended to counter this kind of evidence either (1) by ignoring the polls; or (2) by questioning the validity of the polls (some Goldwater placards were to read "Gallup didn't count us!"); or (3) by questioning the immutability of the early poll readings. Of these reactions, certainly the last-mentioned was entirely appropriate. That is, in the very early stages of a push toward the presidency, even a person who has been something of a "national" figure as Senator or major Governor for a considerable period may not be recognized by very large portions of the public. Until he has received much more intense national exposure in the limelight of presidential primaries and the nominating convention, "straw polls" as to his popularity can be highly misleading and unstable, particularly if the polling pits such a candidate against other figures with more longstanding national prominence and "household"

However, survey data gathered over the course of 1964 can be put together with "hard" data from the presidential primaries to provide an illuminating picture of Goldwater's general popularity and, in particular, the reactions of grass-roots Republicans to him. In January, 1964, before the beginning of the spring primaries, we asked a national sample of the electorate:

Many people are wondering who will run for President on the Republican side this fall. . . . If you had to make a choice, which Republican leader do you think would be best for our country in 1964?

Who would be your second choice?

Are there any of the leading Republicans that you think would make very bad candidates?

In our estimation, some challengers of this description have been prematurely discouraged from competition by poll results which might well have changed radically with greater exposure.

Table I summarizes the responses to this sequence of questions. The open-ended nature of the questions meant that individuals only rated those Republicans whom they were aware of at the time, and thought of as plausible candidates. The table excludes a thin scattering of other mentions. Since the scoring used reflects both the breadth and the intensity of support, a Republican receiving relatively few mentions could not achieve any very high score. Thus, for example, another possible scoring could have shown Henry Cabot Lodge vastly outdistancing all other aspirants, as his references were almost unanimously positive. whereas the other Republicans suffered numerous descriptions as "very bad candidates." However, at this time he was not commonly regarded as an aspirant for the nomination, and the scoring deliberately puts this warm but limited positive feeling toward him in perspective.7

The table speaks for itself as to Goldwater's attractiveness as a candidate. Clearly Goldwater's problem was not that he was still too little known: he received mentions from a wider proportion of the electorate than any of his competitors. But for much of the electorate he was an object of antagonism even in January, 1964. And among grass-roots Republicans, where his strength was concentrated, he remained fourth in a field of six.

The sequence of Republican primary elections in the succeeding months tended, with some local variation, to fit the lines suggested by these January reactions. The table presages the startling Lodge write-in victory over both Goldwater and Rockefeller among New Hampshire Republicans in March, as well as his numerous subsequent strong showings. It contains ample warning as well of the amazingly poor Goldwater record in the primaries throughout the spring, including the scattered victories in such seemingly congenial states as conservative Nebraska, where by standing alone on the ticket he managed to win about half of the votes cast over a flood of Nixon and Lodge write-ins. It even renders intelligible the crucial Goldwater victory in California, where write-ins were not permitted, where the sole opponent was Rockefeller, and where Democrats had a hotly fought primary of their own. Indeed, there is room to wonder whether any presidential aspirant has ever contested so many primaries with as disastrous a showing, and still captured the nomination of his party's convention.

⁷ Lodge's strong grass-roots popularity was one of the untold stories of the 1960 election, when he ran for vice-president. Well-known for his televised confrontations with the Russian delegation in the United Nations, he was far and away the most widely recognized and warmly regarded first-time vice-presidential candidate in the elections we have studied. Given the tarnish which seems to accompany second efforts at the presidency in American elections and which would undoubtedly have hurt Nixon, it may well be that Lodge, had he been acceptable to the Republican Party leadership, could have pushed Lyndon Johnson to a closer race than any other of the Republican hopefuls.

No evidence from polls of the period, moreover, suggests that Goldwater's popularity showed any sudden increase, even among Republicans, in the short interval between the final primary and the San Francisco convention. In interviewing our sample of the national electorate in September and October, we asked respondents to recall their reactions to the decisions of the Republican convention, including the identity of the candidates they had preferred at the time the convention began, as well as their gratification, indifference or disappointment at the outcome. While these responses suffer the inevitable frailties of any retrospective accounts that go back over an evolving situation, the social and political lines of support and antagonism for the various major contestants in July as reported during the campaign bear so close a resemblance to the lines of support visible in the January, 1964 data, as to make it unlikely that they are badly distorted by selective recollection, post hoc rationalization, and the like.

It is most instructive, perhaps, to set these popular reactions to the 1964 Republican convention against a fairly comparable set of data collected in 1952 after the conservative wing had lost its bid to nominate Senator Taft for the presidency against the liberal wing's offering of General Eisenhower, for the bitterness engendered in the 1952 struggle came closer to matching that of 1964 than either of the intervening conventions. Our question in 1952 asked respondents irrespective of partisan allegiance whether they would have preferred to have seen any other candidate nominated in either of the major-party conventions held in Chicago. Thus Republican identifiers could focus their remarks on the Democratic convention in a way that the 1964 question did not permit. However, partisans tended to comment primarily on the outcomes of their own party's nominating conventions.

Among Republican identifiers in the fall of 1952, about one in five recalled having felt a preference for Taft at the time of the conven-

TABLE I. PREFERENCES FOR THE REPUBLICAN PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION AMONG SELECTED SEGMENTS OF THE ELECTORATE,

JANUARY, 1964

	, ,	Segments of the Electorate
	Per cent mentions ^a	Score across total elec- torate ^b	Score within "Minimal Majority": all Inde- pendents and Re- publicans ^b	Score among all Re- publicans ^b
	(%)
Nixon	42	+25	+32	+37
Lodge	10	+11	+13	+13
Romney	11	+ 9	+11	+10
Rockefeller	49	+19	+10	+ 1
Scranton	11	+ 7	+ 6	+ 5
Goldwater	54	- 8	- 5	+ 9

^a The percentage entered represents the proportion of individuals in the total sample mentioning the Republican leader indicated, either as one of two best or one of two very bad candidates.

tion. Another eight percent had preferred some third candidate. The vast majority of the remaining 72 percent indicated that they had been indifferent to the choices at either convention, or expressed gratification in the selection of Eisenhower as the Republican candidate. Some other Republicans responded that they would have preferred a candidate other than Stevenson from the Democratic convention. Presumably, however, these citizens were satisfied with the Republican convention, and it seems reasonable to conclude that a maximum of some 30 percent of all Republicans in 1952 had ground to recall any disappointment over their party's nomination.

The picture from 1964 is remarkably similar in one respect, and drastically different in another. Among Republican identifiers in this latter year, slightly less than 20 percent of all Republicans recalled having preferred Goldwater at the time of the convention. This figure is only one percent less than the proportion of Taft supporters among Republicans in 1952. What was different, of course, was that in 1952 Taft lost the nomination on the first ballot, whereas in 1964 Goldwater won it handily on the first ballot. Although in our 1964 data a b Each mention of a leader as the "best" candidate received a score of +2. Each mention as second best received a score of +1. The first-mentioned "bad" candidate received a score of -2. Any negative second mentions were scored -1. The entries in the table represent the net balance of positive or negative scores for the leader, expressed as a proportion of the maximum possible positive score an individual would have received had he been awarded all of the "best" choices given by the indicated segment of the electorate.

large segment (30 percent) of Republican identifiers indicated that they had held no preference for a specific candidate at convention time, very nearly half of all of our Republicans did recall some preference other than Goldwater. Thus these grass-roots Republicans with non-Goldwater choices outnumbered the Goldwater supporters within Republican ranks by a margin of better than two and one-half to one. A clear majority (60 percent) of those with other preferences, when asked "Were you particularly unhappy that Goldwater got the nomination, or did you think that he was nearly as good as your man?," expressed their lingering unhappiness about the outcome.

In sum, then, it is hard to turn up any bit of evidence to challenge the conclusion that Goldwater was, in rather startling degree, a minority candidate within a minority party. If his camp actually believed that the San Francisco delegates represented a true cross-section of grass-roots Republican sentiment, then they had grossly misunderstood the situation. There was, however, at least one extenuating circumstance: the support among Republican citizens for other candidates than Goldwater was split badly among the four or five other leading candidates. Thus while any of several pairs of other candidates had grass-roots party support at convention time which would have outnumbered the Goldwater faction quite readily, the fact remains that the 20 percent Goldwater support represented a plurality for any single candidate.

However this may be, disappointment at the convention outcome in 1964 had radically different consequences in November than the comparable disappointments among Republicans in 1952. As we have seen above, the former Taft supporters in that year turned out at the polls in near-perfect proportions and cast a very faithful Republican vote for Eisenhower. In 1964, however, the widespread defections among Republicans necessary to account for the Johnson landslide tended to follow rather closely the lines of lingering discontent with the nomination.

These recollections of San Francisco varied according to the different camps in which rank-and-file Republicans had located themselves at the time. So, for example, about three Lodge supporters in four reported they were unhappy with the Goldwater nomination; for Rockefeller supporters, the figure was closer to two in three. Slightly over half of the Nixon supporters, however, indicated that they thought Goldwater was "nearly as good" as their man, Nixon. With minor departures, similar patterns marked the ultimate defections to Johnson among these varying Republicans. Since Nixon supporters were, like Goldwater's, more frequently "strong" Republicans than the adherents of some of the other camps, lower defection rates here were only to be expected. However, defections to Johnson among Republicans who had preferred Nixon at convention time remained about double what could be expected from past norms for Republicans of this particular mixture of strengths of identification. Over three times as many Republicans for Lodge and Scranton defected to Johnson as parallel "normal" expectations would suggest, and-perhaps surprisingly-defections among Republicans who expressed no pre-convention favorite at all were in this range as well. Most extreme were the Rockefeller and Romney supporters, with defection rates at the polls exceeding expectation by a factor of greater than four.8

These differences across the several non-Goldwater camps are intriguing, in part because they appear related to reactions of the various G.O.P. leaders to the Goldwater candidacy. That is, of the set of major Republicans under discussion, Nixon took greatest pains to maintain relations with the Goldwater group before the convention, and undertook to help unify the party behind him after the nomination. Therefore it seems fitting that dismay at the nomination was least in his camp, and defections relatively limited. Neither Rockefeller nor Romney made any major show of reconciliation after the nomination, and subsequently went to some lengths to dissociate themselves from the Goldwater aspects of the Republican campaign.

Yet if it were true that nothing more than a "follow-the-leader" response is needed to account for these variations in defection rates among Republicans, the data would cast a somewhat different light on the question of conflicting perceptions between liberal and conservative wings of Goldwater's voting strength. For in such a case the Senator's problem would have been less one of gross overestimates of his strength, than of self-fulfilling prophecy on the part of the disgruntled liberal leaders. In other words, they first refused to support Goldwater on grounds that he could not win enough votes, and then proceeded to withhold in large quantities the votes of their "followers" to assure exactly this outcome.

⁸ While these rates may sound mountainous, it should be remembered that the expected defection rates for most of these groups are rather low—in the vicinity of 10 percent. Nonetheless, 40 percent of the Rockefeller Republicans in our sample voted for Johnson.

No airtight way is available to determine whether or not Republican defections at the presidential level might have been reduced significantly had Rockefeller or some of the other liberals effected a more genuine reconciliation with Goldwater to unite the party for the campaign. Nevertheless, if we were to compare the issue positions and ideological persuasions of 1964 Nixon Republicans with those of Rockefeller or Romney Republicans and find no substantial differences, we might be tempted to judge that differences in leader behavior did play some independent role in minimizing or maximizing Republican defections in November. Preliminary analyses suggest rather clearly, however, that substantial ideological differences did exist across the range of Republican factions. Republicans enthusiastic about Goldwater showed a rather unique (or "extreme") pattern of ideological positions. Nixon supporters, while unmistakably different, looked more nearly like the Goldwater people than the adherents of any of the other camps. Next in order moving away from the Goldwater position were the Scranton and Lodge followers, and the Rockefeller and Romney adherents show slightly more liberal positions still. Ideological differences, therefore, plainly existed between grass-roots supporters of the various factions, and these differences were indeed correlated with defections from a Goldwater vote. This does not exclude the possibility that the defections might have been lessened by a genuine "unity" move on the part of more liberal Republican leaders. It indicates nevertheless that the desertions were rooted not only in leader-follower behavior, but in a more personal sense of ideological distance between many rank-and-file Republicans and the Goldwater faction-a distance that would have produced increased defections quite apart from examples set by the leadership.

However this may be, it was a significant feature of the election that the customary postconvention reconciliation between party factions was in the 1964 Republican case lack-lustre at best, and at many levels simply non-existent. Many of the liberals wished to avoid the Goldwater platform. At the same time, Goldwater seemed to do less than most candidates in making it easy for the dissident brethren to return to the fold. Among several possible reasons, one may have been that in the blueprint laid out by Goldwater strategists for a November victory, the support of most of these leaders did not appear to be critical.

III. CAMPAIGN STRATEGY: THE SOUTH AS REPUBLICAN TARGET

The strategy of the Goldwater camp for a November victory was both simple and relatively selective. Goldwater felt, to begin with, that he could hold on to essentially the same states that Nixon had won in 1960. This meant a clean sweep of the populous states of the Pacific Coast, most of the Mountain and Plains states, and a scattering east of the Mississippi. To reap the additional electoral votes for victory, Goldwater believed that the way lay open. under proper circumstances, for the Republican Party to make further major inroads in the once solidly Democratic South. The plan implied that Goldwater could largely afford to write off the populous industrial states of the Northeast and some, if not all, of the Midwest -a matter which greatly reduced the importance of the dissident liberal Republican bloc. And it represented a dramatic departure from any past Republican strategy in making of the South a fulcrum for victory.

Such a strategy was not only unusual but, against the long sweep of American electoral history, it might even be thought of as implausible. Yet it was no hastily devised scheme. For years Goldwater had participated in the Congressional coalition between conservative Republicans and Southern Democrats. The same drive for ideological neatness that led him to call for the reorganization of American politics into "Conservative" and "Liberal" parties impressed upon him the grotesque incongruity of a Democratic South. The South had no reason to be a Democratic bastion; by all of its affinities and traditions, it should long since have become Republican. Part of the problem lay with the national Republican Party, which, in the control of the Northeastern bloc, had failed to present national-level candidates making clear that Republicanism was the natural home of the Southern voter. This had been a frustrating fact since Goldwater's entry into national politics—a period during which political observers had frequently predicted an imminent partisan realignment of the South; but gains in the region, while very obvious, had remained rather modest. In discussions of Republican difficulty in recapturing majority status in the land, Goldwater had opined that the Party had to learn to "go hunting in the pond where the ducks are"-the South. As bitterness began to mount in that region toward the civil rights pressures of the Kennedy Administration, the time seemed more ripe than ever for the presentation of a purely conservative Republican candidate who could appeal to the Southern ethos in a most direct way, thereby breaking the Democratic hold on the region in one dramatic and decisive stroke.

This long-planned strategy had suffered two temporary but alarming setbacks. The assassination of President Kennedy suddenly placed a Southerner in the White House, and removed from power the most feared personal symbols of federal intrusion. The continuation of the Kennedy beginnings by the Johnson Administration, however-particularly in the 1964 Civil Rights bill-helped to reset the stage. So did the increased signs of Negro unrest, and the new element of "white backlash" in the North as well as the South that seemed apparent in the spring primaries. The capping touch was Goldwater's vote against the Civil Rights bill. This vote, to be sure, represented no condoning of segregationism per se, but rather a blow for states' rights against the encroachment of the federal government. Nevertheless, white supremacists in the South had so long paraded under the states' rights banner as to leave little room for fear lest the Goldwater gesture go unappreciated. The liberal wing of the Republican Party, having worked for years to prevent the Democrats from "gaining position" on the civil rights issue, was further horrified as it envisioned the G.O.P. suddenly transformed into "the party of the white man" at just the moment when the Negro vote was becoming effectively mobilized.

The second setback threatened when Governor Wallace of Alabama decided to enter the presidential race as a states' rights candidate. This was especially alarming, for Wallace would have competed for exactly the same votes that Goldwater had been wooing toward the Republican column. However, Wallace's subsequent withdrawal left the field open again for the original victory blueprint, and the implementation began in force. Mid-campaign accounts of the Goldwater organizational efforts spoke of a high-powered, modernistic campaign apparatus in the South stocked with volunteer labor in numbers that would have been unbelievable for the earlier Eisenhower and Nixon campaigns. While this machine had been humming efficiently from the start, the Goldwater organization in the West was described as effective but less advanced; in the Midwest it was chaotic, and in the Northeast next to non-existent. At few if any points in recent political history have so many campaign resources-in both issue positions taken and organizational efforts made-been devoted to the cultivation of a single region. The first discordant note came when, during the campaign and apparently as the result of new poll data, Goldwater remarked to reporters that he was not as strong in the South as everybody seemed to think.

After the votes were counted, what was the success of this strategy? The verdict must come in two halves. From one point of view, the strategy was a brilliant success, and it left its imprint on the geographical voting returns with greater strength than any other of what we have called "short-term forces" in the 1964 election. One crude way of separating these immediate or new effects from those better attributable to long-term standing loyalties is to create a different kind of electoral map, entering state by state or region by region the departure of a particular presidential vote in a more Republican or more Democratic direction than the normal voting of the area involved. A map so constructed for 1964, with pro-Goldwater deviations regarded as "high ground" and pro-Johnson deviations as "low," would show one primary "tilt" or gradient across the nation. The very lowest ground would appear in the northern reaches of New England, and the gradient would move upward with fair regularity all the way west to the Pacific Coast. The same gradient would appear, but much more sharply tilted still, as one moved southward to the Gulf of Mexico. In other words, Goldwater's regional emphases were indeed profoundly reflected in the vote.

As soon as one leaves the relative question of the regional and the geographic, however, the strategy was a dismal failure. For while the whole continent tilted in the expected direction, the strong Democratic tide nationally left virtually all of the country submerged under what from a Goldwater point of view was "sea level"-the 50-50 mark in popular votes. In terms of electoral votes, Goldwater was stranded on a few islands which remained above the tide on the outer Southern and Southwestern fringe of the continent. These islands represented stunning "firsts" or dramatic historic reversals in states like Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina. But their historic interest did not bring Goldwater any closer to the presidency.

Indeed, while Goldwater scored sharp Republican gains through the "Black Belt" of the deepest South, his assault on the South as a whole produced rather pathetic results. All observers agree, for example, that the South has been drifting away from its old status as a one-party Democratic bastion for at least two decades, if not for five or more. Hence Goldwater could have hoped to profit from four years more of this drift than Nixon, and a decade more than Eisenhower. Secondly, all observers are equally agreed that not only in the Black Belt but well north into the Border States of the South, civil rights was the prime political issue, and there is no doubt where the mass white population stood on the matter. Our data from the late 1950s and the early 1960s have consistently made clear that the potential of this issue for dramatic partisan realignment in the South had been muffled because of lack of clarity in the eyes of the mass population, prior to 1964, that either of the two major national parties offered much hope to the Southern white. It was exactly this ambiguity that Goldwater set out to remove by providing a clear party differentiation on civil rights at the national level. Putting these two ingredients together, the actual 1964 election results from the South as a whole might seem astonishing. For Goldwater actually did less well in the region than either Nixon in 1960 or Eisenhower in 1952 and 1956. One has to return at least to 1948 to find a comparably poor showing for a Republican presidential candidate; and there are reasonable treatments of the 1948 Thurmond vote which would send one back to 1944 for a parallel. Given the fact that Goldwater wooed the South so straightforwardly, and injected the new and potent ingredient of clear party differentiation on civil rights into the 1964 picture, this retrogression of Republican popular voting strength for a presidential candidate back to levels of the 1940s may seem quite incomprehensible.

A possible explanation, although one that we can summarily reject, would be that the clear party differentiation on civil (or "states") rights which Goldwater tried to communicate failed to come across to the mass voters. Perhaps to the dismay of the liberal wing of the ⁹ We have examined this possibility in some seriousness simply because often in the past we have found public perceptions of party differences on major issues totally confused and muddy. Even on issues where the politically sophisticated see marked party differences, general public inattention and the ambiguities which politicians exploit to blur the edges of their positions combine to produce either lack of recognition of differences, or very conflicting impressions of what those differences are at any given point. See Campbell et al., The American Voter (New York, 1960), pp. 179ff.

Republicans, however, the communication was near-perfect. In our 1960 election study, a measure of association between the two parties and the policy extremes of the civil rights controversy showed values of .02 and .05 (the Democrats only very slightly associated with a pro-civil rights position) on two different civil rights policy items. 10 In 1964, the perceived association in the same terms on the same two items had risen to values of .54 and .50. The change in volunteered identifications of the two parties with the issue, among the much smaller subset of people so concerned that they brought the matter up themselves, showed even more dramatic change. In 1960 these civil rightsconcerned people had tended to associate Kennedy somewhat with a pro-civil rights position, and Nixon with more of a "go-slow" approach (an association of .30). For Johnson and Goldwater in 1964, the association had mounted to .84, approaching consensus. The same volunteered materials include images of the parties, as well as of the candidates, and it is a matter of some interest to know in what measure Goldwater's 1964 position "rubbed off" on the Republican Party as a whole. In 1960, the civil rights association appeared to lie more clearly with the Kennedy-Nixon pairing (.30) than with any differences between the two parties, for these volunteered references to the parties showed only an association of .08. The comparable figure for the two parties in 1964 was .86. In short, we cannot explain why Goldwater produced a retrogression of Republican presidential voting strength in the South by suggesting that his key civil rights position failed to get across.

The Southern vote for Goldwater becomes intelligible if we add three elements to the consideration. First, while civil rights lent an important new pro-Goldwater force to the situation, various strong short-term forces which had pushed the Southern electorate in a pro-Republican direction in 1952, 1956 and 1960 were no longer present. We have argued elsewhere that the popular vote for Eisenhower and Nixon in the South was a very misleading index of the degree of solid Republican advance there. While our data do show the Republican

¹⁰ The statistic is such that if all citizens in the sample agreed that the Democrats represented one side of the issue and the Republicans the other, the figure would be 1.00 (perfect association). A figure of .00 represents the case of no aggregate association whatever.

¹¹ Philip E. Converse, "A Major Political Realignment in the South?" in Allan P. Sindler. Party inching forward in the affections of mass Southern voters, the pace has been slow; the South remains a preponderantly Democratic region. In 1952 and 1956, the Southern presidential vote swung far to the Republican side of normal for the region, just as it did in all other parts of the United States. In 1960, with the Eisenhower appeal gone, most other regions moved back toward the Democrats as we expected. This return toward normal was almost invisible in the South, since a new and offsetting short-term force-Kennedy's Catholicism-had arisen which was peculiarly repugnant to the Southern population with its concentration (Louisiana excepted) of devout and fundamentalist Protestants.12 Thus if any other of the Republican aspirants had run in 1964, we might have expected a delayed return toward a much more normally Democratic vote in the South. From this point of view, the injection of a new civil rights differentiation by Goldwater did not occur in a void, but was something of a replacement for other forces which had kept the Southern vote extended in a remarkably pro-Republican direction for three consecutive presidential elections.

Once we take this into account, the Republican retrogression is less perplexing, although intuitively we would expect civil rights to have an impact on the Southern voter more potent than either Eisenhower's appeal or fear of a Catholic president. It is here that the second and third considerations enter. While Goldwater's civil rights position drew Southern whites toward the Republicans, Negroes both South and North moved monolithically toward the Democrats. Although Southern Negro voting was still limited by registration difficulties, it increased over 1960 and was almost unanimously Democratic for the first time.13 If this sudden new increment of Negro votes could be removed from the Southern totals, the Goldwater vote proportion would undoubtedly appear to be a slight progression, rather than a retrogression, over the Eisenhower and Nixon votes.

Finally, it must be recognized that civil rights, while the primary issue in the South. was not the only one. Beyond civil rights, Southerners reacted negatively to the Goldwater positions much as their fellow citizens elsewhere. Many Southern white respondents said in effect: "Goldwater is right on the black man, and that is very important. But he is so wrong on everything else I can't bring myself to vote for him." From this point of view, the civil rights issue did indeed have a powerful impact in the South: without it, the 1964 Goldwater vote probably would not only have slipped to normal Republican levels, but would have veered as elsewhere to the pro-Democratic side. The more general ideological appeal to what Goldwater saw as Southern "conservatism" aside from the Negro question, did not have major impact.

Much the same comments hold for the failure of "white backlash" to develop in the way many expected outside the South. Our data show that civil rights feeling did not lack impact elsewhere. But for many non-Southern whites who resented the advance of the Negro cause and the summer of discontent, the election involved other important issues as well; and Goldwater's positions on them struck such voters very negatively. Thus "white backlash" feelings were translated into Goldwater votes by Democrats only where fear of the Negro was so intense as to blot out virtually all other considerations. Voters fitting this description existed in fair number and geographic concentration in the deepest latitudes of the South. Elsewhere, they were thinly scattered.

IV. THE ELECTION "POST-MORTEM"

Up to this point we have referred only vaguely to the many negative reactions Goldwater occasioned in all sectors of the country. which tended to dim out isolated attractions he did present. The Goldwater "image" was indeed phenomenally unfavorable. We have measured such images in the past, among other ways, by tallying the simple number of favorable and unfavorable references made by respondents to broad questions inviting them to say what they like and dislike about each of the candidates. Typically, American voters have tended on balance to speak favorably, even about candidates they were about to send down to defeat. The least favorable image we have seen-in Adlai Stevenson's second try in 1956 -involved only about 52 percent of all responses that were favorable. Less than 35 pered., Change in the Contemporary South (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1963).

¹² These religious effects were described in Converse et al., "Stability and Change in 1960: a Reinstating Election," this Review, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp. 269-80.

¹³ In our data, expressions of party loyalty from the South which had been slowly losing Democratic strength throughout the 1950s show a sudden rebound in 1964. However, all of the rebound can be traced to Southern Negroes; the downward trend among Southern whites continued and at about the same pace.

cent of the Goldwater references were favorable

Just after the election, Goldwater observed that "more than 25 million people" voted "not necessarily for me, but for a philosophy that I represent..." At another time, in assessing the magnitude of his defeat, he chastised himself for having been a personally ineffective spokesman for that philosophy. This seemed particularly odd against the descriptions of Goldwater before his nomination, in which even opponents concurred that at long last the right wing had found an articulate spokesman with a magnetic personality.

The candidate references we collect are a mixture of observations concerning the personality and leadership qualities of the individuals themselves as well as reactions to policy positions they represent in the public eye. Ideally, we could take this image material and split it cleanly into references to personal attributes as opposed to policy positions, in order to judge the accuracy of the proposition that what the public repudiated was the spokesman, and not the philosophy. Practically speaking, such divisions present many difficult coding decisions.¹⁴

Nevertheless, we have sifted Johnson and Goldwater references into categories more or less purely reflecting "policy" as opposed to "personality" significance. Among the most pure policy references, Johnson's were favorable by an 80-20 margin, visibly ahead of the 69-31 balance of his total image. Mentions of Goldwater policies ran less than 30-70 favorable, thereby trailing the rest of his image slightly. In general, the farther one moves from pure policy to pure personality, Johnson's advantage declines. His "wheeler-dealer" style and the aura of conflicts-of-interest which dogged him during the campaign came through to dilute his attractiveness. Against this backdrop, Goldwater's personal "integrity" and 14 Take, for example, the charge hung on Goldwater by Democrats and some Republicans that he was "impulsive." This allegation reverberated in the public and came to make up one of our largest single categories of negative references to Goldwater. "Impulsiveness" is a personality trait that on one hand might have been less plausible for some other right-wing leader. Yet the charge took roots and began to flourish with respect to a cluster of policies that Goldwater shared with other Republican leaders of similar persuasions. It seems quite arbitrary to decide that it is exclusively either the person or the policy which is "impulsive."

"sincerity" drew praise. Throughout, the data suggest that Johnson was carried along to an image nearly as positive as Eisenhower's best, less by his personal characteristics than by the policies with which he was associated (many of them identified by respondents as continuations from the Kennedy Administration). For Goldwater, if anything, the reverse was true.

Aside from civil rights and a faint flutter of approval brought by Goldwater's latter-day stand against immorality, none of his major positions was attractive to voters outside the most hard-core Republican ranks. In general, the mass of public opinion has been quite unsympathetic to traditional Republican thinking in areas of social welfare and other domestic problems for several decades. A major Goldwater theme involved attacks against the increasingly heavy hand of "big government," yet this struck little in the way of a responsive chord. Most Americans in the more numerous occupational strata do not appear to feel the governmental presence (save for local civil rights situations) in any oppressive or day-today manner, and as a consequence simply have no reactions to the area which have any motivational significance. Among those more aware of the practices and potentials of federal government, a slight majority feels that if anything, governmental services and protections are inadequate rather than overdone. Thus for better or for worse, such contentions on Goldwater's part had little popular resonance.

Goldwater's failure to make much capital of domestic policy was not uncharacteristic of a Republican presidential candidate. What was new for a Republican, however, was his performance in the area of foreign policy. In a degree often overlooked, the 1950s were a period during which, from the point of view of many Americans inattentive to the finer lines of politics and reacting to the parties in terms of gross associations and moods, something of an uneasy equilibrium prevailed between the two major parties. Much more often than not, for these Americans the Democratic Party was the party of prosperity and good times, but also the party more likely to blunder into war. The Republican Party, conversely, was more skilled in maintaining peace, but brought with it depression and hard times.

The foreign policies proposed by Goldwater and refracted through the press and other commentators, shifted this image more dramatically than one might have thought possible (Table II). Setting aside the large mass of voters who throughout the period did not see any particular differences between the parties

TABLE II. PERCEPTIONS AS TO THE PARTY MOST LIKELY TO KEEP THE UNITED STATES OUT OF WAR IN THE ENSUING FOUR YEARS

	1956	1960	1964
	(%)	(%)	(%)
Democrats would handle better	7	15	38
No party difference	45	46	46
Republicans would handle better	40	29	12
Don't know, not ascertained	8	10	4
	100	100	100

in foreign policy capability, the balance of expectations in the area favored the Republicans by better than a 5-1 margin in 1956. This margin deteriorated somewhat in the late stages of the Eisenhower Administration, but remained at an imposing 2-1 edge. During the Goldwater campaign it reversed itself to a 3-1 margin favoring the Democrats.

Thus to the many ways of describing the public's repudiation of the Goldwater candidacy, another may be added: between a party of prosperity and peace, as against a party of depression and war, there is little room for hesitation.

V. LEVELS OF PUBLIC OPINION AND THE BASES FOR MISPERCEPTION

From at least one point of view, it is less interesting that Goldwater lost the 1964 election than that he thought he had a chance to win. What most of our descriptions of the election year have had in common is a sort of chronic miscalculation of electoral reality: miscalculations of standing strength, of new strength that might be won, and of what appeals were necessary to win that new strength. Since "electoral reality" is at many points a nest of uncertainties, and since we are told that in the face of uncertainty personal needs are likely to color perceptions the more strongly, there is little surprising in the fact that Goldwater overestimated his strength and drawing power. But as these misperceptions of Goldwater and his aides went grossly beyond what many observers felt were the margins of uncertainty, they deserve closer comment.

Rather than write off these perceptions as figments of imagination, let us suppose that to persist in the way many electoral misperceptions of the right wing have persisted, there must be some sustaining reality bases; and let us ask instead what such bases might be. For "public opinion" is a protean thing, and we shall discover that there are perfectly sound ways of measuring public opinion during the 1964 campaign which, instead of illustrating Johnson's towering lead in the opinion polls, would actually have shown Goldwater enjoying a slight margin.

As is well known, public opinion was spoken of and roughly gauged long before the operations of public opinion polling were developed. What was gauged was opinion from a variety of kinds of sources: informal reactions to events among ancillary elites around the centers of government; the writings of intellectuals and newspaper editors; representations from leaders of interest groups, and the like. While it was apparent that this conglomerate of opinion came disproportionately from relatively elite and informed sources and hence need not have coincided with what the "real public" thought, beyond mass elections themselves there were (and are, for those who totally distrust the polls) few further ways of understanding what the public below an elite level was thinking. One of those few ways of "digging down" into the real population was letters of opinion: letters sent from unassuming constituents to public officials, "letters to the editor" composed by non-professional writers reacting to daily events and even, in no few cases, to the opinions of the editor himself. This was one level of public opinion that seemed to be generated below the elite level and that, for the observer interested in opinion beyond the localisms of municipal government, could be monitored regularly on a wide geographic base.15

In our 1964 interview schedule we spent some time investigating the behavior of our respondents with respect to the writing of politically relevant letters. We ascertained first whether or not they had ever written such a letter either to any kind of public official, or to the editor of a newspaper or magazine. Then, among the minority who could recall ever writing such a letter, we went on to ask about the frequency of such activity—whether any of the letters had been written in the past four years, and if so, roughly how many such letters the respondent would estimate he had written to each of the two types of targets over that recent period.

¹⁵ Undoubtedly, for such an observer, letters were not weighted equally in his impressions as to how opinion stood: some were more cogent than others, some were more distressed, and so on. But as a rough first approximation, one can imagine that what registered as "public opinion" on a particular issue in the mind of such an observer was closely related to the simple frequency of letters pro and con.

Many aspects of these data remain intriguing despite their general predictability. Thus, for example, the materials demonstrate handsomely that the large bulk of letters to public officials or the printed media come from a tiny fraction of the population, which tends to write very repetitively. Thus, in the data summarized in Figure 1, we find that only about 15 percent of the adult population reports ever having written a letter to a public official, and of the total stream of such letters from the grassroots, two-thirds are composed by about 3 percent of the population. Where letters to newspapers or magazines are concerned, the constituency is even more restrictive still: only about 3 percent of the population recalls ever having written such a letter, and two-thirds of such letters are turned out by not more than half of one percent of the population.16 Needless to say, there is fair overlap between those who write to the printed media and those writing to public officials, so that the observer monitoring both lines of communication would tend to count the same people twice.

Furthermore, as these few people write more and more letters over time, they are counted again and again, and this of course is the phenomenon that interests us. What we have done is to reconstruct our data on various preferences relevant to the 1964 election not by a raw head-count, which is what a mass election measures, but rather with each individual's preference on an item weighted by the number of letters that he has reported writing to either target in the four preceding years. This provides a basis, within reasonable limits, for a fair replication of the different kind of "public opinion" as it might be assessed by a hypothetical observer.¹⁷

¹⁶ Data on letters to the news media are not presented graphically, in part because the inequality is so complete that there is little one can discriminate in the figure. The Gini index of concentration for the newspaper and magazine letters is .99. See H. Alker and B. Russett, "On Measuring Inequality," Behavioral Science, Vol. 9, No. 3 (July, 1964), pp. 207–18.

¹⁷ We wish to stress that it remains a crude approximation, in part because we do not know, letter by letter, what political opinions the respondent was expressing. Conceivably in many cases they lay outside the range of any of our items. But the exercise is worth completing in part because it is likely that our hypothetical observer generalizes beyond the specific content of letters ("if ultra-conservative opinion on issue x is running about 30 percent, then it is likely that

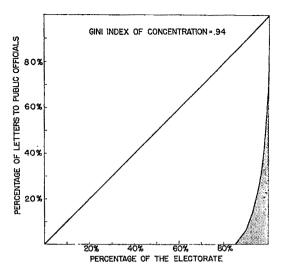

Fig. 1. Letters to public officials and letterwriters within the electorate.

Figure 2 contrasts "public opinion" in the head-count sense, with that form of public opinion as measured by letter-writing. We suggest that this figure may usher us into the reality world on which many of Goldwater's assessments and stratagems were based. This is not to say that Goldwater had no other bases from which to calculate public opinion. He had, among other things, public opinion as measured by the polls, and he did not entirely discredit this information. Yet as we have noted there was evidence that poll data perplexed him, not simply because they customarily brought bad news, but also because they failed to square with all of his other intuitive impressions as to what the public was thinking. In the measure that these impressions came from a variety of sources not very different from the letter-writers among the public (i.e., from party activists, from campaign personnel and from informal associations), it is not hard to believe that they may have been displaced from the head-count of public opinion in much the same ways.

If we accept letter-writing for the moment then as a relevant indicator of public opinion, we see a rather marvelous change in the state of ultra-conservative opinion on issue y would run about the same level if something made that issue salient"); and in part because the systematic lines of displacement of "letter opinion" from "public opinion" in the mass electoral sense are undoubtedly valid in their general direction, whatever the details.

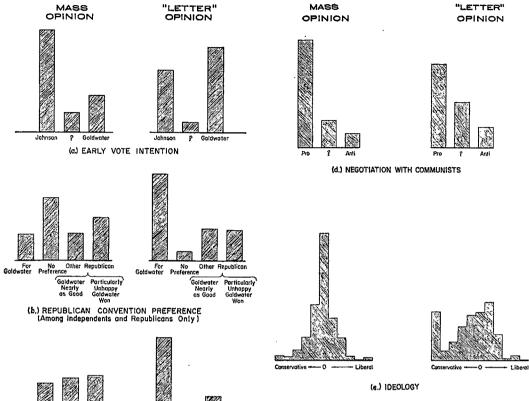

Fig. 2. Public opinion as measured by people or political letters.

(c) FEDERAL GOVERNMENT GETTING TOO STRONG ?

political affairs. In Figure 2(a), instead of trailing Johnson sadly in the anonymous crowd in mid-campaign, Goldwater holds a visible lead. Moving back to the time of the San Francisco convention (b), Goldwater is no longer the candidate of a small minority among Republicans and Independents, but rather is the toast of an absolute majority, even counting "no preferences" against him. In (c), we discover that not only is a vast majority of the public interested in the problem of the growing strength of the federal government, 18 but those ¹⁸ The wordings of the issue items involved in Figure 2(c) and (d) were as follows:

(For 2c) "Some people are afraid the government in Washington is getting too powerful for the good of the country and the individual person. Others feel that the government in Washington has not gotten too strong for the good of the country.... What is your feeling?"

(For 2d) "Some people think our government should sit down upset by this growing strength outnumber their opponents by a ratio approaching 3 to 1! In Figure 2(d), the displacement of "letter opinion" from public opinion is much less, in part because the item wording brought a relatively consensual response. However, it is clear that Goldwater's "hard" inclinations in foreign policy are somewhat overrepresented as well in the letter-writing public.

Fig. 2 (cont.) Public opinion as measured by people or political letters.

In some ways, Figure 2(e) contains more grist than any of the others, however. First, the very form of the distributions of ideological preference differs rather dramatically. Where and talk to the leaders of the Communist countries and try to settle our differences, while others think we should refuse to have anything to do with them. . . . What do you think?"

Figure 2(e) is based on a set of questions that asked people to indicate their affective reactions toward a variety of groups, including "conservatives" and "liberals." The scores for the figure are based on the difference in reaction to the two stimuli.

"public opinion" is concerned, nearly half the population falls in the "zero" category, making no affective distinction whatever between conservatives and liberals.¹⁹ In addition, the clustering around this zero-point is very tight: over three-quarters of the population is located within one category of the zero-point. The distribution of "letter opinion," however, is quite different. The central mode of indifference or ignorance shrinks dramatically, and voices from more extreme positions on the continuum gain in strength. Other analyses show that virtually all letter-writers rank very high on measures we have used of ideological sensitivity. Hence those who remain toward the middle of the continuum in the right half of Figure 2(e) are not there through indifference or ignorance: they understand the ideological alternatives and place themselves toward the middle of the road with forethought. And, as the bimodal shape of the distribution suggests, political discourse becomes most notably a dialogue between very mild liberals and ultra-conservatives.

It is to the world of letter opinion or one like it that the Goldwater campaign, in its original design, was addressed. At least until its late stages, it assumed an electorate with near-total ideological comprehension and sensitivity. The appeal to the Southern conservative tradition in any abstract vein was indeed joyfully received in the South, and created great ferment among a part of the Southern population. Except as this theme became concretized in day-to-day problems with Negroes, however, the part of the population affected was tiny, even though in the letter-writing and related senses it was so visible as to appear to be "most of the South," politically speaking.

Similarly, the distribution of the population in this world of letter opinion helped maintain persistent overestimations of strength. Em-

19 It is likely that this contingent is roughly coterminous with that 40-50 percent of the American electorate which we have described elsewhere as having no impression as to what such terms as "conservative" and "liberal" mean. See Philip E. Converse, "The Nature of Belief Systems in Mass Publics," in David E. Apter, ed., Ideology and Discontent (New York, 1964), pp. 206-61. The data presented there were gathered in 1960. In the 1964 study we collected the same data on recognition of ideological terms, thinking that perhaps the nature of the Goldwater campaign might render these terms and meanings more salient to a wider public The data show that it did not.

pirically speaking, the center of Goldwater support lay roughly in the third bar of the figure on the conservative side. It weakened rapidly with any further steps toward the center, and was relatively solid in the outer two bars of the graph. If one looks at "letter opinion" with this zone in mind, it would appear that the base of standing Goldwater support was very substantial. Goldwater hoped to firm up the support on his side of the center sufficiently to create a majority, and in this figure it would have taken only a modest extension of influence to achieve this. In the world of public opinion relevant for mass elections, however, the distribution of actual and potential support was radically different. Rather than starting from a solid base of support on the conservative wing, the initial springboard was scarcely populated at all. To win a majority, a much deeper penetration into the center would have been required.

In the measure that we have delineated in Figure 2(e), the kind of political environment familiar to many practicing politicians, we can also better understand the first of our puzzles, the myth of the stay-at-home Republicans. For ultra-conservatives who found a wide measure of social support and resonance for their views in the world of public opinion which they understood, it must indeed have been perplexing that uniquely at election time, and uniquely in vote totals, this vigorous support had a habit of evaporating. How could one interpret this gross discrepancy between what one heard and read about public sentiments and what happened at the polls? The easiest explanation was that strong conservatives in large numbers simply refused to go to the polls, however vigorously they would express themselves otherwise. And as soon as a useful reason was worked out as to why this willful nonvoting should occur, a theory was born. It persisted in part because it was a handy tactical weapon; but it persisted in some part as well because the discrepant realities which helped to catalyze the theory also persisted. For its proponents, the election of 1964 was a sobering reality test.

VI. CONCLUSIONS

It should be apparent that the phenomena we have examined in this paper have a significance that stretches considerably beyond the 1964 election, or questions of the credibility of public opinion polls, or the playing of games with the epistemologies of practicing politicians, fascinating though each of these subjects may be.

SAFE SEATS, SENIORITY, AND POWER IN CONGRESS*

RAYMOND E. WOLFINGER AND JOAN HEIFETZ

Stanford University

University of California (Berkeley)

The president's difficulties in inducing Congress to pass his legislative program are usually ascribed to the different constituencies of the two institutions. This difference would make for disharmony under any circumstances, but it is said to be particularly important because the seniority system bestows the most power on congressmen whose constituencies are most unlike the president's. His policy commitments are responses to the needs of a heterogeneous, industrialized, urban society. The occupants of the most influential congressional positions come from districts that re-elect them regardless of national political trends. The representative from such a district "views with alarm the great issues that sweep the nation and threaten to disrupt the familiar and comfortable politics of his district," which is usually characterized as a rural backwater.

Both political parties are described this way. Because the Democrats have controlled Congress for all but four of the past 36 years, most illustrations of this thesis are drawn from conflicts between Democratic presidents and Democratic congresses. More specifically, the focus of attention is usually on the refusal of southern Democratic congressional leaders to support presidential legislative requests. In this article we will be concerned with this phenomenon in the House of Representatives. The thesis we examine may be restated as follows: lack of responsibility in the Democratic party is due to control of Congress by Southerners. Their influence is due to their seniority, which is a result of the lack of party competition in the South. Most academic descriptions of American politics include this thesis.² It is particularly common in textbooks. We will call it the "textbook theory."

* We were aided in gathering data by Milton Cummings and Richard Scammon. Many helpful comments on an earlier draft of this article were made by Richard F. Fenno, Jr., Fred I. Greenstein, Duncan MacRae, Jr., Donald Matthews, Nelson W. Polsby, Randall Ripley, Alan Rosenthal, Stephen Smith, Leo M. Snowiss, Aaron B. Wildavsky, and Barbara Kaye Wolfinger. We are grateful for financial support from the Edgar Stern Family Fund, the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation and the Committee on Political Behavior of the Social Science Research Council, and to the Brookings Institution for use of its facilities.

¹ James MacGregor Burns, The Deadlock of Democracy, rev. Spectrum ed. (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1963), p. 244.

Another interpretation of congressional behavior, that might be called the "insiders' theory," has a good deal of currency in Washington circles close to Congress.3 The insiders concede both the one-party South and southern congressional power, but they say that the former is not a sufficient cause of the latter, and introduce other considerations to explain it. Southern influence in Congress, according to the insiders, is not due just to the lack of party competition in the South, since there are many safe Democratic seats in the North. The men in these northern seats allegedly do not, however, make use of their "potential seniority." They are less interested in congressional careers and tend to "committee hop," thus losing the benefit of whatever seniority they have accrued. Many of these congressmen come from machine-dominated big cities where command of local patronage and contracts is the real sign of status and power. When an opportunity for such a position opens up back home, they desert the House for state or local government.

In the insiders' view, Southerners value a career in the House of Representatives more highly than do Northerners. One presumed reason is that the South, less developed industrially than the rest of the country, offers fewer alternate careers to ambitious young men. A second explanation is that the plantation owners' traditional noblesse oblige has made politics a more highly valued activity in the South, attracting some of the most able men from all walks of life. In the North politics has been not so much a gentleman's calling as a channel of social mobility for underprivileged ethnic groups.

The central proposition of the insiders' theory is that the level of southern influence in Congress is due to more than the "natural" consequences of the lack of party competition in the South. More generally, the insiders' theory raises a number of questions about the relationship between types of party systems and effective legislative representation, and between career alternatives and types of legislative behavior. It suggests that the constituent environment may influence not only the direction of congressional behavior (for example, votes pro or con), but also the roles played by legislators from different types of party systems.⁴

² Burns is probably the best-known contemporary advocate of this point of view.

³ While the insiders' theory is probably the prevailing one among Washington cognoscenti, it has not been given the literary circulation of the textbook theory. Hints and scraps of it may be found in the writings of William S. White; see particularly Citadel (New York, 1956).

Most of the empirical propositions and assumptions in the two theories are readily verifiable. Yet published evidence on them is surprisingly scarce. Their evaluation involves answering the following questions:

- Do congressmen in southern safe seats have more congressional seniority than those in northern safe seats?
- Do the career patterns of the Northerners indicate any greater willingness to leave the House?
- 3. Do congressmen from southern safe districts have more committee seniority than safe Northerners?
- 4. Do the Southerners have more chairmanships than they are "entitled to" by their seniority?
- 5. Do members of the House have more prestige in the South than in the North?

If these questions can be answered affirmatively, the insiders' explanation is a crucial modification of the textbook theory. If not, the insiders' theory is superfluous. If the insiders are right, then the growing northern Democratic representation in Congress will be partly vitiated by members who do not take full advantage of their opportunities to accrue seniority. Our purpose in this article is twofold: to examine the available data in an attempt to answer these five questions; and to explore the implications of recent shifts in the distribution of safe House seats.

I. THE REGIONAL DISTRIBUTION OF INFLUENTIAL POSITIONS IN THE HOUSE

As a prelude to examination of the relevant evidence, it is useful to review the familiar topic of alleged southern and rural dominance in the House of Representatives. There were 255 Democratic Representatives on January 7, ⁴ For an extensive treatment of this subject at the state level see John Wahlke et al., The Legislative System (New York, 1962). See also James Q. Wilson, "Two Negro Politicians: An Interpretation," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 4 (November, 1960), pp. 346-69.

1964. Of these, 38 per cent were from southern districts. Table I shows the representation of congressmen from different types of district (urban-rural, North-South) in influential positions. Contrary to some impressions, the Southerners did not have a disproportionate share of appointments to the Appropriations, Rules, and Ways and Means Committees, generally considered the top three committees

⁵ Since minor changes in the composition of the House occur frequently, it is necessary to choose a date for any analysis of House membership. We chose January 7, 1964 because a House roster for that date was published in the Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, January 10, 1964.

⁶ Throughout this article the South is defined as the eleven states of the Confederacy: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

We have included the five border states (Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia) in the North. Some observers of Congress classify some or all of these states as southern, or put them in a separate category. We saw no reason to do this, since the voting record of the 28 Democratic representatives from these states is similar to that of northern congressmen, and very different from the Southerners'. In 1963, for instance, the border congressmen had a Presidential Support score of 80, compared to 59 for the Southerners and 82 for congressmen from the northeastern states. The Presidential Opposition scores of the three groups were 9, 27, and 5, respectively. (These scores are based on individual voting records for 71 House roll calls during 1963 on proposals on which President Kennedy took a position. The support score is the percentage of the 71 roll calls on which the member supported the president. Since failure to vote lowers a member's support score, we also present the opposition scores. The individual scores are in Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, March 13, 1964.)

Congressional Quarterly defines as "urban" any central city with at least 50,000 population and any suburban city with 100,000 or more people. "Suburban" areas are those "closely settled areas contiguous to central cities," with the exception of cities over 100,000 in population. All other areas are classified as rural. See CQ Census Analysis: Congressional Districts of the United States (Washington, Congressional Quarterly, Inc., 1964), pp. 1786, 1792. We have combined CQ's "urban" and "suburban" classifications for the purpose of testing the propositions stated in the text. We have classified districts as "rural" if they are 50% or more rural according to CQ, and "urban" if they are less than 50% rural.

100

51

	North		Son	South		$\bf Total$
	Urban	Rural	Urban	Rural	No.	Per cent
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)		A
All Democratic congressmen	42	21	9	29	255	101ª
Membership on top three committees	40	24	5	31	55	100
Major committee chairmanships	29	18	0	53	17	100
Subcommittee chairmanships	29	17	6	47	109	99a

14

4

45

37

TABLE I. DISTRIBUTION OF DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSMEN IN INFLUENTIAL COMMITTEE POSITIONS, BY REGION—JANUARY, 1964

Holding first three positions in the House. But they are significantly overrepresented in other powerful posts. They account for 53 per cent of the chairmanships of the 17 major standing committees; 53 per cent of the chairmen of all these 17 committees'

⁷ The absence of southern overrepresentation on the top three committees is due partly to the recent appointment of four Northerners to the Appropriations Committee. During most of the period from 1947 to 1963 every southern state had a representative on that committee. (We are indebted to Richard F. Fenno, Jr. for this information.) If one splits the Appropriations Committee's 30 Democratic members on the basis of seniority, the former southern advantage becomes apparent. Eight of the top-ranking 15 members are Southerners, compared to only one of the 15 most recent appointees.

Appointments to the Ways and Means Committee are made on the basis of regional zones, but it should not be thought that this guarantees equitable representation on the committee to all parts of the country. The zones are not redrawn after every election to take account of changes in state delegations, and, perhaps for this reason, there is considerable variation in the number of representatives assigned to each zone. The range was from 14 to 24 in the 86th Congress. See Nicholas A. Masters, "Committee Assignments in the House of Representatives," this Review, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), p. 347.

⁸ There are 20 standing committees. Members generally consider three of them unimportant: the District of Columbia, House Administration, and Un-American Activities Committees. The first of these—important to permanent residents of the District—is in effect Washington's city council, the second is occupied with housekeeping, and the third reports virtually no legislation. Membership on one of these three committees does not preclude assignment to another standing committee.

subcommittees; and 49 per cent of all the representatives who hold the first three positions (chairman and first and second ranking majority members) on each of the 17 committees. For a variety of reasons this last measure may be the best index of committee seniority. The number of chairmanships is so small that the death or retirement of a single chairman produces a sizeable percentage change, and subcommittee chairmen are not appointed solely on the basis of seniority. The top-ranking majority members are next in line for the chairmanship. Together with the chairman and the two ranking minority members, they are usually appointed to conference committees on bills the committee has handled.9 Among their various other advantages is first preference in questioning witnesses at hearings.

II. THE DISTRIBUTION AND CHARACTERISTICS OF DEMOCRATIC SAFE SEATS

For the purposes of our study we defined safe Democratic seats as those which met all three of the following criteria:

- Won by a Democrat in every special¹⁰ and general election since 1940.
- (2) Won by an average of 60 per cent or more of the two-party vote since 1944.
- (3) Won by not less than 55 per cent of the two-party vote in every election since 1946.

Changes in district boundaries proved not much of a problem in our efforts to identify safe districts. We were usually able to "follow" the incumbent. Where a change in incumbent

- ⁹ This practice is not required by the rules, but is usually followed.
- ¹⁰ Two seats, one each in the North and South, were omitted because they were won by Republicans at the special election following the death of the incumbents.

^a Does not sum to 100 because of rounding.

TABLE II. DISTRIBUTION OF DEMOCRATIC SAFE SEATS BY REGION AND TYPE OF CONSTITUENCY

	North		Son	South		Totals
	Urban	Rural	Urban	Rural	No.	Per cent
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
Safe Seats All Democratic	30	7	11	52	122	100
Seats	42	21	9	29	255	1018

a Does not sum to 100 because of rounding.

coincided with redistricting, we used maps to trace the district's lineage. Our definition of safety turned out to be rather stringent. It excluded the seats held by three major committee chairmen: Wayne Aspinall of Colorado, Interior and Insular Affairs; George P. Miller of California, Science and Astronautics: and Clarence Cannon of Missouri, Appropriations. Cannon's winning percentage dipped below 55 per cent on two occasions, while the first two seats were held by Republicans in the 1940s. Also excluded were a number of seats which. because of redistricting or population movement, now seem to be completely safe. But the inclusion of such newly safe seats would not contribute much to our analysis of members' responses to the opportunity to accrue seniority. Implicit in our definition is the assumption that the key aspect of safety is the incumbent's belief that he can stay in his seat as long as he wants.

By our definition we counted a total of 122 safe Democratic seats in the 88th Congress, 45 in the North and 77 in the South. Table II shows how these were distributed between ^a The average median family income for the safe seats was $5506, compared to $5921 for the non-safe districts. If rural districts from the border states are eliminated from both groups, the figures are $5811 and $6099, respectively.

^b Quartiles are based on nationwide ranking.

All but one of the northern safe seats in the 4th quartile are from rural border districts.

d Includes all persons born abroad (except of American parents) or with at least one foreign-born parent.

• Does not sum to 100 because of rounding. Sources: 1960 Census data reported in U. S. Bureau of the Census, Congressional District Data Book (Districts of the 88th Congress) (Washington, 1963); and CQ Census Analysis. urban and rural constituencies: 72 are rural and a bare majority of them are both southern and rural. More than a third of the safe seats are northern. There are four urban safe seats for every rural one in the North; in the South this ratio is reversed. Seven of the nine northern

TABLE III. A SOCIO-ECONOMIC PROFILE OF NORTHERN SAFE AND NON-SAFE DEMO-CRATIC DISTRICTS—1964

	Northern Safe Democratic	Northern Non-Safe Democratic
	(%)	(%)
1959 median family income:
Per cent of districts	in:
first quartileb	18	31
second quartile	36	35
third quartile	31	24
fourth quartile	16	10
	101°	100
N	(45)	(115)
Per cent Negro:
0-4.9%	31	64
5-9.9%	27	13
10-19.9%	13	12
20-29.9%	9	4
30% and over	20	6
	100	99•
N	(45)	(115)
Per cent first- and second-generation:d
0 - 9.9%	20 [.]	17
10-19.9%	9	25
20 39.9%	36	44
40% and over	36	13
	101°	99•
N	(45)	(115)
Type of constituency:
urban	· 80	61
rural	20	39
	100	100
N	(45)	(115)

rural safe seats are from the border states of Kentucky, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia. The urban seats include five from Chicago, three from Detroit, eleven from New York, and three from the Los Angeles area. The boundaries of most of these Democratic city districts were drawn by Republican legislatures.

Compared to northern non-safe seats held by Democrats in 1964, the safe districts included a somewhat higher proportion of low-income families, of Negroes, and of first- and second-generation Americans, as Table III shows. These differences are not large, however, and the safe seats are no less diverse in their socio-economic characteristics than the others. The higher level of ethnicity in the safe seats is the

TABLE IV. PRESIDENTIAL SUPPORT SCORES OF DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSMEN IN SAFE AND NON-SAFE SEATS, BY REGION—1963

	North		Son	ıth
	Urban	Rural	Urban	Rural
Safe Seats	76	77	75	55
Non-Safe Seats	83	82	61	55

greatest difference. Half of the safe districts in the first income quartile and 43 per cent of those in the second quartile had 40 per cent or more first- and second-generation residents. Twenty-seven of the 45 safe constituencies had 40 per cent or more foreign-stock residents or 20 per cent Negroes, or both.

We explored the textbook theory proposition that congressmen in safe seats are less likely to support their president, presumably because they are subject to different constituency pressures. Tables IV and V show the Presidential Support and Opposition scores for congressmen in safe and non-safe seats with region and type of constituency controlled. Table IV suggests that Northerners in safe seats gave slightly less support than those from non-safe districts. Since failure to vote lowers a member's support score and many New York City congressmen are notorious absentees, Table V may be a

TABLE V. PRESIDENTIAL OPPOSITION SCORES OF DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSMEN IN SAFE AND NON-SAFE SEATS, BY REGION—1963

	North		Sc	outh
	Urban	Rural	Urban	Rural
Safe Seats	5	8	14	28
Non-Safe Seats	4	8	31	36

better indicator of presidential support.¹² It shows no differences between safe and non-safe northern congressmen. The extremely spotty attendance records of two members from rural safe districts account for most of the difference in the support scores of rural Northerners. The lower support by non-safe Southerners may result from Republican competition forcing these incumbents to adopt a more conservative position. In short, the level of party competition does not appear to be a useful general explanation of voting patterns among Democratic congressmen.¹³

III. CAREER PATTERNS OF SAFE SEAT HOLDERS

We come now to our major concern: the different levels of interest in a congressional career by members from different sides of the Mason-Dixon line. Years of consecutive service is one index of this interest. If northern congressmen in safe seats were less interested in House service, then, taken as a group, they should have less congressional seniority. But as Table VI indicates, this does not appear to be the case. There were no important differences in length of consecutive service between northern and southern Representatives.

According to the insiders' theory, many congressmen from urban machines are only serving ¹² Of course, failure to vote also lowers the Presidential Opposition score, but the rate of opposition in all northern cells is so low that 100% voting participation would not change the opposition scores significantly.

¹³ After examining voting records for the 87th Congress, Froman came to the same conclusion (ibid., p. 114). Other recent findings indicate that when region is controlled, length of service is not strongly related to the support that congressmen of either party give to their president. See Judson Mitchell and George Spink, "Presidential Support and Length of Service in the House of Representatives" (unpublished paper, Stanford University).

¹¹ See, e.g., Burns, pp. 242-4. Lewis A. Froman, Jr., discusses several other propositions about relationships between competition and party loyalty at both state and national levels. See his Congressmen and their Constituencies (Chicago, Rand McNally, 1963), ch. 9; and the works cited there.

TABLE VI. YEARS OF CONSECUTIVE SERVICE BY DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSMEN IN SAFE SEATS,

BY REGION—1964

Years of Consecutive Service	Northerners	Southerners
	(%)	(%)
0-9	38	32
10-19	33	38
20-29	25	23
30 and over	4	6
	100	994
N	(45)	(77)

⁴ Does not sum to 100 because of rounding.

time in the House until they can get a more highly prized post. The principal example offered is a tendency for New York City congressmen to quit the House abruptly when a judgeship becomes available. (These are usually elective offices, but access to them has been effectively controlled by the regular Democratic organization in New York.) By extension other northern big-city congressmen alleged to have the same preference for careers in state and local government. In contrast, a seat in Congress is said to be the high ambition of almost any southern politician. Those fortunate few who attain this goal are content to stay in the House (unless an opportunity for the Senate presents itself), patiently going along and working their way up the ladder of seniority to a position of real influence in national affairs.

We tested this proposition by examining the circumstances under which safe-seat incumbents left their seats from January, 1947 to the beginning of 1964. In all but a few cases the reasons for leaving were either stated by the incumbent or were obvious enough, e.g., death in office, defeat in a primary, retirement. In a few instances we inferred the reason from the man's subsequent occupation. These data, classified by region, are presented in Table VII.

The insiders' theory is confirmed on one point: 21 per cent of the Northerners who left the House did so to run for a state or local office, in contrast to only one Southerner. Almost all of these Northerners were from New York City and most of the offices sought were state or county judgeships. Quitting one's seat to go into business also is an indication of lack of interest in a House career, and here the regional ratio is reversed. Twenty-two per cent of the Southerners who left Congress went into private business or law practice, compared to just one Northerner. Since preferences for local public office or for private business to continuing congressional service are both examples of voluntary departure, the two categories can be combined to provide an overall measure of low interest in a House career. When so combined, these categories account for an identical proportion of northern and southern quitters: twenty-four per cent.

Fear of losing a primary may cause a member to quit in favor of another job. Rumors have it that several congressmen, from both North and South, have done this in the past decade. There is no reason to believe, however, that this fear is any more prevalent among Northerners than Southerners, or vice versa. One could argue that, everything considered, primary defeat may be less of a hazard for Northerners because of the strong political organizations in many cities. The data in Table VII support this proposition; more than twice as many Southerners were defeated in primaries.

The data presented thus far do not support the insiders' claim that Northerners evince less interest in Congress. Table VII indicates that, in fact, Northerners who leave Congress are

TABLE VII. SAFE SEAT HOLDERS' REASONS FOR LEAVING CONGRESS, BY REGION—1947-1964

Reasons for Leaving	Northerners	Southerners
	(%)	(%)
Death in offices	37	22
Retirement due to health or age	5	12
Defeat in primary	11	26
Run for Senate	16	12
Run for state or local office	21	2
Go into business
or law	3	22
Appointed to government position	8	5
-	****************
	101ь	101 ^b
N	(38)	(59)

^a See below, p. 346, for a discussion of this regional difference.

b Does not sum to 100 because of rounding. Sources: Congressional Quarterly Weekly Reports; Biographical Directory of the American Congress, 1774-1961 (Washington, G.P.O., 1961); and various issues of Congressional Directory (Washington, G.P.O.).

more likely to remain in public service than Southerners. This may reflect fewer opportunities for rewarding government posts in the largely rural South. It may also be a result of the unstructured southern political parties. There appears to be much less articulation between congressional politics and state and local politics in the South.¹⁴

We have seen that incumbents in northern safe seats have as much seniority as their opposite numbers from the South. Seniority in Congress is useful chiefly to secure desirable committee assignments. Since committee rank is a result of consecutive service on the committee, the northern safe seat holders conceivably could dissipate their congressional seniority by "committee hopping."

The data do not support this speculation. Twenty-nine per cent of the southern safe seat holders and 31 per cent of the Northerners were in one of the top three positions on the 17 major standing committees. Of the 14 major chairmanships held by members from safe districts, Southerners held nine and Northerners five; 12 per cent of the Southerners were major committee chairmen, and 11 per cent of the Northerners. The southern advantage in total chairmanships appears to be a result of their great number of safe seats, and nothing else.

Finally, we examined the proportions of the two groups of safe seat holders who were chairmen of subcommittees. Here there is a southern advantage; 36 per cent of the Northerners were subcommittee chairmen, compared to 45 per cent of the Southerners. Subcommittee chairmen are chosen by the committee chairman, who need not make their selections solely on the basis of seniority. Favoritism by the predominantly southern committee chairmen might account for the disparity in subcommittee chairmanships. We tested this proposition by counting, on each of the 17 major committees, those committee members who were not subcommittee chairmen themselves but who had more seniority than the lowest ranking subcommittee chairman. A total of 28 congressmen were in this position, 18 Northerners and 10 Southerners. 16 On committees chaired by Southerners, nine Northerners and three Southerners were by-passed. With northern chairmen, the proportion was more even: nine Northerners and seven Southerners.

¹⁴ See V. O. Key, Southern Politics (New York, 1949), ch. 18 and passim.

Favoritism may not be the only reason for setting aside seniority in appointing subcommittee chairmen. Someone with special expertise may receive such an appointment out of turn. An uninterested or hopelessly incompetent member may be passed over. Some members may be reluctant to accept the chairmanship of an undesirable subcommittee in hopes of being chosen eventually to head a more powerful one. There is no reason to believe, however, that any of these considerations would apply disproportionately more to southern than northern members. Thus while the data in the preceding paragraph cannot be considered conclusive evidence of southern favoritism, they provide at least some basis for an explanation of the disproportionate number of subcommittee chairmanships held by Southerners.

The data presented up to this point indicate that the insiders' theory is wrong on every count:

- Congressmen in southern safe seats do not have more congressional seniority than those in northern safe seats.
- (2) The post-congressional career patterns of the two groups do not indicate any greater northern inclination to leave the House for another career.
- (3) The safe Southerners do not have more committee seniority than safe Northerners.
- (4) Safe Southerners have more chairmanships than they are "entitled to" only at the subcommittee level, where considerations other than seniority affect the selection process.

The final element in the insiders' theory, concerning differences in the prestige of congressmen, will be discussed in the following section.

IV. OTHER REGIONAL DIFFERENCES

The finding that northern safe seat holders do not quit congress any more readily than their southern counterparts does not by itself dispose of the proposition that Southerners are more effective legislators. Is it possible to examine the proposition that while the North-

Southerners comprise 44% of the membership of the highest-ranking half of the 17 major committees, and it is from this group that subcommittee chairmen are chosen.

¹⁵ The figure for the Southerners would be 13% if we took account of George Mahon's accession to the chairmanship of the Appropriations Committee on the death of Clarence Cannon in May, 1964.

¹⁶ It might be thought that the larger number of by-passed Northerners results from the fact that there are more of them in the House. But erners are no less likely to leave Congress, they do not use their House positions as effectively as the Southerners? Are the Northerners, as a group, less able men? Some fragments of data can be considered.

In the first place, the role of United States Representative does not appear to be any more prestigious among the mass of southern citizens than among those in the North. In a survey conducted in 1947 the National Opinion Research Center studied a national sample's assessment of the "general standing" of 90 occupations, one of which was "United States Representative in Congress."17 Each of the 2920 respondents was asked to rate each occupation's "general standing" on the following scale: "excellent," "good," "average," "somewhat below average," and "poor." When tabulated by region, with southern Negro respondents removed, the results do not indicate any significant regional differences in congressional prestige. Eighty-eight per cent of the white southern respondents gave "excellent" or "good" ratings to the job of congressman, compared to 92 per cent in the Midwest and 94 per cent in Northeast and West. When all occupations were ranked, congressmen were sixth in the West and Midwest and seventh in the South and Northeast.18

The office of representative may be accorded as much respect by the mass electorate in the North, as in every section, and yet not be as highly regarded in the specialized political milieu in which politicians are socialized. Urban political organizations control Democratic congressional nominations in many northern one-party areas. Since these machines typically are based on the tangible rewards that can be drawn from control of local government, status in them generally goes to those who distribute jobs and contracts. Positions that have a share in this distribution process are the most desirable that the machine can bestow. In such cities many people see politics as a way to make money through the exercise of discretion.

Congressmen have hardly any patronage of their own19 and, when there is a party organization of any consequence back home, federal appointments are cleared with its leader. In any event, federal patronage is negligible compared to the jobs and contracts that any machine-influenced local government can dispense. For most politicians who have worked their way up in an urban machine, being a congressman has little appeal. Some local bosses have also been congressmen, e.g., the late William Green of Philadelphia or Charles Buckley of the Bronx, but their political power was not a result of their congressional seats. In his study of the Chicago congressional delegation, Leo M. Snowiss found that in that city's powerful Democratic organization the job of congressman was not as highly prized as any of a number of party and local governmental positions.20 Consequently, at least some congressional nominations go to less highly regarded organization figures, tired mediocrities in late middle age. Most regular machine politicians in New York City seem to have a similarly low evaluation of congressmen. Richard H. Rovere's description of Peter J. Mc-Guinness, an old-time boss in Brooklyn, includes an interesting example of this point of view:

¹⁷ For a full description of this study see Albert J. Reiss, Jr., Occupations and Social Status (New York, 1961.)

¹⁸ Ibid., pp. 6, 19, 200, 220 Data on white Southerners were obtained from the National Opinion Research Center through the Inter-University, Consortium for Political Research. We are grateful to Ralph L. Bisco of the Consortium and Patrick Bova of NORC for their kind help.

Like most politicians of his school, McGuinness considers congressmen members of an inferior class. To him, the local party bosses, who pick the legislators and tell them what to do, are the elite of politics and congressmen are men who, unable to make the grade themselves, must serve as legislative secretaries to men who have made the grade. He cannot understand the tendency, comparatively recent in this city, of political bosses to take congressional nominations for themselves. "I've sent plenty of them to Albany and Washington," he says, "but I'd never be such a damn fool as to send meself. Believe me, I'm glad I was never in a fix where anyone else could send me. If a man's a leader in New York, what the hell business has he got in Washington?"21

¹⁹ In addition to nominations to the service academies (which usually are heavily dependent on objective examination scores), the average congressman is lucky if he can name a Capitol policeman, elevator operator, or page. It takes a number of terms to acquire enough seniority to have much more appointment power.

²⁰ Leo M. Snowiss, "Chicago and Congress: A Study of Metropolitan Representation" (unpublished doctoral dissertation, University of Chicago, 1965), ch. 2.

²¹ Richard H. Rovere, "The Big Hello," in The American Establishment, Harvest edition (New York, 1962), pp. 45-6.

One of the authors of this article, engaged in research that provided many opportunities to observe status relations in a very cohesive traditional northeastern urban organization, noted that the local congressional candidate seemed to get very little deference from most members of the organization.

This is not to say that all big-city congressmen are incompetent. The candidate just mentioned, for instance, has become a congressman with a considerable reputation for ability and effectiveness. Many other able representatives have come to Washington from the machines. In fact, given the low value generally placed on House seats in such political milieux, some ambitious men probably realize that the competition for such positions is less than for more lucrative posts at home. Nevertheless, politicians, like everyone else, are partly products of their environment, and there are indications that machine-controlled districts in the North produce more than their share of ineffective congressmen.

The New York City delegation is a case in point. Its members make up the core of the "Tuesday-to-Thursday club": congressmen who are in Washington only from Tuesday morning through Thursday afternoon and spend the rest of their time back home in more congenial and profitable pursuits. This habit is so prevalent that the decision of a second-term Democratic congressman from Queens to live in Washington evoked quasi-anthropological awe from The New York Times: "Mr. Rosenthal is the first New York City Democrat to take this step, as far as anyone in the state delegation can recall."22

The best available measure of attendance is CQ's voting participation score, which gives the percentage of roll calls (119 in 1963) at which each member was present.23 A serious disadvantage of this score as a measure of interest in legislation is that the leadership. aware of the members' habits, tries to schedule roll calls when most congressmen are in Washington. Since the House has been in Democratic hands for the past ten years, votes are seldom held when many Democrats are absent. As a practical matter, this means that there is little voting except on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. If a member's score is low, his attendance must be very spotty indeed. Table VIII contains voting participation scores for safe and non-safe congressmen, with region controlled. Although a safe congressman should not have to spend as much time mending fences

TABLE VIII. VOTING PARTICIPATION BY DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSMEN IN SAFE AND NON-SAFE SEATS, BY REGION—1963

Type of District	Voting Participation Score
Northern Safe	79
Northern Non-Safe	86
Southern Safe	83
Southern Non-Safe	87

at home, the northern safe group scored somewhat lower than the non-safe Northerners. The New York City delegation accounts for most of this difference. When they are excluded, the northern safe group's score rises from 79 to 82, virtually the same as the southern safe score.

Since a number of Southerners also have unimpressive attendance records (although no southern delegation can match the New Yorkers), it is difficult to derive marked regional differences from these data. The complaints about the New York and Chicago delegations come chiefly from people who would usually like to be able to count on their votes. Possibly conservative spokesmen are equally bitter about southern absenteeism, but do not exhibit their disappointments in print.

Another bit of evidence may be useful in determining whether there are regional differences in legislative effectiveness. Despite the intentions of the spirit, the flesh may be weak. Some congressmen might not be physically capable of working as hard as they want. Representatives in northern safe seats are more likely than their southern counterparts to begin their congressional careers at fairly advanced ages. As Table IX shows, a quarter of

TABLE IX. AGE DISTRIBUTION AT BEGINNING OF CURRENT TERM OF SERVICE OF INCUMBENTS IN SAFE SEATS, BY REGION—1964

Age at Entry	Northerners	Southerners
	(%)	(%)
25-34	13	17
35-39	33	32
40-44	18	29
45-49	11	10
50-54	16	10
55 and over	8	1
	99ª	99*
N	(45)	(77)

Does not sum to 100 because of rounding.

²² The New York Times, March 16, 1964, p. 37. ²³ Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, January 31, 1964.

the present northern safe seat holders entered the House when they were fifty or older, compared to 11 per cent of the Southerners. This explains the finding in Table VII that more Northerners than Southerners die in office. The machine-dominated recruitment patterns discussed earlier may account for the regional age difference. Like other rewards for faithful service, congressional nominations are not given to neophytes. The leaders of urban machines typically are older men who have put in decades of work for the party. Upstarts are not highly regarded. On the other hand, nominations for available seats in most southern districts are more often fought over by a number of ambitious young men.24 Since this prize is seldom one that can be bestowed by a cohesive organization, precedence has less to do with who gets it.

On the basis of these scattered data, it appears that Northerners in safe seats may be somewhat less vigorous than Southerners. This difference cannot be established as either large or conclusive.

V. TRENDS IN THE COMPETITIVENESS OF CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS

Our definition of safe seats is static and does not take account of districts that have become non-competitive since 1946. What trends have there been since then? As Charles O. Jones has shown, the number of competitive seats has decreased since 1952.²⁵ What effect is this trend likely to have on the distribution of political power in the House Democratic party? Do these trends modify the picture of safe districts painted by Burns and other spokesmen of the textbook theory?

To explore these questions we traced the number of non-competitive Democratic districts in every congressional election from 1946 through 1964. 1946 is a good starting point for two reasons: it was the first postwar election and it marks the low point of Democratic congressional votes in the past 36 years. For purposes of this discussion we will define a non-competitive election as one in which the Democratic candidate received 65 per cent or more of the major party vote. This is an arbi-

²⁴ The classic description of the unstructured politics of most southern states is Key's book. See also Julius Turner, "Primary Elections as the Alternative to Party Competition in 'Safe' Districts," Journal of Politics, Vol. 15 (May, 1953), pp. 197–210.

²⁵ Charles O. Jones, "Inter-party Competition for Congressional Seats," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 17 (September, 1964), pp. 461-76. trary criterion, designed only to put often uncontested southern seats in some sort of comparative framework with northern non-competitive districts.

Table X shows the distribution of non-competitive districts in every election since the war. The number of southern districts in this category remained almost constant through 1958, with the exception of 1956, and has declined since then. The number of northern non-competitive districts has increased consistently and now exceeds the South's. The 1964 election has exaggerated these trends,26 but the probably aberrant character of this election should not minimize the significance of the steady increase in the North's share of noncompetitive districts. Since 1956 Northern districts have never comprised less than 44 per cent of all seats won by 65 per cent or more. A similar proportion of non-competitive districts has been urban since 1956. It is no longer so true that non-competitive districts "have a heavily rural bias," as Burns said in 1963.27

The increase in Democratic strength in the North is due in part to population growth and movement. Better-off urban residents have been moving to the suburbs. The remaining city dwellers include higher proportions of Negroes, ethnic groups, and the poor. Reapportionment after the 1950 and 1960 Censuses may also have contributed to the growth of non-competitive districts.²⁸ Republican state legislatures often follow a strategy of concentrating Democratic voting strength in a few districts.²⁹

The increase in northern numbers has been accompanied by a decline in the southern position. In 1947 there were 103 Democratic representatives from the South and only two ²⁶ There probably would be fewer southern noncompetitive seats (not to mention fewer Democratic congressmen) if there had been Republican candidates in every southern district in the 1964 election. In several southern states Republican candidates either won or held their opponents to less than 65% of the vote in every district that they contested.

²⁷ Burns, p. 242.

²⁸ The wholesale reapportionment resulting from recent Supreme Court decisions is also likely to increase urban and suburban representation in both North and South.

²⁹ This is an example of how a rational strategy for Republican parties at the state level—conceding a minimum number of seats to the Democrats—is harmful to the party's interests on the national level because it enables these Democrats to build up seniority in Congress.

TABLE X. CONGRESSIONAL SEATS WON BY DEMOCRATS BY AT LEAST 65 PER CENT OF THE TWO-PARTY VOTE, BY YEAR AND REGION—1946 THROUGH 1964

Year	North				South				Total		Total
	Urban		Rural		Urban		Rural		Seats Won By 65%		Demo- cratic
	No.	Per cent	No.	Per cent	No.	Per cent	No.	Per	No.	Per cent	Seats Won
		%		%		%		%		%
1946	16	15	7	6	11	10	76	69	110	100	188
1948	31	23	14	10	12	9	78	58	135	100	263
1950	25	19	13	10	12	9	79	61	129	994	235
1952	24	20	4	3	12	10	78	66	118	99a	213
1954	40	28	. 14	10	9	6	79	56	142	100	232
1956	32	26	8	. 7	13	11	68	56	121	100	234
1958	61	35	20	11	20	11	75	43	176	100	283
1960	57	36	12	8	19	12	70	44	158	100	260
1962	53	39	10	7	10	7	64	47	137	100	259
1964	81	49	25	15	12	7	48	29	166	100	294

a Does not sum to 100 because of rounding.

Sources: for election returns, various editions of Richard Scammon, ed., America Votes (Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press); several editions of the Congressional Directory; various editions of Clerk, U. S. House of Representatives, Statistics of the Congressional and Presidential Elections (Washington, G.P.O.); and Complete Returns of the 1964 Elections by Congressional District (Washington, Congressional Quarterly, Inc., 1965). The task of classifying Congressional districts as urban or rural proved to be rather complicated. For the 1962 and 1964 elections we used CQ Census Analysis, and for 1956 through 1960 similar data in Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, February 2, 1962. In an earlier classification published in 1956, CQ used a completely different four-point classification scheme, Congressional Quarterly Almanac, 1956 (Washington, Congressional Quarterly, Inc., 1956), pp. 788-792. We adapted this scheme to the urban-rural one on the basis of apparent similarities in the two taxonomies. For the elections from 1946 through 1950 we used the 1956 data, modified by examination of Congressional district maps.

Republicans. By 1963 there were eleven southern Republican seats; and in 1965 there are 17 such, 30 and 89 Democratic. Some of the Republican seats gained in 1964, notably five in Alabama and one in Mississippi, may presently revert to the Democrats. On the other hand, Goldwater did not do as well as Eisenhower and Nixon in the peripheral southern states. Possibly, therefore, the Democrats will recover their seats in the Deep South only to lose seats in Florida, Texas, or Virginia. The 1964 election cost the South two of its subcommittee chairmanships. 31 These are not the ³⁰ This includes Representative Albert W. Watson of South Carolina, a Democrat who backed Senator Goldwater in 1964, was stripped of his seniority for this defection by the Democratic Caucus, and then switched parties.

³¹ Representatives Grant and Roberts of Alabama and Winstead of Mississippi, all defeated by Republican candidates, headed a total of four only seniority losses the region has suffered. Primary losses and redistricting have also eroded its power in the House. Since 1947 eight southern congressmen have lost their seats through redistricting and 15 more have been deposed in primaries. The redistricted seats have been gained by other southern states, but the new incumbents in these 23 seats could not inherit the seniority of the supplanted congressmen.

These trends mark an important shift in the distribution of power in the Democratic party. The northern wing of the congressional party is just now recovering the ground lost in the Republican sweep of 1946. The enormous Democratic losses in that election were consubcommittees. A fifth subcommittee was chaired by John Bell Williams of Mississippi, who shared Watson's fate (but did not switch parties). Northerners took over Williams' subcommittee and one of the two chaired by Grant. fined almost entirely to the North. One of the long-term consequences of the Republican landslide then was the creation of a "seniority generation" dominated by Southerners. Unless the trend depicted in Table X is reversed, northern Democrats with useful amounts of seniority will soon be as numerous as the weakened southern contingent. Within a few years the North should begin to realize in its turn the fruits of the seniority system.

The familiar debate over "party responsibility" often leads to rejoinders that fragmentation is inevitable in American political parties. Some fragmentation is unavoidable, but it is one thing to say that we cannot (or should not) have cohesive parties on the English model, and quite another to claim that any particular existing level of fragmentation is immutable. As the changes in House rules at the beginning of the 1965 session demonstrate,32 arrangements to make the process more or less responsive to majorities can occur within the basic framework of fragmentation. A "bargaining system" can be any of a variety of political orders, from just short of anarchy to something like what happens in Great Britain when one party does not have a decisive majority. All systems characterized by bargaining do not assign similar resources to the principal actors. If the effective power of the president and the majority leadership were enhanced by any of half a dozen procedural changes, e.g., an item veto, it would still be necessary for the actors to bargain with each other. The change would be in the cards, not the game. This is a simple point, but it seems to be overlooked by some of the most enthusiastic academic apologists for anti-majoritarian aspects of our political sys-

Dissension in the Democratic party is due largely to Southerners.³³ As the relative strength of the South decreases, the cohesive potential of the party as a whole will increase, for there is little reason to expect that the northern wing of the party will become pro-

³² Procedures were changed to reduce the Rules Committee's power to prevent floor consideration of legislation and avoid appointing conference committees. Most Southerners resisted these actions.

³³ There are, of course, many Southerners, including powerful committee chairmen like Carl Vinson, who are (or were) loyal to Democratic presidents all or most of the time. One cannot validly label all southern congressmen as invariably dissident. Nevertheless, there is also no doubt that the southern wing of the party is the major source of deviance.

portionately more divided as it grows in strength.³⁴ To put it another way, the decline of the Southerners will be accompanied by a Democratic president's greater ability to get his way with Congress. It appears, then, that present trends are in the direction of greater cohesion and "responsibility" in the Democratic party.

VI. SUMMARY

We have presented data to test two theories about southern influence in the Democratic party in the House of Representatives. The central question is whether southern power can be explained solely by the lack of party competition in the South, or whether it is due also to regional differences which result in more dedication to legislative careers on the part of Southerners. We approached this problem by comparing northern and southern occupants of safe Democratic seats. There were no regional differences in congressional or committee 34 Some political scientists have argued that large legislative majorities are less responsive to the president, because they lead to factionalism. It is unclear whether this proposition refers simply to a majority for the president's party, or an effective majority for his policies. Even if it refers to the latter, there are some difficulties. Most important, it would seem that the smaller the majority, the easier it is for a potential defector to impede the president's program, since he needs to win fewer other dissidents to destroy the majority. As the majority grows, so does the size of the splinter group necessary to make an impact, and hence so does the magnitude of the defector's task. For discussions of this "law of economy" see E. E. Schattschneider. Party Government (New York, 1942), pp. 85-96. William H. Riker, who is cited on this point, actually discusses the weakness of big majorities only when they are so big that they become "a coalition of the whole." See his A Theory of Political Coalitions (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1962), p. 56.

Statements of this proposition are usually accompanied by reminders that President Roosevelt, having won enormous congressional majorities in 1936, found his legislative program bogged down soon thereafter. This appears to be the major item of evidence to support the proposition. It does not appear that presidents have restrained their efforts to elect friendly congresses for fear of suffering Roosevelt's fate. A systematic examination of the historical record found that, if anything, big majorities are better than little ones. See Jay Goodman, "Legislative Majorities and Presidential Success" (unpublished paper, Brown University.)

seniority, or in forsaking Congress for other careers. Lack of party competition, aided perhaps by southern favoritism in appointment of subcommittee chairmen—and in the wake of the northern Republican sweep in 1946—seems to be an adequate explanation for the disproportionate number of Southerners in influential positions in the House. The textbook theory, accordingly, appears to be correct on this point.

The southerners may be more vigorous in the use they make of the positions they have. If age is any indication, Northerners, while they remain in the House, may be less able and energetic than Southerners. We could find no evidence of regional differences in the prestige of congressmen among electorates. The Northerners did tend to include more absentees and more members who first entered Congress at age 50 or older. These differences are not great, however, and must be interpreted with caution.

The number and share of non-competitive seats held by the North have increased markedly in the past fifteen years. The text-book theory is becoming increasingly less valid in its description of the characteristics of non-competitive districts. Unless this trend is reversed, northern Democrats will become much more influential in the House within a few years, since the other findings of this article do not indicate that they are any less likely to accrue seniority. The effect of these trends will be a decrease in the power of the deviant wing of the Democratic party and therefore an increase in party cohesion.

CHARACTER AND MISSION OF A UNITED NATIONS PEACE FORCE, UNDER CONDITIONS OF GENERAL AND COMPLETE DISARMAMENT

CHARLES BURTON MARSHALL

The Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research, The Johns Hopkins University

A principal element of the United States Government's conception of general and complete disarmament pertains to establishment and development of a force not identified with any national governing entity, subject to control by an all-embracing international collectivity, and charged with missions of global scope in connection with peace-keeping.

The purpose of this essay is to examine what might be entailed, as conditions and as consequences, in establishing such a force. The discussion focuses quite explicitly on terms in the United States' proposal before the eighteennation Disarmament Conference at Geneva in 1962—a document hereinafter referred to by the short title Outline.¹ Other sources, including proposals and discussions of forces of kindred type, are referred to for details concerning conceivable forms and conditions for the undertaking.

I. THE PROJECT IN BROAD COMPASS

As set forth in the Outline, such a force would be brought into existence over a span of years. The process of realizing it would be linked, stage by stage, with a progressive diminution of all forces under national control. At a transforming juncture, national forces would have been scaled down to a level rendering impossible their projection of any threat beyond the borders of their respective domains. Concomitantly, the global force would be increased to a level such as to place it beyond effective challenge by any other force existing. The course would not be one of simply doing away with forces capable of deployment over a wide range. It would involve an amalgam of such forces into an all-encompassing monopoly —a coercive institution of scope and relative, if not absolute, power heretofore never achieved.

¹ United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Blueprint for the Peace Race: Outline of Basic Provisions of a Treaty on General and Complete Disarmament in a Peaceful World (Washington, Government Printing Office, 1962). This article is from a study prepared for the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency by the Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research, The Johns Hopkins University. The judgments in this article are the author's and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency or any other department or agency of the United States Government.

The lines of development would be essentially interdependent. The final step in reducing nationally controlled forces to a level commensurate with internal security requirements would be contingent upon a solid and immediate prospect of achievement of an efficacious global force. Fulfillment of the design for the global force, moreover, would be dependent upon diminution of nationally controlled forces.

An initial question, necessarily hypothetical, is in order concerning the appropriateness for their respective missions of the world peace force and of forces to be permitted under national control. The criteria in the Outline are limited to quantitative and technical considerations expressed in highly general terms. With respect to the world peace force, the key words in the Outline are: "sufficient armed forces and armaments that no state could challenge it." This prescription is amplified by the following phrases: "fully capable of insuring international security in a disarmed world" and "equipped with agreed types of armaments necessary to ensure that the United Nations can effectively deter any threat or use of arms."2 The counterpart terms in the Outline regarding forces permissible for states to retain under their own direction are: "agreed requirements for nonnuclear armaments of agreed types for national forces required to maintain internal order and protect the personal security of citizens." States would be required to disband "organizational arrangements comprising and supporting their national military establishment."3

Relevant qualities in each instance are simply postulated. Their feasibility and ascertainability are assumed. The terms necessary for fulfillment are left to be worked out by international accord. For the moment, questions of the adequacy of a purely quantifying and technical expression of attributes may be passed over, along with questions regarding the practicability, probability, or even desirability of the relevant contemplated developments. The focus here is on the broad missions of the force and its presumable character in the light of its missions and on the requirements and consequences inferable from its missions and character.

² Outline, Stage III, H, 3; A. Objectives, 4. ³ Outline, Stage III, B, 1.

A mission assigned to the projected peace force with respect to maintenance of order and security among states, as explicitly expressed in the Outline, would be enormously inclusive and complex. In addition, however, the force would have duties to perform with respect to security within component states. Because this aspect of the matter is only implicitly indicated in the project, and because it is fundamental to comprehension of the idea of the peace force, elucidation is called for. For that purpose, it is necessary to make clear the transformation of the character of states envisaged in the project.

II. THE TRANSFORMATION OF STATES

A decision to move into and past the transforming stage would involve both resolution of will and ascertainment of fact on the part of concerned governments acting in their single discretion but also as a group. A number of antecedent choices would have to have been made, and relevant actions effected, to take the course to that decisive stage.

The purpose here, rather than speculating upon procedure, is to examine the sorts of questions likely to require answer at the seat of judgment. As a precondition to the final step, or, more accurately, as a constituent part of it, the governments would have to register themselves as satisfied on two interrelated propositions: first, a solid and immediate prospect of the scaling of forces retained under individual state control, case by case, down to a level providing no surplus over requirements for domestic security; second, a concomitant conveyance of overwhelming superiority to the world peace force. Clearly—a point requiring no argument—the determination would be both subjective and objective: the governments' wills would be resolved in response to their appraisal of relevant realities, but the relevant realities would in major part flow from their combined wills.

For the moment, the focus is on the first of the two propositions. The forces permitted to retain national identity and to be at the disposition of individual governments would be limited to agreed requirements and would be of agreed types, with the referent à propos of requirements and types to be the function of maintaining internal order and protecting the security of citizens. Capability for sustaining the internal security of states would have been removed from their autonomous jurisdiction.

One might speculate on a possibility of proforma ascertainment, with each government's estimate of its own requirements and its related inventory of equipment and related manpower to be accepted as conclusive by the others. The supposition does not withstand analysis. Fulfillment of the paramountcy accorded the central forces would be measurable only in relation to capabilities to be retained by states individually or cumulatively.

As an auxiliary postulate, however, one might premise the irresistibility of the universal force by assuming it to have been vested with a monopoly of prodigious instruments such as nuclear weapons, thereby rendering uncritical the amounts of weapons of less destructive efficacy and the related trained manpower to be retained by individual states. This line of argument requires overlooking the references to agreed requirements and to provisions in the project calling for states to disband "organizational arrangements comprising and supporting their national military establishment." It requires one to hypothesize huge improvidence on the part of the participating governments in creating a world security force capable of effective action only at the highest levels of destruction—a characteristic far more likely to inhibit authorized use of the force than to intimidate potential challengers.

One might speculate also on a possibility of limiting the term of general concern in retained security capabilities to the moment of decision, whereafter the matter would revert to the autonomous jurisdiction of the respective states. This notion of lifting internal security requirements of states only for a moment to the center of world concern and then permitting them to subside immediately into being a concern for each state to settle in its own way also fails of credibility. Factors simply do not shift so arbitrarily from importance to indifference.

The inference is clear. Limitation upon internal security capabilities to an agreed level of requirements would be a continuing and integral part of the pattern of general obligation in the disarmament undertaking. Establishment of that level, case by case, would be a matter for international authority not just initially and once but thenceforth and continuously. The limitation would be part of a contract underlying a global governing apparatus. Confinement within those limits would be an essential aspect of adherence to the whole scheme and subject, therefore, to the processes of verification and enforcement underlying the disarmament program as a whole. Any question of upward revision of restrictions settled on at the outset would be international business on a par with the question of setting limits in the first instance.

The constituent states would have yielded their autonomy with respect to allocation of resources as between the uses of civil enjoyment and provision for coercion. The autonomy thus surrendered would relate not only to power to decide, within limits of resources available, on provision of forces for launching or repelling attack as counters in relations with other states but would extend as well to the discretion of any government as to requirements for maintaining the regime within.

The point is basic and highly important—one deserving to be acknowledged for what it is rather than minimized euphemistically. The implications are made clearer by taking into account the nature of internal security requirements, which are implicitly predicated as fixed and predictable in the United States disarmament project but which are in reality elastic and unpredictable.

III. PREDICTABILITY AND INTERNAL ORDER

How far ahead could the internal security requirements of any particular political society be divined? The question is not disposed of by postulating the efficacy of international arrangements for interdicting all factors playing upon such a society from beyond its borders. That sweeping assumption is scarcely demonstrable at best, but in order to forward the argument here, relevant doubts may be discounted. An array of imponderables would still remain.

To place the matter in perspective, it is in point to take account of the meanings of the key term internal order used in connection with standards and limits predicated for forces to be permitted to be retained under the control of particular states. The phrase implies reliable conditions in human relations over the land concerned—a sense conveyed in an auxiliary phrase about "the personal security of citizens." Beyond that sense, the term embraces the idea of continuity of regime. Order may be said to obtain within a civil society when succession to places of authority is reliably controlled by rules rather than subject to determination by forcible means. In an ordered society, those holding title to power would be enabled, as well as constrained, to convey it to successors determined under the same basic licit arrangements by which the holders in their turn had received it.

Those holding high magisterial positions under any orderly system of governance, moreover, must take heed of questions of continuity and descent. Faculties for deciding on the allocation of means to ensure continuity of the system itself are an integral element in any governing system, a necessary constituent of power to lay down the law. Divested of power to assure the means of survival, a system of government would lose a main prop of authority—an element of internal sovereignty, to use an overworked abstraction.

These observations do not imply a possibility of an absolute guarantee of survival for a system of government. Perhaps no regime could ever foreclose all possibilities, at least logical possibilities, of being overthrown by revolt or revolution. Nevertheless, the concept of order—and this is the main point—entails a licit and reliable descent of authority as distinguished from violent disjunctions and overturns in the system of rulership.

Whether with respect to order in the sense of assurance of the personal security of persons or in the sense of assured continuity of the system of government, internal security requirements, stated in amounts or types, vary in relation to the mores prevailing within a society. They vary in relation to factors of urban concentration and rural dispersion. They vary in relation, moreover, to factors of identity and confidence operative between a regime and its populace. They are affected by degrees of confidence assumed by regimes, or accorded by their populaces, with respect to their legitimacy. They vary as between circumstances of political tension and oppression and those of free consensus. They vary in relation to stress or contentment with respect to conditions of production and distribution, social unrest or placidity, and to factors of ethnic and cultural homogeneity or diversity and circumstances of disturbance or adjustment among ethnic groups. They are affected by factors of morale and competence within the security forces themselves. All these considerations—and many others of indisputable relevance—may be summed up as inherent and persistent variables in any political society. The point requires no labored argument. One needs only to ask himself as to the validity of a ten-year projection of internal security requirements for the United States drawn up, say, in the year 1855.

Variability of internal security requirements leads logically to a consideration of the role of military establishments in regard to internal security, to implications of abolishing such establishments under national control, and to the bearing of the topic on the mission of the projected United Nations peace force.

IV. DIVISION OF FUNCTIONS REGARDING INTERNAL ORDER

This facet of the subject entails a recital of some elementary, even obvious, points concerning organization of coercion in relation to maintenance of order and statehood. The delineation necessarily is highly generalized, focusing on essences rather than details and eliding empirical distinctions as between unitary and federal systems and as among states of varying degrees of civic development in the contemporary world.

A basic division of functions with respect to the apparatus of coercion is generally characteristic of advanced states. The origins trace back to a stage of development when groups first settled down in permanent identification with delimited portions of the earth's surface and used them as sites for accumulating goods and established fixed habitations and passed them along from one generation to another. The concept of state—as suggested by its static implication—is rooted in the idea of fixed position. It represents established order pervasive within an area, with diversity beyond the perimeter.

Basically, the relevant division of function lies between establishment of a span of jurisdiction and control on the one hand and the exercise of control or jurisdiction within the established span on the other: external security and internal security. These are distinguishable but not absolutely separable functions.

Military functions pertain to the establishment of spans of control. They are concerned with securing, in the first instance, dominion over land or water, as the case may be—and in modern circumstances, over air space as well; with holding perimeters against other forces competing for access to or mastery over all or part of the range concerned, and with expanding perimeters as opportune or necessary under the spur of ambition, advantage, or survival.

In our nomenclature, the generic term in respect of enforcing order within an established span of jurisdiction is police—derived, obviously, from the Greek term for city, reflecting the institution known as the Greek city state, and cognate with such terms as polish, politics, polity, and the like, associated with the handling of general affairs among a people living in proximity, interdependent, highly involved in each other's existence, and needing a pervasive and constantly operative scheme of order to minister conditions of their common life.

Military and police institutions share many characteristics, some of them superficial only. Each type is customarily called a force—a term denoting coercion, directed energy, and a body of men prepared for action. Their specialty centers on weapons and their use. Uniform dress and distinguishing emblems to differentiate members from the general run of people are a normal requirement on duty. Each such institution—certainly, at least, in a constitutional order—is under rigorous restrictions regarding the occasions and purposes for bringing its specialty to bear in action. Their structures are tightly hierarchic. Each is more highly organized than other institutions of society in general.

Yet contrasting characteristics are also relevant. The rigor of organization and authority is generally more pervasive within a military establishment. Systems of tutelage and surveillance within are more highly developed. Autonomous standards of privilege and courtesy are particular traits. Military organizations have separate codes of rules enforceable through an autonomous system of adjudication and punishment effected by magisterial systems of their own. Prerogative to deploy elements in what has been called systematic nomadism is part of the scheme of authority in the usual case. The obligation of service between a member and the military establishment is dissolvable only at the state's consent: that is, a member cannot quit at his option but must be absolved from duty. Such are the characteristics distinguishing a military establishment as a sort of state within a state.4

A police establishment is committed to its mission continuously. At all times it is deployed and operating within its assigned area. It acts on a basis of delegated discretion. Its activities on behalf of internal order therefore may be said to be of an administrative character. A military establishment represents, in contrast, a latent power under normal circumstances. Its mission is reserved. A military establishment exists in some degree of readiness, but it is not in action with respect to its mission except under extraordinary circumstances. Then it takes the field not on a basis of delegated discretion but properly in response to specific command or authorization representing an exercise of prerogative basic and central to the existence and maintenance of a state.

The prerogative to call military forces into action has to do not only with levying war against external enemies but also with maintenance of a state's span of jurisdiction against internal challenge as well. Military forces are a part, even if normally an abeyant part, of the internal security arrangements of a state. Police forces are calculated to cope with predictable challenges to internal security. Military forces are a reserve capability for use when a challenge exceeds the capabilities of police establishments, whether because of some extraordinarily formidable character in the challenge or because of some factor of disaffection within the police apparatus. The concept here invoked is not one of mere theorizing. In an instance still fresh in American national experience, a thousand score of troops were called out to enforce the right of one individual to attend a university.

⁴S. E. Finer, The Man on Horseback (New York, Praeger, 1962), pp. 6-13.

Thus one of the potentials for maintaining order within a state is military power. Disorder within a state's span of jurisdiction may take on proportions challenging the integrity and continuity of the state's existence. In such an extremity, the relevance of military power to the maintenance of internal order becomes patent. Even in normal times, when military power is only an abeyant factor, its very existence and the prospect of its availability in exigency are a presumable, if incalculable, factor in support of internal security.

Discussion on the point here has been directed to the role of military power within political systems characterized by a high level of institutional development. In contrasting cases military establishments are often dominant factors rather than subordinated elements in patterns of rulership. In some extreme instances-illustrations from recent events in various African states come readily to mindunbridled military establishments may even be an aggravating factor in discontinuity and disorder. In others, a degree of corporateness and effectiveness within the military apparatus may supply a principal and virtually sole basis for holding a so-called nation together. Such phenomena do not offset the main argument here concerning the basic role of military power within autonomous states.

The project for abolishing military capabilities of states thus has deep implications for their existence and for the character of authority within them. The prerogative to interpose forces in exigency beyond those forces provided in the police establishment for coping with challenges to internal security would pass from the hands of state authority and be vested in an organ external to each state.

Limitation to internal security requirements of forces under control of any state might be so construed as to permit each government to maintain armed bodies in some modest excess of constant requirements as a means for coping with extremities. Some such thought is reflected in the Outline. This approach would raise a question of how to foreclose use of such forces to threaten the security of neighboring areas. Neighboring areas, too, might have, as counters to such threats, forces of their own in excess of calculable internal security needs. This line of thought would tend to perpetuate in some degree the relationship which the Outline would seek to transform. Such a problem and a related necessity of dealing with it appear to have been anticipated in the Outline, which apparently envisages a system of continuous surveillance and reporting on the stationing and operations of internal security forces. The point supports a conclusion con-

⁵ This conclusion is warranted by a careful reading. Indeed, no alternative interpretation seems adducible. After completion of disarmament, "The Parties . . . would apply to national forces required to maintain internal order and protect the personal security of citizens those applicable measures concerning the reduction of the risk of war that had been applied to national armed forces in Stages I and II." Outline, Stage III, F, 2. Moreover, the International Disarmament Organization "would be strengthened . . . to ensure its capacity . . . to verify. . . . " This would be accomplished through extension of arrangements referred to. Outline, Stage III, G. Relevant provisions for Stage II simply refer to "extending and improving the measures undertaken in Stage I...." Outline, Stage II, E. Hence it is necessary here to refer only to Stage I. The measures are expressed as follows:

Specified Parties to the Treaty would give advance notification of major military movements and maneuvers to other Parties to the Treaty and to the International Disarmament Organization. Specific arrangements relating to this commitment, including the scale of movements and maneuvers to be reported and the information to be transmitted, would be agreed. [Moreover], Specified Parties to the Treaty would permit observation posts to be established at agreed locations, including major ports, railway centers, motor highways, river crossings, and air bases to report on concentrations and movements of military forces. The number of such posts could be progressively expanded in each successive step of Stage I. Specific arrangements relating to such observation posts, including the location and staffing of posts, the method of receiving and reporting information, and the schedule for installation cerning the subordination of internal security to international jurisdiction.

The basic intention would be to eliminate national forces in excess of requirements for internal order assumed to be predictable and passed upon by international authority. In the event of exigencies requiring forces in excess of allowed levels to cope with internal violence and threats to public order, each state would be left in the position of a petitioner for assistance from a source beyond its own control. Those having a determinative voice in withholding or making available such assistance from outside would be cast as ultimate arbiters of order within each state. The forces from outside, if made available, would operate under a chain of command external to the state concerned. The doctrine under which the force would operate would presumably be beyond determination by the state affected. The same would be true of personnel constituting the outside force.

It is fitting now to take account of some of the considerations relevant to establishing and maintaining such a force as envisaged.

V. MATERIAL BASES OF THE PROJECTED PEACE FORCE

Constituent governments acting to create a new framework of force would presumably have to be convinced of its prospective reliability in high degree before divesting themselves of control of military forces of their own and subordinating themselves to the new arrangement. A condition of the reliability of the new arrangement would be the good faith of all significant parties in subordinating themselves. The problems posed by interdependency between these two considerations are not logically more difficult than those involved in any proposition of forming a new frame of government by contract. The essential thing here is to recognize the process as that of forming a world state of sorts.

The matter of reliability of the new arrangement would include, beyond assurance against likelihood of misuse of the peace force, assurance of the force's capability and disposition to meet its responsibilities. By a proviso "that no state could challenge it," the Outline predicates an overwhelmingly effective force, but the only index to its efficacy—a phrase regarding "sufficient forces and armaments"—is a quantitative and technical description reflecting what has been aptly characterized as a typical civilian fallacy in measuring military strength.6 In all probability, the technical and quantitative aspects of putting such a force together would be the simplest part of the processthough its simplicity would only be relative to the difficulties of others.

The force would require mobility and technical proficiency of the highest order and would have to be immediately available when summoned to action to meet manifold and ranging responsibilities. It would necessarily be a fighting force capable of exerting coercive power with overwhelming effect—that is, to a degree calculated to prevail—at any level of armed activity against whatever adversaries it might be called upon to meet in any environment whatever.7 It would have to be, in sum, a sophisticated, versatile, multifarious force. Besides requiring at operating levels great subtleties of doctrine and an extraordinary degree of corporate identity and morale, it would need at staff levels a mastery of higher logistics and huge proficiency in military and industrial mobilization. The matter of industrial and technical underpinnings for such a force is especially important. In this respect, the Out-of posts would be agreed. (Outline, Stage I, F, 1 and 2.)

⁶ Frederick Martin Stern, The Citizen Army (New York, St. Martin Press, 1957), p. 4.

7 This point seems adequately clear, notwithstanding a tendency among some to meet questions of how to fit United Nations contingents for unmeasured responsibilities by imagining the problem of force to have been obviated and the way thus opened for immaculate order. For example, one such writer predicates such a moral authority for the United Nations as to enable a force under its aegis to prevail by symbols-its efficacy in its arm bands rather than its arms. See William P. Frye, A United Nations Peace Force (New York, Oceana, 1957), p. 91. The context shows this idea to have been a generalization overdrawn from the single case of the United Nations Emergency Force interposed between Israel and Egypt.

The Outline says further, in relation to Stage I: Assurance that agreed levels of armaments and armed forces were not exceeded and that activities limited or prohibited by the Treaty were not being conducted clandestinely would be provided by the International Disarmament Organization through agreed arrangements which would have the effect of providing that the extent of inspection during any step or stage would be related to the amount of disarmament being undertaken and to the degree of risk to the Parties to the Treaty of possible violations (Outline, Stage I, G, 2, C.)... line affords small illumination, presenting not so much a formula as an invitation to governments to attempt a formula. Implicitly, however, it points to an intricate question of how to begin.

The requirements indicated, in connection with reduction of force levels to internal security requirements, include action by participating governments "to cause to be disbanded organizational arrangements comprising and supporting their national military establishment, and terminate the employment of civilian personnel associated with the foregoing," dismantlement or conversion to peaceful uses of bases and facilities beyond those permitted to be retained for internal security purposes, and closure of all military research, development, production, and testing except as permitted by international agreement for purposes of maintaining internal security.

Obviously, however, lore and technology relevant to military matters are in the hands of national governments. The international collectivity could scarcely start from scratch in fashioning a military mechanism of the limitless scope and supreme proficiency intended. It would fall to participants to contribute to aggrandizement of the force. Presumably, though this is not explicit in the Outline, the process would have to be that of conveyance, by participants to the world collectivity, of ownership, control, and operation of considerable portions of their domains, their concentrations of relevant professional talents, and their scientific and industrial complexes. At least, this would be incumbent upon participants having such endowments. The new military collectivity would have to have something to draw upon. It is scarcely plausible for nations at once to extirpate military resources and to proliferate military strength in combination.9 8 Outline, Stage III, B, 1 and 2.

⁹ A quite different set of hypotheses is employed, however, in one relevant work. The portion of nationals permissible from any one state would be limited to 3 per cent of the force. Nationals of the twelve most populous states—namely China, the Soviet Union, India, the United States, Indonesia, Pakistan, Germany, Brazil, the United Kingdom, France, Japan, and Italy—would be wholly barred from service in the top command. Basing of any portion of the force in the aforementioned countries would be forbidden. Implicitly, these provisions would amount to a wholesale realignment of military capability. Militarily significant and resourceful areas would be ordained to become militarily

Something equivalent to a global defense ministry would have to be founded, since retention of such agencies by individual states would be forbidden. Implicitly, the establishment would include a multifarious staff system of its own, research and development systems, access to and control of patents and manufacturing systems, as well as contractive powers, procurement processes, systems for settling accounts, and the like, along with cantonments, training ranges, aviation complexes, depot systems, transport arteries and port facilities and vessels of its own or enforceable accesses to them, and many other such properties of a cogent military capability. All of these would necessarily be operative within and located within territory of presently independent states.10 They would have to be exempt from interference by such states. Otherwise, obviously, the apparatus would be subject to impediment and interruption. Its efficacy would not then be a calculable surety. The force would lack the measure of absolute reliability postulated as a central characteristic.11 insignificant, and vice versa. No empirical evidence to support the practicability of the proposal is adduced, however. Grenville Clark and Louis B. Sohn, World Peace Through World Law (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 2d ed., 1960), pp. xxix-xxxii.

10 Again, note should be taken of a proposal, ibid., p. xxx, for locating "main bases . . . on easily defensible islands or peninsulas." The proposal has been elaborated with a suggestion of Trinidad, Madeira, Iceland, Malta, Cyprus, Zanzibar, and Ceylon as locations. Sohn, in Arthur B. Larson, ed., A Warless World (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1963), p. 5. Reasons for such anxiety about security in locating a force supposed to be inherently paramount do not need to be speculated upon here. The main point of doubt concerns something else. A world peace force, if realized, would be a central reality, not a marginal and abeyant one. Of far greater apparent practicality—if such a quality may be invoked in respect of so hypothetical an exercise—is the idea of deliberately positioning such a peace force within the larger industrial countries. See Thomas C. Schelling in Lincoln P. Bloomfield, ed., International Military Forces (Boston, Little, Brown & Co., 1964), p. 227.

¹¹ Some readers of this part of the manuscript have suggested an alternative possibility. States participating in the disarmament arrangement might be permitted to retain control of facilities, contracting authority, patents, and so on, relevant to capacity for making war, and at the same

Tracing out ramifications, one sees clearly in general conformation if not explicitly in detail the outlines of a world government. The point may be elaborated by considering, in addition to quantitative and technical aspects of the projected peace force, the more subtle requirements for men to compose the force.

VI. MANPOWER AND COMMAND IN A GLOBAL PEACE FORCE

Planning for a global peace force adequate for its manifold duties while amenable to control by some collective authority must entail appreciation of the nature of command and its interrelation with the character of the force commanded.

Not a great deal on the subject is available in general literature on the idea of a world peace force. Mostly the writing is characterized by expansiveness of imagination amounting to romance, as anyone with appreciable military experience and some grasp of factors of diversity in the world would note. A sort of omnicompetence for governments and their negotiators is predicated. Cultural factors would become completely malleable on a premise of an absolutely new day in world affairs, and statesmanship would be enabled to perform prodigies of combination heretofore unachievable. Heterogeneity would fall into ranks, and a homogeneous force would thereupon be ready to march. Ethnic antipathies and factors of diversity respecting language, nutritional habits, religious practices, and innumerable taboos would fade into inconsequentiality. Deficiencies in talent would somehow be redressed. Thus men from primitive societies would be fitted to constitute and to operate a complex, versatile, modernized force fit to serve in any clime and amid populations of whatever cultural level. Maximum admixture of ethnic and lingual groups in ranks and even alienism between time be subjected to restrictions which would permit making use of them only as agents of the world collectivity and providing material underpinnings for the global peace force. The idea underlying this alternative possibility is that states would be spared thereby from impingements upon their autonomy. The idea involves a distinction without a real difference. Agency is not the same as autonomy. To fulfill the characteristics stipulated for the peace force, that force would have to be placed beyond possibility of challenge by any state. That would require placing it beyond possibility of being hamstrung by any state's withholding use of facilities or other material requirements.

officers and men would be cultivated as positive bases for morale rather than as conditions for chaos. Men would sign their years to rotation among remote garrisons.

Such suppositions and propositions, drawn from the literature of disarmament, reflect what has been already described as a typical civilian fallacy of regarding military organizations in technical terms only.12 This outlook, preoccupied with categories rather than functional realities and noting structural parallels between one national force and another, construes military life as a genus of culture and imagines unlimited possibilities of combination. Components are treated as fungible like mechanical parts. By this line of thought, a peace force would be susceptible of assemblage from components of national forces according to whatever design statesmen might determine. A force could be made multinational in such degree as matched the authors' desires.

Such exercises in imagination have small bearing on practical problems. Planners for a world peace force could surely count on no exemption from requirements relevant to the human equation inherent in setting up a cogent military body. To assume such exemption would be equivalent to planning a ship in disregard of factors of seaworthiness.

Some guidance for such planners is provided by the Outline. The document calls for examination anew of the feasibility of giving effect to article 43 of the UN Charter. A stipulation 12 It seems pointless to churn at length through ideas contained in the largely fantastical literature on the subject. Essays of Schelling and Henry V. Dicks, respectively, loc. cit., pp. 212-256, are of some considerable value, however, as endeavors to come to terms with problems inherent in such an undertaking. They avoid the fallacy of assuming that the world and all factors relevant to creating such a force can be made over to suit statesmen's designs. In contrast, little of relevant value appears in Clark and Sohn, op. cit.. which is interesting chiefly as an illustration of what has been called the civilian fallacy. This sort of fallacy has been aptly described by an authority in gestalt psychology. From structural similarities between one heart and another, it construes a community among hearts and overlooks the ties functionally binding a heart to a pair of lungs in a relationship infinitely closer than any conceivable between one heart and another. Wolfgang Köhler, Gestalt Psychology (New York, Liveright, 1929), p. 351, cited by Robert S. Lynd, Knowledge for What? (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1948), p. 12.

for the new force to "be supplied agreed manpower by states" might be construed as a scheme both to prorate participation and to authorize conscription for the purpose envisaged. The language might accommodate preservation of symbolic national identities of troops, but it would be consistent also with conglomerate forces. The point is relatively inconsequential. The peace force is clearly anticipated as one inclusive apparatus. National command structures would be things of the past. Organization, support, and tempering of the force would be international business.

As a point for emphasis, the endeavor to create a force on such a mould of admixture, should it ever materialize, would be a departure from experience. No certain precedent indicating feasibility is adducible. Forces operating under the United Nations or, in earlier times, the League of Nations, have not been in such a pattern but have consisted rather of temporarily and contingently assigned units of national military establishments. The French Foreign Legion is sometimes cited as a model, but the instance proves inapposite when examined in detail.¹⁴

¹³ This last interpretation is consistent with a ban on conscription expressed elsewhere in the Outline: "The parties . . . would halt all military conscription . . . inconsistent with the foregoing measures" which include the provision regarding supply of agreed manpower for the peace force. Outline, Stage III, B, 3.

¹⁴ The French Foreign Legion as an example might have seemed more persuasive before the French government's decision in 1961 to disband its paratrooper battalions because of their recalcitrance and potential for mutiny. In any event, the Foreign Legion is a French Foreign Legion. The members are subject to French indoctrination and authority, serve on missions ordained by the French government, and use French as their operational language. Company officers are largely French and senior officers entirely so. Some Frenchmen serve in ranks. The rest are drawn mainly from European cultures somewhat assimilated to the French. Alien members usually serve in expectation of receiving French nationality upon completion of service. All are judged and rewarded or punished according to standards authorized by the French government. Discipline, however, emphasizes rigorous punishment for strictly military infractions but is indulgent with respect to social offenses, as would be usual in a service based on a mercenary principle—that is, without high identity between the outfit and the frame of authority. Withal, deserThe problem is put in better proportion by including among criteria of reliability such considerations as identity, common doctrine and motivation, and amenability to command and control, in addition to the relatively easy factors of magnitude and technical adequacy. One must see a way through these aspects before being justified in any appreciable degree of confidence in the practicability of the whole idea of a global peace force. Without a plausible formula for bringing governments into concord on such sensitive and basic considerations, one could scarcely be said to have even the beginning of a plan.

Faculties of command respecting a military apparatus concern both the chain of authority within and the system of guidance and control exterior to and above it. The interlaced functions of command are broadly four: first, determination of doctrine underlying and motivating the force, its character as a social entity, and traits to be cultivated through control of members' careers; second—and closely related -the magisterial function of judging and punishing derelictions; third, choice of weapon systems and inculcation of proficiency in them, conceived in relation to putative missions; fourth, competence to decide upon and to effect deployments in actual operations. The first two aspects—characteristically taken for granted or summarily dealt with in projects for universal forces—are foundations of accomplishment with respect to the other two.

A fundamental aspect concerns the moral basis of the faculty of command. In a superficial view, obedience flows from establishment of a command framework: create authority, and compliance will follow in consequence. This approach involves a simplification amounting to distortion. Command authority is in essence a grant from those subject to it. Command conceived as a product of obedience comes closer to basic truth than a statement putting the relationship vice versa. 15 tions have been a perennial problem, as gang tendencies also have been. The Legion's suitability is limited to duties in marginal areas with high incidence of combat rather than to routine duties in metropolitan areas. See Adrian Liddell Hart, Strange Company (London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1953), passim.

15 Chester Barnard, The Functions of the Executive (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1938), pp. 163-164. Also James G. Harbord, The American Army in France (Boston, Little, Brown & Co., 1936), p. 259. Military annals are replete with instances of units rendered actively mutinous

A second key aspect concerns the cultural base of a military organization's responses.16 This base is linked integrally to the concept of reliability. Reliability standing alone conveys little. The term requires a referent: reliability with respect to what? To be reliable, a force must have unity of character—a unity reflecting a common doctrine, reflecting agreement about values. The range of possibilities concerning moral and cultural bases for creating an effective force are wide, but no universal base -no generally accepted ethic of authority, responsibility, and the like-exists to be invoked as a basis for a world peace force. Such an ethic would have to be agreed upon and given reality as a motivating body of ideas, as a condition to creating a structure of command and control. Because of its importance, this simple point deserves elaboration.

VII. AN UNDERLYING ETHIC FOR A GLOBAL FORCE

It is accurate but inadequate to conceive of a force as a body of men organized and equipped to bring energy to bear destructively against designated adversaries on proper command. A force is not a collection of depersonalized entities. A force, moreover, should be thought of as spending the larger part of its existence under peaceable conditions rather than in hostile operations. The problem of relation to environment mostly concerns pacific environment. The members represent some pattern of identities and associations. In the usual case, a member has affective ties with some place in-or passively unresponsive, whereupon power of command was vitiated even though the structure of command was left intact.

16 "Military institutions are intimately bound up with the state of culture which the nation has obtained," in the words of Rudiger von der Goltz, quoted by Hoffman Nickerson, The Armed Horde (New York, Putnam, 1939), p. 3. Literature constituting what might be called a sociology of military organization is not abundant. Stern, op. cit., Nickerson, op. cit., and Alfred Vagts, A History of Militarism (New York, Macmillan, 1959) are useful, however. Two relevant points emerge from a perusal of such works: the basic and complex social character of military organization in contrast to the relatively simple technical aspect; the fallacy of thinking of military culture as a culture per se rather than as an aspect of culture normally related to a national base. Niccolò Machiavelli's insights into the national basis of military morale, though brief, are incisive. See his Discourses (New York, Random House, 1940), Bk. I, ch. xlii.

habited by his own kind—a place in whose security against enemies he is personally involved.

Peaceable associations, sense of identity, and affective connections are basic to the assumptions, responses, and motivations underlying the character and effectiveness of a force. These characteristics vary in detail and strength from one member to another. In the degree of their existence and likeness, however, as between one member and another, they afford some basis for essential community. They do not account for all constituent traits of a force. Many other intertwined factors enter into determining a force's character, meaning the sum of what it can be relied upon to do or not to do: such matters as indoctrination, development of common habits and general proficiency by training, cumulative common experience as a group, systems of preferment and promotion, qualities of administered justice, standards of leadership, and the moral basis of authority. The sum total of determinants of a force's character is great and complex, and the sum differs from one culture to another, so that respective armed forces, however much alike considered from a technical standpoint, are widely variant as social entities. Such moral aspects are basic, and their paramountcy over material factors is recognized in a well known Napoleonic maxim.

Persons from alien cultures may indeed be assimilated to a force associated with some particular culture. This circumstance does not gainsay the main point: a force cannot be adequately considered apart from a cultural base and an underlying ethic. Outsiders must be assimilated. A force must reflect a character—not a patchwork. Forces may have roots in variant schemes of identity and value. A force must have, and be limited to, one basis. Otherwise it would constitute not a force, but a congeries of forces—not susceptible of being equated against putative missions.

The considerable variations possible may be illustrated by a force, on the one hand, with preponderant attitudes and associations scarcely distinguishable from those characterizing the civil community to which the force relates and, in contrast, a force dissociated from its surroundings, centered on its own existence, and characterized by inward affective connections so that the outfit itself becomes a moral equivalent of a homeland, and barracks life becomes the engrossing focus of loyalties. The Swiss army or a force based on the ethic delineated by Frederick Martin Stern in The Citizen Army would typify the first. Any force in the Janissary or Praetorian-Guard model could typify the latter.¹⁷

What the Outline contemplates is a force. It would be synthesized from pre-existing forces associated with particular cultures—an assemblage of fragments taken over from disbanded national components. Three, and only three, elements of its binding ethic are made apparent: first, an affirmation of the unconditional heinousness of unauthorized violence; second, as a corollary, the countering rightness of authorized violence; and third, the repose of relevant authority—meaning the faculty determinative of the difference between violence authorized and violence unauthorized—in some prescribed consensus, as yet undefined, of local representatives in an international collectivity.

For a moment, at whatever cost in effort to suspend disbelief, it is appropriate to hypothesize achievement of a force on the basis of the ethic stipulated and to ponder its possible effectiveness, whether active or deterrent. The two aspects would be linked. The deterrent effects would be a product of estimates of the force's probable efficacy on being called into action.

A decision is made by a requisite majority in the establishment vested with control of the global peace force. It deems some act, whether in connection with an international quarrel or a contest for power within a national domain, to be a malefaction deserving or requiring interposition of the peace force; designates the malefactors; and summons the force to bring to bear its irresistible capabilities. The decision is conveyed to the apex of authority within the confines of the force establishment properpresumably some global equivalent of a ministry of defense. Appropriate orders thence are relayed to the military command apparatus. The immediate results conceivable fall into two general categories: an effective strike against the designated malefactors, or a default. The implications of these two broad possibilities deserve further consideration.

¹⁷ A reader has asked whether an army of occupation would not be in the same category. That would depend on its inherent character as a force, not on its relation to a particular scene of duty. An army of occupation, though at least formally alienated from its surroundings, is not ipso facto in the mood of feeling detached from any homeland whatever or being disposed to think of home as being the barracks. This is no less the case with troops on occupation duty accompanied by their kindred.

An effective response might reflect either an identification on the part of a determining number within the force with the requisite majority's view on the merits of the matter at issue or an unreflecting acceptance of the directive as conclusive ipso facto. The first would not necessarily constitute a precedent for subsequent compliance under different circumstances. The second, unreflecting compliance, would apparently—with emphasis on that qualifier—tend to sustain the frame of authority unequivocally.

The possible forms of failure of compliance. signaling collapse of the ethic and derogation of the authority, would be various, for the ways of mutiny are multiple: dissent and cleavage within the command structure, resulting in a withholding of orders or even a commitment of force to the opposite side; divided identities within the force as a whole. rendering it inert in the particular instance or even sundering it, dividing its irresistibility into two or more parts, and bringing on an internal struggle for ascendancy. A potential for such developments would remain in any force with national identities and a sense for the merits of issues lingering in the command structure or the cadres,18 and calculations of that potential and of ways for affecting it would become a central consideration in world politics.

It would be presumptuous to dismiss possibilities, as distinguished from probabilities, of achieving a force to suit the prescription and to sustain authority by bringing its overwhelming capabilities unquestioningly to bear. Some may uphold the possibility on a premise of recruiting members with a zeal for universal peace.19 This is an improbable hope. A force's capability must depend on a fighting élan—not a zeal against fighting. Theoretically, however, such a force might be realized in either or both of two ways: by recruitment of individuals free of antecedent loyalties, moved by an urge to identify with paramount power, or desirous of opportunity to fight on the overwhelming side without fear of formidable retribution, or by a rigorous method of indoctrination such as to expunge members' antecedent loyalties and identities, to inculcate purely reflex responses to mandate, and so to transform personalities as to render members willing to operate even against their erstwhile homelands because a vote taken has determined for them to do so in the name of enforcing peace.

¹⁸ Paul Kecskmeti, "Nuclear Absolutism," Commentary (July, 1963), pp. 43, 47.

¹⁹ See for example Dicks, loc. cit., p. 252. The author envisions a force imbued with, and motivated by, zeal for peace. He suggests the Ghurkas and the French Foreign Legion as possible prototypes. The inappositeness of these two traditional groups, with high reputations as fighting men, needs no laboring.

In reason and prudence, a word must be added. One should rule out an assumption of achieving a complete departure from lessons and limits of experience through international concord on the ethic of a global force. A force of such overwhelming corporate spirit, imbued with absolute obedience, dissociated from considerations which move or stay others, divorced from cultural ties, and committed to so peculiar an ethic, would in great probability be characterized by a high Janissary or Praetorian potential—a potential for developing its own momentum, a potential for passing almost momentarily from subordination to usurpation of authority or from absolute obedience to absolute mutiny.20

VIII. DOUBTS AND QUERIES

With his mind's eye, one can visualize the component parts of the new ordering of force predicated in the United States project: first, 20 This danger is dealt with, and a solution offered, by one highly reputed writer in this field: "The danger of Caesar worship may be avoided if the command of the force is entrusted, not to a single person, but to a committee of five or seven persons, all of whom preferably ought to be nationals of small nations. At the same time, to ensure the impartiality of decisions, the majority of the command group should come from the noncommitted nations rather than the two major blocs." Sohn, in Larson, op. cit., p. 5. No showing is made on the relevance of such concepts as "major blocs" and "noncommitted nations" under conditions of complete national disarmament. No links between "impartiality" and "noncommitted nations" are demonstrated. No showing is made for the assumed likelihood of finding small nations to be resourceful in affording talents and experience for the intricate and subtle problems of command under the contemplated conditions. No experiential data on the efficacy of command by committee are offered. Nothing is adduced to support an assumption in favor of the appropriateness of plural command as a means of averting the perils. The passage quoted is an interesting example of how to project the future in disregard of experience.

the basic force itself; above, yet part of it, a command and staff structure; higher still in the chain of formal authority, an equivalent of a world defense ministry; and in supreme or political charge a collectivity of representatives of erstwhile independent governments.

The peace force itself would be a body of fighting men chosen in accordance with some criteria, supposed to be moulded to a set of habits and responses in common, equipped and trained not for some abstractly conceived mission of peace but prepared or preparing to interpose and to wage havor in particular theaters under specific assumed operational conditions. Necessarily, it would be garrisoned somewhere, maybe in a diversity of locations. It must come to some social relationship within itself and with environing populations. The members might conceivably be cut off from women and familial ties. They might be permitted fuller lives in enclaves set apart from the surrounding societies, or they might even enjoy that combination of aloofness and prerogative associated with a conqueror's status. Their way of life might be that of blending into surrounding cultures as full sharers. The basis chosen would, of course, have a bearing on the degree of feasible admixture into a conglomerate homogeneity or of assortment into diverse components attempted in the force, and that factor in turn would have much to do with how the force could be used.

The higher command and staff structure itself presumably drawn from diverse cultural sources and struggling with language barriers as well as internal divergencies of outlookwould be concerned with trying to realize a cogent, unified, operationally reliable instrument out of culturally varied men. The men must be either admixed into a uniformity of diversities or separated into a diversity of uniformities. With small inherent unity within itself, the structure would be trying to cope with unexampled complexities of human relations. What notional missions should be prepared for-inasmuch as military doctrine and training cannot be formulated against abstractions?21 Staff work and command would be

²¹ Schelling, loc. cit., p. 233, puts the matter succinctly: unless conceived as a purely ceremonial or symbolic entity, such a force would have to have a strategy. A set of purposes and assumed missions would have to be built into the organization and reflected in its doctrine. Determining that strategy would be a central concern in world politics, because in turn that strategy unremittingly involved in that most prickly of questions.

The ministerial agency, itself internally diverse, would be trying to perform prodigies of superintendency in integrating force over a world scope. It would be seeking and trying to apply formulas for qualification, selection, promotion, brigading, compensation, retirement, and conditions for a common life covering throngs of persons of divergent background, different senses of reality, highly varied frames of value, and discrepant expectations and taboos. It would face baffling problems in the formulation and administration of justice resulting from interspersion of cultures in an intensively organized body. It would be charged with measuring operational requirements, and procuring accordingly, against unforeseeable missions.

The supreme authority, the political collectivity itself, would be engrossed in parallel issues in trying to translate the rhetoric of unity and world order into measurable realities. Basically, the collectivity must determine the distribution of authority. The participants would be in an ambiguous position. The entities for which they would speak would be putative targets of, as well as participants in, the amalgam of force. This duality would affect a wide range of questions requiring decision. One such question would be that of selecting a site for the force's headquarters. Others would arise in connection with locating the force's main bases and main normal concentrations of personnel and determining its main supply sources. Obviously, except under incalculably distraught conditions, the force would never be ordered to proceed against its own establishment or sources. Hence a host area, or a significant contributary, might presumably be exempt from ever becoming an operational target. On the other hand, the continuing presence of large numbers of global troops would probably be an important political conditioning factor in any land. The issues would be deep and enduring.

Further, such questions would arise in determining who should command from one stage to another, what should be the extent of his or their prerogative to determine subordinates in the chain of authority, and who should have the determining voice in displacing commanders. The questions, obviously, would bear upon what the force might be relied upon to do or would have a determinative influence on world politics.

not to do. The participating entities would have to be vitally alert because vitally concerned.

A basic matter would be that of settling who should lay down the binding doctrine for the force and how the inculcation of that doctrine should be supervised. These would not be theoretic questions. Academies, staff and command schools, and the like would have to be instituted in view of the abolition of national establishments of such character. Who should be in charge? What precepts and methods should be imposed in them? The pattern of fidelity and reliability for a globally irresistible force might well turn on such questions, and every significant unit of government would feel vitally concerned.

How and by whom would specific questions of equipment and specific objects of training exercises be determined? In a related way, how, and at whose say-so, should operational intelligence be gathered? The implications do not need to be labored. Forces must be prepared to operate on one kind of mission or another, in one sort of terrain or another, and amid one populace or another-against specific rather than abstract operational targets. For example, the force may run maneuvers under simulated Alpine conditions. Or, it concentrates on desert training. The staff studies Baltic or Red Sea oceanography. Some officers are assigned to study Arabic. Data on land approaches to Kashmir are gathered. One can readily imagine the sort of reverberating issues bound to arise as plans, exercises and the gathering of operational information were directed to correspond to particular countries. One may predicate the vesting of control of nuclear weapons in the projected apparatus and ponder the question -and its implications—as to what particular capitals or industrial complexes should be tar-

Such questions, by no means exhaustive, are illustrative of what would be involved in creating links to ensure control and response with respect to such a force. The aspects are myriad, and all delicate. Authority of a central collectivity over such a peace force may sound engagingly simple when confined to considerations of authorizing a pre-established and ready force to blast away at some hypothetical miscreant. In practice the elements of control would be integral to the character of the force itself and would have to be built into the force from its origin and to be continuously superintended.

If the whole idea were to work at all, the collectivity, however organized, with the force under its charge as an instrument of presumed reliability, would have to exercise effective power in suppression of attempts to undermine the arrangement. The irresistible force would need to be brought to bear at once and rigorously against any effort to offset its irresistibility. Any move by a formerly independent state to resume military autonomy would need to be regarded and dealt with as an act of rebellion and secession. In consenting to become a participant in, and putative beneficiary of, a world monopoly of military force, a state would ipso facto consent to becoming a target in event of a later attempt to renounce the contract. Under other conditions—and without an effective will to maintain paramountcy in the central arrangement—the force would fail of irresistibility, and states could not afford to commit their security to its care unconditionally. Yet the paramountcy premised for the force must rest on such commitments made in an engrossing pattern. With respect to the whole undertaking, the peace force's irresistibility is thus premised both as a condition precedent and as a consequence. In any event, and in practical terms, it is at least subject to doubt that the constituent elements of the stipulated quality are accessible.

The collective authority, with its irresistible coercive instrument, would become arbiter of questions of legitimacy touching the system of regime in every land. To its jurisdiction would come questions of enlarging quotas of force permitted to particular governments for internal security. It would have to develop a basis for approving and rejecting such petitions. It would presumably inquire into the necessities in view of the methods and purposes of an applicant government and in relation to the purposes and interests confronting it. It would be in position to grant effectiveness, to license oppression, or to deny a beset regime requirements for maintaining itself against internal challenge.

In extremity, involving a regime's inability to counter domestic challenge with its permitted quota of internal security forces, it would fall to the world collectivity to lend or not to lend a hand with a fraction of its irresistible components—a political question of sweeping import. A factor in the life and stability of regimes would be their standing, in the measure of political favor, with whatever consensus might prevail in the apparatus of control over the central force and the apparent probability, again calculated in political terms, of their being able to obtain its assistance in exigency. In an instance of rival claims to a local seat of authority, the advantage falling to a claimant enjoying favor with the determining voices in the central apparatus might well prove conclusive.

In like fashion, the suffrage of the central apparatus would be dominant in issues of secession arising within any constituent area.

These considerations have a basic importance to every scheme for integrating and centralizing the organization of force over a great expanse. Characteristically—and, one should add, essentially—such projects in the past have faced the attendant problems squarely. They have started from postulates of the legitimacy of every regime engrossed and of the propriety of its span of jurisdiction. In predicating a central authority in possession and control over paramount forces, they have complementarily undertaken to guarantee each participating regime in perpetuity.

Thus it was, for example, with the Duke of Sully's Grand Design in the sixteenth century and with the Abbé de St. Pierre's Projet in the eighteenth. Thus it was, and remains, with the Constitution of the United States. A provision, in section 10 of Article I, that "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, . . . keep troops, or ships of war" goes hand in hand with provisions, in sections 3 and 4 of Article IV. that "no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State: nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress" and that the "United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them . . . against domestic violence." The integrity of every span of domain and the continuity of legitimacy for every participating regime are clearly stipulated. Every state is secured against disruption of its domain. Every state is promised a duly elected and representative regime and guaranteed constitutional continuity.

The Outline omits equivalent provisions for guaranteed peaceful continuity. To the contrary, it bespeaks peaceful change. Yet assurance of what can be counted on to last—not what can be counted on to give way—forms the foundation of order. It is difficult to see how any significant regime could afford to sign away command over factors of force without some such set of guarantees as those cited from the Constitution of the United States. Yet the idea of agreeing ab initio on a universal frame for legitimacy, undertaking to guarantee licit continuity of authority in every land, and predicating the fixity of all territorial dispositions only underlines the remoteness from actuality of preconditions for a world monopoly of force.

To assume such preconditions as fulfilled is to construe the underlying problems of world order and security as solved. To attribute to governments individually and collectively such plenitude of power—such omnificent capacities—as to enable them to achieve these conditions as an exercise in policy involves disregarding the actual limitations bearing upon their actions. As an element in the United States disarmament plan, the project for a world peace force may promote an aura of abstract good intention for United States policy. Its usefulness with respect to the credibility of United States policy is another matter.

THE 1914 CASE*

OLE R. HOLSTI Stanford University

This paper will employ techniques of content analysis to examine some features of top-level communications between national policy makers during a momentous period of stress. It is concerned with the effects of stress upon: (1) the manner in which decision-makers perceive time as a factor in their formulation of policy; (2) the contrasting ways in which they view policy alternatives for their own nations, for their allies, and for their adversaries; and (3) the flow of communications among them.

I. HYPOTHESES AND DATA

Specifically, the following hypotheses will be tested with data from the 1914 crisis leading up to the Great War in Europe:

Hypothesis 1. As stress increases in a crisis situation:

- (a) time will be perceived as an increasingly salient factor in decision-making.
- (b) decision-makers will become increasingly concerned with the immediate rather than the distant future.

Hypothesis 2. In a crisis situation, decision-makers will perceive:

- (a) their own range of alternatives to be more restricted than those of their adversaries.
- (b) their allies' range of alternatives to be more restricted than those of their adversaries.

Hypothesis 3. As stress increases, decision-makers will perceive:

- (a) the range of alternatives open to themselves to become narrower.
- (b) the range of alternatives open to adversaries to expand.
- * An earlier version of this paper was read at the International Peace Research Conference, Chicago, November 16–17, 1964. This study was supported in part by the United States Naval Ordnance Test Station, China Lake, California, under Contract N60530–9666. The author very gratefully acknowledges the research assistance of Mrs. Jean Heffin and Mrs. Elizabeth Hart; the criticisms and suggestions of Richard Brody, Richard Fagen, Todd LaPorte and Lois Swirsky of the Department of Political Science, Stanford University; and the help of Mrs. Arlee Ellis and Mrs. Violet Lofgren in typing the various drafts of this manuscript.

Hypothesis 4. The higher the stress in a crisis situation:

- (a) the heavier the overload upon the channels of communication.
- (b) the more stereotyped will be the information content of messages.
- (c) the greater the tendency to rely upon extraordinary or improvised channels of communication.
- (d) the higher the proportion of intracoalition—as compared with inter-coalition—communication.

These hypotheses have been developed in large part from recent decision-making literature and from the voluminous experimental literature of psychology. The advantages of precise measurement, easy replication, and tight control over the experimental variables have permitted psychologists to probe into many aspects of human performance under varying situational conditions. Results obtained primarily from observations of undergraduate students may at first blush be suspect when generalized to foreign policy leaders. The strong support for these hypotheses in the experimental literature, however, at least suggests that they warrant testing in historical crisis situations.1

The 1914 crisis provides a particularly suitable case for a test of the hypotheses. The available documentation relating to the outbreak of the Great War surpasses that of any crisis of similar magnitude. Among the nations directly involved, only the Serbian archives have remained relatively inaccessible to the investigator. A generation of careful scholarship produced document collections of unquestioned authenticity, including those of Austria-Hungary, France, Great Britain, Germany and Russia.² Finally, the crisis is a classic example of war through escalation. The minor war between Austria-Hungary and Serbia, which crisis-hardened European diplomats expected to remain localized,³ engulfed nearly the entire continent within ten days. The existing international system—still commonly referred to as the archetype of a functioning "balance of power" system—was unable to cope with the situation as it had previously in the recurring Balkan crises. While extensive war plans had been drawn up by the various general staffs, there is little evidence that any European decision-maker wanted or expected a general war—at least in 1914.

¹ This literature is reviewed in my "Perceptions of Time, Perceptions of Alternatives, and Patterns of Communication as Factors in Crisis Decision-Making," as the earlier version of this paper, noted above, was entitled. See also F. E. Horvath, "Psychological Stress: A Review of Definitions and Experimental Research," in L. von Bertalanffy and Anatol Rapoport, eds., General Systems Yearbook, IV (Ann Arbor, Society for General Systems Research, 1959).

² Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, Ministerium des k. and k. Hauses und des Äusseren, Österreich-

The data for this paper were derived in whole from documents signed and sent by designated British, French, Russian, German, and Austro-Hungarian decision-makers; that is, those persons filling the roles of: head of state; head of government; foreign minister; under-secre-

Perceiver	Agent	Action or Attitude	Target
Sazonov	Austrian	hope is the ultimate annihilation of hope is the ultimate annihilation of	Serbia
Sazonov	German		Serbia

Ungarns Aussenpolitik von der bosnischen Krise 1908 bis zum Kriegsausbruch 1914; Diplomatische Aktenstücke des Österreich-ungarischen Ministeriums des Aussern, Ludwig Bittner and Alfred Pribram, Heinrich Srbik and Hans Uebersberger, eds., vol. VIII (Vienna and Leipzig, 1930.)

France, Commission for the Publication of Documents Relative to the War of 1914, Documents Diplomatiques Francais (1871–1914), 3d series, vols. X and XI (Paris, 1936).

Great Britain, Foreign Office, British Documents on the Origins of the War, 1898-1914, vol. XI, G. P. Gooch and Harold Temperley, eds. (London, 1926).

Max Montgelas and Walther Schücking, eds., Outbreak of the World War, German Documents Collected by Karl Kautsky (New York, Oxford University Press, 1924).

Russia, Komissiia po izdaiiu dokumentov spokhi imperializma: Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia v ipokhu imperializma; dokumenty iz arkhivov tsarkogi i vremennogo pravitel 'stv 1878–1915 gg., seriia III, toma IV and V (Moskva-Leningrad, 1931 and 1934).

In this paper references to these collections are made by document number, rather than page number ³ The reaction of Sir Arthur Nicholson, British Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was typical: "I have my doubts as to whether Austria will take any action of a serious character and I expect the storm will blow over" (Great Britain, tary of foreign affairs; minister of war; chief of the general staff. The data in the present paper are derived from the complete verbatim text of published documents meeting the criteria of authorship and date (June 27-August 4). While these documents do not record all messages initiated by the designated leaders—notably lacking are face-to-face or telephone conversations—they do embody a substantial portion of all their communications.

The initial step in the content analysis of these documents was to develop a coding unit—the perception—defined in terms of the following elements: the perceiver; the perceived, or agent; the action or attitude; and the target.
For example, the assertion by a Russian decision-maker that "The Austrian, as well as German, hope is the ultimate annihilation of Serbia," was coded as two separate perceptions, in each case the perceiver being the author of the document.4

The 1914 documents yielded 4883 such perceptions.

The independent variable in each hypothesis—the level of stress—can be defined as resulting from a perceived threat to high priority values. Eight of the ten hypotheses postulate changes deriving from increased stress. The outbreak of war between Serbia and Austria-Hungary will be used as the dividing point between the period of lower (June 27-July 28) and higher (July 29-August 4) stress. Intuitively one would expect that European decision-makers—except perhaps the Serbs and Austrians, by then already committed—were under greater stress during the latter period.

op. cit., #40). At about the same time Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, wrote, "I went to bed with a feeling things might blow over... we were still a long way, as it seemed, from any danger of war". Winston S. Churchill, The World Crisis, 1911-1914 (New York, 1928), p. 208. As late as July 28 the Kaiser wrote of the crisis in the Balkans, "A great moral victory for Vienna; but with it every reason for war drops away" (Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #271).

⁴ For a full description of the coding operations, see Robert C. North et al., Content Analysis: A Handbook with Applications for the Study of International Crisis (Evanston, Northwestern University Press, 1963). Some problems of sampling in the use of historical documents are discussed in Holsti, op. cit., pp. 21-22.

TABLE I. FREQUENCY AND TYPE OF PERCEPTIONS OF TIME AS A FACTOR IN DECISION-MAKING: COMBINED TOTALS FOR AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, GERMANY, FRANCE, RUSSIA AND GREAT BRITAIN

7-1-1	Total		Tim	e Percept	ions	m1
Period	Perceptions	A	В	С	D	E	Total
June 27-July 2	306	3	0	0	0	0	3
July 3-16	349	11	1	0	1	3	16
July 12-20	211	1	0	0	1	1	3
July 21-25	634	11	17	9	0	1	38
July 26	300	0	3	0	0	. 0	3
July 27	287	0	7	1	2	2	12
July 28	407	0	1	0	0	0	1
July 29	456	0	5	1	1	0	7
July 30	342	1	1	5	2	0	9
July 31	529	0	0	10	5	2	17
August 1-2	583	0	2	11	8	7	28
August 3-4	479	0	σ	2	18	3	23
		•
Total	4883	27	37	39	38	19	160

Code of relevance of time:

This premise is supported by measures of both attitude and action. The documents yielded 882 perceptions of hostility directed against the perceivers' nations, which were scaled by the Q-Sort method. The results indicate significantly higher intensity during the July 29-August 4 period for each alliance (Z=10.81and 3.88; both are significant at the .0001 level). A scaling of the actions taken by members of each alliance also reveals a significantly higher level of violence or potential violence during the last week prior to the outbreak of general war (Z=2.24 and 5.58, significant at the .025 and .0001 levels respectively).4a Thus the two periods meet the requirements necessary to test the hypotheses.

II. PERCEPTIONS OF TIME

To test the first two hypotheses, the entire set of nearly five thousand perceptions derived from the decision-makers' documents was recoded; every statement making reference to time as a factor in decision-making was extracted. The 160 time perceptions were initially classified according to date⁵ and stated reason for the relevance of time (Table I).

Time perceptions in these data fall into four major categories which correspond to the development of events within the crisis. During the earliest period—through July 20—some 68.1 per cent of the references to time focus on tent analysis data, the data were divided into twelve periods of approximately equal volume of documentation as in Table I; thus time periods early in the crisis are longer than those in the days immediately preceding the outbreak of war. See Ole R. Holsti and Robert C. North, "History as a 'Laboratory' of Conflict," in Elton B. Mc-Neil, ed., The Nature of Human Conflict (Englewood Cliffs, 1965); Holsti and North, "Perceptions of Hostility and Economic Variables," in Richard Merritt, ed., Comparing Nations (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1965); North et al., "Perception and Action in the Study of International Relations: The 1914 Crisis," in J. David Singer, ed., The International Yearbook of Political Behavior Research: Empirical Studies in International Relations (1965, in press); Holsti et al., "Violence and Hostility: The Path to World War," paper read at American Psychiatric Association meeting, Los Angeles, Calif. (May, 1964.)

The statistical tests of hypotheses 1a, 3a, 3b, 4a and 4b are based on these twelve periods.

A-Factor in Austro-Hungarian action toward Serbia.

B-Factor in localizing conflict.

C-Factor in mobilization.

D-Factor in political commitments.

E-Others.

^{4a} For a more detailed discussion of the data and scaling methods see, ibid., pp. 19-20.

⁵ In earlier studies of the 1914 crisis using con-the prospects of early Austro-Hungarian actions against Serbia. Count Alexander Hoyos, for example, wrote on July 7 that "From a military standpoint . . . it would be much more favorable to start the war now than later since the balance of power would weigh against us in the future."6 Hoyos's fear that "through a policy of delay and weakness, we at a later moment, endanger this unflinching support of the German Empire,"7 was not wholly without foundation. Germany was exerting considerable pressure on its ally not to postpone a showdown until a less clearly defined future. Gottlieb von Jagow, German Foreign Minister, wrote on July 15: "We are concerned at present with the preeminent political question, perhaps the last opportunity of giving the Greater-Serbia menace its death blow under comparatively favorable circumstances."8

Once the content of the Austrian ultimatum became known, the 48-hour deadline given the Serbian government to reply became an immediate subject of concern. The time perceptions from July 21 through 29 focus predominantly (54.0 per cent) on the necessity of delaying the course of events in the Balkans in the hope of averting war, or at least containing it within a local area.

By July 30 it was apparent that war between Austria-Hungary and Serbia could not be prevented. At the same time, it was increasingly evident that such a war was likely to spread. As late as August 1 many European decision-makers asserted that if time permitted a reconvening of the concert powers, general war might be avoided. The British Foreign Minister wrote: "I still believe that if only a little respite in time can be gained before any Great Power begins war it might be possible to secure peace."9 By this time, however, the pressure of time had taken a different meaning for many of them. A major concern (48.1 per cent of all time perceptions from July 30 to August 2) was that one's nation not be caught militarily unprepared in case of war.

The dilemma was obvious. Time was re-

⁶ Hoyos's assessment that time was working against the Dual Monarchy was supported by General Conrad, Austro-Hungarian Chief-of-Staff: "In the years 1908-1909 it would have been a game with open cards," he said. "In 1912-1913 the chances were in our favour. Now it is a sheer gamble [ein va-banque spiel]." Quoted in Edmund Taylor, The Fall of the Dynasties (Garden City, 1963), p. 206.

- 7 Austria-Hungary, op. cit., #10118.
- ⁸ Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #48.
- 9 Great Britain, op. cit., #411.

quired to avert a general European war; above all, a moratorium on military operations was necessary. So on August 1 King George V wrote of his efforts "to find some solution which permits in any case the adjournment of active military operations and the granting of time to the powers to discuss among themselves calmly."10 But increasingly this consideration was overshadowed by the fear that a potential adversary might gain a head start in mobilizing its military power. Although no official mobilization orders except those of Austria-Hungary and Serbia were issued until July 29. there were increasing rumors and suspicions of secret preparations—some of them well founded, as it turned out.11

In the early hours of the morning of July 30, the Kaiser wrote on the margin of a message from the Czar,

... the Czar—as is openly admitted by him here—instituted "mil. measures which have now come into force" against Austria and us and as a matter of fact five days ago. Thus it is almost a week ahead of us. And these measures are for a defense against Austria, which is in no way attacking him!!! I can not agree to any more mediation, since the Czar who requested it has at the same time secretly mobilized behind my back. It is only a maneuver, in order to hold us back and to increase the start they have already got. My work is at an end!¹²

Later the Kaiser added, "In view of the colossal war preparations of Russia now discovered, this is all too late, I fear. Begin! Now!" 13

The previous day Russia had ordered—and then cancelled—a general mobilization. Later it was decided in St. Petersburg that the mobilization of the four southern military districts would deter an Austro-Hungarian attack on Serbia without alarming Berlin. But technical 10 France, op. cit., #550.

"Winston Churchill mobilized the British Navy contrary to a decision of the Cabinet. "At the Cabinet [meeting of August 1] I demanded the immediate calling out of the Fleet Reserves and the completion of our naval preparations.... However, I did not succeed in procuring their assent.... I went back to the Admiralty and gave forthwith the order to mobilise. We had no legal authority for calling up the Naval Reserves, as no proclamation had been submitted to his Majesty in view of the Cabinet decision, but we were quite sure that the Fleet men would unquestioningly obey the summons." Churchill, op. cit., pp. 230-231.

- ¹² Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #390.
- 13 Ibid., #433.

difficulties caused the Russians to reverse their decision once again on July 30 in favor of general mobilization—German warnings notwithstanding.

In response to what was perceived as a mounting threat against its eastern frontiers, the German Empire proclaimed a "state of threatening danger of war" on July 31 and dispatched a twelve-hour ultimatum to Russia demanding a cessation of military preparations. Berlin then ordered mobilization on August 1. A general mobilization was simultaneously ordered in Paris. Although official British mobilization was delayed until August 2, many had advocated such action considerably earlier. On July 31 Arthur Nicolson had urged immediate military preparations: "It seems to me most essential, whatever our future course may be in regard to intervention, that we should at once give orders for mobilization of the army."14

So, ten days after the small scale mobilizations by Serbia and Austria-Hungary on July 25, each of the major European nations had ordered a general mobilization; the armies totalling less than 400,000 men called to fight a limited war had grown to nearly twelve million men. As each mobilization was ordered it was described as a necessary defensive reaction—made more urgent by the pressure of time—to a previous decision within the other alliance, although such an act was commonly regarded in 1914 as tantamount to a declaration of war. Thus, each mobilization acted as a stimulus that elicited an almost reflex-like response. 15

14 Great Britain, op. cit., #368.

15 In some cases, the escalation of measures and counter-measures was sustained almost by accident, or by the failure to perceive the effects of one's actions. The mobilization of the Russian Baltic fleet is a good example: "On 25 July, when the Tsar looked over the minutes and resolutions of the Council of Ministers of the 24th, he not only approved them by adding 'agreed,' but, where it was the question of mobilizing the districts of Kiev, Moscow, Odessa and Kazan and the Black Sea fleet, he inserted in his own hand 'and Baltic' without any of his ministers drawing his attention to the fact that the mobilization of the Baltic fleet constituted an act of hostility toward Germany." Luigi Albertini, The Origins of the War of 1914, 3 vols. (New York, Oxford University Press, 1953), II, p. 558.

Although the Russian Baltic Fleet was no match for the German Navy, the Kaiser apparently felt genuinely threatened. In response to Bethmann-Hollweg's plea that the German Fleet

In the final hours of the crisis leaders in both coalitions became increasingly concerned (78.2 per cent of all time perceptions August 3-4) that other nations make their intentions known immediately. Allied states, members of the opposing coalition, and even neutral states were subjected to demands for immediate commitment to one side or the other.

The first hypothesis (1a, above) relating the stress of crisis to perceptions of time states that:

As stress increases in a crisis situation, time will be perceived as an increasingly salient factor in decision-making.

In order to perform a valid test of the hypothesis, the frequency of time references for each of the twelve periods (Table I) was adjusted as follows:

$\frac{\text{Time Perceptions} \times 100}{\text{Total Perceptions}}$

The resulting scores were then divided into two periods, June 27-July 28, and July 29-August 4.

A Mann-Whitney U-Test of the direction and magnitude of differences between the two periods was applied to the data for each coalition. The hypothesis is strongly supported by the data for the Triple Entente (France, Russia and England), whose leaders perceived time as a factor in decision-making significantly more frequently during the culminating stages (July 29-August 4) of the crisis than during the earlier period (June 27-July 28) (U=3, p=.009). The data for the Dual Alliance (Germany, be left in Norway, he wrote, "there is a Russian Fleet! In the Baltic there are now five Russian torpedo boat flotillas engaged in practice cruises, which as a whole or in part can be at the Belts within sixteen hours and close them. Port Arthur should be a lesson! My Fleet has orders to sail for Kiel, and to Kiel it is going to sail!" Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #221.

16 This test is used to determine if there is a systematic difference between scores in two samples or populations. Each item is given a rank order score; in the case of hypothesis 1a, each time period receives a rank score based on the adjusted frequency with which time is perceived as a salient factor in decision-making. The value of U (the statistic in this test) is given by the number of times that a score in one group (July 29-August 4) precedes a score in the other group (June 27-July 28). Thus, the lower the value of U, the more significant is the difference. Sidney Siegel, Nonparametric Statistics for the Behavioral Sciences (New York, 1956), pp. 116-127.

Austria-Hungary) reveal that differences between the early and later periods of the crisis are in the predicted direction, but that the difference is not statistically significant (U=11.5, p=.19).

According to the second hypothesis (1b) concerning perceptions of time:

As stress increases in a crisis situation, decisionmakers will become increasingly concerned with the immediate rather than the distant future.

Of the total of 160 statements in which time is perceived to be a factor in decision-making, only eight reveal a concern for the more distant future. When the data are divided into the early and later periods of the crisis, all perceptions of the distant future occur during the June 27-July 28 period, and none are found in the last week of the crisis, a distribution which is statistically significant (Fisher exact p = .002).

These data confirm again the relevance of the "Thomas Theorem": "If men define situations as real, they are real in their consequences." An analysis of European military technology and doctrines reveals that "objectively" time was of incalculably less importance than in the 1960s. Estimates of the time required for Austria-Hungary to field a full army ranged from three to four weeks. The necessities of harvesting the summer's crops were an important factor in military timetables. Russia's inability to mount a rapid offensive against Germany could be discounted; this assumption in fact was the basis of the Schlieffen plan.

Yet in the situation of high stress the decision-makers perceived that time was crucial—and they acted on that assumption. In the culminating phases of the crisis, leaders in the various capitals of Europe increasingly perceived potential enemies as able to deliver a sudden punishing blow. As a result, the penalties for delaying immediate military action were perceived to be increasingly high. Or, to use the language of modern deterrence theory, the nations of each coalition perceived those of the other alliance as able and willing to launch a massive, crippling first-strike, and thus hastened their own preparations. 17 Hence the entire

¹⁷ A question of possible interest to deterrence theorists is: Would the "capacity to delay response" have materially altered the outcome in 1914? Although we can only speculate, one point does seem clear. The ability of the weapons system to delay response successfully may be a necessary, but is not a sufficient, factor. None of the states in 1914 had the ability to unleash a rapid destructive blow, crippling the retaliatory capabilities of the adversary. But during the final

European concert system—which was assumed to act as an equilibrating mechanism—became instead a "runaway system."

III. PERCEPTIONS OF ALTERNATIVES

The entire original set of 4883 perceptions was recoded to test the hypotheses relating to perceived alternatives. This process yielded 508 statements classified as perceptions of "choice," "necessity," or "closed alternatives." 18

The "choice" category includes all statements in which more than one course of action is perceived.

The "necessity" category includes all statements indicating that the author sees only one possible course of action.

The "closed" classification includes all statements indicating that some course of action is not possible.

The initial hypothesis (2a) to be tested with these data is that:

In a crisis situation, decision-makers will tend to perceive their own range of alternatives to be more restricted than those of their adversaries; that is, they will perceive their own decision-making to be characterized by necessity and closed options, whereas those of the adversary are characterized by open choices.

Table II reveals that British, French, Russian and German decision-makers perceived significantly fewer options open to themselves than to their adversaries. In one respect the data for Austria-Hungary are similar to those of the week prior to the outbreak of general war, decision-makers in the capitals of Europe increasingly attributed this ability and intent to potential enemies. Thus the capacity to delay response is not likely to be effective unless decision-makers: (a) perceive the net rewards of delay to be higher than those of immediate action; and (b) are willing to attribute the same preferences to the adversary's decision-makers.

18 The inter-coder reliability was 0.87.

19 There may, of course, be political and strategic reasons for such assertions, quite aside from the way in which the situation is actually perceived. This is particularly likely in documents which are intended for wide public circulation. On the other hand, the most "private" documents—intended only for circulation within the various decision groups—do not differ materially from the entire set of documents in respect to the findings reported here. See, for example, the Kaiser's marginal annotations, or the various minutes of Sir Eyre Crowe, Assistant Under-Secretary of State in the British Foreign Office.

TABLE II. PERCEPTIONS OF ALTERNATIVES: FREQUENCY OF "CHOICE," "NECESSITY," AND "CLOSED" ALTERNATIVES FOR OWN NATION AND ENEMIES

		GERM	4 N Y
	Choice	Necessity		Choice	Closed
Self	10	109	Self	10	19
Enemies	21	3	Enemies	21	0
$\chi^2 = 75$	3.6 p < .001		$\chi^2 = 2$	22.2 p < .001
		AUSTRIA-I	HUNGARY
	Choice	Necessity		Choice	Closed
Self	. 13	80	Self	13	7
Enemies	0	3	Enemies	0	0
Fisher	exact $p = .65$		Fisher	exact $p = 1.00$
		RUSS	TIA.
	Choice	Necessity		Choice	Closed
Self	7	20	Self	7	7
Enemies	6	2	Enemies	6	0
Fisher	exact $p = .02$		Fishe	r exact $p = .04$
		FRAN	CE
	Choice	Necessity		Choice	Closed
Self	1	13	Self	1	6
Enemies	12	2	Enemies	12	3
$\chi^2 = 1$	7.8 $p < .001$		Fisher	exact $p = .006$
		GREAT BI	RITAIN
	Choice	Necessity		Choice	Closed
Self	7	20	Self	7	23
Enemies	21	2	Enemies	21	0
$\chi^2 = 2$	1.6 $p < .001$		$\chi^2 = 2$	29.3 $p < .001$

other nations—the decision-makers in Vienna perceived themselves to be acting out of necessity and closed options rather than open choice. There are only three Austro-Hungarian statements regarding the options of the enemies and none are perceptions of choice. This finding is not surprising. After the earliest phase of the crisis, the policy of punishing Serbia was pursued in Vienna with a single-mindedness not evident in the British policy of seeking a mediated solution; nor in the German policy of trying to preserve the "dignity and honor" of her ally, while averting a general war which many Germans perceived would end disastrously; on or in the Russian policy which, like ²⁰ An earlier study of the 1914 crisis revealed, for example, that German decision-makers were fully aware of Germany's inability to wage a successful two-front war in 1914. Dina A. Zinnes, Robert C. North, and Howard Koch, Jr., "Capability, Threat and the Outbreak of War," in James N. Rosenau, ed., International Politics and that of Germany, sought to support the prestige of a weak ally without a world war.

Leaders of the Triple Entente nations perceived few acceptable alternatives open to themselves in regard to the Balkan crisis. Sir Edward Grey wrote on July 24 that "We can do nothing for moderation unless Germany is prepared pari passu to do the same." Almost to the end leaders in Berlin opposed mediation. According to Bethmann-Hollweg, "We cannot mediate in the conflict between Austria and Serbia but possibly later between Austria and Russia." Nor were the Russians inclined to Foreign Policy (New York, 1961). Admiral Tirpitz wrote, "It [the German Government] was convinced from the very beginning that we should not win...that government itself was most deeply convinced of its hopelessness." Alfred von Tirpitz, My Memoirs (London, Hurst & Blackett, Ltd., 1919).

²¹ Great Britain, op. cit., #103.

²² Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #247.

mediation because, in the words of Sazonov, "We have assumed from the beginning a posture which we cannot change."²³ Yet the same leaders tended to perceive more freedom of action for members of the other alliance.²⁴

The tendency to perceive one's own alternatives to be more restricted than those of the adversary is also evident in the reaction to the events leading up to general war. On July 28 Nicholas II had warned that, "I foresee that I will succumb very soon to the pressure put upon me and will be compelled to take extreme measures which will lead to war." Three days later—in the course of his desperate last minute correspondence with the Kaiser, the Tsar asserted, "It is technically impossible to stop our military preparations which were obligatory owing to Austria's mobilization. 26

The reaction of German decision-makers to the series of events leading up to mobilization and war was almost identical to that of the Tsar. On the one hand they repeatedly asserted that they had no choice but to take vigorous military measures against the threat to the east.²⁷ These were, on the other hand, interspersed with statements that only Russia was free to act in order to prevent war.²⁸ And Wilhelm, like the Tsar, finally asserted that he had lost control of his own military and that only the actions of the adversary could stop further escalation:²⁹

- ²³ Russia, op. cit., #118.
- ²⁴ After the outbreak of war between Serbia and Austria-Hungary, Grey wrote: "The whole idea of mediation or mediating influence was ready to be put into operation by any method that Germany could suggest if mine was not acceptable. In fact, mediation was ready to come into operation by any method that Germany thought possible if only Germany would 'press the button' in the interests of peace' (Great Britain, op. cit., #263).
 - 25 Russia, op. cit., #170.
 - 28 Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #487.
- ²⁷ "Then I must mobilize too!... He [Nicholas] expressly stated in his first telegram that he would be presumably forced to take measures that would lead to a European war. Thus he takes the responsibility upon himself." Ibid., #399.
- ²⁸ "The responsibility for the disaster which is now threatening the whole civilized world will not be laid at my door. In this moment it still lies in your [Nicholas] power to avert it." Ibid., #480.
- ²⁹ To students of strategy the assertions of the Kaiser and the Tsar may appear to be a "real life" application of the tactics of "commitment: a device to leave the last clear chance to decide

On technical grounds my mobilization which had already been proclaimed this afternoon must proceed against two fronts, east and west as prepared. This cannot be countermanded because I am sorry your [George V] telegram came so late.³⁰

The same theme of a single option open to one's self, coupled with perceptions that the initiative for peace rested with the enemy, are the outcome with the other party, in a manner that he fully appreciates; it is to relinquish further initiative, having rigged the incentives so that the other party must choose in one's favor." Thomas C. Schelling, The Strategy of Conflict (New York, Oxford University Press, 1960), p. 37.

The behavior of military leaders in St. Petersburg and Berlin proved, however, that neither monarch was merely bluffing. After Sazonov and General Tatischev had browbeaten the vacillating Nicholas into ordering general mobilization, the former called General Ianuschkevitch and said: "Now you can smash the telephone. Give your orders, General, and then—disappear for the rest of the day."

In Berlin Moltke effectively undermined belated German efforts to restrain Austria-Hungary by wiring: "Stand firm to Russian mobilization. Austria-Hungary must be preserved. Mobilize at once against Russia. Germany will mobilize."

In Vienna Conrad von Hotzendorf insured himself against any second thoughts Francis Joseph might have had by ordering mobilization one day ahead of schedule.

One factor which contributed to the perceptions of a single alternative was the rigidity of the various mobilization plans. The Russian attempt to mobilize against only Austria was anathema to the Russian generals because no such plan had been drawn up. According to General Dobrorolski, "The whole plan of mobilization is worked out ahead to its final conclusion and in all its detail... Once the moment is chosen, everything is settled; there is no going back; it determines mechanically the beginning of war." Virginia Cowles, The Kaiser (New York, 1964), pp. 343-46.

Similarly the Kaiser's last minute attempt to reverse the Schlieffen plan—to attack only in the east—shattered Moltke, who replied: "That is impossible, Your Majesty. An army of a million cannot be improvised. It would be nothing but a rabble of undisciplined armed men, without a commissariat. . . . It is utterly impossible to advance except according to plan; strong in the west, weak in the east." Moltke, Erinnerungen, quoted ibid., pp. 348-9.

²⁰ Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #575.

evident in the French and Austrian statements regarding their own mobilizations. ³¹ During the last week only the British consistently stated that they were able to act with some degree of freedom. Owing in part to a badly divided Cabinet, to estimates of public apathy, and to pressure from the business community for neutrality, Grey asserted that British "hands were free."³²

According to the second hypothesis (2b) relating stress to perceptions of alternatives:

In a crisis situation, decision-makers will tend to perceive their allies' range of alternatives to be more restricted than those of their adversaries.

European leaders perceived fewer alternatives open to themselves than to their adversaries; they regarded their allies to be in a similar position. On the one hand German documents are replete with explanations that Austria was pursuing the only policy open to her, thus preventing Germany from playing a moderating role in Vienna.³³ On the other hand the Kaiser was apparently convinced that England could perform the very function which he felt was impossible for Germany—the restraining of the most belligerent member of the coalition.³⁴ se Great Britain, op. cit., #447. These statements explain, in part, the Kaiser's violent reaction to Grey's telegram of July 29 that, "There would be no question of our intervening if Germany was not involved, or even if France was not involved. But we know very well that if the issue did become such that we thought British interests required us to intervene, we must intervene at once, and the decision would have to be very rapid." Ibid., #286. Upon reading this, Wilhelm wrote, "The net has been suddenly thrown over our head, and England sneeringly reaps the most brilliant success of her persistently prosecuted purely anti-German world policy . . ." Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #401.

³¹ Austria-Hungary, op. cit., #11203; France, op. cit., #532, #725.

33 "Thus, there remains nothing for the Austro-Hungarian Government to do unless it is willing to make the final sacrifice of its status as a Great Power, but to enforce its demands by the use of heavy pressure, or, if need be, by taking military measures." Ibid., #423.

³⁴ "Instead of mediation, a serious word to Petersburg and Paris, to the effect that England would not help them would quiet the situation at once." Ibid., #368.

"If Grey wanted really to preserve peace he need only as Prince Henry suggested on 20th July intimate to the two allies France and Russia—not to mobilize but to wait, until the pour-

The assumption of British freedom, coupled with restrictions on German policy, is nowhere as clear as in one of the Kaiser's marginal notes:

He [Grey] knows perfectly well, that if he were to say one single serious sharp and warning word at Paris and Petersburg, and were to warn them to remain neutral, both would become quiet at once. But he takes care not to speak the word, and threatens us instead! Common cur! England alone bears the responsibility for peace and war, and not we any longer!³⁵

This approach to the problems of allies was not confined to Berlin. Nicolson wrote on July 29: "I do not think that Berlin quite understands that Russia cannot and will not stand quietly by while Austria administers a severe chastisement to Serbia." Grey assessed the requirements of his French ally in similar terms. At the same time, however, he believed that Germany could constrain her southern ally. 38

Only when mobilizations and other actions had gone too far to be stopped, were some futile attempts made to restrain the militant members of each alliance. For example, at the last minute Bethmann-Hollweg tried to hold Austria in check, but he was effectively countermanded by Moltke's wire to Vienna urging immediate general mobilization.³⁹

Because there are relatively few perceptions of allies' alternatives, the data for the second hypothesis have been aggregated by alliance rather than by nation (Table III). For both the Triple Entente and the Dual Alliance there is a significant ($p \le .02$) difference between the choice parlers which I was directing had succeeded or otherwise between Vienna and Russia." Ibid., #720.

³⁷ "France did not wish to join in the war that seemed about to break out, but she was obliged to join in it, because of her alliance." Ibid., #447.

38 "But none of us could influence Austria in this direction unless Germany would propose and participate in such action in Vienna." Ibid., #99.

³⁹ On July 30, Bethmann-Hollweg concluded a telegram to Vienna: "Under these circumstances we must urgently and impressively suggest to the consideration of the Vienna Cabinet the acceptance of mediation on the above mentioned honorable conditions. The responsibility for the consequences that would otherwise follow would be an uncommonly heavy one both for Austria and for us." Montgelas and Schücking, op. cit., #395.

³⁵ Ibid., #368.

³⁶ Great Britain, op. cit., #264.

TABLE III. PERCEPTIONS OF ALTERNATIVES:
FREQUENCY OF "CHOICE," "NECESSITY," AND "CLOSED" ALTERNATIVES FOR ALLIES AND ENEMIES

DUAL ALLIANCE			TRIPLE ENTENTE
	Choice	Neces- sity		Choice	Neces- sity
Allies	13	20	Allies	30	17
Enemies	21	6	Enemies	39	6
$\chi^2 = 8.9 p = .005$			$\chi^2 = 6.4$ $p = .02$
	Choice	Closed		Choice	Closed
Allies	13	3	Allies	30	7
Enemies	21	0	Enemies	39	3
Fishe	r exact p :	=.07	$\chi^2 = 2.5$.20 > p	>.10

and necessity perceptions for allies and enemies. The difference between perceptions of choice and those of closed alternatives is in the predicted direction, but in the region of doubt. Hypothesis 3a states that:

As stress increases, decision-makers will perceive the range of alternatives open to themselves to become narrower.

A valid test of the hypothesis, free from the effects of message volume, required a prior adjustment of frequency of "necessity" and "closed" perceptions similar to that performed on the time data. The resulting figures were again divided into two periods: June 27-July 28 and July 29-August 4. A Mann-Whitney U-Test reveals that the difference for each coalition is in the predicted direction, and is statistically significant (U=7,p=.05).

According to the final hypothesis (3b) relating crisis-induced tension to perceived alternatives,

As stress increases, decision-makers will perceive the range of alternatives open to adversaries or potential adversaries to expand.

To test the hypothesis, frequency of perception was again adjusted for message volume and the data are divided into the periods of lower (June 27-July 28) and higher (July 29-August 4) stress. A Mann-Whitney U-Test lends only partial support to the hypothesis. For both alliances, differences between the early and later periods are in the predicted directionthe "choice" alternatives open to members of the opposing coalition were perceived to be increasing as the crisis deepened. In the case of the Dual Alliance, the increase in perceptions of the open alternatives for adversaries is significant (U=5, p=.02); for the Triple Entente, however the difference is not sufficient to support the hypothesis (U=10; p=.13).

IV. PATTERNS OF COMMUNICATION

The data used to test hypotheses relating to communication in crisis differ from those in earlier sections of this paper in one important respect: all 5269 documents in the Austro-Hungarian, British, French, German and Russian collections, rather than those authored by selected decision-makers, were counted and classified into four categories:

- (1) Documents from officials abroad (ambassadors, ministers, attachés, consuls, etc.) to their central decision-makers.
- (2) Documents from central decision-makers to their officials abroad.
- (3) Documents from the central decisionmakers of one nation to those of another nation.
- (4) Documents circulated within a central decision-making unit.

Two units of measurement are used to describe message volume—the document and the word. An index of the average number of words per line in each volume was determined by an exact count of every fiftieth page. The number of lines in each document was then counted and multiplied by the index figure. No attempt was made to adjust message volume for linguistic style, which may affect word counts.⁴⁰

The initial communication hypothesis (4a) to be tested is that:

The higher the stress in a crisis situation, the heavier the overload of channels of communication.⁴¹

Figure 1—in which message volumes for all five nations have been aggregated by type—reveals sharp increases in daily average message volume during the latter stages of the crisis. During late June and early July, for example, the average frequency of messages from a nation's diplomats abroad was approximately four per day. By July 30, this figure had risen over tenfold.

For purposes of testing the hypothesis, the data have again been divided into two periods: June 27-July 28, and July 29-August 4. A ⁴⁰ For an attempt to adjust for linguistic differences—that is, the necessity to use a different number of words in various languages to express the same idea—see Dina A. Zinnes, "Expression and Perception of Hostility in International Relations," Ph.D. Dissertation, Stanford University, 1963, pp. 137–43.

⁴¹ Hypothesis 4a clearly presupposes the existence of a quantitative definition of "overload." This problem is discussed, but not resolved, below.

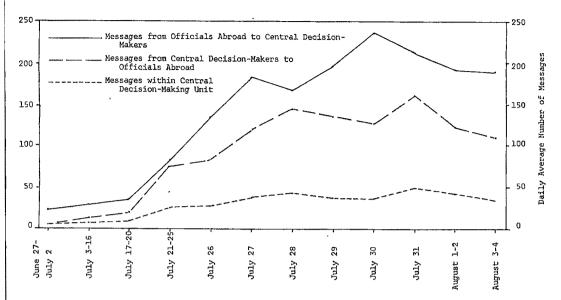

Fig. 1. Daily average message volume by type and date. Figures for Austria-Hungary, Germany, France, Russia and Great Britain combined.

Mann-Whitney U-Test for the direction and magnitude of differences between the two periods was applied to the message volume—measured both in documents and words—of each nation and for each type of communication (Table IV).

The increase in message volume appears to depend on three factors: the degree of involvement in the early stages of the crisis, the channel of communication, and the unit of measurement.

Austria-Hungary was most deeply involved in the crisis during the early period, and increases in Austro-Hungarian message volume from the early to the later period of the crisis are generally lower than for Germany. Similarly, among members of the Triple Entente, Russia was the first to be involved in the Balkan crisis, and the increase in Russian message volume is less significant than that for either France or England. Thus, the less dramatic increase in message volume for Austria and Russia during the most intense period of crisis may be interpreted as adding support to the hypothesis.

The change in message volume also appears to depend on the source and destination of the documents. The rate of increase was highest for messages from ambassadors and other officials abroad to the various capitals of Europe. This finding is generally consistent with Taylor's thesis that the decision-makers in 1914 were "snowed under by the blizzard of information" [information input] and that "decisions"

[information output] tended to lag behind events."42 The differences in message volume within the central decision-making unit between the early and late period of the crisis are in the predicted direction, but rather marginal. This is probably the result, in large part, of increased reliance upon oral communication during the final days prior to war.

Finally, when the rate of communications is measured by the number of documents, the change from the early to the later period of the crisis is more significant than when a word count is used.

The second communication hypothesis (4b) states that:⁴³

The higher the stress in a crisis situation, the more stereotyped will be the information content of messages.

The average length of messages has been taken as a measure of stereotypy, on the premise that richness of information concerning the course of events, possible alternatives, and completeness of detail are more characteristic of longer documents. The data lend strong support to the hypothesis. The average length of messages decreased systematically as war ⁴² Taylor, op. cit., pp. 220-21.

⁴³ This hypothesis is not dissimilar to Lasswell's prediction that "style grows terse... when the crisis is recognized as serious." Harold D. Lasswell et al., The Language of Politics (New York, George Stewart, 1949), p. 28.

TABLE IV. DIFFERENCES IN M	MESSAGE VOLUME BETWEEN E.	ARLY (JUNE 27-JULY 28) AND
LATE (JULY 29-AUGUST 4	PERIODS OF THE 1914 CRISIS	s: mann-whitney U -test

	Official to C	ges from s Abroad entral n-Makers	Central Mal	ges from Decision- cers to s Abroad	Central	es within Decision- ng Unit
Daily Average Volume—No. of Documents	U	p *	U	p *	U	p *
Austria-Hungary	0	.008	5	.133	15	n.s.
Germany	2	.005	3	.009 `	3	.009
England	1	.003	5	.024	8	.074
France	3	.009	5	.024	7	.035
Russia	2	.005	9	.101	14	n.s.
Daily Average Volume—No. of Words
Austria-Hungary	2	.033	11	n.s.	12	n.s.
Germany	6	.037	4	.015	6	.037
England	5	.024	10	.134	14	n.s.
France	7	.053	12	n.s.	6	.037
Russia	11	n.s.	11	n.s.	15	n.s.

^{*} $n_1=7$ $n_2=5$, except for Austria-Hungary, $n_1=7$, $n_2=3$.

approached. Each document written immediately following the assassination averaged 326 words in length. During the two days immediately prior to England's entry into the war the average message was only 97 words long. A Mann-Whitney U-Test reveals that documents were significantly (U=2, p=.005) shorter during the period of highest stress (July 29-August 4).

Prior to World War I, the normal and most important channel of communications between two nations was the diplomatic corps. When leaders in London wished to communicate with their counterparts in Berlin, the message was sent to the British Ambassador to Germany, who would then convey its contents to the proper German decision-makers. Direct communication between top level leaders was clearly the exception to normal procedures. According to the third hypothesis (4c) relating stress to communications:

The higher the stress in a crisis situation, the greater the tendency to rely upon extraordinary or improvised channels of communication.

⁴⁴ A more comprehensive description of the normal patterns of communication in 1914 may be found in Zinnes, op. cit., pp. 20-24.

Of the 2780 inter-state messages, 1530 occurred from June 27 to July 28; of this total, only 74 (4.8 per cent) were direct communications between central decision-makers. During the last seven days of the crisis, on the other hand, 116 out of 1250 (9.3 per cent) messages were sent directly to another state's decision-makers, bypassing the ambassadors. The difference between the two periods is statistically significant ($X^2=21.3$; p<.001).

As crisis deepens, the need for clear and unimpeded communication between potential adversaries is likely to become both more urgent and more difficult. It is unlikely that similar difficulties in communication will arise between members of the same coalition. Hence the hypothesis (4d) that:

The higher the stress in a crisis situation, the higher the proportion of intra-coalition—as against inter-coalition—communication.

When inter-nation messages are classified according to date and divided into inter-coalition and intra-coalition communications, the results support the hypothesis. During the first month after the assassination, 830 out of 1530 (54.3 per cent) inter-nation messages were exchanged between members of opposing coalitions. During the week prior to the outbreak of general war, on the other hand, inter-coalition messages account for only 580 out of 1250 (46.4 per cent) messages. The difference between the two periods in regard to communications within and between alliances is significant ($X^2 = 17.3$; p < .001).

The four communication hypotheses have generally been supported by the 1914 data, but some interesting questions remain unanswered. For example, the assumption that information input overload is as dysfunctional as lack of information, is supported by evidence on at least five levels—the cell, the organ, the individual, the group, and the organization. At though there is strong evidence that channel capacity is inversely related to the size of the system, we know comparatively little about what magnitude of input constitutes overload at complex levels such as foreign policy decision-making units.

A second problem is that the communication hypotheses have been concerned solely with the volume of messages without regard to their content. While these two factors are not independent of each other, further research on information input overload must consider such factors as the ratio of signal to redundancy and noise.

The most difficult aspect of studying communications in historical situations is the assessment of its impact on policy. For example, how is the behavior of decision-makers changed by communication overload? In his survey of the experimental literature, Miller has identified a number of coping mechanisms: omissions, error, queuing, filtering, cutting categories of discrimination, employing multiple channels, and escape.46 Some insights can be derived from the 1914 data; the employment of multiple channels during the latter stages of the crisisthrough more frequent direct communication between decision-makers—has already been noted. But data regarding such consequences as selective filtering of incoming information is at best fragmentary. Thus, even with the relatively complete documentation available for the 1914 crisis, the findings on some important questions are only suggestive.

v. conclusion

In conclusion it may be useful to consider some questions of more general concern. First, ⁴⁵ James G. Miller, "Information Input Overload and Psychopathology," The American Journal of Psychiatry, Vol. 116 (1960), pp. 695-704.

46 Miller, "Information Input Overload," Self Organizing Systems—1962, n. p.

do the concepts and findings in this paper have any relevance beyond the historical one of illuminating a series of unique events?

The factors of perceived time, perceived alternatives, and patterns of communication are usually treated as generic concepts in the decision-making literature. The experimental evidence from psychology supports the assumption that they are among the key factors which affect the performance of individuals and groups, particularly those engaged in complex tasks. Further support for the findings in this paper appears to be forthcoming from laboratory simulation studies.47 Their ultimate importance for the student of international politics must, however, be established in case studies of actual foreign policy decision. In this connection, a study of the Cuban missile crisis of 1962 assessed the importance of the factors discussed in this paper; it was shown that the crucial factors in the settlement of the crisis without recourse to war included the ability of President Kennedy and his advisers: (1) to maintain multiple options for both the United States and the Soviet Union; (2) to lengthen decision time, again for both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.; and (3) to use effectively multiple channels of communication.48

A second question concerns research strategy. Are these hypotheses merely a matter of "common sense," and if so, do they warrant the extensive research effort which is entailed in the use of content analysis? A major drawback to the type of data used in this study is found in the very nature of content analysis, which requires considerable expenditure of scarce research resources. Recent developments in programming computers—such as the IBM 7090—for content analysis have gone a long ⁴⁷ A full report of the findings from this simulation will be found in a doctoral dissertation by Charles F. Hermann, Northwestern University.

48 Holsti, et al., "The Management of International Crisis: Affect and Action in American-Soviet Relations, October 1962," to appear in a reader edited by Richard C. Snyder and Dean Pruitt, in press. The theoretical and practical implications of such future studies may be somewhat different. For example, should one find that 1914-like results appear only in every tenth case, the social scientist might reject the hypotheses. The criteria of practical relevence might be less rigid. Given twentieth century military technology, such findings should give little rise to complacency. As Brodie, op. cit., p. 175, has pointed out, today a single case of deterrent failure is too many.

way toward solving the problem.⁴⁹ An adaptation of the "General Inquirer" system of automated content analysis permits studies such as that of the 1914 crisis with substantial reduction of manual effort while materially increasing speed, reliability, and flexibility.⁵⁰

The more fundamental question of research strategy relates to the choice of "common sense" hypotheses for extensive research. Yet as Robinson⁵¹ has shown, in his study of some propositions similar to those in this paper, decision-makers generally characterize their own activities in terms of classical economic models of decision-making (reviewing all alternatives for the optimum one). They often apply the same model to the decision processes of other states. Moreover, it is not difficult in almost every case to develop precisely the reverse proposition. For example, it is wholly consistent with the concept of crisis as a situation of potentially high penalties, as well as with common sense, to hypothesize that:52

⁴⁹ Philip J. Stone et al., "The General Inquirer: A Computer System for Content Analysis and Retrieval Based on the Sentence as a Unit of Information," Behavioral Science, Vol. 7 (1962), pp. 484-494.

⁵⁰ Holsti, "An Adaptation of the 'General Inquirer' for the Systematic Analysis of Political Documents," Behavioral Science, Vol. 9 (1964), pp. 382–88.

51 Robinson, op. cit., pp. 7-8.

52 A series of assertions which tend to contra-

As stress, increases, decision-makers will be motivated to search for, and to consider an increasing number of alternative policies.

While the last two decades have seen a great deal of theorizing about international relations, as well as the development of numerous promising techniques of generating and analyzing data, a basic theory—solidly grounded in empirical evidence—remains a distant goal. Given the rudimentary state of international relations as a discipline, it may be that research directed toward illuminating and rendering more precise our notions, even of "common sense," is not wholly misdirected, either from the standpoint of developing a viable theory of international relations or of contributing to a more stable world dict the hypotheses in this paper may be found in Theodore Abel, "The Elements of Decision in the Pattern of War," American Sociological Review, Vol. 6 (1941), pp. 853-59, in which the author writes:

"I. The decision to fight, unless the opponent abandons resistance without a struggle, is not reached on the spur of the moment. In every case the decision is based upon a careful weighing of chances and of anticipating consequences. . . . In no case is the decision precipitated by emotional tensions, sentimentality, crowd-behavior, or other irrational motivations.

"2. The rational, calculating decision is reached far in advance of the actual outbreak of hostilities."

LAW, SOCIETY AND THE DOMESTIC REGIME IN RUSSIA, IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

GEORGE L. YANEY University of Maryland

American experts on the Soviet Union have given much of their time to discussing whether the Russian communist government is going to remain "totalitarian" or instead turn "liberal." Journalists and scholars alike judge Soviet policies and decrees largely according to whether or not they extend more "freedom" to the Russian people.1 Similarly, American writers in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries almost never inquired as to what purposes the Russian imperial government's policies and decrees were actually intended to serve but only how liberal they were or were not. When one writer said that the Tsar was liberalizing, another would reply that he had not actually surrendered any of his arbitrary power and that Russia was still as oppressive as ever.2 In American eyes, then, the Russian state apparently cannot move except along a single line that extends from freedom to oppression, democracy to absolutism, similarity to Western institutions to dissimilarity. If Russia is not moving toward one of these poles, then she is not moving at all. Few have suggested that Russian statesmen have been operating along other lines and coping with other problems. Seldom has it occurred to American observers that the question of liberalization has actually been rather a minor one in Russian development.3

Ι

Political freedom, as Americans use the term, is fundamentally an attribute of society rather than of the individual. Individual rights do not repose in separate persons but in the common recognition of them by the citizenry as expressed in law. A citizen's right to speak freely resides not so much in him as in the men around him.

- ¹ E.g., R. Conquest, "After Khrushchev: A Conservative Restoration?," Problems of Communism, Vol. 12 (September-October, 1963), pp. 41-6.
- ² Typically, the author of "Civil Liberties in Russia," Outlook, Vol. 54 (November 1905), pp. 543-4, believed the Tsar was liberalizing in October 1905, while the author of "The Russian Chaos," Living Age, Vol. 247 (November, 1905), pp. 502-4, believed he was shamming.
- ³ A welcome exception is T. Von Laue, Why Lenin? Why Stalin? (New York, 1964.)

If they believe in the abstract principle that government cannot interfere with the individual's right to speak, and if all statutes and government decrees conform to this principle, then the citizen possesses the right. To be more specific, if in some particular instance the men around him do not agree that he is free to express himself, the legal system and their respect for it limits the actions they can take to stop him.⁴

Conceived in this way, law proceeds from abstract principles, applied to everyday life in such a way that specific enactments and decisions are supposed to be rationally consistent with the principles and with each other. Theoretically, the very legitimacy of the state stems from its consistency with an integral constitutional system based on explicit guarantees of rights common to all citizens. Men may be unequal in a free society but not by express provision of the law.

Freedom, in this view, is not simply the right to do whatever one wishes. It is the condition of men whose experience has inculcated in them common notions of the rights properly belonging to the individual and whose law embodies these notions. When Americans say that a government is liberalizing, they mean in effect that it is limiting itself to operate within a

- ⁴ T. Parsons, The Structure of Social Action (Glencoe, Ill., 1949), pp. 100-5, notes that the social origin of individual rights has been ignored by Western liberal thought ever since John Locke. The social-historical development that produced the eighteenth-century ideal of "natural" rights has been what Parsons calls a residual category, an assumption which is necessary to the validity of an idea but which is left unstated and unnoticed.
- ⁵ A. L. Goodhart, "Some American Interpretations of Law," in Modern Theories of Law (London, 1933), pp. 1–20, acknowledges that the legal system in America is not in fact reducible to a consistent framework. Nevertheless, he says, American judges make their decisions with the aim of developing and maintaining as consistent a body of law as they can. See also R. Pound, Social Control through Law (New Haven, 1942); A. Hagerstrom, Inquiries into the Nature of Law and Morals (Stockholm, 1953); and L. Petrazhitsky, Law and Morality (Cambridge, Mass., 1955).

purportedly consistent legal system based on constitutional principles which the citizens generally recognize as legitimate—a constitution of the sort that Sartori has called garantiste.

In Russia, neither freedom nor law have commonly carried these meanings or even implied them. Russian society has never produced a commonly recognized legal system based on abstract governing principles. Russian social institutions have generally been narrowly local and isolated from one another. In cities and villages alike, the members of "family groups," as the communists have quite accurately termed them, have been set into separate social positions in hierarchical relation to one another either by inheritance or the personal favor of someone in authority.6 Each Russian has been sharply aware of his own special privileges and prerogatives, but the concept of rights shared by all men, rights whose force and legitimacy derive entirely from the fact that they are shared, he has comprehended only dimly at best.7

Up to the last few decades, over four-fifths of the Russian people were peasants, living in small, self-sufficient, culturally isolated villages. To them, the word freedom meant primarily the absence of any outside interference that threatened their personal status in their separate villages. Law had two meanings. The word pravo, formally equivalent to the German Recht, meant both the traditional social structure of his own immediate group, based largely on common habits, and the arbitrary authority of the ruler.8 Ideally, these two meanings represented aspects of a single system, in which a benevolent tsar (or, later, a party secretary) exercised his personal power to protect the local hierarchical group from harm. In practice, the tsar's power has been exercised ever since the fifteenth century by a number of agents and landholders, each and all of whom were themselves arbitrary authorities who could interfere with or protect the peasant villages pretty much at will. The people at large shared no common legal relations, consequently the tsar had no basis on which to compile a law that would guide and limit his officials. Whatever intentions he had and however many pious phrases he inserted into his decrees, all he could grant to his agents in fact was an undefined authority, and the only way he could limit their activities was by setting them in opposition to one another. From the peasant's view. then, the concrete forms of the tsar's authority did not constitute pravo. The tsar's power as pravo was an abstraction, a dream of an allpowerful demi-god who would correct the evils of his own government if only someone told him about them. Thus, the peasant's experience taught him that political authority in practice had nothing to do with pravo. Even when the agents of the state followed their regulations. their power seemed arbitrary to the people with whom they had to deal.

⁶ M. Fainsod, Smolensk Under Soviet Rule (Cambridge, Mass., 1958), pp. 85-9, 407-8.

In the nineteenth century, when the ruler began to attempt to govern the peasants by law, his agents and judges still seemed as arbitrary to the peasant as they had always been. The peasants continued as before to utilize or appeal to or bribe the government agents, but the essential quality of the state's minions continued to be their arbitrary power, not the consistency of their operation. Toward such a power the peasant might feel reverence and awe, but no duties and no responsibilities. The peasant could conceive of the state and even feel a vague loyalty toward it, but the idea of legal relationships with it involving rights and duties was quite foreign to him.

The typical Russian peasant has not generally resented arbitrary rule as such. With few exceptions he has recognized the central government as necessary and tried to utilize the power of its agents for his own purposes, usually by bribing them. If one agent acted oppressively, a peasant was more inclined to appeal to another agent than to any abstract law. The significant characteristic of the Russian's legal consciousness, that which has distinguished his concept of law most clearly from the American, has not been that he has opposed central governmental authority but that his notion of law as either habit or force has produced very little sense of duty or responsibility in him. The legal rules the peasant has known have been primarily confined to habitual attitudes. Political power as he has experienced it has neither needed nor claimed his active support.10

⁷ B. A. Kistiakovskii, Sotsialnyia nauki i pravo (Moscow, 1916), pp. 619-59, discusses the weakness of legal consciousness in Russian society prior to the Revolution.

⁸ A. Leontev, "Volostyni sud i obychnoe pravo," Zhurnal iuridicheskogo obshchestva pri S-Petersburgskogo universiteta (November, 1894), pp. 23-33, 41-7.

⁹ N. M. Druzhinin, Gosudarstvennye krestiane i reforma P. D. Kiseleva (2 vols., Moscow, 1946, 1958), describes the government's first consistent attempt to establish a legal system over and within the peasant communities; see esp. II, 74-8.

¹⁰ Sorokin has made it abundantly clear that

The Russian peasant's characteristic attitude toward the state is both a cause and a result of the state's historical development. From its beginnings, the Russian state grew up around a band of warriors whose battlefield extended from the White Sea to the Black and from the Baltic to the Caspian.11 The problems and policies of the warriors took form on such a vast scale, and the social horizons of the people were so limited that for all practical purposes the Russian state evolved apart from Russian society. Its needs and purposes were quite beyond the consciousness of its subjects, and thus the unity it imposed on them possessed no other institutional form than what the central government itself established.

The Russian state has always lived in fear of its neighbors. United, the powers within striking distance of its borders have always possessed ample strength to invade and perhaps overcome it and they have often threatened to do so. That they have never fully succeeded has been due not only to Russia's own military prowess but also to their continuing struggles with each other. The same could be said for the other powers of Eastern and Central Europe during the last five centuries. They have all dreaded one another ever since they have been recognizable as states, and their mutual fear has been its own justification. Acts of defense in Eastern Europe have usually been indistinguishable from acts of aggression; weakness has been an invitation to invaders; military power has been a state's only security and the foundation for its independence and identity. In every state the desire to survive has merged easily into the urge to conquer. In short, warfare, both hot and cold, has been constant in Eastern Europe for several centuries. All governments have had to concern themselves primarily with survival against enemies whose strength might at any moment become overpowering. In good seasons and bad the most compelling problems of government in Russia have been to field an army and to keep neighboring powers disunited.

In the early eighteenth century, Russia became a European power, and the area with which her statesmen had to concern themselves became extended abruptly to the Mediterranean and the Atlantic. Her new competitors were perhaps more orderly but hardly less warlike and threatening than the ones that had plagued her in the preceding centuries. Most significant, the West European states possessed the economic resources to support very expensive armies, and Russia's armies likewise had to be very expensive.

Like all the larger continental European states of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the Russian government not only collected taxes, but involved itself directly in national economic development. In Russia, as in Western Europe, the state attempted to regulate society as a means to the fulfillment of its economic needs and to resolve those conflicts of economic and social interests among its subjects to which economic development gave rise. In the West, however, the state found social institutions and economic classes that had already undergone a long experience of interaction with one another. Various groups had developed interests and purposes and philosophies that identified what the members had in common with one another and that defined the relationships between groups. Society itself had gone a long way toward replacing hierarchical relationships with those of common interest and collective self-awareness. When the state acted, therefore, it expressed to some extent the growing social awareness of its subjects. Their interest groups and institutions were already in being and in interaction. They had made coherent political forces of themselves and found avenues for political action. They conflicted with each other, but they were doing business. Although they were often opposed to the state, they constituted concrete political forces with which the state could negotiate and form relationships that would give a measure of consistency and legitimacy to its policies. Conflicts of interest among the various social and economic groups and between them and the state gave rise to a legal system, the necessary institutional concomitant of modern economic development. In the West, all levels of society participated in social evolution and formed their interests, purposes, and ways of life around it. Social and economic groups grew peasant life is typically ritualistic and liturgical. See P. A. Sorokin et al., eds. A Systematic Sourcebook in Rural Sociology, 3 vols. (Minneapolis, 1930), I, 13-4; II, 124-34. Good discussions of the Russian peasant's attitudes toward law and the state may be found in K. D. Kavelin, Krestianskii vopros (St. Petersburg, 1882); A. Novikov, Zapiski zemskogo nachalnika (St. Petersburg, 1889); Leontev, cited above, n. 8; and V. A. Beer, Kommentarii novykh provintsialnykh uchrezhdenii 12 iulia 1889 goda (Moscow, 1894), pp. viii-xi.

n One of the best descriptions of Russia's perennial problems of foreign policy is J. Fennell, Ivan the Great of Moscow (London, 1961). Although Fennell's study is limited to the late fifteenth century, the nature of Ivan III's problems is suggestive concerning the situation he left to his successors.

increasingly dependent on one another whether they liked it or not. 12

In Russia, on the other hand, the groups that responded to the state's growing efforts to maintain itself did not engage in much interaction with each other before the late nineteenth century. Up to the 1860s, society in cities and villages alike was still strongly hierarchical at all levels, and the interests of the various "families"—the hierarchies of personal influence—were still confined largely to maintaining their established local positions. All the commercial and industrial development of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries notwithstanding, self-conscious groups based on common economic interest and commonly accepted practices had not yet replaced the hierarchical relationships of the old society.

The habit of negotiation had struck only a few weak roots in Russia by the eighteenth century, when the state began its attempts to stimulate economic development. Peter the Great found no major political forces to work with. There were only separate "families", each concerned primarily to maintain its own social position or to better it, pursuing its ends not by cooperating with other groups, but by attaching itself to some higher power in hopes of rising above and so displacing other groups. People on all social levels were inclined to see the state in the image of their own local societies, as a gigantic hierarchy of persons rather than an institutionalized negotiation between groups each united by common interests or purposes. In 1613, on the one occasion when the responsible leaders of Russian society exerted themselves on their own initiative to restore the unity of their country after a period of foreign invasions and acute domestic disorders, they had simply restored the hierarchy largely as it had been: they installed the Romanov dynasty. That they made no serious attempt to draw up law codes or set up institutions that would represent their separate interests and negotiate between them is a clear indication that there was no basis for such laws or institutions in Russian social experience.

Lacking any system of de facto legal relationships, the Russian state has had to negotiate directly with family-type groups to achieve its ends. It has offered the rewards of political influence and economic power to the social groups which could best serve its purposes. just as the Western European states have done. In a hierarchical society, however, to offer a reward to one group—or rather to its head is per se to punish another, in a zero-sum game. Any extension of political influence to a particular servitor is likely to disrupt the existing hierarchical structure; and since the argument revolves around social position rather than interests, there is little room for compromise. New arrangements that would satisfy all parties and the state as well are not likely to emerge from squabbles over hierarchical position. The social conflicts that plagued the Russian state were therefore qualitatively different from those that produced the Western legal systems. Conscious interests did not produce new legal relationships that would lend stability to society, but only a perpetual struggle between "families" whose heads were in favor and those whose heads were being shunted aside. Civil wars and rebellions did not involve the clash of interests so much as widespread struggles for position between members of hierarchies and outcasts.13

¹² Two excellent descriptions of government interaction with society in Western Europe prior to the industrial revolution are F. O. Hertz, The Development of the German Public Mind, 2 vols. (London, 1957, 1962); and G. T. Matthews, The Royal General Farms in Eighteenth Century France (New York, 1958).

¹³ The later peasant uprisings of the period 1900-1917 and the widespread workers' strikes of about the same period are the only cases of mass violence in Russian history in which a significant part of the trouble stemmed from conflicts between social groups each identified by common interests other than status position. Even in these years, whenever revolutionary violence reached its height the social classes whose interests were jeopardized hastened to identify themselves with the government rather than to compel the government to accept their demands. Western European states, on the other hand, prior to the 1920s, characteristically responded to crises by making significant concessions to the social elements that could support them the most effectively. The October Manifesto of 1905 was, of course, a concession by the Imperial government to the dominant social classes in Russia, and as such it is unique in Russian history. Nevertheless, the government cancelled it out within two years by openly violating its guarantees—and this with the general approbation of the very classes to whom it had been a concession. The cancellation, not the Manifesto, proved to be lasting. The "ruling classes" were still more concerned to be in-groups than to struggle for their interests. Both the landowning gentry and the business and industrial leaders threw themselves behind the central government from 1905 on and became, in effect, parts of its organization. See R. Roosa, "Russian Industrialists Look to the Future: Thoughts on Social interaction in Russia before the Revolution was far less a dynamic force for social change than in the West. In all modern states the government has had both to keep order and to foster progress; and in all states this has involved the government in contradictions. In Russia, the contradiction has been extreme. Keeping order has meant preserving static hierarchies; fostering progress has meant breaking them down and, inadvertently, forming new ones still as helplessly attached to the state as their predecessors. Until the last century, Russian society did not itself progress toward closer unity. Its people did not grow significantly more conscious of their dependence on each other but only clung to their habitual relationships. When the state fostered progress, therefore, it was in effect imposing goals of economic achievement and social reform upon its people which were formulated apart from their conscious needs and their traditions. The tsar from time to time tried to insert foreign methods, organizations, legal systems, and even ethical values into a reluctant society in order to establish workable legal and economic relationships with the people and among them, but his efforts, however successful, also served thereby to alienate the state from society and to disrupt society itself.

II

The domestic aims of Russian government have derived basically from the peculiar role it has played in Russian society. The government has taken form primarily as an instrument for the tsar (and later, the party secretary) to use in order to direct the energies of the people toward the alien goals he and his supporters have selected for them. A Soviet and tsarist

Economic Development, 1906–1917," in J. S. Curtiss, ed., Essays in Russian and Soviet History (New York, 1963), pp. 198–218, for a survey of the attitudes of the industrial leaders. No systematic study of gentry attitudes in this period exists, but evidence is plentiful showing their wholehearted support of the state's interest as if it were their own. See D. N. Shipov, Vospominaniia i dumy o perezhitom (Moscow, 1918), pp. 501–31; S. I. Shidlovskii, Vospominaniia, 2 vols. (Berlin, 1923), I, 130–218; and the programs set forth by various gentry groups in 1906 in B. B. Veselovskii, ed., Agrarnyi vopros v Sovete Ministrov, 1906 g. (Moscow, 1924), pp. 23–7, 152–3.

¹⁴ The distinction between the government's role in social development in Russia and in Western Europe is pointed out in Kavelin, cited above, n. 10, and in D. P. Troshchinskii, "Zapiska Dmitriia Prokofevicha Troshchinskogo ob uch-statesmen alike have generally regarded themselves as preservers of their people's "freedom." They have always assumed in practice that society by itself was not free, that individual subjects were unable to protect their own interests except by appealing to persons in power. Russian society until lately has been, in their eyes, only an interminable and aimless squabbling among narrow, selfish family-type, hierarchical groups with no broader aim than to put other groups down so that they might rise higher themselves. In such a milieu only the ruler and his favorites have stood for "freedom." They have consistently believed that their personal power has been the only vital force for social order, economic progress, popular morality, and all the other good things that Americans and Russians alike are fond of associating with freedom. 16 It is not surprising, therefore, that the main political concern of Russia's leaders has been to make the central government organization a more effective instrument for the exercise of power. Liberalization, in the sense of a surrender of the tsar's authority to institutions purporting to represent public opinion, has only very rarely been a practical aim among Russian statesmen.17 rezhdennii ministerstv," Sbornik Imperatorskogo Istoricheskogo Obshchestva (148 vols., St. Petersburg, 1867-1917), III (1868), 45-58, 86-7 (see below, n. 22).

15 M. Cherniavsky, Tsar and People (New Haven, 1961), pp. 84-8, argues that the Russians conceived of the tsar as a source of law in himself; his personal will was above society, whereas in Europe the most absolute of monarchs derived most of his power from an extant traditional legal framework (pp. 26-9). The tsars, like the European monarchs, claimed to be the preservers of the law (see, e.g., Ivan IV's charge to the ecclesiastical assembly of 1551 in Le Stoglav, Paris, 1920, pp. 14-25), but in fact there was not much law to preserve.

16 E.g., K. Pobedonostsev, Reflections of a Russian Statesman (London, 1898), pp. 254-62. It has been a communist dogma that the power of the party leaders is equivalent to the people's freedom. See History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolsheriks), Short Course (Moscow, 1951), pp. 79-82.

17 Many statesmen have recognized that Russia needed legal and constitutional reforms before her people could be "free," but even these functioned from day to day in absolute dependence on the ruler, and they have recognized the necessity for his supremacy until such time as law was in fact developed. P. A. Valuev, Minister of Internal Affairs from 1861 to 1868, is a good example. He

Most American authorities say otherwise. The current version of Russian history exhibits several rulers, notably Catherine II, Alexander I and Alexander II, who are supposed to have been liberal at one time or another during their reigns. 18 But there is no basis for this interpretation. All Russia's rulers have desired to develop a system of law that would establish justice among their people, but none has ever thought that such a system already existed or that all his people possessed rights of their own as individuals apart from what the state power allowed. Every ruler has been aware that rights apart from state power were in Russia only individual privileges, and that where they did have force, they did not make anyone "free." Catherine granted the gentry their land as private property in 1785, but this was a grant more than a right. She and her successors hoped that the gentry would someday become citizens whose consciousness of right carried with it a consciousness of duty, but no tsar ever believed that that day had arrived in his own time. Catherine never suggested that she was only recognizing a right that the gentry already possessed naturally.19 Alexander I's schemes in the early nineteenth century were all directed primarily to the improvement of the government's executive organization,20 and so were may have been limited in his intellectual horizons and his policies were not always enlightened, but he was generally realistic and relatively straightforward. His diary (Dnevnik, 2 vols., Moscow, 1961, 1964) shows him often in profound disagreement with Alexander II and with what he himself had to do, yet never wavering in his conviction that the tsar's absolute power was indispensable for the government of his day. His conviction seems to have been constantly reinforced by his day-to-day experience in the government service (see P. A. Zaionchkovskii's introduction to vol. I of Dnevnik, pp. 20-1, 26-32; and Valuev's own entries for 13-14 April 1861, pp. 97-101). On 14 April Valuev conversed with Prince Dolgorukii on the need for a constitution in Russia. Dolgorukii said that Russia needed a constitution but that the tsar was opposed to it; then he asked Valuev what he thought should be done. Valuev replied, "Wait in loval submissiveness until the tsar changes his mind" (p. 101).

¹⁸ See, e.g., A. Mazour, Rise and Fall of the Romanovs (Princeton, N. J., 1960), pp. 72, 89, 108-11.

¹⁹ V. Leontovitsch, Geschichte des Liberalismus in Russland (Frankfurt-am-Main, 1957), pp. 25– 36; and N. M. Korkunov, Russkoe gosudarstvennoe pravo, 2 vols. (St. Petersburg, 1909), II, 435–7.

20 Leontovitsch, op. cit., pp. 43-100.

Alexander II's local autonomous institutions.²¹ Seen from the government's point of view, even the emancipation of the serfs was an administrative reform. Alexander II's purpose was not to recognize the peasants' liberties or even to grant them. He and his statesmen simply wanted to govern them more effectively. If these rulers are to be termed liberal, we should also have to speak of the liberal years of Ivan IV, Peter I, Nicholas I, Alexander III, and Josef Stalin, all of whom devoted their lives to improving the government organization so that it could bring the Russian people "freedom" more effectively.

No Russian ruler has ever willingly considered the outright surrender of state power to institutions apart from the central government's executive organization. Russian legal convictions have tended to keep society fragmented rather than to unite it. Social groups have devoted their separate efforts to fortifying their own narrow traditions, not to the development of a legal system based on abstract principles common to all Russia. The tsars (and the party secretaries after them) have dreamed of developing a unity of convictions and practices among their people from which a coherent legal system could be derived, but they have realized that such a system could not be based directly on the existing family-type institutions of Russian society.²² Power surrendered to family-

²¹ Korkunov, op. cit., II, 533-4, discusses the purpose of the zemstvoes and city dumas. P. A. Zaionchkovskii, Provedenie v zhizn krestianskoi reformy 1861 g. (Moscow, 1958), pp. 93-9, describes the organs of peasant government, especially their relation to the central administration.

²² See Troshchinskii, op. cit., above, n. 14. Troshchinskii was a high-level official from about 1793 until his retirement in 1817. He disagreed with the prevailing tendencies in the administration of his time, chiefly the innovations of Michael Speranskii; but his view of Russian society was common among both innovators and conservatives in the government. He said that Russian society possessed no effective political institutions and had no basis for developing them except the power of the tsar. Only the tsar could furnish the necessary leadership to develop the institutions of a modern legal system in Russia. For some comparable Soviet views regarding the role of the ruler in Russia see J. Hazard, The Soviet Legal System, 3 vols. (New York, 1962), I, 5-12.

It is true that the tsars made many attempts to divide the government into regional units, but none of these were founded on existing social institutions, and in any case they all failed, primarily because regional administrators were as type, hierarchical groups has been in effect power lost to the state and unity lost to the nation.

In the past two centuries the only politically significant Russia-wide organizations have been the Orthodox church, the central government, and, since 1917, the communist party. They have all been for the most part clusters of family groups, hierarchies of personal status joined to each other in a similarly hierarchical order, so that the whole of each organization has been in essence a network of personal influence, seemingly rigid but easily corrupted and manipulated in practice. Government, church and party alike have been united chiefly by liturgy and ritual, not by a rationally consistent system of law recognized by the members as legitimate in itself.23 Only exceptionally has any functioning organization in Russia been able, at least until very recently, to operate within a system based on abstract legal principles. Law in practice has been largely a matter of status structures. Villages, guilds, towns, government ministries, revolutionary groups, and regiments alike have always tended to isolate themselves into "families."24

The isolated hierarchies that have made up traditional Russian society cannot be dismissed as merely the products of ignorance and stupid-wont to form separate family groups as anyone else in Russia. B. Rauch, Russland (Munich, 1953), describes the various attempts by Russia's rulers to create federalist systems.

²³ The characteristics of Orthodox Church organization are described in E. Benz, The Eastern Orthodox Church (New York, 1963), pp. 43-7, 202-8. Fainsod, Smolensk, op. cit., discusses "family groups" in communist organization in the 1920s and 1930s and J. D. Littlepage, In Search of Soviet Gold (New York, 1937), pp. 8, 13, 42, 160-2, gives examples of status hierarchies in Soviet industrial organization. M. Raeff, "The Russian Autocracy and its Officials," in H. McLean et al., eds., Russian Thought and Politics (Harvard Slavic Studies, Vol. 4, Cambridge, Mass., 1957), pp. 77-91, describes the hierarchies in the tsarist government prior to 1861.

²⁴ N. I. Lazareskii, Lektsii po russkomu gosudarstvennomu pravu (2 vols., St. Petersburg, 1910), I, 103–261, esp. p. 210. Max Weber has described the evolution of the modern legal system in Western Europe out of older, family-type forms. See Max Weber on Law in Economy and Society (Cambridge, Mass., 1954). To use his terms, Russian administrators have tended to organize themselves into a "formal-irrational" system even though the terms and ideals of the written laws have been largely "formal-rational."

ity. On the contrary, they have represented valid organizational forms in a country where neither legal system nor effective, consistent law enforcement has ever existed for the mass of the people nor for the government itself. Personal bonds have furnished the only available guarantee of unity and solidarity against a hostile world full of bandits, indifferent and oppressive landlord-owners, and ruthless government agents. The government officials themselves have generally formed hierarchies of personal status within their organization in order to protect their positions against arbitrary superiors. Family-type groups have persisted up to recent times on all levels of society because they have constituted the best way for individual Russians to cope with the realities they have faced. Chekhov's metaphor of the ocean steamer portrays these realities as the Russians experienced them more vividly than any scholarly analysis could do:

... there is darkness and disorder. Tall waves are making an uproar for no reason. Each one of them as you look at it is trying to rise higher than all the rest and to chase and crush its neighbor; it is thunderously attacked by a third wave that has a gleeming white mane and is just as ferocious and ugly.

The sea has neither sense nor pity. If the steamer had been smaller, not made of thick iron plates, the waves would have crushed it without the slightest remorse, and would have devoured all the people in it without distinguishing between saints and sinners. The steamer's expression was equally senseless and cruel. This beaked monster presses forward, cutting millions of waves in its path; it fears neither darkness nor the wind, nor space, nor solitude—it's all child's play for it, and if the ocean had its population, this monster would crush it, too, without distinguishing between saints and sinners.²⁵

The deep-seated and continuing tendency toward forming personal hierarchies has forced all Russian statesmen to pursue mutually contradictory aims. On the one hand the ruler and his agents have had to do the daily work of maintaining the state without any reliable legal system to direct them, beyond orders from superiors to subordinates. On the other, they have tried to establish or discover workable, mutually consistent laws that would guide the actual practice of the government administrators and the people. Tsars and party secretaries alike have regarded a coherent system of law as an essential means to secure their power and to carry out their policies. But because daily operation has had to proceed through a hierarchy of personal influence whose customary ways have kept it disunited rather than united, central authority has had to be itself arbitrary in order to be effective at any particular time. Government officials on all levels have had to disrupt the rules they have been ordered to uphold simply to get the necessary work done. The tsars and party secretaries have themselves set the example for arbitrary rule by frequently violating their own decrees.²⁶

²⁵ From "Gusev," in The Portable Chekhov (New York, 1947), p. 265.

The edicts of the Russian state, although duly recorded for the last two or three centuries as laws of the land, have rarely been more in fact than temporary regulations applicable at best only to a single locale or government office. As permanent statutes, they have often obstructed the unification of the Russian legal system. Hierarchical groups within the administration have been able to protect themselves against the vigor of reforming statesmen by citing clauses from past decrees, long since inoperative. Would-be reformers have had either to ignore the law entirely or to issue new orders to cancel the old ones, in which case they have upset whatever regularity had developed in practice. New commands have served only to accomplish specific, immediate purposes. New statutes have constituted only statements of purpose-ideals to be achieved in the future and experimental attempts to achieve them rather than operational rules.27

²⁶ Troshchinskii, pp. 56-65, 86-8. S. Dobrin, "Soviet Jurisprudence and Socialism," Law Quarterly Review, Vol. 52 (July, 1936), pp. 402-24, shows that this contradiction has carried over into the Soviet period. Soviet statesmen generally avoid any explicit reference to it, but their habit of demanding legal procedure while simultaneously violating it themselves is well known. The outstanding example was A. Ia. Vyshinskii, who in 1937 was conducting the infamous purge trials with one hand while strenuously working for the observance of law in the government administration with the other. See G. Morgan, Soviet Administrative Legality (Stanford, 1962), pp. 91-116, esp. p. 112.

²⁷ Druzhinin, op. cit., II, 77-8, has shown that this was true of Kiselev's reform legislation of 1837-1838. Lenin said that he used decrees as experiments during the civil war years; see his speech before the Eighth Party Congress in 1919, quoted in S. N. Frokopovich, The Economic Condition of Soviet Russia (London, 1924), pp. 13-4. Hazard calls the constitution of 1918 a "statement of lofty aims" rather than a "set of rules," op cit., I, 27, and it is clear from Morgan's account, cited

For about five hundred years, since the time when the church persuaded the Grand Duke of Moscow to act consistently as a statesman, the government of Russia has been at cross purposes with itself. The ruler has had only two procedures available to him for the effective exercise of his power. At times he has worked through the hierarchies, respecting and guaranteeing their customary ways and privileges, while at other times he has attacked them, breaking them down by his arbitrary power and replacing their members with new men, more responsive to his wishes. Not infrequently, he has utilized both methods in combination. The periodic purges of government servitors since the late fifteenth century have been drastic and far-reaching applications of the latter approach. But purges by themselves have worked no constructive reforms in government organization. They could never eliminate personal hierarchies as such; on the contrary, the arbitrary exercise of force compels men to seek the protection of personal influence with redoubled urgency.

In the absence of consistent laws and regulations, government servitors in Russia have almost never formed anything resembling a rational network of operating relationships among themselves extending throughout the government organization. Servitors on the lowest echelon of both tsarist and Soviet governments—those men who have actually collected the taxes, assembled recruits for the army, built schools and roads, run factories and the like—have had to deal with people isolated above, n. 26, that statutory laws in the Soviet Union have often been ideals rather than norms, op. cit., pp. 49-53, 73-5, 96-116. Michael Speranskii, who did more, perhaps, than any other man to bring law to Russia, explained the difficulties involved in a series of memoranda printed in Proekty i zapiski (Moscow, 1961), especially pp. 17-28. Speranskii was primarily responsible for the publication of the first Svod Zakonov (Digest of Laws) in Russia in 1833, after almost thirty years of work. He in turn based his studies on more than a century of previous attempts by various commissions, elected and appointed, to organize Russian law into a coherent system. Even with all this preparation, Speranskii denied that the product of his efforts was really a code. See N. M. Korkunov, "Znachenie svoda zakonov," Zhurnal Ministerstva Narodnogo Prosveshcheniia (Sept., 1894), reprinted in his Sbornik statei (St. Petersburg, 1898), pp. 77-96; and V. Gribowski's review of this article in the Zhurnal Iuridicheskogo obshchestva pri imperatorskom S-Petersburgskom universitete (January, 1895), pp. 4-6.

from one another by their traditions. A government agent who has confined himself strictly to following the formal regulations of his superiors has had to violate the existing order among those subject to him, thereby increasing the difficulties involved in accomplishing his tasks. Normally, therefore, the agent has worked through the hierarchies as he has found them among his "subjects" or subordinates and he has even made efforts to preserve them, which is to say that he has become a part of them. In cases where an especially strong official has usurped the places of established leaders among his "subjects" or subordinates and forcibly replaced them with men more willing to carry out his orders, he has not created a system that could operate by a set of formal regulations but only a new hierarchy of persons with himself at its head. Strong and vigorous leaders have been governed by the crude necessities of their power rather than the dictates of tradition, but they have still had to act as members of local hierarchies, not as the agencies of a rationally consistent system.

These contradictions have communicated themselves to successively higher levels of the administration and ultimately to the ruler himself. Officials on all echelons have had to cope with a hodge-podge of personal hierarchies, operating according to a wide variety of customs and necessities. Whatever purposes or goals Russia's leading statesmen have pursued, hierarchical groups have generally been the only available means for pursuing them. In a real sense, then, the rulers of Russia have been trapped by their own government organization. They have had the power to enact regulations but never to enforce them as such. Laws they have published in great profusion, but a system of legal relations has been slow to develop.28

During the last several decades of the tsarist regime, convictions regarding the individual rights of all citizens did develop among the gentry and some of the "upper middle class." Legal institutions emerged or began to be established which reflected a Russia-wide social consciousness. Nevertheless, no more than ten to fifteen per cent of the population experienced this development. For the peasant masses, law remained essentially a random mixture of local custom and arbitrary force, and in the years prior to World War I local custom was rapidly breaking down.²⁹ With the peasants in turmoil, the tsarist administration continued to regard itself as necessarily above any legal system, constituting an all-powerful and impartial arbiter apart from the factions and classes of society—the guardian and director of its people and the keystone of the Russian nation. The legal system, said the statesmen, was not yet strong enough in itself to eliminate the need for arbitrary power. Paradoxically, the need for the exercise of arbitrary power increased in Russia at the very time when a modern legal order seemed on the point of being successfully established.

The traditional keystone of the Russian state itself proved vulnerable to the personal weakness of the tsar, and in March 1917 it disappeared. A government based entirely on legal relationships tried to replace it, but the factions and classes had not yet developed institutions that could cooperate effectively on their own under the stress of war. The old contradiction between the necessity for action and the striving for legal system became suddenly very sharp, and at last it became clear that only force could restore order. The attempt to govern Russia under law collapsed in November 1917.³¹ entered into the peasant way of life by the end of the tsarist regime. B. S. Martynov, Poniatie zemleustroistva (St. Petersburg, 1917), describes the difficulties involved in establishing legal definitions of ownership among the peasantry. S. N. Dubrowski, Die Bauernbewegung in der russischen Revolution, 1917 (Berlin, 1929), pp. 37-62, describes peasant violence in the years before 1914.

³⁰ E.g., P. A. Stolypin's speech of 1 April 1911 to the State Council, in E. V. [erpakhovskaia], Gosudarstvennaia deiatelnost P. A. Stolypina (3 vols., St. Petersburg 1911), II, 150.

31 P. P. Gronsky and N. J. Astrov, The War and the Russian Government (New Haven, 1929), furnishes a useful chronicle of government organization up to November 1917. The sudden collapse of Russian society in 1917 reflects the flimsiness of social order in Russia and the tensions which still plagued the newly industrializing economy. Between 1917 and 1920 a number of generals and liberal politicians called upon the "Russian people" to overthrow the communists and restore some facsimile of legitimate order. Their appeal would seem to have been reasonable. The communists were in fact usurpers: they forced the Constituent Assembly, the legally elected representatives of the people, to disband. Nevertheless, throughout all Russia there was almost no response to the generals' appeal except from the non-Russian nationalities, and these ²⁸ Lazarevskii, II, 158; Troshchinskii, pp. 37-41.

²⁹ V. I. Boshko, Grazhdanskaia pravosposobnost krestian v oblasti zemlevladeniia (Kiev, 1917), gives some idea of the degree to which legal system had

III

The years 1917-1920 saw a phenomenon very close to total social collapse in Russia. Nicholas II abdicated, removing not only himself but, in the absence of a suitable heir, the institution of tsardom as well. Within a few months, the classes which had attached themselves to the ideal of a Russian nation under a common legal system lost their hold on the armed crowds that dominated the cities. Factories shut down, railroad traffic dwindled, and the cities lost half their population. Russian society came close to dissolution, and the state would probably have been scattered into a number of League mandates, had not a few ruthless leaders acted to preserve it. Inevitably, the new order that they constructed was in effect a crude hierarchy, utterly without legal system, whose desperate leaders could pull Russian society together only by taking measures which alienated them from it. The new communist rulers relied almost wholly on arbitrary force to sustain their power. They dragooned indifferent peasants into their hastily formed armies, forced hostile servitors from the tsarist regime to staff their administration, and marshalled even their own party into a ruthless band held together only by a chain of personal influence. No one, not even party members, could act effectively except under compulsion were only trying to get free of Russia, not to restore her. In Russia proper almost no one voluntarily attacked the communists and almost no one supported them. In fact, the "Russian people" did not care who ruled Russia nor did they care what happened to their elected representatives. See D. Footman, Civil War in Russia (New York, 1962), pp. 49-55, 104-11, 139-42, 303.

In Finland the native communists also forced out the elected Diet and seized power, but here the result was quite different. General Mannerheim, who was no more nor less reactionary than the Russian White Army leaders, found himself at the head of a united and aggressive volunteer army made up largely of Finnish peasants actively concerned over who was ruling them. Within four months he was able to drive out the communists and restore legitimate government. He had German help, but it was no more significant than what the Allies gave the Russian White armies. In Finland, then, the tsar's abdication did not seriously weaken society as such, whereas in Russia it represented in fact the removal of a keystone. See C. Mannerheim, Memoirs of Marshal Mannerheim (New York, 1954), pp. 130-83; and C. Smith, Finland and the Russian Revolution (Athens, Ga., 1958), p. 211.

In social chaos, no one could decide rationally and no one could agree. There were only those who were courageous enough to command and those desperate enough to obey. Within a few months after they seized power, even the most capable and devoted communist leaders had fallen to bickering among themselves and attacking one another with such intensity that only a strong and arbitrary commander could hold them together. They found themselves tied fast to each other by their struggle for survival and yet unable to work together effectively. Utterly dependent on one another and yet utterly without the habits of active cooperation and mutual trust, they clung to Lenin, as their own subordinates clung to them, with a fervent desperation.32

Since 1917 the communist party has had to contend with much the same contradictions that plagued the tsars. Its leaders have had to build up Russia's defenses against enemies so powerful that their failure to crush the Soviet government at the outset surprised Lenin himself. Like the tsars, the party leaders have worked feverishly to develop Russia's military and economic strength and in so doing have brought viclent upheaval to the narrow hierarchies in which they and their people have lived. It is not surprising, therefore, that despite the communists' devotion to Marxist principles, they adopted the most arbitrary of the old tsarist methods of governing immediately upon seizing power.³³ The democracy of the Soviets disappeared within the first year. Democratic centralism in the party organization gave way to a centralized hierarchy, whose power the party itself sanctioned in March 1921.34 Stalin definitively renounced the equalitarian ideal in 1931.

Until the last decade, the communists have controlled their government largely through picked agents possessing broad and ill-defined powers, responsible directly to the center.

³² A. Adams, Bolsheviks in the Ukraine (New Haven, 1963), portrays the emergence of essentially hierarchical relationships among the Bolshevik leaders out of the actions they understook in the Civil War. In general these relationships seem to have developed against the will of the leaders themselves. See esp. pp. v-viii, 28, 116-27.

33 Morgan, op. cit., pp. 22-3.

³⁴ A good chronicle of the early disappearance of democracy and the growth of a hierarchy of personal rule in both government and party emerges from Sverdlov's speeches and dispatches. See the last two volumes of I. M. Sverdlov, Izbrannye proizvedenniia (3 vols., Moscow, 1959).

These agents have worked outside the operating government organization in order to be in a position to enforce the orders of the leaders directly. Such have been the party commissars, the party control commissions, the workers' and peasants' inspectorate, the procuracy, and above all, the secret police. Until recently, this host of arbitrary supervisors has been practically the only means of direction and control available to the Soviet leaders. Only arbitrary power on all levels could cope with the hierarchical groups that formed in all the operating departments of the executive administration, and only they could furnish the center with anything approaching reliable information.

In their time, the tsars had utilized special agents vested personally with arbitrary and undefined powers. By the early 1800s, if not before, such agents as the oprichniki, the procurators, the revizorii, and the governorsgeneral had gained a permanent place in Russian political thought. The writings of Michael Speranskii-a liberalizer according to the view of Russian history now in vogue-offer a convincing account of how to use all-powerful agents, a description of the circumstances under which they should be used, and a warning as to the disadvantages of using them.35 But the most tyrannical of the tsars never set up anything so extensive as the incredible accumulation of secret and semi-secret inspectorates which guided Soviet administration in its first four decades.

IV

Rarely has history furnished such a clear demonstration of the force of state necessity as the Bolshevik revolution and its aftermath. It cannot be imagined that the communist rulers gave the lie to their ideals and aspirations willingly. Their words, their early, abortive attempts to introduce communist institutions, their continued bickering to the present day over the details of what they are pleased to call Marxism-Leninism, are clear proof that they still cherish their old dreams. Indeed, they are still communist insofar as their necessities have allowed them to be. Yet in practice they have junked most of their professed ideals and surrendered themselves utterly to the superhuman task of putting together and governing a shattered Russia. They are, of course, still working toward a society where every man regards it as a virtue to give what he can and take only what he needs. They call this Marxist and so it is; but Marx shared this particular ideal with such eminent economic liberals as Jeremy Bentham, John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, and Samuel Smiles, to name only a few. 36 It is in fact little more than an ethic common and necessary to all societies possessing modern economic organization, whatever their political systems. The communist vision of the ideal man is not so different from the "bourgeois" ethical notions which have been vital to Western capitalism. except that Russian "communism," contrary to both Marxian and Western liberal prescriptions, calls for the state to take the lead in remaking the Russian people in the image of this ideal man.37 But this, of course, is precisely what the Russian state has been consciously trying to do for over two centuries.

The circumstances in which Russia's leading statesmen have had to work make it clear why liberalization in the Western sense of the word has never been relevant to Russian development. The state has had to organize itself in accordance with necessity rather than Russia's social institutions. The government's very action to unify its organization has been characteristically arbitrary, and its own action has served inadvertently to perpetuate the traditional hierarchical fragmentation of Russian society. Russia's failure to liberalize, then, has not resulted from the ignorance and mental rigidity of her rulers, any more than the failure of Russian society to unite itself represents some inherent deficiency in the people. Both "failures" spring from the peculiar circumstances of Russia's historical development. which have set government and society in a unique relationship to one another.

If the main problem of Russian government has always been that the executive organization could not operate within a consistent legal system, then it is obvious that removing the arbitrary ruler and replacing him with an elected president or legislative assembly would at no time have made any relevant contribution to Russian development. In fact, an elected legislature in a society traditionally broken down into hierarchical fragments is most likely to become the tool of a single privileged group, freezing the government itself into an immovable hierarchy without liberating anyone at all.38 Until such a time as Russian

- 36 J. Bentham, The Principles of Morals and Legislation (New York, Hafner Publishing Co., 1961), pp. 3-4; J. S. Mill, On Liberty (Chicago, Henry Regnery, 1949), pp. 95-6; and S. Smiles, Self-Help (New York, n.d.), pp. 293-7.
- ²⁷ J. Triska, ed., Soviet Communism: Programs and Rules (San Francisco, 1962), pp. 112-3.
- 38 S. N. Eisenstact, The Political Systems of Empires (Glencoe, Ill., 1963), pp. 13-27.

³⁵ Speranskii, loc. cit., n. 27, pp. 80-1, 105-25.

society became unified by its own of life, laws passed by an elected assembly could have had no more effect than the ruler's decrees.³⁹ Indeed, the relation between government and society in Russia has been such that only an absolute personal authority has been able to hold it together.

Quite without foundation, however, is the argument that since Russian government has not been liberalizing, it has therefore not been changing or developing at all. Obviously tsarist and Soviet rulers have both wanted to base their regimes in a rationally consistent law that actually would govern the everyday life of the people and regulate the government, a condition which would approximate that of Western society, but which, doubtless, would embody very different political forms. The communist party has been striving to find roots in Russian society by developing legal relationships among its people, just as the tsarist government did in its time and for the same reasons.

Rule by arbitrary force is inherently disruptive and therefore dangerous for any government that employs it.40 The rulers of Russia, especially the communists, have used force and violence against their own subordinates and by so doing have strengthened the very hierarchies which have made a coherent administration impossible; but this has never been by choice. Those scholars and emigrés who imagine that Soviet leaders use purges and spies purposely in order to inspire distrust among their subjects and their subordinates have either failed or simply refused to recognize the traditional fragmentation of Russian society.41 No sane statesman has ever desired to alienate his people by terror or any other means except as an expedient measure against groups which actually block government action or threaten the statesman's own position. The alienation of the citizenry has never increased the power of a state, but only rendered both rulers and ruled more desperate. Arbitrary force—specifically the use of all-powerful inspectors, purges, and spies—is in any case a very clumsy method of control. Secret police and trusted men are not by themselves an adequate means for securing information and directing subordinate agencies, especially in a modern industrial society. As Speranskii pointed out long ago, if such men make only brief visits to the agencies they are assigned to inspect, then they will not have time to find out what is really going on. If they stay long, they themselves become part of the "family" and cease to be effective as agents and informants for the rulers.42 Government by purely arbitrary power is only useful to a ruler who, like Machiavelli's usurper, possesses no other means of control.

38 Korkunov, op. cit., I, 417-50.

What actually does develop in Russia will not be a matter of what Soviet leaders want to do but rather what they can do under the circumstances, internal and external, which they face. The technical requirements of maintaining a massive industrial plant, the effects of widespread education, the coming to maturity of new generations born into a modern society unified by economic interdependence and a sense of collective accomplishment-all have had and will continue to have their effects on the old struggle between rulers and people. The results are impossible to predict, because the process of change is inherently contradictory and subject to both global and domestic circumstances, but Americans might come closer to understanding what the Soviet leaders are about if they direct their attention more to the circumstances confronting the Russian state and less to distorting their observations to fit their preconceptions. American political theory, which is concerned primarily with rendering a government administration powerless in itself, is irrelevant to the attempts of Russian statesmen to erect and maintain an effective state organization that can unite a people who have never been themselves a nation.43 Whatever Russia may become, she will not be likely either to follow or to deny the principles of Thomas Jefferson. Her statesmen will simply ignore them as they always have and go on trying to find Russia's own course.

42 Speranskii, loc. cit., pp. 105-6.

⁴⁰ Speranskii, loc. cit., pp. 56-67.

⁴¹ J. D. Littlepage's description of Russian behavior patterns, based on his experience as a mining engineer in the Soviet Union, shows the effects of this fragmentation on Soviet organization at all levels during the early 1930s. See his In Search of Soviet Gold, cited above, n. 23.

⁴³ V. Weidle, Russia: Absent and Present (New York, 1961), pp. 34-7; Cherniavsky, op. cit., pp. 71-96.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF VOID BALLOTS IN WEST GERMAN ELECTIONS*

RODNEY P. STIEFBOLD Columbia University

In the 1961 federal election six per cent of West German voters failed to cast two valid votes under the single-ballot, two-vote German electoral system: 1.3 million voters cast their party list vote invalidly, while almost one million failed to vote validly for a district candidate. Since 1949—and 1953, when the present single-ballot, two-vote system was introduced—the development of the invalid vote has been as shown in Table I.

TABLE I. DEVELOPMENT OF THE INVALID VOTE IN GERMANY, 1949–1961²

Year	First V	otes	Second Vo	Second Votes
•	Number	Per cent	Number	Per cent	Per cent
1949			763,216	3.1
1953	959,790	3.4	928,278	3.3	5.1
1957	916,680	3.0	1,167,466	3.8	5.7
1961	845,158	2.6	1,298,723	4.0	6.1

Not only has the total invalid vote increased steadily, despite the counter-movement of first

* I am indebted to Professor Otto Kirchheimer for his encouragement and advice in the preparation of this article, and to Professor Juan Linz for his critical reading of an earlier draft.

¹ The German ballot consists of a single sheet of paper on which are printed two parallel columns of contestants. Each voter casts a first vote from the column on the left side of the ballot for the party-sponsored or independent candidate whom he favors in his local election district; and casts a second vote from the right-hand column for the Land (state) list of the political party which he favors nationally. His two votes need not coincide and need not both be exercised. Since each vote is tallied separately, an invalid vote in one column does not invalidate the vote in the other column. For a detailed description of Germany's mixed system of "personalized proportional representation," see Uwe Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics: A Study of the 1957 Campaign (London, Oxford University Press, 1960), pp. 17-37.

² Based on official publications of: Germany (Federal Republic), Statistisches Bundesamt, and second vote trends; it has also been exceptionally high in comparison to the Weimar Republic, Imperial Germany and other Western European countries. Thus in pre-Hitler Germany the invalid vote seldom exceeded 1 per cent of the poll. In postwar parliamentary elections in Scandinavia it has not yet exceeded 1 per cent while in Britain, Switzerland and Austria it has approached 2 per cent only in rare instances. In Fourth and Fifth Republic France spoiled and blank ballots have been constant at about 3 per cent of the poll. Only in isolated cases—for example, where compulsory voting is combined with a deep-seated social and political malaise, as in Belgium—has the invalid vote been comparable in proportion to that of Western Germany.3 Yet comparison Wiesbaden (hereafter referred to as "Bundesamt"). Data for the 1949, 1953 and 1957 elections appeared as Statistik der Bundesrepublik Deutschland, Vol. 10 (1949); Vol. 100, Nos. 1-2 (1953); and Vol. 200, Nos. 1-4 (1957). Data for the 1961 election appeared in the new electoral series, under Fachserie A: Bevoelkerung und Kultur, Reihe 8, Wahl zum Deutschen Bundestag, as Wahl zum 4. Deutschen Bundestag vom 17. September 1961, Nos. 1-4. (Hereafter these documents will be cited as "Bundesamt: 1949." "Bundesamt: 1953 (2)," etc.). For a detailed bibliography of official electoral statistics published by the Bundesamt and state statistical offices, see Bundesamt: 1961(1), pp. 59-67. A useful compilation of federal and state election statistics, 1946-1960, is contained in Erwin Faul, ed., Wahlen und Waehler in Westdeutschland (Villingen-Schwarzwald, Ring-Verlag, 1960), pp. 321-363.

German invalid vote data for 1871-1919 are found in Germany, Statistisches Reichsamt, Statistisches Jahrbuch fuer das Deutsche Reich, Vol. 42 (Berlin, 1921/22), pp. 354-355; and for 1919-1932, ibid., Vol. 52 (Berlin, 1933), p. 539. Some comparative data are given by Richard M. Scammon, "Postwar Elections and Electoral Processes," in E. H. Litchfield, ed., Governing Postwar Germany (Ithaca, N.Y., Cornell University Press, 1953), p. 505. For France see David B. Goldey, "The French Referendum and Election of 1962: The National Campaigns," Political Studies, Vol. 11 (October, 1963), p. 302; and Philip Williams, Politics in Post-War France (2d here seems problematic, for in the Federal Republic voting is voluntary, social cohesion high, and the political temperature low; indeed, never before in this century have social calm and political consensus appeared so broad or deep.

ed., New York, Longmans, 1958), p. 324 and pp. 446-447.

Comparative data on invalid votes in parliamentary elections in fifteen Western European countries since 1945 are found in the appendix on post-war election statistics in Uwe Kitzinger, Britain, Europe and Beyond: Essays in European Politics (Leyden, A. W. Sythoff, 1964), pp. 183-217. See also Kitzinger's discussion of invalid votes in Belgium, and in the cantons of Switzerland and states of Austria where voting is compulsory, in his chapter on "The Belgian Electoral System," ibid., pp. 174-175. For an analysis of the cleavages in Belgian politics, see Val Lorwin's chapter on Belgium in R. A. Dahl, ed., Oppositions in Western Democracies (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1965), forthcoming.

Herbert Tingsten, in an extensive examination of the effects of compulsory voting in several European countries before the Second World War, demonstrated that compulsory voting—which, if effectively enforced, inevitably involves the electoral mobilization of some citizens who are more or less unwilling or apolitical—was in most cases accompanied by increases in both the level of participation and the proportion of invalid votes. See his Political Behavior: Studies in Election Statistics (Totowa, New Jersey, The Bedminister Press, 1963; first published as Stockholm Economic Studies, Vol. 7, 1937), ch. 4.

Besides Belgium, only Luxembourg has consistently recorded an invalid vote well in excess of 3% of the poll; clues for the reasons underlying it may perhaps be found in highly effective compulsory voting regulations and the relatively complex electoral system, described by Kitzinger, "The Luxembourg Electoral System," in Kitzinger, loc. cit., pp. 181–182.

Italy, in 1953, completes the list of deviant Western European examples: 4.6% of the voters spoiled their ballots in that year's parliamentary election. The chief motivation seems to have been popular resentment of a specially rigged electoral law pushed through parliament just prior to the election and designed to insure continued dominance by Italy's four-party governing coalition. The law provided that any associated group of parties which received 50% plus one of the votes cast was to obtain two-thirds of the parliamentary seats; thus it represented an attempt to overthrow Italy's traditional proportional representation electoral system. For many Italians the law

Why, then, is the invalid vote so high? And why is it increasing? Is the problem essentially a technical one, solution of which depends on increased civic instruction in the use of the allegedly complex two-vote ballot? Does it represent a small nucleus of political protest? Or is it the product of deeper sociological and psychological factors on the contemporary German political scene?

Most observers of German electoral politics—political scientists, the Bundesamt, and most state statistical offices—consider the invalid vote negligible in number and politically unimportant. While paying lip service to other interpretations, most analysts hold that its principal cause is the failure of some voters to understand the possibility or at least the technique of voting twice. One optimistic appraisal places the technical-complexity argument in the center of its analysis, then concludes that "the low magnitude of invalid votes is as favorable a sign of the success of political education in postwar Germany as the high level of popular participation."

Yet we have seen that the invalid vote is both high and increasing; and the contention of this article will be that the frequent occurrence of invalid votes is a small but distressing sign of the underdevelopment of political interest, involvement and integration in the West German variant of industrial mass society; that it stems in part from the deceptively high level of electoral participation (which is high in quantity but not in quality); and that it expresses a variety of political discontent. We shall turn first to the general patterns of invalid voting, then to the motivations which underlie it.

was unhappily reminiscent of Mussolini's Acerbo Law of 1923. Dubbed the "swindle law" by the Communists, it elicited a great deal of bitter debate both in parliament and in the election campaign itself. Cf. Gerard J. Mangone, "Italy," in Taylor Cole, ed., European Political Systems (2d ed. rev.; New York, 1959), pp. 508-509.

⁴ Some representative examples are: Samuel H. Barnes, Frank Grace, James K. Pollock and Peter Sperlich, "The German Party System and the 1961 Federal Election," this Review, Vol. 56 (December, 1962), pp. 905-906; Bundesamt, "Ungueltige Stimmen bei der Bundestagswahl 1961," Wirtschaft und Statistik, 1962, No. 3, pp. 145-147 (hereafter cited as "Bundesamt: WS 1962(3)"); and Baden-Wuerttemberg, Statistisches Landesamt, Statistik von Baden-Wuerttemberg, Vol. 80 (1961), pp. 10-11.

⁵ Barnes, et al., op. cit., p. 906.

Stimmzettel

für die Bundeslagswahl im Wahlkreis Nr. 22 Hamburg VIII am 17. September 1981

Jeder Wähler hat

	Frsssimme für die Wahi des Wahikreisabgeoräneis	_	and	Zwelislimme 2017 die Wahl nach Landcall
1	Schmidt, Helmut DiplVolkswirt HmbGr. Flottbek1 Zidtzaddweg 6b Socialdemokratische Partel Deutsch- Spp		1	Sozialdemokratische Pariei Deutschlands Dr. Brauer, Wehner, Frau Keilhack, Schmidt, Kalbitzer
2	Gewandt, Heinrich Drogist Hamburg 39 Sierichstraße 20		2	Christlich-Demokratischa Union Blumenfeld, Dr. Bucerius, Dr. Seffrin, Gewandt, Frau Blohm
3	Rademacher, Willy Max Sped-Kaufmann Hamburg 30 Seitchstraße 90		3	Freie Demokratische Partei Rademacher, Dr. Dahlgrün Frau Dr. Klep-Alteniot, Dr. Frankenfeld, Dr. Naumann zu Könic Grück
4	Dr. Bialas, Gossmideutsche Rolf Poted (DP. BHE) Arzt. HmbPublisbüttel GDP Februsce 12		4	Gesamideutsche Partel (DP-BHE) Dr. Behr, Radtke, Frau Kayser, Beass, Glabbate
5	Bethge, Horst Lehrer Hamburg 22 Petkumstraße 7		5	Deutsche Friedens-Union Prof. Dr. Gröbe, Frau Er, Beck, Berg, Lippold, Or. Colps
6	Dr. Nielsen, Ernst Baurat Hemburg 19 Eichenstraße 50	0	6	Doutsche Reichs-Partei Prof. Dr. Kunstmann, Kupke, Hoblader, Bister, Trute DR

BALLOT

For the Federal Election of September 17, 1961 Electoral District No. 22 Hamburg District VIII

Each Voter Has

f	First Vote or the election of his district d	eputy	and	Second Vote for the election from Lan	d lists
1	NAME of Candidate Party Occupation Address	0	1	NAME of Party Names of Candidates	0

From Patterns of Government, by Samuel H. Beer and Adam B. Ulam. @ Copyright 1958 by Random House, Inc. Reprinted by permission.

' I. GENERAL PATTERNS

The sample survey data collected by the Federal Statistical Office in 1961 in 1,125 representative precincts throughout the Federal Republic produced the following composite picture of invalid votes by type and combination:

nent in the southern and western areas of the Federal Republic. They have been a characteristic feature of voting patterns in the Saarland, Hessen, Rheinland-Pfalz and Baden-Wuerttemberg since the first postwar Landtag elections. Exceptionally low invalid votes, on the other hand, have been common since 1949 in

TABLE II. INVALID VOTES BY TYPE AND BALLOT COMBINATION, 19616

	Number	Per cen
A. Invalid First and Second Votes	338,500	18.0
1. First and second vote columns blank	236,600	12.6
2. First vote blank, second vote multicrossed	25,300	1.3
3. Second vote blank, first vote multicrossed	37,600	2.0
4. Both votes multicrossed	30,100	1.6
5. One vote blank, other vote miscellaneous causes	2,500	0.1
6. Both votes miscellaneous causes	6,400	0.3
3. Invalid First and Valid Second Vote	583,600	31.0
7. First vote blank	572,300	30.4
8. First vote multicrossed	9,800	0.5
9. First vote miscellaneous causes	1,400	0.1
. Invalid Second and Valid First Vote	959,400	51.0
10. Second vote blank	847,800	50.4
11. Second vote multicrossed	10,500	0.6
12. Second vote miscellaneous causes	1,100	0.1
'otal	1,881,500	100.0

The striking fact which emerges from this table is that 82 per cent of all invalid votes (51 per cent of party list votes, 31 per cent of district votes) were paired with a valid vote. Moreover, most invalid votes were void because they were left blank—scarcely 6 per cent were multicrossed, while fewer than 1 per cent were voided by miscellaneous causes.

Except for Schleswig-Holstein and Bremen, high invalid list votes have been most promi-

⁵ Bundesamt: 1961(3), p. 11. According to Paragraph 39 of the West German Federal Electoral Law, a vote is considered invalid if the voter's preference for a district candidate or party list is not unmistakably clear. In Table II, "blank" votes include a small number of crossedout vote columns as well as those which were "multicrossed" votes are those unmarked; marked for more than one candidate or party list: and "miscellaneous causes" include vote-columns defaced by marks, tears or comments, as well as those on which the voter's mark is unclear. The special count of invalid votes is described in Bundesamt: WS 1962(3), p. 145. On the sample survey, see Bundesamt: 1961(3), pp. 4-8.

the northern German states of Niedersachsen. Hamburg and Nordrhein-Westfalen.7 But if the rank-order of the states according to per cent of invalid list votes has remained fairly constant, the patterns of increase have not; only one of the ten German states has never ranked among the first four states in rate of void list vote increase on at least one occasion. The federal average is particularly sensitive to voting fluctuations in the bigger states; thus the largest increase—0.5 per cent in 1957 resulted chiefly from the exceptional increases recorded that year in Baden-Wuerttemberg and Nordrhein-Westfalen, not from admission of the Saarland as some observers have maintained.8

⁷ Faul, ed., loc. cit. Void district votes have also been consistently higher in the southwestern part of the Federal Republic, except for 1953 when they were also high in these three north German states. With few exceptions the void district vote has decreased steadily in all states and in every election since 1953.

⁸ See, for example, the contentions of Barnes, et al., op. cit. But in 1957 void list votes increased table III. Invalid votes and ballot combinations by age and sex, 1957–1961

		Number of Votes Cast Invalidly Per 1000 Voters
Age-Group, Men		Both Votes	First Vote Only	Second Vote Only	Either Vote
21-30	1957	10.6	13.5	20.5	44.6
	1961	7.4	11.8	24.2	43.4
30-60	1957	11.7	14.9	17.4	44.0
	1961	10.3	13.2	21.0	44.5
60 and over	1957	12.2	18.4	22.0	52.6
	1961	12.2	19.5	31.8	63.5
Total	1957	11.6	15.4	19.0	46.0
	1961	10.2	14.4	24.1	48.7
ge-Group, Women
21-30	1957	, 11.6	20.0	30.1	61.7
	1961	8.0	16.6	34.3	58.9
30-60	1957	12.5	21.7	29.9	64.1
	1961	10.9	20.7	35.8	67.4
60 and over	1957	13.5	27.4	36.5	77.4
	1961	11.5	30.9	46.0	88.4
Total	1957	12.6	22.7	31.4	66.7
	1961	10.6	22.5	38.0	77.1
Total, Both Men	1957	12.1	19.3	25.7	57.1
and Women	1961	10.4	18.8	31.6	60.8

Some voters are more prone than others to cast invalid votes. The chief variables identified by the sample survey are the voter's age and sex, the size and location of the community in which he lives and his political party preference. Especially relevant are age and sex factors, as shown by Table III. In the 1961 election 7.7 per cent of women voters (and 8.8 per cent of women over 60) and 4.9 per cent of men voters failed to cast two valid votes. The larger proportion of imperfect ballots cast by women was in Baden-Wuerttemberg by 68,000 (1.3%), in Nordrhein-Westfalen by 62,000 (0.4%); the Saarland added 38,000. Nordrhein-Westfalen increased by only 0.2% in 1953, and decreased by 0.4% in 1961. Baden-Wuerttemberg decreased by 0.9% in 1953, and increased by 0.6% in 1961. Therefore, even without the Saarland, the federal average invalid vote for 1957 represented an increase more than twice the federal increase of 1953 or 1961. Bundesamt: 1957(3), pp. 64-65; Bundesamt: 1961(1), p. 8.

due primarily to the fact that women much more frequently than men combined a valid vote with an invalid vote. Older voters of both sexes shared chief responsibility for paired invalid votes. With increasing voter age, void district votes among women increased from 1.7 to 3.1 per cent; among men from 1.2 to 2.0 per cent. Likewise, with increasing voter age, void list votes among women increased from 3.4 to 4.6 per cent while the corresponding figures among men were only 2.4 and 3.2 per cent.⁹

Thus both men and women of all ages cast more invalid list votes than district votes; more women voted invalidly than men in every age group and on every possible ballot combination save paired invalid votes cast by elderly men; and more older voters than younger voters failed to cast two valid votes. Since 1957 the paired invalid vote has decreased among all age-groups of both sexes; the combination of an invalid district with a valid list vote has decreased among all but the oldest voters of both sexes; and the combination of an invalid list with a valid district vote has increased among all age-groups of both sexes, and most conspicuously among voters over 60.10

⁹ Since women form a majority among voters, their share of the invalid vote is numerically even more striking. Burdesamt, "Wahlbeteiligung und Stimmabgabe der Maenner und Frauen nach dem Alter bei der Bundestagswahl 1961," WS 1962(2), pp. 75–79.

These figures suggest a partial explanation for the counter-movement of district and list vote trends. Although the correlation coefficient for invalid votes and participation shows no relationship between the two factors.11 it is nonetheless clear that both the size and development of the invalid vote are partly determined by changes in the sociological composition of the participating electorate. In 1961 three principal changes occurred; all three affected the invalid vote. First, there was a great increase in the number of voters over 60. among whom the occurrence of blank second votes was especially frequent and the increase from 1957 especially marked. Second, there was a great increase in the number of voters under 30, among whom participation in past elections had been very low, among whom the occurrence of invalid second votes was relatively frequent and increasing, and among whom the occurrence of invalid first votes was least frequent and decreasing. Finally, the number of women participating increased substantially, which had a decisive over-all impact on the number of invalid votes cast. In some states—for example, Baden-Wuerttembergcertain of these trends were even more pronounced and the net increase of invalid votes correspondingly larger than in the Federal Republic as a whole.12

No less important than differences in the frequency and patterns of invalid voting among age-groups and between sexes have been differences among various sizes of community. Voters in village and rural areas (about one-third of the electorate) are more likely to cast invalid votes than are voters in small and medium-sized towns and cities. Thus the highest invalid vote is normally recorded by men and women over 60 in communities of fewer than 3000 inhabitants. Above we noted that void list votes tend to increase among all age-groups of both sexes, while void district votes increase only among the old. Although this pattern retains its basic shape, it shifts from one size of community to another. In village and rural areas the increase in void district votes was just slightly less pronounced in 1957 than the increase in void list votes, and then not only among older voters but also among middle-aged men from 30 to 60. On the other hand, in cities of more than 50,000 inhabitants, the per cent of invalid district votes cast by older citizens did not change; but of course the absolute number increased owing both to the high turnout and increased number of older voters.¹³

¹⁰ Bundesamt: 1961(3), p. 11.

Data on the political party orientations of invalid voters are also relevant to an understanding of the general patterns of invalid voting in the Federal Republic. Nearly 61 per cent of all void list votes in 1961 were cast by electors who gave their district vote to the candidate of the CDU (33 per cent) or SPD (28 per cent); another 25 per cent were cast by "straight-ticket" invalid voters—that is, by voters who cast no valid vote at all. Corresponding data for void district votes show similar patterns: over 50 per cent were cast by major party list voters, only 13 per cent by minor party voters, and some 36 per cent as straight tickets. However, while under 2 per cent of SPD or CDU voters failed to vote for a district candidate, and slightly more than 3 per cent for a party list, over 5 per cent of the minor party electorate cast void district votes and over 4 per cent void list votes. Since 1953 the per cent of both major and minor party. voters failing to cast two valid votes—and particularly those failing to cast the important party list vote, on the basis of which proportional representation is figured—has gradually increased.14

II. CAUSES AND MOTIVATIONS

At least four main causes of invalid voting can be identified. They are: (1) protest; (2)

¹³ Bundesamt: 1957(3), pp. 21-22. Most of the districts (24 of 27) which ranked highest in 1953, 1957 or 1961 in per cent of invalid votes—and three-fourths of those with consistently high percentages—were comprised predominantly of farms, villages and small towns. Cf. Bundesamt, Statistische Berichte, Arb.-Nr. VIII/5/12 and Arb.-Nr. VIII/5/15; and Bundesamt: 1953(1), pp. 52-63. See also Bundesamt: 1961(4), p. 26, for the results of the 1961 sample survey.

¹⁴ Bundesamt: 1961(3), p. 10; 1957(3), p. 53; 1953(2), p. 47. For 1953 see also W. Hirsch-Weber and Klaus Schuetz, Waehler und Gewaehlte: Untersuchung der Bundestagswahlen 1953 (Berlin and Frankfurt, Verlag Franz Vahlen, 1957), pp. 322-ignorance of voting techniques; (3) cross-pressures; and (4) apathy. Their exposition will be somewhat clearer if we organize our discussion according to the types of invalid votes and their combination on the ballot papers (see above, Table II).

¹¹ Barnes, et al., loc. cit.

¹² Baden-Wuerttemberg, op. cit., pp. 9-11. For the federal trends see Bundesamt: 1961(3), p. 9; and Bundesamt: WS, loc. cit.

Votes invalidated by the addition of extraneous marks, tears or comments were a comparative rarity in the 1961 election, accounting for just 0.5 per cent of all invalid votes. They represent—as do probably the crossed-out vote columns—the irreconcilables present in all organized political societies, voters who use their ballots to indicate in drastic fashion their total alienation from the political system in which they live.

More significant, if still relatively infrequent, were the 113,000 votes invalidated by multicrossing. Few of these can be considered products of political protest; on the other hand, it is thoroughly conceivable that many of these voters had an insufficient understanding of the electoral system. Voters who placed both their marks on one side of the ballot may have wished to cast their two votes for two different political parties but erred in the attempt to do so. Other voters may have assumed that they were permitted two votes for each or either column, despite minor technical improvements in ballot design and instructions between 1953 and 1957. More important than lack of information or inability to read directions may have been the problem of conflicting information, owing to the wide variety of electoral systems (and hence of vote-casting experiences) in use at state and local government levels in the Federal Republic. For example, the municipal and county electoral systems in Baden-Wuerttemberg and Bayern permit each elector several votes, which he may split among several candidates, cumulate for a single candidate, or cast as a block for a single party list without change. The per cent of invalid votes voided by multicrossing is significantly higher in these two states than in the rest of the Federal Republic.15

Another possible interpretation of multicrossing—at least where valid votes are paired with invalid votes—is that of cross-pressures. Unable to decide between two parties or two candidates which strongly appeal to him, the voter marks his ballot for both. Although we lack precise information on the combination of multicrossed invalid votes for the Federal Republic, an examination of such ballots in Bayern found that when people voted for two parties they nearly always voted for two which were ideologically relatively close to each other, indicating perhaps that multicrossing was not so much the product of errors as of political impotence in the face of equally attractive choices.¹⁶

Most invalid votes were simply abstentions. Almost a quarter of a million voters turned in unmarked ballot papers; they cast neither a district nor a party list vote. Whether they "voted" for the sake of appearance or because they wanted to, they apparently came to the polls with the sole intention of casting an unmistakable and cogent protest vote, not only against the choice of candidates and political parties, but against the political system itself. More interesting, therefore—and statistically much more important—are the one and onehalf million voters who paired an abstention with a valid vote. One-third of all voters who cast such a combination failed to mark the left side of their ballot paper (for a district candidate), two-thirds the right side (for a party list).

The most frequently cited explanation for valid and blank vote combinations is ignorance by some voters of the purpose and technique of casting two votes, And in fact a convincing case can be made for this thesis. There is, first of all, some evidence from local, state and federal elections which indicates that the size of the invalid vote varies directly with the complexity of the electoral system and the design of the ballot. Moreover, in some cases 16 Richard Schachtner, "Wahlberechtigte, Wahlbeteiligung, Nichtwaehler und Falschwaehler," Bayern in Zahlen: Monatsheft des Bayerischen Statistischen Antes, Vol. 6 (January, 1952), p. 21. Cf. S. M. Lipset, Political Man (Garden City, N. Y., 1963), pp. 212-213. Of course, crosspressures could equally well lead to withdrawal and abstention. Cf. ibid., pp. 211ff.

17 For example, see Schachtner, op. cit., pp. 20-21; Baden-Wuerttemberg, op. cit., p. 11; Hessen, Statistisches Landesamt, Staat und Wirtschaft in Hessen, Vol. 4 (January, 1949), p. 15; also "Vierzehn Jahre Wahlen in Friedrich Erbe, Westdeutschland (1946-1960)," in Faul, ed., op. cit., p. 40. However, the Bundesamt noted that introduction of the two-vote, two-column ballot in 1953 had had only a fractional impact on invalid voting; void list votes increased by only 0.2% from a sum which in 1949 (see Table I) the Bundesamt had regarded as chiefly an overt expression of political protest. Bundesamt: 1953(2), p. 47; 1949, p. 7. Already by 1957 and especially in 1961 the Bundesamt's position inexplicably changed; its new emphasis has been on technical complexity as the sounder explanation for both the size and successive increases of invalid votes. See Bundesamt: 1957(3), p. 21 and p. 52; and Bundesamt: WS, loc. cit.

¹⁵ Bundesamt: WS 1962(3), p. 146.

where direct efforts have been made to acquaint prospective voters with details of the electoral system—an example is the postal ballot in 1961—the invalid vote has amounted to 1 per cent or less.¹⁸

Detailed studies of West German crossvoting behavior in each of the past three federal elections also suggest an interpretation of partially void ballots which emphasizes error rather than intent as the chief cause of invalid votes. Despite the fact that each elector who casts two votes must vote separately for the district candidate and the party list of his choice, 89 per cent of the voters in 1957 and 94 per cent in 1961 cast their two votes for the same party: thus the personality of the district candidate can have played only a minor role in the voter's choice compared with his party label.19 This conclusion is substantiated despite the larger number of void list votesby extensive survey research data from the Divo, Allensbach and Emnid institutes of public opinion. Thus it was found that most voters paid little attention to, and had scant knowledge of, the electoral law or the personal qualities of district candidates; very few of those questioned considered the candidate's personality to be the basis of their electoral choice. Instead, the issues to which the electorate responded were bound up with images of a few nationally known politicians and the great political parties—with their achievements, programs and relative capacities for national leadership.20 Many of the voters who allowed the important party list vote to remain a blank must therefore have committed unintentional errors. They probably thought that by voting for a district candidate whose name was also marked with a party label they had fulfilled their electoral duty.²¹

¹⁸ Bundesamt, "Ergebnis der Briefwahl bei der Bundestagswahl 1961," WS 1962(1), pp. 23-25. There are, however, special features of the postal ballot which impair its comparability with other aspects of invalid voting; for a brief discussion, see Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, pp. 284-285.

¹⁹ Bundesamt: 1957(3), p. 54; Bundesamt: WS 1962(2), p. 79. Cf. Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, p. 288.

²⁰ For 1961 see Emnid-Institut, Der Prozess der Meinungsbildung (Bielefeld, 1962), excerpts from which appear in Klaus D. Eberlein, "Die Wahlentscheidung vom 17. September 1961, ihre Ursachen und Wirkung," Zeitschrift fuer Politik, Vol. 9 (September, 1962), pp. 236-257; and Gerhard Schmidtchen and E. Noelle-Neumann (Allensbach), "Die Bedeutung repraesentativer Bevoelkerungsumfragen fuer die offene Gesellschaft," Politische Vierteljahresschrift, Vol. 4 (June, 1963), pp. 174-179. For 1957 see Divo-Institut, Untersuchung der Waehlerschaft und Wahlentscheidung 1957 (Frankfurt, 1959), pp. 72-121 and pp. 170-235. For 1953 see Hirsch-Weber and Schuetz, op. cit., pp. 94-355.

The first use of voting machines in a German federal election in 1961 in four precincts also lends credence to the technical-complexity explanation for invalid voting. The machines were designed to render impossible the casting of accidental invalid votes; and a measure of their success appears to be that whereas in 1957 the number of invalid votes polled in the four precincts had ranged from 13 to 34 district votes and from 15 to 63 party list votes, in 1961 no precinct had more than three invalid first votes or seven invalid second votes. Moreover, in three of the four precincts there were equal numbers of invalid first and second votes (not an excess of the latter as one would expect); in one precinct there were no invalid votes at all; and in the fourth precinct there were only two invalid first votes, seven invalid second votes. (See Table IV.)

But if voter ignorance thus appears to be a relevant explanation for blank votes, it is neither the only nor the most important one. An equally important cause is political protest, rooted in electoral alliances; in the decline of radical political parties; and in the reaction of local populations to temporary political, social or economic dislocations.

A principal cause of invalid first votes has been the device known as Wahlabkommen, or electoral alliance, whereby a political party refrains from nominating a candidate in a particular election district and instead instructs its 21 Kitzinger, loc. cit.; and Bundesamt: 1957(3), p. 21 and p. 52. The Bundesamt's suggestion that void party list votes may have resulted from rejection by major party voters of unalterable state party lists over whose composition and order they have no influence, seems improbable in the light of these data, since it is the party and not the man for whom the voter apparently marks his ballot. Bundesamt: 1957(3), p. 21. In Baden-Wuerttemberg and Bayern, where voters have long been able to alter lists and cumulate votes, and where, therefore, one might expect such considerations to be especially relevant, the void list vote has been high, but lower than in several other states where voters are not permitted to alter lists or cumulate votes. Moreover, the data from both states suggest that the more choices a voter has, the more likely he is to cast invalid votes, rather than vice versa. See Schachtner, loc. cit.; and Baden-Wuerttemberg, loc. cit.

District In Which Precinct Located	Year	Electors	Voters	Per cent		Votes valid	Secon Inv	d Votes alid
Krefeld, 81	1953	882 689	78.1	14	2.0%	14	2.0%
•	1957	1250	1123	89.8	18	1.2	15	1.3
	1961	1624	1227	75.6	2	0.2	7	0.6
Duisburg I, 92	1953	November		·
J ,	1957	700	634	90.6	21	1.7	41	6.5
	1961	679	585	86.2	α	0.0	0	0.0
Dortmund I, 116	1953	1080	925	85.6	29	3.1	38	4.1
	1957			-
	1961	861	605	70.3	3	0.5	3	0.5

1226

1388

1036

81.2

85.0

80.4

TABLE IV. VOTING MACHINES AND INVALID VOTES IN FOUR PRECINCTS, 1953-196122 supporters to give their first votes to the candidate of an ally-party.²³ Rejection of electoral alliances by some voters of both large and small political parties produced an artificially high invalid first vote in 1953 (when there were 39 such alliances²⁴) and 1957 (when there were 20²⁵). Consequently a true comparison of in-

1953

1957

1961

1509

1632

1289

Darmstadt, 145

²² I am indebted to Dr. Karl Schwarz of the Bundesamt for a photostatic copy of the data on which this table is based. The Bundesamt's own brief analysis appears in Bundesamt: WS 1962(3), p. 146. For a description of the voting machines, see Das Parlament, September 13, 1961, p. 16.

²³ A complete list of Wahlabkommen appears in Erbe, op. cit., pp. 84-85. By means of this device the Bavarian and Center parties in 1953 and the German Party in both 1953 and 1957 managed to circumvent the electoral law's splinter party clauses and obtain representation in the Federal Bundestag.

²⁴ In 1953, 14 of the 20 districts with an invalid first vote exceeding 5% were districts in which alliances had been concluded between two or more of the bourgeois parties. The largest invalid vote was recorded in districts in which the CDU withdrew in favor of one of the smaller parties; in 20 of 22 such districts the invalid first vote exceeded 4%, while that was the case in only 8 of 23 districts in which a smaller party renounced in favor of the CDU. Notice that 27 of the 39 Wahlabkommen were in Niedersachsen, Hamburg and Nordrhein-Westfalen, which thus explains their unusually high polls of void district votes that year; see above, note 8.

²⁵ In 1957 Wahlabkommen were concluded between the CDU and German Party (DP) in 12 districts, between the SPD and Bavarian Party valid first votes for 1953, 1957 and 1961 (when there were no alliances) is extremely difficult; for example, if the ten districts without major party candidates are subtracted from the 1957 totals, the percentage decrease of invalid first votes from 1957 to 1961 is 50 per cent less than that indicated by the official election returns. Should the electoral alliance reappear—which seems unlikely in view of party consolidation and the acknowledged dominance of the two big catch-all parties—the downward trend of void district votes could be slowed, halted or even reversed. The second construction of the two even reversed.

28

34

2.3

2.4

0.3

41

63

3.3

4.5

0.3

(FU) in 8 others. In 8 of the 10 districts where the SPD or CDU renounced, invalid votes numbered more than 7%, ranking first through eighth among German election districts. In each of the other two, void district votes exceeded 5%. For an analysis of the cross-pressures impinging on the SPD and FU electorates, and the resultant high incidence of first vote abstentions especially among SPD voters, see the local study of Munich-Land by Keith Panter-Brick, in Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, pp. 338-339.

²⁶ Bundesamt: WS 1962(3), p. 147.

led by Franz Josef Strauss, should follow through on its apparent 1965 Wahlabkommen with the small right-wing Bavarian GDP (whereby the GDP is to "deliver" the right-wing vote to the CSU, and the CSU is to guarantee the GDP two direct mandates and three list mandates, thus permitting it to reenter the Bundestag; see Die Zeit, January 22, 1965, p. 3), void district votes by disenchanted CSU voters could contribute to a relatively higher invalid first vote in particular districts.

The decline of radical parties has also contributed to the gradual increase in the number of ballots intentionally invalidated in whole or in part by disenchanted, protesting voters. On the political Right the relationship seems manifest particularly in 1953 and 1961, on the Left chiefly in 1957. In 1953 the rate of void list vote increase was greatest-more than five times the federal average—in Bayern (+1.0 per cent), where the right-wing WAV, which had polled 14 per cent of the vote there in 1949 and sent 12 deputies to Bonn, no longer existed. Sharp increases in the number of void list votes were recorded in nearly every area of former WAV strength; and in one-half its 1949 refugee and lower middle-class citadels the percentage increase amounted to twice the Bavarian and ten times the federal average increase.28 Similar results also obtained in the two

In the absence of Wahlabkommen, however, the downward trend of void district votes may even accelerate as minor and splinter party voters make the transition to voting for the major parties. In the past, these voters have often cast invalid first votes in districts where their party ran no candidate. For example, in 1953 special counts revealed that 25% of the DRP voters in Rhineland-Pfalz and over 11% of the Center Party's voters in Nordrhein-Westfalen invalidated their first vote because they had no opportunity to vote for a DRP or Center Party candidate in their district; see Hirsch-Weber and Schuetz, op. cit., p. 330 and p. 333. For 1957 see the data and analysis in Bundesamt: 1957(3), p. 53. Representative of such districts in 1961 were 153 in Rhineland-Pfalz and 198, 211, 213, 218, 221, 230, 232 and 239 in Bayern; see Bundesamt: 1961(1).

²⁸ See especially districts 196, 198, 199, 205, 208, 211, 212, 213, 217, 224, 226 and 228. Bundesamt: 1949, p. 24; 1953(1). In noting that voters did not vote invalidly in 1953 as often as had been expected owing to introduction of the new two-vote, two-column ballot, James K. Pollock implies that voter ignorance of the technical aspects of vote-casting was particularly minimized in Bayern, where the voters already had experience with a comparable electoral system. James K. Pollock, ed., German Democracy at Work: A Selective Study (Ann Arbor, Michigan, University of Michigan Press, 1955), p. 88 and p. 193, note 11. Were voter ignorance actually the primary cause of invalid votes in the Federal Republic, however, Bayern should have recorded no significant increase from 1949 and should have polled among the fewest invalid votes of any of the German states. In fact, it registered a larger increase in 1953 than any other state and ranked third in per cent of invalid second votes.

North German states of Bremen and Niedersachsen, where the neo-Nazi Socialist Reich Party, outlawed in 1952, scored political breakthroughs in Landtag elections in 1951.29 Not until 1959 did a right-wing extremist party again score comparable gains in state politics. The DRP that year polled 5.1 per cent of the vote in Rheinland-Pfalz; and two years later, in the 1961 federal election, the invalid vote rose most sharply-between three and four times the state and 15 times the federal increase -in the seven small town and rural areas where in 1959 the DRP had been most successful in mobilizing the disaffections of economically depressed vine-growers and small farmers.30

Dissident Communist voters, bereft of their party vehicle after prohibition of the KPD by the Federal Constitutional Court in 1956, contributed—often extensively, it appears—to the 1957 upsurge of invalid votes in five states where the KPD had polled well in Landtag elections during the immediately preceding two years. Thus the SPD (which is supposed to ²⁹ The relevant figures by district are found in Bremen, Statistisches Landesamt, Statistische Mitteilungen, 1951, No. 3 and 1953, No. 4; and in Niedersachsen, Statistisches Landesamt, Wahlen und Abstimmungen, Reihe F, Vol. 14, Nos. 1 and 3. Detailed information on the SRP may be found in Otto Buesch and Peter Furth, Rechtsradikalismus im Nachkriegsdeutschland: Studien ueber die 'Sozialistische Reichspartei' (SRP) (Berlin and Frankfurt, Verlag Franz Vahlen, 1957), esp. pp. 93 ff., 97 ff., 152 ff., and 156 ff.

30 The areas are included in federal districts 151, 152, 153, 156, 157, 159 and 160. See Rheinland-Pfalz, Statistisches Landesamt, Statistische Mitteilungen, November 1961, pp. 259-266 and May 1959, pp. 99-104. Cf. Richard S. Cromwell, "Rightist Extremism in Postwar West Germany." Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 16 (June, 1964), pp. 284-293. A contributing factor in the void list vote increase in Rheinland-Pfalz was probably the merger of the increasingly right-wing Refugee Party with the former German Party to form the All-German Party (GDP). The GDP suffered an 83% drop in 1961 from the combined 1957 strength of the two parent parties; at the same time the per cent of GDP electors casting void list votes jumped to 8.3, four times the party's national average (which in any case was up sharply from 1957). Bundesamt: 1961(3), p. 10 and p. 20; 1957(3), p. 53. On the resentment engendered among former DP supporters by the merger with the Refugee Party, see Eberlein, op. cit., pp. 245-246.

³¹ Invalid list votes increased in the Saar, Baden-Wuerttemberg, Bremen, Hessen, and have absorbed the Communist vote) increased its vote in 1957 in Nordrhein-Westfalen by only one-half its federal average proportionate increase and by only two-fifths of the percentage which the Communists and other left-wing parties had polled in 1953;32 meanwhile, 15 of 17 districts which had given the KPD at least 4 per cent of the vote in 1953 recorded void list vote increases in excess of the average Nordrhein-Westfalen increase.33 It appears likely that many Communist voters in the Saarland simply sat out the 1957 election, only to vote invalidly with at least one of their two votes in 1961, when they came to the polls in response to election appeals by the newly founded, leftneutralist German Peace Union (DFU).34

The Saarland provides an excellent case study in the use of invalid votes as a weapon of Nordrhein-Westfalen, invalid district votes in all but Nordrhein-Westfalen. The KPD had polled 3.4% of the vote in Hessen and 3.8% in Nordrhein-Westfalen in 1954, 6.6% in the Saar and 5.0% in Bremen in 1955, and 3.2% in Baden-Wuerttemberg as late as April, 1956. Among states with no appreciable Communist vote, only Schleswig-Holstein recorded a large invalid vote increase in 1957. See the data in Faul, ed., op. cit., pp. 321–363. The unusual parallel increase of invalid first and second votes may have been a reflection of the great regularity of KPD straightticket voting (exceeded only by the SPD) in 1953. See Bundesamt: 1953(2), p. 47.

⁸² Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, p. 284. Moreover, the per cent of SPD electors casting void district votes rose steeply, possibly indicating a less than wholehearted commitment even among those KPD voters who did switch. Bundesamt: 1957(3), p. 53; 1953, loc. cit.

³³ Cf. especially the results in districts 74, 75, 76, 89, 90, 92, 99, 102, 111, 112, 113, 114, 116, 117. Bundesamt: 1957(1); 1953(1).

34 The correlation is particularly clear in the Saar districts of St. Wendel (Federal election district 246) where the KPD had won a plurality in the Saar Landtag election of 1952: i.e., 229, 235, 249, 261, 268, 275, 282. It is noteworthy that Communist strength in postwar Saarland scarcely wavered: in 1955 the party received about the same number of votes it had in 1947 and only 7% fewer than in 1952. See Saarland, Statistisches Landesamt, Statistischer Bericht, B III 1, January 1961; and Kurzbericht, II/10, 1955 and II/1, 1956. On the character of the German Peace Union (DFU) see Der Spiegel, August 23, 1961; and Eduard Wald, "Communism," in Walter Stahl, ed., The Politics of Postwar Germany (New York, 1963), pp. 293-294. On Communism and invalid voting in the Saar, cf. also Erbe, op. cit., p. 41.

political protest. Reunited with Germany politically in 1957 following popular rejection of political autonomy by referendum in 1955. and reunited economically in 1959 following dissolution of the Franco-Saar economic union concluded in 1947, the Saarland has participated in only two German federal elections. This has prompted some observers to dismiss the relatively higher invalid vote recorded there in 1957 and 1961 with the simple assertion that Saar voters "have had less experience than others with the German electoral system."35 Had that been the real cause, however, halfvalid ballots should have been considerably more numerous in the Saarland than elsewhere; but in fact 44 per cent (federal: 25 per cent) of void list votes and 55 per cent (federal: 36 per cent) of void district votes were paired with another invalid vote in 1961 in unambiguous protest against the prevailing political situation.36 In addition to the partyless Saar Communists, it appears on the basis of available voting data that former supporters of the Saar Christian People's Party (CVP), who were opposed to integration with Germany, may have selected the invalid vote as their own medium of political expression.37 In Saarlouis, Merzig-Wadern and St. Ingbert the void list vote was little short of amazing: in 1961 it actually exceeded 10 per cent of the poll in onethird of the Saar precincts where the CVP had obtained 20 per cent of the vote in its final electoral appearance (as the Saar branch of the Bavarian CSU) in 1957.38

35 Barnes, et al., loc. cit.

36 Bundesamt: 1961(3), p. 22.

³⁷ Erbe, loc. cit.; Bernhard Beger, "Anatomie einer Wahl, Gewinne und Verluste am 17. September," Politische Meinung, Vol. 6 (October, 1961), p. 19.

38 Saarland, Statistisches Landesamt, Statistischer Bericht, B III 1, January 1961. Actually, Saarlanders had waged political battles with invalid votes even prior to the 1955 referendum, but then the source of discontent was the obverse of 1957 or 1961. In 1952, for example, almost a quarter of the Saar electorate invalidated their ballots in response to appeals for abstention by the Deutscher Saarbund and the pro-German political parties, which the fearful and mildly authoritarian Saar government had refused to license. See Hans-Joachim Hagmann, Die Saarlaendischen Landtagswahlen vom 30. November 1952 (Cologne, 1953), pp. 111 ff. and pp. 174 ff.; Richard Schachtner, Die deutsche Nachkriegswahlen (Munich, Isar Verlag, 1956), pp. 171-173; Erbe, op. cit., p. 40; and esp. Jacques Freymond, The Saar Conflict 1945-1955 (New York 1960), pp. 125-128. Only in 1955, when all

Finally, invalid protest votes result from the disaffection of local populations with temporary political, social or economic dislocations, as we have already noted with respect to Rheinland-Pfalz in 1959 and 1961. An especially fertile source for the study of literally thousands of examples of invalid voting as a weapon of political protest are the state and local elections in south-central and southwestern Germany during the period of the military occupation.39 For example, in Hessen in 1946 refugee discontent at the refusal of American Occupation authorities to authorize an allrefugee political party found expression through invalid votes at the first Landtag election; three years later, in the first Bundestag election, the number of invalid votes declined in certain districts in proportion to the vote polled there by refugee candidates standing independently of the licensed political parties.40

In the French Occupation Zone—where invalid voting was especially frequent—the number of void ballots cast at the first Landtag elections varied in direct proportion to the efforts expended by France to dissociate occupied areas from German control. Thus it reached 11.1 per cent in Rheinland-Pfalz, 9.2 per cent in Baden and 7.5 per cent in Wuerttemberg-Hohenzollern.41 One of the best ex-claimants competed openly for the first and last time in a postwar Saar election, did the invalid vote amount to no more than a "normal" 1-2%.

³⁹ The most useful compilation of election statistics for the immediate postwar period is that prepared by the Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, Elections and Political Parties in Germany, 1945–1952 (Bad Godesberg/Mehlen, Germany, 1952), pp. 37–71. See also the extensive publications of state statistical offices for the state and local elections of this period, to which the bibliography in Bundesamt: 1961(1), pp. 59–67, provides a convenient guide.

⁴⁰ Erbe, loc. cit. On other aspects of anti-Occupation protest voting with invalid ballots in Hessen, see Hessen, Statistisches Landesamt, Staat und Wirtschaft in Hessen, Vol. 2, No. 1 (1947), pp. 20-26; and Vol. 4, No. 1 (1949), p. 13 and p. 15.

⁴¹ Cf. Erbe, loc. cit. Invalid votes in all three areas may also have reflected the relatively greater social unrest in the French Zone caused by severe local economic dislocations resulting from France's harsh reparations, monetary and commercial policies, described in F. Roy Willis, The French in Germany, 1945–1949 (Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1963). For a brief description of local disruptions in Rhinelandamples of invalid protest voting during the Occupation period occurred in a special election held in September, 1947 to select a member of the Rheinland-Pfalz Landtag to represent communities transferred from the Saarland back to German jurisdiction: nearly 30 per cent of the voters cast invalid votes in protest against the transfer.⁴²

Political protest (defaced and blank votes); cross-pressures (multi-crossed and blank votes); and voter ignorance of vote-casting techniques (multicrossed and blank votes) are three major causes of invalid voting. A fourth—which to some extent gives rise to the other three—is the coupling of widespread political apathy with an unusually high voting turnout.

Voting in Western Germany is not compulsory; yet electoral participation has been consistently and remarkably high even by European standards, increasing from 78.5 per cent in 1949 to almost 88 per cent in 1957 and 1961.43 Although some political scientists have welcomed high turnout as a sign of the success of political education in postwar Germany,44 available survey data suggest quite different conclusions. Survey research data from the 1953, 1957, and 1961 elections—some of which have already been cited-indicate that the politically well-informed (with respect to the candidates, issues and voting techniques) constitute much the smaller part of the German electorate; moreover, there is ample evidence that high electoral participation occurs independently of either political interest or of personal political involvement on the part of most German voters.45

Pfalz, cf. Freymond, op. cit., pp. 52-53 and pp. 245-248.

42 Scammon, op. cit., p. 505.

43 Comparative data are found in Kitzinger, Britain, Europe and Beyond, op. cit., pp. 183-217. For Germany, see Erwin Faul, "Soziologie der westdeutschen Waehlerschaft," in Faul, ed., op. cit., pp. 135-315.

44 For example: Barnes, et al., loc. cit.

46 In 1957 less than half the Divo respondents expressed interest in the campaign; only 4 in 10 could remember having discussed the outcome of the fall election when questioned shortly before it took place; discussion was least frequent among women, older persons, CDU voters, and in outlying areas. Divo-Institut, op. cit., pp. 198-209; 72-75; 268-269. Few voters could perceive any relationship at all between the possible electoral result and their personal lives. Ibid., pp. 294-295. Cf. Allensbach Institut, "SPD und oeffentliche Meinung," Politische Meinung, Vol. 8 (July-August, 1963), pp. 103-105; and Lewis J. Edinger, "Electoral Politics and Voting in Western

Nor do most Germans believe that voting serves the citizen as an effective means of participation in public affairs; only a fraction of the population would actually seek redress for personal political problems by voting for or against either of the major political parties.46 On the contrary, the real political process is viewed as a rather distant play in which the citizen-actor has no role; political affairs impinge on the individual but are intractable to his influence.47 One's focus is in any case on one's particular "veto-group," or his private life, to which the state relates chiefly in its capacity as administrator of social welfare schemes or collector of taxes.48 In short: it appears probable that among broad segments of the West German population, political interest and insight are minimal, electoral involvement impersonal and peripheral, and both the expectation of real political change and the assessment of one's own political efficacy negligible.

Why, then, does the German citizen vote? Several explanations are possible. Above all, however, going to the polls seems to be a variety of social conformism—possibly rooted in the Third Reich and the Occupation⁴⁹—and an expression of the widespread German feeling that voting is a moral obligation, a duty which the state imposes on its citizens before releasing Germany," World Politics, Vol. 13 (April, 1961), pp. 480-481.

⁴⁶ Wolfgang Hartenstein and G. Schubert, Mitlaufen oder Mitbestimmen: Eine Untersuchung zum Demokratischen Bewusstsein und Politische Tradition (Frankfurt, 1961), pp. 43-48; W. Hartenstein and K. Liepelt, "Party Members and Party Voters in W. Germany," in Stein Rokkan, ed., Approaches to the Study of Political Participation (Special Issue of Acta Sociologica, Vol. 6, Fasc. 1-2, 1962), pp. 43-52; Sidney Verba, "Political Participation and Strategies of Influence: A Comparative Study," ibid., pp. 22-42.

⁴⁷ U. Lohmar, Innerparteiliche Demokratie (Stuttgart, F. Enke Verlag, 1963), pp. 26-34. Cf. Otto Kirchheimer, Appendix to his chapter on "Conditions of a Stable Opposition: Germany," in Dahl, ed., op. cit.

⁴⁸ Cf. the remarks in Otto Kirchheimer, "German Democracy in the 1950's," World Politics, Vol. 13 (October, 1960), pp. 256-257.

⁴⁹ That is, in coercive plebiscitarian voting (which particularly mobilized women and residents of village and rural areas) or in the circumspect habits acquired under the watchful tutelage of foreign military authorities. On the former see Faul, op. cit., pp. 150-151 and p. 159; on the latter see Hirsch-Weber and Schuetz, op. cit., p. 160.

them to private life.⁵⁰ Under these circumstances it is hardly surprising that German elections over the years may have mobilized and brought to the polls a large number of less interested and less discerning citizens who have lacked a sufficiently sophisticated understanding of the single-ballot, two-vote electoral system and who, therefore, have sometimes cast unintentional invalid votes.⁵¹ The Divo survey in 1957 identified these 14 per cent of least informed and least interested "mobilized" voters as predominantly women, older men, supporters of the CDU and residents of village and rural areas.⁵² The link between "mobilized"

50 In one recent poll 52% of the respondents felt that even persons who were politically totally uninterested should vote; 39% considered voting a formal duty. Hartenstein and Schubert, op. cit., p. 37. For 1757 data, see Divo-Institut, op. cit., p. 295 and Table 159. Less than a quarter of the Divo respondents cited ideological or pragmatic political reasons for voting. This relationship between sense of duty and voting turnout is not necessarily a uniquely German trait; Angus Campbell, et al., The American Voter (New York, 1960), p. 106, report a similarly close correlation between the two factors for the 1956 U. S. Presidential election. Nevertheless, as Almond and Verba have clearly demonstrated, this combination of high frequencies of formal participation and a passive orientation to that participation is an attitude and behavior pattern that reaches far more deeply into the German political culture than it does the American or British, with important consequences for democratic politics. See Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1963). Cf. Verba, op. cit.; and the same author's excellent chapter. "Germany: The Remaking of Political Culture," in Lucian Pye and Sidney Verba, eds., Political Culture and Political Development (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1965).

⁵¹ Others, more knowledgeable in at least the technique of voting, perhaps felt competent to choose between national parties and programs but unable to decide between local personalities who were often unknown to them; according to Kitzinger, many of these voters no doubt deliberately allowed the left-hand side of their ballot paper to remain blank. Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, p. 288.

52 Divo-Institut, op. cit., pp. 152-161. Sex is probably the most striking variable: in late 1963 only 15% of the women (but over 50% of the men) interviewed by the Allensbach Institut expressed an interest in politics. See "Umfragen: Interesse fuer Politik," Politische Meinung, Vol. 8 (December, 1963), pp. 84-88.

voting and invalid voting seems fairly clear: both mobilized and invalid voters have been recruited from among substantially the same groups of West German citizens.

More worrisomethan mobilization of apathetic voters could be the mobilization of citizens characterized by Lipset as "normally disaffected habitual nonvoters." Under other political regimes such individuals might tend to withdraw and to isolate themselves from politics; but in Western Germany they may come to the polls despite their political nonintegration simply for the sake of appearance, in response to the general social pressure to vote. Once inside the voting booth such voters may well invalidate their ballots in whole or in part. In particular, it may be that alienated middle-aged and older voters in village and rural areas, affectively tied to the fortunes of a political party which no longer competes effectively on the political scene, frequently prefer the anonymity of invalid voting to the publicity of nonvoting.54

53 Lipset, op. cit., p. 229.

54 See the analysis of rural invalid voting in Bavarian elections by Richard Schachtner, "Wahlberechtigte, Wahlbeteiligung, Nichtwaehler und Falschwaehler," Bayern in Zahlen: Monatshefte des Bayerischen Statistischen Amtes. Vol. 4 (August, 1950), pp. 402-403; cf. Hessen. Statistisches Landesamt, Staat und Wirtschaft in Hessen, Vol. 4 (February, 1949), p. 15; and Faul, op. cit., p. 160. The practice of reporting election results by precinct even in sparsely populated rural areas probably tends also to increase the general social pressure to vote; cf. Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, pp. 35-36. Concerning the factors which generally promote a combination of high electoral participation and comparatively low interest in politics in rural areas, see Juan Linz, The Social Bases of West German Politics, Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1959; Microfilm Publication #59-4075 (University Microfilms, Inc., Ann Arbor, Michigan), pp. 731-790.

Minor and radical political parties were supported chiefly by older and middle-aged voters (especially men) in rural and village areas. Bundesamt: 1957(3), pp. 46 ff. and p. 53. Significantly, the least decrease in paired invalid votes has occurred among older and middle-aged voters (esp. men); invalid list votes have been most numerous and have increased most rapidly among older voters; while the only increase of invalid first votes has occurred among the elderly and among middle-aged men in rural areas. The slow increase in the percentage of major party electors who cast valid district votes but void list votes also is indicative of the relationship between invalid voting and minor party political orienta-

Several recent studies of right-wing and restorative tendencies have suggested that public accommodation by political conservatives to the generally accepted standards of political speech and behavior prevalent in the Federal Republic (presumably including, for many, the act of voting), camouflages political attitudes by these persons which are often dangerously uninformed and frequently hostile.55 It is scarcely worth noting that when deviant political attitudes exist in an environment which is intolerant of deviant political behavior, some other expression must be found for those attitudes; and in Germany a partial answer may be conformist electoral participation but invalid voting. In this connection the data associated with the voting machine experiment are not unambiguous. Thus the most interesting aspect of this experiment is perhaps not that the number of invalid votes decreased. but that turnout decreased sharply in each of the four precincts; it may be that the tion; moreover, the increase is faster for the CDU, which absorbed most of these minor party switchovers, than for the SPD. (See above, text and references on "General Patterns" of invalid voting). Another suggestive relationship is the following: the spatial distribution of radical political party strength in postwar Germany has tended to be concentrated along roughly the same belt where the Nazis formerly polled best and where the invalid vote tended later to be highest. Cf. Faul, op. cit., p. 159.

One final remark concerning the mobilization of these peripheral voters may be relevant: in many countries the habitual, uninterested or disaffected nonvoter-type simply stays home; when forced to vote (in Belgium or Luxembourg, or in the cantons of Switzerland or states of Austria where voting is compulsory) he may vote invalidly. In Germany social compulsion replaces legal compulsion but the effect is the same: nonvoters vote invalidly. Cf. above, note 3.

55 Cf. some of the data in J. Habermas, et al., Student und Politik: Eine Soziologische Untersuchung zum Politischen Bewusstsein Frankfurter Studenten (Neuwied: Hermann Luchterhand Verlag, 1961), summarized in part by Kurt Tauber, "Nationalism and Social Restoration: Fraternities in Postwar Germany," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 78 (March, 1963), pp. 83-85; Peter Schoenbach, "German Reactions to Anti-Semitic Incidents—A Sociological Study," in Stahl, ed., op. cit., pp. 329-331. See also Hans-Helmuth Knuetter, "Extreme-Rightism," ibid., pp. 213-228; and Manfred Jenke, Verschwoerung von Rechts? Ein Bericht ueber den Rechtsradikalismus in Deutschland nach 1945 (Berlin, Colloquium Verlag, 1961).

well advertised introduction of voting machines inhibited some voters from going to the polls, all the more so if they intended to cast void or partly void ballots: turnout then became less important than the imagined risk of losing one's anonymity when casting an invalid vote.⁵⁶

Finally, a cursory analysis of void ballots at state and local elections also helps to clarify the general factors which lead voters to spoil their ballots, rather than to cast a valid vote for a candidate or political party. Such an appraisal yields several instructive points. First, in most states participation, invalid votes and the CDU's share of votes all tend to be lower than the comparable figures at national electionspartly because the CDU is unable to mobilize less committed, indifferent women and older voters as effectively in state as in federal elections.⁵⁷ Second, because of the wider lattitude of political choice, there tends to be a greater scattering of votes among independent and splinter party candidates than is true in federal elections-and, perhaps as a consequence, a lower number of spoiled ballot papers are cast by particularist voters who are unable to find the candidate or representative of their choice.58 A third feature of void balloting at the ⁵⁶ Note particularly the sharp 14% drop in Krefeld from 1957 and 15% drop in Dortmund from 1953. See above, Table IV.

⁶⁷ For the basic data, see Faul, ed., op. cit., pp. 321-363; for the extensive literature on sample surveys conducted by state statistical offices, see Bundesamt: 1961(1), pp. 59-67. Cf. Kitzinger, German Electoral Politics, pp. 291-295. There are of course additional reasons for lower participation rates, as well as for the relatively poorer showing of the CDU; see Edinger, op. cit., pp. 436-437; and Erbe, op. cit., pp. 36-39. However, the reason cited seems to be decisive for the lower invalid vote in most cases.

58 For a concise survey of most of the minor and splinter party groups which have appeared since 1945, see Erbe, op. cit., pp. 52-63. Cf. above, the material cited in notes 29, 30, 31, 38; such examples could be multiplied many times over. However, in many cases at the lower levels of selfgovernment, a narrowed range of political choice again obtains and the invalid vote increases: frequent failure of the major parties to nominate candidates for local office in small towns and villages deprives many voters of the opportunity to vote for the party of their choice-in this case usually CDU or SPD—and they respond to that situation by depositing a blank or crossed-out ballot in protest. As a result, the invalid vote in peripheral areas at local elections often exceeds that cast in these same areas in federal elections. For example, in the 1960 communal elections in state and local levels of government is the startling degree to which the reasons for invalid votes often may be traced to highly specific local and personal factors, rather than to questions of national or party politics or to some combination of national and local factors.⁵⁹

III. CONCLUSIONS

Invalid votes are most conspicuous among women, older citizens, village and farm dwellers, previous nonvoters, and supporters or former supporters of minor political parties who now vote CDU or SPD. They are based at once on the most apathetic segments of the population and—drawing as they do from the electorates of the expremist parties as the latter Hessen, the SPD put up a party list in just 900 of the 2600 communities, the CDU in 357, the BHE in 388 and the FDP in 78. Invalid votes varied directly with the number of parties competing in a given commune: the more parties, the fewer invalid votes, and vice versa. In the larger, kreisfreie cities-those detached governmentally and administratively from the county in which they are situated—all the parties put up lists of candidates; there the invalid vote was just 1.3%. The neglected areas were mainly the smaller of the kreisangehoerige towns and villages in less accessible rural areas; in these the invalid vote averaged 6.0%, depending on which party or combination of parties failed to present candidates. In communes where the parties presented lists for the first time in 1960, there was a noticeable retrenchment in the percentage of invalid votes cast in 1956. Hessen, Statistisches Landesamt, Beitraege zur Statistik Hessens, No. 124; and Staat und Wirtschaft in Hessen, Vol. 15 (October, 1960), pp. 253-256.

⁵⁹ A classic example was that of the commune of Rockensuess (Kreis or County Rotenburg), in the 1952 Hessen communal elections, where nearly 55% of the ballots deposited were invalid. Close examination revealed that most of these had been cast in a single polling district, the neighborhood of Cornberg (where 82.7% of the voters spoiled their ballots); Cornberg was campaigning for detachment from Rockensuess and status as a self-governing commune. Hessen. Statistisches Landesamt, Beitraege zur Statistik Hessens, No. 52. A number of personal and local factors in particular Saar communes in 1955 also provide instructive insight; they are described in Freymond, op. cit., pp. 252-254. Cf. especially the case of Webenheim. Schachtner's two articles on invalid voting in Bayern in the early 1950s (see above, notes 16 and 54) are also valuable, particularly for their detailed differentiation of urban and rural patterns.

decline—on political radicals and disaffected persons in outlying regions who have not done well in economic life. Insofar as voter ignorance of the electoral system produces invalid votes, it is centered to a great extent among individuals who are only imperfectly integrated into the West German political system, who are more concerned with personal than with public affairs, and who vote only because they think they ought to or because everyone else does.

Hence there are basically two categories of invalid voters. The first is the apathetic "invalid," who is borderline from the nonvoter, who responds to the general electoral mobilization because it is the thing to do, but who remains actually indifferent to the political system. Whether out of ignorance, negligence or cross-pressures, he fails to cast two valid votes. The second major category is formed by the highly politicized "invalid," who knows exactly how he would vote if he could find the party corresponding to his ideas, but who, not finding that party, deliberately invalidates his ballot as a political act. ⁵⁰ Each of these two groups has its own potential significance.

The highly politicized. To the extent that radical voters are merely leftovers from the authoritarian past, they will in time disappear and the invalid vote based on them will continue to decline. On the other hand, given the gradual narrowing of the political party choice spectrum (both in the number of parties and in the differences between the big "catch-all"

60 This can even be stated as a rule: wherever there is a perceived constriction of political choice, some invalid votes will be cast by those who feel deprived. In addition to the data on German federal, state and local elections presented in this paper, evidence in support of this rule may be found in the first (comparatively less regimented) Nazi and East German elections, in which invalid votes were often unusually frequent, and in some communes even more numerous than valid votes (e.g., at the East German communal elections of 1946); in the Italian elections of 1953, cited in footnote 3; and in occasional single-member constituency elections in Switzerland in which only one candidate has been nominated. See: Germany, Statistisches Reichsamt, Statistisches Jahrbuch fuer das Deutsche Reich, Vol. 53 (Berlin, 1934), p. 550; Bundesministerium fuer Gesamtdeutsche Fragen, Die Wahlen in der Sowjetzone: Dokumente und Materialien (5th ed.; Bonn and Berlin, Deutscher Bundes-Verlag, 1963); Scammon, op. cit., pp. 526-531; and Uwe Kitzinger, "Swiss Electoral Democracy," Parliamentary Affairs, Vol. 13 (Summer, 1960), p. 339.

parties which remain) and the effective closure of the system to new political party aspirants, some groups of otherwise dedicated Bonn citizens may come to feel that the only effective exercise of political opposition which remains open to them is the deposit of void ballots at federal elections. The potential political usefulness of the invalid vote as an avenue of political protest has recently been recognized by Pastor Martin Niemoeller, one of the leading (and most controversial) figures of postwar German Protestantism, who is openly advocating the deposit of void ballots at the forthcoming September, 1965 election. 61

The apathetic. The significance of the apathetic "invalids" is more difficult to assess. To the extent that electoral mobilization has provoked invalid votes by less competent voters in the older age groups, these too may in time decrease. 62 However, to the extent that the apathetic "invalids" are representative of an underdeveloped political interest, involvement and integration incident to much wider circles of the German electorate, they merit attention and raise troublesome questions. For a democracy in which substantial numbers of persons both voting and nonvoting—are, politically speaking, totally uninterested and uninvolved may be one in which democratic political consensus and commitment are relatively low. Scepticism, cynicism and hostility may not be far removed from apathy and ignorance, especially under potential conditions of external or internal crisis.

German political culture is not yet a "given"; the critical questions of boundaries and national identity are still unresolved, producing that curious West German paradox in which politics is both nowhere and everywhere, nothing and everything. §3 As Verba has noted, "the on Niemoeller, a neutralist who opposed German rearmament, was formerly director of the bureau of foreign affairs of the EKD (Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland), and president of the provincial evangelical church of Hessen-Nassau. For Niemoeller's appeal and reasons for casting invalid votes, as well as the sharply critical response of the press and leading politicians, consult: Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, December 30, 1964 and January 4, 1965; Christ und Welt, January 8, 1965; Die Zeit, January 15, 1965.

62 Although we have stressed the dominance of older age groups, it should be pointed out that more than 4.0% of the voters in each age group of both sexes failed to cast two valid votes in both 1957 and 1961. See above. Table III.

⁶³ Cf. Kirchheimer, "German Democracy in the 1950s," pp. 262-265.

future level and form of German political involvement is unpredictable because the issues of German politics—issues connected with both the German past and the German future—are so important." Present stability, without real political integration, may be deceiving or at least vulnerable. Moreover, privatization, while helpful in reducing political and social conflict over the last decade and a half, may only have made it more difficult to perceive and guard against latent forms of antipathy or nonintegration. High voting turnout by indifferent citizens may actually camouflage depoliticization which is more apparent than real. **

In these circumstances the invalid vote may acquire functional significance as a "barometer of discontent"; it can serve political democracy as an early warning system against potentially stabilizing political attitudes existing or forming among the electorate.

But if the invalid vote is to serve as an auxiliary tool by which to study German political cleavage and consensus, we must first learn a great deal more about it. Inclusion of an "invalid vote" lever on the new German voting machines is one step in this direction. Another would be the incorporation of a series of questions designed to illuminate invalid vote patterns and motivations into projected Divo, Emnid and Allensbach studies of the forthcom-

⁶⁴ Verba, "Germany: The Remaking of Political Culture," op. cit.

ing 1965 election.66

The West German invalid vote is not simply technical and cannot be eliminated solely by a program of civic instruction designed to reduce voter error. Rooted in several shades and varieties of political protest, and in a generally low level of mass political interest, involvement and integration with the political system; relatively extensive in comparison with other Western European countries; and possessing a potential significance as a "political barometer" which may reach well beyond the small number of voters it actually encompasses, the invalid vote permits, in limited but useful fashion, insights about a number of complex and important problems of mass political participation in contemporary Western Germany.

66 For an intriguing letter-to-the-editor by a disenchanted German citizen, proposing such survev questions as a means of both exercising political opposition and analyzing it, see Christ und Welt, January &, 1965, p. 11. Unfortunately, the Bundesamt has implied its endorsement of vote-counting measures which would obfuscate rather than clarify invalid vote patterns. It suggests that a more realistic appraisal of the number of invalid votes could be gained if separate ballot papers were used for first and second votes, with the voter free to deposit one or both ballots as he sees fit. The two ballots would then be tallied separately. Abstentions would thus appear statistically as lower turnout rather than as deposited blank (invalid) votes. See: Bundesamt: WS 1962(3), p. 145. No doubt, this would be a convenient device for reducing the per cent of invalid votes, but at the expense of making it even more difficult to assess the possible political significance of invalid votes and their combinations on the ballot papers.

cussion in Ulf Himmelstrand, "A Theoretical and Empirical Approach to Depoliticization and Political Involvement," in Rokkan, ed., op. cit., pp. 83-110, and esp. p. 110; and in Lohmar, op. cit., pp. 28-31.

SCIENTISTS AND THE POLICY PROCESS*

AVERY LEISERSON Vanderbilt University

Alan T. Waterman (retired Director of the National Science Foundation and past president of the A.A.A.S.) recently insisted that there is a considerable difference between observations and perceptual images of scientists' behavior in governmental and policy-making situations when made by scientists and when they are made by persons "outside of science."1 Waterman went on to say that most natural scientists would prefer to write on "science" rather than "scientists" in policy-making. Reflection on the implications of these distinctions raises several fascinating questions. In what senses may there be a political science of science? Are only natural and biological scientists equipped to investigate and interpret the behavior of scientists in non-laboratory, public policy-formulating situations? Is it necessary to have separate "natural-scientific" and "socialscientific"—to say nothing of any number of "humanistic"—views of the political role of science? What does it mean to say that the proper focus of study is the representation of science, rather than scientists in government?

The foregoing questions could be analyzed and argued philosophically; but that is not my purpose here—beyond conveying the reminder that "science makes progress largely by redefining the key questions and problems." The present paper, based on selective interviews and intensive examination of the growing literature on science-government relations, attempts instead to do three things: (1) to identify the principal concepts and models that postulate the separation, but at the same time the vital connection, between the political framework of coercive public authority and the voluntary, established organization of scientific effort in society, and in so doing to make explicit certain attributes and characteristics of science and scientists viewed as a political constituency; (2) to report some findings from a study of scientists in the Executive Office of the President, including an appraisal of the conditions attached to accepting responsibility for shaping controversial decisions of public policy;

* Delivered at the Annual Meetings, American Political Science Association, Chicago, Illinois, September 9, 1964.

¹ Science, Vol. 144 (19 June 1964), p. 1438. A review of R. Gilpin and C. Wright, Scientists and National Policy-Making (New York, Columbia University Press, 1964).

and (3) to distinguish several major, different types or patterns of policy-making affecting science. The paper specifically excludes consideration of the effects of government policy and scientific participation therein upon the conduct of scientific research in government, industry or the universities.

I. SCIENCE AND THE POLITICAL ORDER

The first step in cutting through the conceptual complexity and semantic confusion that bedevil understanding of science-government relations is to develop a skeptical attitude toward divisions of the field into two broad categories, such as Wiesner's differentiation of "science in policy" from "policy for science,"2 Wright's separation of "science" from "science affairs," and Waterman's notion that the "representation of science" in government is somehow different from scientists acting as official advisers and administrators in government positions. Useful as such ideas may be in a preliminary way to introduce order into chaos, it turns out that these distinctions are not really fundamental analytical categories, but are actually labels for different parts of the total problem.

Thus Wiesner very understandably differentiates between (a) the policy problems of recruiting and mobilizing competent scientific advice to work on the formulation of urgent national policies which require a considerable amount of technical, scientific knowledge for their resolution, and (b) working out either in general or in particular areas the terms and conditions of government support for scientific research, manpower, education and information. For different reasons, Wright, along with Wohlstetter and others, properly insist upon the situational and environmental differences between the methods and behavior of scientific workers in the laboratory, when the scientist is engaged in investigating a problem of knowledge, and what is involved when scientists engage upon the external affairs of science, e.g., the work of planning, organization, finance, communication and consultation that links the world of science with education, industry and government. Waterman, finally, groups together what to him are the important issues of public support for science and taking a scientific approach (that taken by scientists) to policy questions—preferring not to discuss the less interesting, perhaps distasteful organizational and administrative problems of getting scientists into jobs at appropriate levels and points of public decision-making. Each of these terms or phrases refers to a problematic aspect of science policy; none of them provides a reliable conceptual map of the field.

² Jerome B. Wiesner, Hearings Before a Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations, House of Representatives, Systems Development and Management, Part 1, 87th Cong., 2d sess. (1962), p. 142.

³ Gilpin and Wright, op. cit., p. 257.

Does such a map exist? The rudiments have been outlined for the United States in Vannevar Bush's famous 1945 report, Science: The Endless Frontier, which should be read with the annotated progress report 15 years later by Alan Waterman,⁴ in penetrating articles by Don K. Price and Wallace Sayre,⁵ and in two comparative sketches by Alexander King.⁶ From these sources we can visualize national science policy (used interchangeably with the term "Government-Science Relations"), as an area comprising the following related elements:

- 1. The values and relations of science to the nation
- The national strategy of scientific development
- 3. Government science organization
- 4. Policies and practices in support of science

Elaboration of these categories should produce a comprehensive picture of the field, understanding of the linkages between the parts and the whole, and identification of the institutional components of the system and processes of science policy-making.

Detailed elaboration of the above categories will have to be reserved for another place. For the present, it must suffice to observe that what we call the values and relations of science to the nation are the authoritative public attitudes and doctrinal beliefs defining the national purposes with respect to science and establishing the boundaries between the scientific and the political communities. By national strategy for science is meant the operative, explicit and implicit norms of the policy processes that guide the determination of goals and priorities

- 4 National Science Foundation, 1960 (NSF-60-40).
- ⁵ Reprinted in Gilpin and Wright, op. cit., pp. 19-40: 97-112.
- ⁶ "Towards A National Science Policy," Impact of Science on Society, Vol. XII (1962), pp. 157-175; "Science and Technology in the New Europe," Daedalus (Winter, 1964), pp. 434-58.

among the competing claims for support of scientific research. Government science organization refers to the official, authoritative definitions of the structure, location and missions of government departments and agencies administering programs of scientific research and development, including the instruments of coordination and communication with the President and Congress. Policies and practices in support of science is a listing of the various kinds and processes of government financing of scientific research, $\epsilon.g.$, (1) basic research; (2) science education, training and manpower; (3) facilities; (4) planning (determination of trends and requirements); (b) budgetary policy (determination of total amounts and allocation of available resources among different programs and projects); (6) government-university and government-industry relationships (including policies governing awards of contracts and grants, indirect costs, conflicts of interest and standards of conduct for persons engaged in government-financed research, etc.); (7) scientific information; (8) civilian technology; and (9) international aspects of science. The list, of course, could be expanded to include the whole range of subject-matter areas of government support for scientific research, such as military weapons, space exploration, atomic energy, medical and agricultural research, down through the more controversial fields of natural resources and conservation, communication and transportation, housing and urban redevelopment, measures for alleviating unemployment and retraining of technologically displaced workers, delinquency and crime, social insurance, and so on throughout the entire agenda of modern government.7

Taking these four categories, with their accompanying subdivisions, to constitute an adequate conceptual outline of the field of government-science relations, it immediately appears that much of what has been called the "politics of science" falls within the first two, which have to do with the constitutional principles that in broad terms define the legitimate. respective spheres of science and government and the relations between them, and the political assumptions that provide the context for controversial decisions establishing goals and priorities among conflicting claims for government support of scientific research. Constitutional principles and political assumptions may be called operative norms, authoritative attitudes, embodied in a public philosophy of science-government relations. As such they are intangible matters of conviction and belief: they also reflect or are associated with very materialistic interests and values; they are at once the product and the source of historical evolution and institutional change. In the United States we have seen both massive, longrun and dramatic, short-run changes in these constitutional attitudes during the twenty-five years since 1940 (for evidence, compare the National Resources Planning Board's 1938 report, Research: A National Resource with Appendix G of the President's Executive Budget for 1964). In this political perspective of changing values, interests, and institutions, what models or theories help to explain the evolving relations of science and government?

⁷ Charles A. Beard, The New Leviathan (New York, 1930) was an early effort to treat American government in the context of science and technology.

Even if we accept the "scientific war" of 1939-1945 as the great divide marking the revolution in the relations between science and politics, there are strong reasons for questioning the representative accuracy of the notion of the pre-1940 scientific world as one inhabited by isolated, autonomous, independent workers in university or industrial laboratories, engaged in a "pure" quest for knowledge for its own sake, motivated only by the curiosity of the truth-seeker. Undoubtedly such individuals existed, but the scientific societies and institutes financed by royal (European) and philanthropic or industrial grants (United States) were always proud to justify their work and activities by the derivative benefits and technological uses of scientific ideas. Moreover, the organization of scientific research comprised the same groupings before 1940 as after 1945 namely, university professors and research assistants engaged in research, industrial research laboratories, government agencies engaged in more or less basic research associated with the missions (purposes) of their parent departments (Naval Observatory, Weather Bureau, Geological Survey, Agricultural Experiment Stations, Bureau of Standards, etc.), and nonprofit research corporations and institutes financed both by private foundations and public capital (Carnegie Institution, Rockefeller Institute, Smithsonian Institution, to name but a few). Scientists were organized into professional associations by disciplines of knowledge, and by cooptive recognition into National Academies of Science for voluntary and cooperative services to the nation upon request. Even the devices of governmental delegation or devolution of scientific research by contract or grant to universities, industrial corporations, or nonprofit research organizations, were known before 1940. The quantum shift that World War II brought about was partly attitudinal, partly materialistic, in the sheer magnitude of changes in dollar volume of governmental support for scientific research. It followed from the mutual recognition of politicians, science administrators and scientific workers that: (a) science and technology were strategically important elements of national strength and power, militarily speaking, (b) science and technology were not merely culturally and educationally advantageous in personal terms, or industrially profitable, but were a national asset and resource upon which national political and economic development depended.

Not all at once, and not without controversy, nations discovered that the advancement of scientific knowledge had become an object of major national policy, not only in conjunction with specific agency programs (Defense, Atomic Energy, Space) but also to encourage and enlarge the supply of scientific manpower in the nation by direct support of scientists engaged in basic research and of institutions engaged in recruiting and educating scientists for the future. This shift in "constitutional thinking" was not brought about by ideological conversion, but by the dramatic demonstration of events, and by scientists who participated in the construction of those events becoming convinced that they should participate in the policy decisions establishing the conditions of government support for scientific growth and progress.

Much of the story of how scientists were mobilized for the nation's service has been and is being written elsewhere. In searching for a model to describe the process whereby the revolution in government-science relations was brought about, the notion of some of the atomic scientists that the effective instrument was their organizing themselves into a pressure group for purposes of popular information and congressional lobbying, I am convinced, has been overstated. The political concept, and the instrument, of the transformation that comes much closer to reality is, in my opinion, Don K. Price's idea of the establishment—that is to say, certain individuals who made themselves useful in the achievement of governmental purposes by showing the politicians and administrators helpful and acceptable ways of mobilizing for government employment the skills and resources of scientists.

8 R. G. Hewlett and O. E. Anderson, The New World: 1939-1946 (Pennsylvania State University Press, 1962); the autobiographical works of A. H. Compton, Harold Groves, and L. L. Strauss; Hunter Dupree, Science in the Federal Government (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1960); D. K. Price, Government and Science (New York, New York University Press, 1954); J. S. Dupre and S. A. Lakoff, Science and the Nation (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1962); D. Wolfle, Science and Public Policy (University of Nebraska Press, 1959); R. Gilpin, American Scientists and Nuclear Policy (Princeton University Press, 1962).

Such relationships of course go back many years. The most recent stage began around 1940, when scientists began to work on weapons technology, such as the development of radar and electronic detection devices, the proximity fuse, and the controlled release of nuclear energy, for the Office of Scientific Research and Development. Such men as Vannevar Bush, J. B. Conant and K. T. Compton were the mediaries between the President, the military and the M.I.T. and California Radiation Laboratories, the Chicago and Los Alamos Metallurgical Projects. Second. some scientists in Britain and the United States began to work on so-called "operations research," constructing mathematical models of alternative military situations, predicting and evaluating the results of alternative weapons systems and strategies. At a lower level, others accepted employment as consultants and advisers to military and civilian agencies, developing and testing technical aspects of their operating programs.

After the war, a new form of assistance to government came on the scene, namely, that of reviewing and advising on the desirability and feasibility of research proposals submitted to government agencies (again both military and civilian) for support; this led naturally to being asked by such agencies to evaluate (including recommendations to proceed with, to modify or to drop) specific scientific or technological programs for budgetary purposes or policy reasons related to the national health and safety. Having earned their keep, as it were, in connection with operating departmental and bureau programs in the military and civilian agencies, it was only a matter of time (1951) and Sputnik (1957) before scientists were drafted into service at the highest executive and legislative levels of government to evaluate competing programs and proposals between departments for budgetary and other policy reasons, to study specific areas of science to identify new opportunities for research and development, to formulate coherent national programs of research support, and to advise on organizational responsibilities involving the most effective coordination and economic allocation of scientific resources.9 In all this, by making their services available, valuable, and sought after by the government, scientists were not acting in a representative capacity, speaking for the scientific community and bringing pressure to bear upon government after the manner of a pressure group, but rather were acting as a skill group of varying technical specialties, individually contributing their services as members of the official team (not to say "family") determining policy for science-related and science-affecting government programs.

⁹ Harvey Brooks, "The Scientific Adviser," in Gilpin and Wright, op. cit., pp. 74-75.

Now, it is not quite accurate to say that the scientific establishment acts only through individuals. Their ability, reputation and contribution are the product of a complex system of professional training, competence, standards, performance, recognition, and employment by a university, industrial concern, foundation or government giving them autonomous and prestigious status in society. The utilization of scientists as a professional skill group resembles that of the lawyers more than the military specialists, whose recruitment, training and equipment is that of a special class of government service. In contrast with the differentiated processes of formal litigation and the application of organized force that the legal and military groups have developed, there is as yet no technique conventionally recognized as a distinctive process of scientific policy-making and execution, in the general sense of "the systematic application of logico-experimental methods of testing knowledge to the solution of public problems." The calling or vocation of science may share common or general standards of competence and evidence for ascertaining truth, including personal and social values required for supporting the advancement of knowledge, 10 but the methods of science seem to be limited by the nature of the subjectmatter and the technical specialties appropriate to the analysis of the particular segment of reality selected for investigation. Scientists may become politicians or administrators, just as lawyers do, but the fact that the content of so many political decisions has become heavily scientific has not yet produced a transformation (or adaptation) of governmental decision-making processes to the scientific model for resolving conflicts of opinion, interest or power. We cannot yet specify an agreed-upon statement of the requisite conditions of a scientific model for public decision-making, 11 operations research and game theory to the contrary notwith-standing.

¹⁰ Max Weber, "The Vocation of Science," in H. Gerth and C. W. Mills, From Max Weber: Essays in General Sociology (Oxford, 1946); W. R. Schilling, "Scientists, Foreign Policy and Politics," in Gilpin and Wright, op. cit., pp. 144 ff; D. Bell, "Twelve Modes of Prediction," Daedalus (Summer 1964), pp. 845–80.

We thus are obliged to conclude for the time being that the scientific community is not organized nor does it act in the conventional sense of a political constituency or interest group. Its usefulness to government consists in objective skills associated with control of the material environment.12 Scientists as a technical, policy-making skill group are organized on a craft and confederation basis cutting across the private and governmental economies; they are represented in the public order by a variety of cooptive, consultative, contractual, employment and subsidy arrangements. Instead of visualizing a single process or agency (such as a Department of Science) staffed by scientists prepared to apply a distinctive body of concepts and techniques to the solution of problems, we must continue to visualize and invent improved ways of associating different kinds of scientists with different kinds of responsibilities for achieving public purposes, at operating, staff, executive and legislative levels.13

II. REPRESENTATION OF SCIENCE IN THE EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

1960-61 there were approximately 1,400,000 professional scientists and engineers in the United States; some 387,000 were working on federally financed research and development: 201,000 scientists (relatively few engineers) reported to the National Register of Scientific and Technical Personnel, and about 155,000 scientists and engineers were employed by the federal government. Robert C. Wood and Christopher Wright have independently estimated the size of the science establishment -depending upon whether one takes the criterion of "consistently influential in national science policy" or "continually engaged in the conduct of national science affairs" at from 200-400 at the lower limit to 800-1,000 at the

TABLE I. INSTITUTIONAL AFFILIATIONS OF MEMBERS OF PANELS, SUBPANELS, AND CONSULTANTS TO THE PRESIDENT'S SCIENCE ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 1962-63*

Category	Number	Per Cent
University scientists and administrators	153	50.7
Research foundations, insti- tutes, contractors	53	18.3
Industrial research execu- tives Government scientists and	52	18.2
administrators	32	10.8
Total	290	100.0

* I am indebted to Mr. Daniel Z. Beckler, Assistant to the Director, Office of Science and Technology, for access to the materials from which this table was compiled.

upper.¹⁴ During the winter of 1962-63, the writer had the opportunity of examining the names and institutional affiliations of persons currently serving as members of panels, subpanels and consultants to the President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC). There were 290 individuals of whom one-half were affiliated with universities in either a scientific or administrative capacity, one-fifth each came from private, nonprofit research institutes and from industry, and one-tenth were government scientists or administrators. Most of them worked on a part-time basis, of course, presumably on leave of absence from, or in addition to. regular research, teaching or administrative duties.

Taking them by their institutional affiliations, the 22 members of the PSAC and alumni consultants-at-large were numerically dominated by university professors (16), the remaining six being divided between medical research (2), university or business administration (2) and industrial research (2). By scientific occupation, physics and electrical engineering dominated the group (12); next came chemists and the chemical engineers (4), with medical research and administration (4), and finally mathematics (2). Informal, personal and experimental bases of group alignments within PSAC remain to be derived from career and' interview data. For example, a number served on the Research and Development Board and advisory committee structure of the Defense Department and the Atomic Energy Commis-¹¹ Huxley's Brave New World; Orwell's 1984; Harvey Wheeler, Science and Democratic Government (Center for Study of Democratic Institutions); and the literary attack upon C. P. Snow's The Two Cultures and the Scientific Revolution are familiar illustrations of the controversies. But see J. Bronowski's Science and Human Values (1956) and K. Polanyi's Personal Knowledge (1958).

R. C. Wood, "Scientists As an A-Political Elite," in Gilpin and Wright, op. cit., pp. 41-72.
 D. Lerner and H. C. Lasswell, eds., The Policy Sciences (Stanford University Press, 1949);
 D. Lerner, ed., The Human Meaning of the Social Sciences (Meridian Books, 1959).

¹⁴ Gilpin and Wright, op. cit., pp. 48, 273.

sion; several were associated with the M.I.T. and Berkeley Radiation Laboratories during World War II. Geographically, the residences of the PSAC members were concentrated among states on the east coast (17), with only 2 from the west coast and 3 from the midwest. Terms of appointment to PSAC are normally for four years; reappointment is not uncommon, so that about half of those serving in 1962-63 had been members in 1958. The average age of the members was reported in 1963 to be 49. The recruitment process appears to be one of co-optation, governed by the following factors: (1) experience, contribution and distinction during World War II; (2) distinguished service and prominence on departmental or agency advisory committees in the Department of Defense or the Atomic Energy Commission; (3) the presidency or high office in the National Academy of Sciences; (4) distinguished service with one of the outstanding private research foundations: (5) major theoretical or technical contributions to basic science. As time goes on, we may expect the importance of (1) and (5) to decline relatively to the other three. There is a remarkable continuity and overlapping of names on the rosters of OSRD and the research organizations it supported, the consultants and advisers to the Office of Naval Research and Research and Development Board of the Defense Department (1947-53), the Defense Science Board (after 1953), and the General Advisory Committee of the Atomic Energy Commission.

These data go far to support Huntington's thesis that the group affiliations and the interpenetration of institutional hierarchies are two of the critical indices for assessing the political influence of policy-making elites (in that case, the military).15 When to them is added the criterion of association (through consultation and recommendation) with the allocation of tremendous sums for particular weapons systems, approval or "scratching" of broad, national programs of support for both research and facilities, and assignment of respective organizational responsibilities, there is no doubt that the university scientists have acquired a strong position among the seats of the mighty. However, certain conditional features of their influence should be specified, both of a positive and negative character.

First, and perhaps the most important dependent variable, is their technical usefulness to the Chief Executive, namely, to review and evaluate objectively the competing, interested, bureaucratic claims (from the military or civilian agencies of government, university or industrial interests) for the need and priority of their research or operating programs, all of which have their own scientific protagonists. It is this variable, probably, which explains the atmosphere and environment of secrecy surrounding PSAC proceedings, in what C. P. Snow calls "closed committee politics." Scientific advice also loses its helpfulness to the Chief Executive if he cannot trust technical recommendations tainted by special scientific interests, personalistic drives, and political motivations either in the partisan or the interest group sense. At the same time, scientists do not relish publicity among their colleagues with respect to their personal responsibility for official decisions vitally affecting the lives, interests and reputations of their professional colleagues. Closely connected with these implicit factors in the environment of decision is the hard fact that the scientific, technical alternatives-quite aside from the intangible assumptions about the national interest-are neither understood by nor susceptible to the test of public preference and popular satisfaction. For such considerations the Chief Executive must assume responsibility (in the basic sense of political representation), until such time as we can invent ways of sharing his authority with leaders of legislative and influential group opinion. Interest group negotiation on behalf of publicly informed constituencies would destroy the utility and defeat the purpose of objective deliberation and scientific recommendation in the Executive office. 17

¹⁵ S. P. Huntington, The Soldier and the State (Random House, Vintage Books, 1964), pp. 88-9.

The second structural, dependent variable which qualifies the influence of non-government scientists on the PSAC is their relation to the President's Special Assistant for Science and Technology. While the members collectively have the right to elect their own chairman and to report directly to the President, under all four Assistants (Killian, Kistiakowsky, Wiesner and Hornig) they have in fact chosen the President's Assistant as their chairman, and found communication and reporting through him quite compatible with maintenance of their professional objectivity and public responsibility. This balance or equilibrium is extremely important, because the President cannot talk familiarly and confidentially to a committee of part-time consultants and advisers, while the usefulness of his Science Adviser depends very largely upon the latter's ability to mobilize the working energies and retain the respect of leading scientists throughout the nation. When this relation is operational, the PSAC serves the nation in giving the President competent help not only in deciding complex specific issues of weapons technology, affecting military and foreign policy, but also in broad decisions as to areas and programs of scientific research to support. Through a series of educational reports, it helps him to lead and create public and congressional opinion concerning the conditions, uses, limitations and needs of scientific progress.

¹⁶ Science and Government (Harvard University Press, 1960), pp. 56-66.

¹⁷ D. K. Price, Science, Vol. 142 (6 December 1963).

The third conditioning variable is the relationship between the non-government (mostly university) scientists on the PSAC and the government scientists and science administrators. The diversified, hierarchical governmental structure requires some formal mechanism, which usually takes the form of an interdepartmental committee, and since 1959 has been called the Federal Council for Science and Technology (FCST). This also is chaired by the President's Special Assistant, and is composed of eight other government officials, either the chairman or administrator of a major science agency (NASA; AEC; NSF) or the assistant secretary or principal science adviser to the Secretaries of the largest scienceaffecting departments (Agriculture, Commerce, Defense, HEW, and Interior). Like PSAC, the FCST works primarily through committees and subcommittees. In 1962-63 there were nine standing committees, composed of some 70-80 subordinates of the nine Council members, and a secretarial staff drawn from the Office of Science and Technology and Bureau of the Budget. Here all the problems of government structure and hierarchy are presented: the government laboratory scientists have to filter their views through administrative superiors; bureau chiefs have their own problems of access and influence with department heads, assistant secretaries and other bureau chiefs; and the principals on the Federal Council are themselves mostly at a level below the Secretarial or Cabinet level, and so cannot report directly to the President. Government scientists therefore feel that they are under-represented in the Executive Office, in prestige and influence, compared to non-government scientists in the PSAC. This is probably unavoidable, unless in the unlikely event that the President were to delegate—and so downgrade -the staff function of his Special Assistant for Science to a Cabinet (Interdepartmental) Committee. The PSAC is very much aware of the problems of government science: it was responsible for the creation of the FCST in 1959. Through the leadership and initiative of the President's Assistant, it has invited many government scientists, members of the Council and their alternates to serve on PSAC panels; it has encouraged and participated in several investigations and reports dealing with the problems of recruiting, compensating, moralebuilding and retaining scientists in government employment: it has fostered and supervised the work of several interdepartmental committees. notably in oceanography and atmospheric sciences, which developed coordinated, longrange, inter-agency programs of government research support. In the last analysis, however, the PSAC's and the Special Assistant's value consist not in solving the administrative problems of government science—to which they can contribute only tangentially-but in their detachment from departmental, agency and bureau programs, and in bringing their objective judgment to bear on the national problems of balancing the programs and interests of university, government, and industrial research.

The first postwar presidential science adviser (Oliver Buckley of the Bell Telephone Laboratories), appointed in 1951 by President Truman, came from industry. But his four successors have been university-affiliated, and industrial scientists have never constituted more than a small minority of PSAC and its panels. Industrial research executives have been more prominent on Defense and AEC advisory and consultative groups, as perhaps might be expected, in connection with operating programs of applied research and development, rather than in promotion of basic science or at the Executive Office level. On the other hand, private research foundations have contributed significantly to the personnel of presidential science consultation, beginning with Vannevar Bush from the Carnegie Institution and continuing through Detlev Bronk of the Rockefeller Institute and National Academy of Sciences (which in the United States is a nongovernment instrumentality, although chartered by Act of Congress in 1863).

At one time it was thought that the National Science Board and its Director under the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 would become an instrument of science representation and national science policy-making. Under its first Director, Alan T. Waterman (1950–1963), the National Science Board became representative more of college and university presidents than of scientists, and the Board confined itself to policy development primarily in the fields of basic research, education and government-university relations rather than in the coordination of government science policies generally, or in the resolution of science-related policy issues involving military or other agencies at the presidential level. The Board and the Foundation have always contributed greatly through staff assistance and other help to the work of PSAC and the Presidential Science Assistants, particularly in the fields of scientific manpower and education. In 1962, President Kennedy's Reorganization Plan No. 2 (87th Cong., 2d sess., H.R. Doc. 372) creating the Office of Science and Technology (OST) in the Executive Office of the President, headed by the President's Special Assistant, finally transferred the statutory powers of the National Science Board for evaluation, review and coordination of federal science programs to the OST.

It is still too soon to evaluate properly the effects of the 1962 action giving statutory status to the Presidential Science Adviser as Director of OST, almost parallel to the Director of the Budget and the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. The significance of the step was a gesture to Congressional feelings of ignorance and uncertainty concerning the facts and responsibilities for important policy decisions affecting science being made in the Executive Office. The first Director of OST, in his testimony justifying establishment of the Office, made the explicit distinction between matters of confidential advice to the President on issues where scientific questions were concerned, and matters of overall review, evaluation and coordination of the very large and growing scientific research programs of the federal government. The implication was that Congress had the right to know the considerations underlying Presidential budgetary and policy recommendations requiring Congressional authorization and appropriation of funds. We still lack detailed knowledge of whether Wiesner was able to maintain this distinction in testifying before Congressional committees, avoiding exposure of the personalities associated with differences of view and final disposition of issues, while satisfying the congressmen of the completeness of his reports and the soundness and accuracy of decisions made by the Executive branch. It is the counterpart of the distinction that Edwin G. Nourse, first Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, insisted upon, in refusing to testify before the congressional Joint Committee on the Economic Report in support of the President's program. 18 Congressional agitation

¹⁸ See his memoir, Economics in the Public Service (New York, 1953), esp. pp. 203, 221, 270; and Corinne Silverman, The President's Economic Advisers, Inter-University Case Program, No. 48 (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill), reprinted in E. A. Bock and A. K. Campbell, eds., Case Studies in has not disappeared for additional machinery to oversee and administer federal science policy—witness the 1963 Report of the Senate Government Operations Committee, Establishment of a Commission on Science and Technology, 19 on S. 816 (McClellan), and Senator Bartlett's bill (S. 2038) to establish a Joint Congressional Committee and Office of Science and Technology.

To sum up this discussion of scientific representation at the highest levels of government, one may ask whether the term "scientific establishment" is appropriate to describe the formal-informal, inter-agency, composite structure of policy advice and consultation, the contract-and-subsidy-supported, decentralized administration of scientific research and development that unites universities, private foundations, industry contractors and government bureaus in the nation's scientific effort. But regardless of the label, one must agree with President Lee DuBridge of the California Institute of Technology that the crucial questions involved in the science-government relation are not whether but now the government is to enlist the help of the most competent, available members of the scientific community in meeting its problems in the revolutionary age of science and technology; and how the government organizes and applies the diverse institutional components of this community to the science-related issues affecting the public interest and the fostering of scientific progress. We must also agree with him that the criteria of evaluation are whether the scientists' contribution has been characterized by the highest levels of competence, breadth of vision and foresight, personal objectivity and conscien-

American Government (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1962), pp. 301-24. Unlike Wiesner, Nourse wanted to dissociate himself from the advice the President took, while maintaining the scientific integrity of the Council's Economic Report; he soon found his position untenable.

19 88th Cong., 1st sess. S. Rep. No. 16. The hearings and report reveal that the idea of a federal department of science is by no means defunct, both as a vehicle for congressional control and some scientists' conception of how science policy should be made, notwithstanding the almost unanimous opposition of the scientific establishment and informed political scientists.

The Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress has lately formed a Science Policy Research Division, headed by Edward C. Welsh, Jr., formerly Executive Secretary of the National Aeronautics and Space Council. New York Times, August 30, 1964.

tiousness, in the most inclusive sense of the nation's interests.²⁰

III. THE ROLES OF SCIENCE IN POLICY

Science and scientists are represented in the political and governmental order because of their utility (one might say indispensability) not because of their omniscience or correctness of judgment.21 The problem of scientific representation, then, is not a case of an omnipotent, ruling clique, but a significant case in the general problem of the relation of the expert in the policy-shaping process. In the first section of this paper, the concept of that process as conforming or analogous to the model of the scientific worker in the laboratory was rejected. Several different functional roles in public service were distinguished which scientists have successfully demonstrated their competence to fill. These roles may be briefly recapitulated:

- 1. Scientific laboratory research in cooperation with government agencies,
 - (a) in government laboratories (basic or applied)
 - (b) in industrial laboratories (applied, development and testing)
- (c) in universities (basic and applied).2. Direct support of basic research: review and evaluation of proposals for research
- support (e.g., panels of NSF and NIH).

 3. Authorization and review of research programs (in-house, contracted, or subsidized), communication into policy channels, and translation into policy alternatives for decision:
 - (a) technical consultation or service
 - (b) administrative: continuing supervision, evaluation.
- 4. Research on the politics of choice (prediction and evaluation of alternative strategies of decision).
- 5. Formulation of specific or broad, coherent programs of research support through government funding:
 - (a) mission-related, within agencies
 - (b) inter-agency programs
 - (c) science education; recruitment and training of scientific manpower.
- 6. Evaluation, coordination, allocation of all scientific programs:
 - (a) among fields of basic scientific research
- ²⁰ "Policy and the Scientists," Foreign Affairs (April, 1963), pp. 571-88.
- ²¹ The essays by Albert Wohlstetter and Bernard Brodie in the Gilpin and Wright volume provide ample evidence for the fallibility and limitations of scientific judgment in policy situations.

- (b) between basic, applied R&D, and agency missions
- (c) general policies for modes of research support (contracts vs. grants; project vs. institutional; indirect costs; government-industry-university relationships).

Generally speaking, the kinds of services listed proceed from the more technical to the more policy-oriented, from the operating levels of agency research programs to the staff and higher policy levels of departmental and government-wide management and coordination. The recruitment and upward mobility of scientists into administrative work and government policy committees proceeds to some extent along the line of progression from function I to 6. But the distinction between the technical aspects of knowledge tested and testable by research, and the applications of knowledge in policy is but a matter of degree.22 As the character of problems departs from those which can be stated and answered with almost complete precision and certainty, to those about which information on the several variables is uncertain and the inferences debatable, to those about which the variables, the respective weights and conclusions are all speculative, the problem is not simply a matter of substituting the judgment of the policymaker for the expert's but one of eliciting the contribution of each and finding an appropriate balance between the several expertnesses involved. It is most interesting to observe the parallels between the recent thought about the contributions of the military to policy and that of the scientists.23 The contemporary emphasis in both fields seems to be upon professional objectivity and balance in the presentation of the technical, i.e., the military or the scientific, factors and viewpoints, along with the political, economic or moral aspects of the particular policy problem. If then, to adapt Huntington's terminology to another context, high professional objectivity is associated with low political (electoral) involvement and high popular prestige, the contemporary relations between science and government would appear to be consistent with a long-standing American tradition.

- ²² H. D. Smyth, "Science and National Policy," Walter J. Shepard Lecture, Ohio State University, February 8, 1961.
- ²³ See testimony of Col. G. A. Lincoln and appendices, Hearing Before (Jackson) Subcommittee of Committee on Government Operations, U. S. Senate, 88th Cong., 2d sess., "Administration of National Security," Part 9 (June 25, 1964), esp. pp. 560-1.

DEMOCRACY, ORGANIZATION, MICHELS

JOHN D. MAY Yale University

This article marks an attempt to clarify the teachings of Robert Michels. It suggests that in Political Parties: A Sociological Study of the Oligarchical Tendencies of Modern Democracy (1915), Michels presented a favorable account of the compatibility of organization and democracy.

Other treatments attribute to Michels a thesis of the following kind: (1) Large, organizationally complex associations, compared with small, simple associations, are likely to be governed by cliques whose powers (disposable resources, freedom of action, security of tenure) are abundant and whose policies (use of official status and resources) deviate from the policy-preferences of their constituents. (2) Increments of Organization (of scale, or members, and of complexity, or procedural formality, functional differentiation, stratification, specialization, hierarchy, and bureaucracy) augment the powers and the policy-deviating propensities of leaders vis-à-vis followers.

¹ See S. M. Lipset's introduction to the Collier Books edition (1962) of Political Parties, and the commentaries cited by Lipset. For additional statements or approximations of this version of Michels's thesis, and some challenges, see the following: P. M. Blau and W. R. Scott, Format Organizations (Chandler, 1962), pp. 48, 228; R. C. Brooks, Political Parties and Electoral Problems (Harper, 1933), p. 30; F. W. Coker, Recent Political Thought (Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1934), p. 328; R. A. Dahl and C. E. Lindblom, Politics, Economics and Welfare (Harper, 1953), pp. 279-85; A. W. Gouldner, ed., Studies in Leadership, pp. 418-35 (T. W. Adorno) and 477-504 (B. Barber); H. S. Hughes, Consciousness and Society (Vintage, 1951), ch. 7; Suzanne Keller, Beyond the Ruling Class (Random House, 1963), pp. 72-3, 80, 263, 273-74; Arthur Kornhauser and others, eds., Industrial Conflict (McGraw-Hill, 1954), ch. 9 (L. H. Fisher and G. McConnell); H. D. Lasswell and A. Kaplan, Power and Society (Yale, 1950); R. M. MacIver, The Web of Government (Macmillan, 1959), pp. 122, 140, 434; R. T. McKenzie, British Political Parties (Praeger, 1964 ed.), pp. 15-17, ch. 11; C. E. Merriam and H. E. Barnes, eds., A History of Political Theories: Recent Times (Macmillan, 1924), pp. 56-67, 383; Max Nomad, Aspects of Revolt (Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1959), ch. 1; Robert Presthus, The Organizational Society (Knopf, 1962), pp. 4, 41-52; It probably is true that in Michels's terms, a system where leaders possess the means and the disposition to ignore their followers' will (or wills) is an undemocratic system.² It is not true that on Michels's showing, organization is relatively inhospitable to democratic leader-follower relations. It is not true that Michels portrays increments of Organization as breeders, persistently and proportionally, of counter-democratic changes. Instead, he argues (in a complex but not inconsistent manner) that Organization is incompatible with the attainment or maintenance of absolute democracy and yet can be a source, in many cases and in many ways, of democratization.

It is true that Michels deplored Organization. It is true that Michels voiced a profound pessimism about the fate of mankind, a pessimism rooted in conceptions of the indispensability and the consequences of Organization. It is not true that Michels's pessimism was the pessimism of a democrat.

Far from being a democrat, Michels was a

J. M. Pfiffner and F. P. Sherwood, Administrative Organization (Prentice-Hall, 1960), p. 338; Giovanni Sartori, Democratic Theory (Wayne State University Press, 1962), pp. 42, 82, 100, 120-28, 134; David Spitz, Patterns of Anti-Democratic Thought (Macmillan, 1949), esp. p. 27 and the treatment in Part II of James Burnham's The Machiavellians; D. B. Truman, The Governmental Process (Knopf, 1955), pp. 137-55; and Dwight Waldo, "Development of Theory of Democratic Administration," this Review, Vol. 46 (March 1952), pp. 100-01.

² Michels does not use the terms "democracy," "oligarchy," and "crganization" in a consistent or coherent manner. The terminological difficulties have been probed by C. W. Cassinelli, in "The Law of Oligarchy," this REVIEW, Vol. 47 (Sept. 1953), p. 3 f. However, Michels persistently associates democracy with equality, with conditions suggesting the notion of popular sovereignty, and with the "system in which delegates represent the mass and carry out its will." On the other hand, he speaks of "The notion of the representation of popular interests, a notion to which the great majority of democrats... cleave. . . . " Political Parties, trans. Eden and Cedar Paul (Dover Publications, 1959), esp. pp. 1-2, 27, 401. References hereafter will be to this edition unless designated otherwise.

Romantic Revolutionist. He deplored the "conservative" effects of Organization—its general tendency to facilitate the maintenance of a society which is not and cannot be perfectly democratic, and its particular tendency to dissipate "revolutionary currents" in society. But by his account, Organization is counter-revolutionary precisely because it facilitates the amelioration of discontents and injustices; it facilitates democratization.

Far from being a democrat, moreover, Michels was a Scientific Paternalist. He portrayed, and lamented, Organization as the nemesis of authority-systems wherein leaders possess the means and the disposition to voice the scientifically ascertained Interests of the "mass." But by his account, Organization facilitates the advent and the maintenance of leaders who are able and willing to express the manifest wills of their clients or constituents.

Such, at any rate, is the interpretation which seems consistent with the following analysis of (I) Michels's account of general historical trends, (II) his basic reasoning, and (III) his treatment of the Socialist experience.

T

According to Michels's account of general trends, democratization has persistently accompanied Organization.

The modern era, in which "political and economic life" acquires increasingly "complex forms," and in which massive bureaucratization occurs in the state and industry and labor, is "what we know as the era of democracy." Only the "blind and fanatical" fail to perceive that "the democratic current daily makes undeniable advance."

Modern "state institutions" exhibit "increasing democratization." Human "freedoms and privileges" have broadened. The workers are enjoying "better conditions of labor;" their burgeoning aptitude for "criticism and control" is bound to increase further "in proportion as the economic status of the masses undergoes improvement and becomes more stable, and as the masses are admitted more effectively to the advantages of civilization."

Michels stipulates that in "the sphere of party" as contrasted with "the sphere of the state," democracy is in a "descending phase." Yet he testifies that a "democratic external form" prevails among modern parties. The aristocratic parties have come to espouse "democratic" policies, and some liberal and

The foregoing citations are not arbitrarily selective. Michels does not specifically name any associations in which democracy has been attenuated by Organization.

His contradictory testimony concerning party evolution may be ascribed to at least two sources. On the one hand, it may be ascribed to inconsistent, ambiguous use of the term "party." Sometimes "party" denotes an existential aggregate; sometimes if refers to a hypothetical aggregate. Thus, the so-called, existential 'parties' have not manifested counter-democratic changes, but hypothetical, authentic 'parties' must undergo such changes.

On the other hand, his contradictory testimony may be ascribed to inconsistent, ambiguous use of the term "democracy." Sometimes "democracy" signifies close control by followers over leaders; sometimes it signifies a distinctive associational character (an ideological, sociological, operational uniqueness) and a moral commitment to the cause of social-democratic revolution.

Only in the latter unconventional sense, and only with respect to hypothetical aggregates, does he sustain the argument that 'parties' necessarily undergo a counter-'democratic' transformation.

)11.

II

According to Michels's basic reasoning, Organization precludes democracy, and can destroy democracy, and can facilitate democratization.

These three propositions are not contradictory. The first pertains to what is ultimately attainable. The others pertain to what can happen in various situations.

Organization precludes democracy. Michels argues persuasively that the presence of Organization is incompatible with the presence of democracy:

conservative parties have worked "essentially" for "socialist ideas and for the victory of the proletariat." The Socialist International has changed from an "individual dictatorship" into "a federal republic consisting of several independent oligarchies." Nearly every Socialist and labor group has manifested "tendencies toward decentralization," tendencies which create pluralistic rather than monistic oligarchies. In the German Socialist and labor parties, an "enormous increase" in membership and in organizational development has been accompanied by changes from "dictatorship" to "oligarchy" and to "theoretical and applied democracy."

³ Pp. 33, 40.

⁴ P. 402.

⁵ Pp. 329, 406.

⁶ Pp. 3, 5, 5n, 11, 63, 190, 194, 201.

Organization implies the tendency to oligarchy....Immanent oligarchical tendencies [exist] in every kind of human organization which strives for the attainment of definite ends....Oligarchy is...a preordained form of the common life of great social aggregates.... The majority of human beings, in a condition of eternal tutelage, are predestined... to submit to the dominion of a small minority, and must... constitute the pedestal of an oligarchy.... Leadership is a necessary phenomenon in every form of social life [and] every system of leadership is incompatible with the most essential postulates of democracy.... All order and civilization must exhibit aristocratic features.

This reiterated proposition seems logically unassailable, so long as two considerations are kept in mind: (a) the proposition pertains only to the attainability of 'pure' democracy, or absolute equality; and (b) "oligarchy" signifies not the antithesis of democracy, but a condition occupying the ground between pure democracy and pure autocracy.

With these considerations noted, the basis of his proposition can readily be appreciated. The presence of Organization signifies the presence of an association whose members are so numerous that it is technically difficult for all to participate equally in all decisions. This condition also is technically incompatible with the exercise by one member of direct control over the formulation and implementation of policies.

Similarly, the presence of Organization signifies the presence of a "system" of leadership, or of subordinate-superordinate relations, together with an established pattern of differentiated tasks, responsibilities, privileges and resources. These conditions are incompatible with equality—and with autocracy. There must be inequalities, and the inequalities must be multiple. Various tasks and resources are vested in various members of the association, each being endowed with a particular expertise and a particular decisional jurisdiction.

In short, Organization necessitates "oligarchy"—that is, arrangements which are neither absolutely democratic nor absolutely autocratic.

⁷ Pp. 11, 32, 390, 400, 402.

Between the poles of pure democracy and pure autocracy lies an enormous range of variations. Although no "system of leadership" can be democratic, some can be less undemocratic than others. Variations can arise from differences in the rules, in the social composition, and in other traits of associations.

Michels does not say, nor does he imply, that the extent of deviation from pure democracy must be directly related to the size or complexity of organization. He does not exclude the possibility that increments of democratization can accompany increments of scale and complexity. Thus his proposition that Organization precludes (absolute) democracy is logically compatible with his reports that democratization has persistently accompanied Organization.

Organization can destroy democracy. Michels devotes most of his attention not to the proposition that Organization is a condition which precludes (absolute) democracy, but to the proposition that Organization is an agent which destroys (absolute) democracy:

Democracy leads to oligarchy, and necessarily contains an oligarchical nucleus... When democracies have gained a certain stage of development, they undergo a gradual transformation, adopting the aristocratic spirit, and in many cases also the aristocratic forms, against which at the outset they struggled so fiercely... Oligarchy... issues from democracy... Organization is ... the source from which the conservative currents flow over the plain of democracy... The formation of oligarchies within the various forms of democracy is the outcome of organic necessity. 10

The proposition contained in these passages has been persistently misunderstood. It is not that Organization breeds Oligarchy; it is that Democracy leads (through Organization) to Oligarchy. The difference is momentous.

Michels's proposition—his Iron Law of Oligarchy—is a statement about what must happen in groups which initially are democracies. Only when democracy is present initially can it be slain by Organization. Democracy is not self-evidently present in all groups which lack Organization. Some small, primitive groups may be run by bullies; others may be isocracies, or associations of equals. Only in the latter instances can the onset of Organization be blamed for the demise of Democracy.

⁸ We are excluding here Michels's arguments for the indispensability of Organization and his suggestions that the process of Organization tends to be self-accelerating. Attention is confined to the question of what arrangements can be compatible with the presence of Organization.

⁹ For a sophisticated discussion of these processes and of some implications, see Langer, above, note 1, esp. ch. 3.

¹⁰ Pp. viii, 22, 168, 402, 408.

Scholars have persistently inferred that Michels's Law applies, or can apply, to a much broader range of cases—perhaps to the generality of voluntary associations, or of social movements, or of human groups. Michels has been credited with the broad proposition that increments of Organization invariably yield increments of Oligarchy. This misunderstanding may be due to a misapprehension concerning his use of key words. The key words are emphasized in the following passages:

In every organization, whether it be a political party, a professional union, or any other association of the kind, the aristocratic tendency manifests itself very clearly. The mechanism of the organization, while conferring a solidity of structure, induces serious changes in the organized mass, completely inverting the respective position of the leaders and the led. As a result of organization, every party or professional union becomes divided into a minority of directors and a majority of directed.¹²

Reduced to its most concise expression, the fundamental sociological law of political parties (the term "political" being used in its most comprehensive significance) may be formulated in the following terms: "It is organization which gives birth to the dominion of the elected over the electors, of the mandatories over the mandators, of the delegates over the delegators. Who says organization, says oligarchy." 13

The crucial point here is that by "political parties" and "professional unions" Michels does not mean the generality of so-called, historical parties and unions. Instead, he uses these terms to designate the "kind" of association which is emphasized in Marxian thought: association by social class. This qualification is of vital importance.

According to the Marxian formulation, the members of a social class are equal to one another and are endowed with identical needs. If they actively associate, the initial relationship among them must be democratic. The leaders initially will be equal in resources to the followers and will exemplify the policy-preferences of their followers. In Michels's terms, then, who says "party" says initial democracy. Thus,

The term "party" presupposes that among the individual components of the party there should exist a harmonious direction of wills toward identical objective and practical aims. Where this is lacking, the party becomes a mere "organization." ¹⁴

Similarly, in a "party,"

Originally the chief is merely the servant of the mass. The organization is based upon the absolute equality of its members. Equality is here understood in its most general sense, as an equality of like men. . . . The democratic principle aims at guaranteeing to all an equal influence and an equal participation in the regulation of the common interests. All are electors, and all are eligible for office. . . . All offices are filled by election. The officials, executive organs of the general will, play a merely subordinate part, are always dependent upon the collectivity, and can be deprived of their office at any moment. The mass of the party is omnipotent. 15

From this romantic premise of "pure democracy," Michels unfolds his tragic tale of degeneration wrought by Organization. In "the sphere of party," with "the advance of organization, democracy tends to decline." As far as party life is concerned,

It may be enunciated as a general rule that the increase in the power of the leaders is directly proportional with the extension of the organization. In the various parties and labor organizations of different countries the influence of the leaders is mainly determined . . . by the varying development of organization. Where organization is stronger, we find that there is a lesser degree of applied democracy.¹⁶

Given this premise of initial democracy, Michels is logically free to argue that only at a ¹⁴ P. 376; emphasis added. He also says, "A party is neither a social unity nor an economic unity." (p. 387) His characterization of change in parties, however, presupposes initial unity. See section III below, under Social Pluralism.

15 Pp. 27-8. Omitted from this quotation is a contradictory remark, illuminating Michels's chronic confusion about the difference between hypothesis and history. He remarks that the "equality of like men" is "manifested" in some cases (i.e., Socialist labor groups) "by the mutual use of the familiar 'thou,' which is employed by the most poorly paid wage-laborer in addressing the most distinguished intellectuals." (p. 27) If poor laborers and intellectuals are associated, then "equality of like men" is absent. The group is not a social democracy, although it may employ equalitarian rituals and it may be pledged to the attainment of social democracy.

16 P. 33.

¹¹ For example, David Easton, The Political System (Knopf, 1959), pp. 56-7.

¹² P. 32.

¹³ P. 401.

"second stage" of organizational development (the stage of full-time, salaried, specialized officialdom) do leaders become "stable and irremovable." Similarly, the assumption that the first leaders were indistinguishable from the followers enables him to say that the "first appearance of professional leadership" marks "the beginning of the end" for "democracy," since such leaders are said to be stronger than their followers and to be animated by deviant interests. 18

This line of reasoning depends for its elemental plausibility on the validity of the premise of initial democracy. Michels's argument applies only to cases where "at first" the leaders are "no more than executive organs of the general wills," where the leaders first arise "spontaneously" to perform only "accessory and gratuitous" functions, where the leaders initially are "simple workmates" or "single molecule(s) of the mass." 19

Such reasoning is conspicuous for the contingencies it does not cover. It does not cover associations initially run by bullies. It does not cover groups initially led by men who, instead of being "simple workmates," descend from upper social strata. Since it does not cover cases of this sort, it is neither sustained nor refuted by evidence that in many cases, including cases of so-called political parties, Organization has been accompanied by democratization.

Organization can facilitate democratization. The propositions that Organization precludes absolute democracy and can destroy absolute democracy do not exclude the possibility that Organization can facilitate democratization. Two broad possibilities, within appropriate circumstances, are discernible from Michels's analysis.

(1) Organization can facilitate 'external' democratization. Michels teaches that Organization is the "weapon of the weak in their struggle with the strong"—an instrument which facilitates "economy of effort" and the political utilization of numerical strength.²⁰ He acknowledges that "Within certain narrow limits, the democratic party, even when subjected to oligarchical control, can doubtless act upon the state in a democratic sense."²¹ (In the context, the phrase "democratic party" evidently denotes a kind of aim or interest, rather than an

In this argument Michels covers a contingency which he has been accused of overlooking. He acknowledges that the democratization of the state and of society can be promoted by, and can occur in the midst of, associations which are non-democratic.²³ Strong organization among society's lower strata impels the ruling caste, for the sake of self-preservation, to make concessions in the form of policies and positions.²⁴

The old political caste of society, and above all the "state" itself, are forced to undertake the revaluation of a considerable number of values—a revaluation both ideal and practical. The importance attributed to the masses increases, even when the leaders are demagogues. The legislature and the executive become accustomed to yield, not only to claims proceeding from above, but also to those proceeding from below.²⁵

(2) Organization can facilitate 'internal' democratization.

Michels does not deal explicitly with the possibility that Organization can facilitate the democratization of groups within societythat is, the equalization of resources among members and the conformity of leaders' policies to followers' wishes. Such a possibility may be inferred, however, from his testimony that counter-autocratic changes accompanied Socialist Organization. The same possibility may be inferred from the basis of his reasoning. Increments of Organization necessitate delegation and dispersal of authority. In the case of an association where all the members have exercised all authority on an equal basis, the effect of Organization will be counter-democratic. In the case of an association where one or just a few members have exercised all authority, the effect of Organization will be counter-autocratic. An appraisal of these possibilities may be gained from a review of Michels's treatment of Socialist history.

Ш

According to Michels's account of Socialist experience in Western Europe before 1914, internal structure.) The chances for democratizing the state are relatively favorable "where there exists universal, equal, and direct suffrage, and where the working class is strongly organized and is awake to its own interests."22

²² P. 365n.

²³ For example, see Sartori, above, note 1, pp. 121-26.

²⁴ See pp. 176, 185-87, 272, 392.

²⁵ P. 365.

¹⁷ P. 401.

¹⁸ P. 36.

¹⁹ Pp. 31-2, 36, 206, 400.

²⁰ Pp. 21-2.

²¹ P. 365.

Organization facilitates democratization. He depicts Organization as the efficient cause of multitudinous changes in the 'character' of Socialism, changes that are alleged to be unavoidable and horrible. He spins a fable of innocence lost.

In the days of the so-called "socialism of the emigres," the socialists devoted themselves to an elevated policy of principles, inspired by the classic criteria of internationalism. Almost every one of them was . . . a specialist in this more general and comprehensive domain. The whole course of their lives, the brisk exchange of ideas on unoccupied evenings, the continued rubbing of shoulders between men of the most different tongues, the enforced isolation from the bourgeois world of their respective countries, and the utter impossibility of any "practical" action, all contributed to this result. But in proportion as, in their own country, paths of activity were opened for the socialists . . . the more did a recognition of the demands of the everyday life of the party divert their attention from immortal principles.26

With the advent of practical activities and professional activists, Socialism's "wider and more ideal cultural aims" were smothered by the "petty, narrow, rigid, and illiberal" bureaucratic spirit. The "logical audacities" and "revolutionary currents" suppressed, the once-bold champions displaced by routinizers whose "personal inclination towards quietism" could not be "neutralized" by "the preponderant energy of a comprehensive theory." Socialism's youthful promise to represent the "popular interests" was violated; the "democratic principle" of "THAT WHICH OUGHT TO BE" was suffocated by "that which is." Bureaucratization and vote-chasing ravished Socialism's "essential character"; having contracted "promiscuous relationships with the most heterogeneous elements," Socialism lost "political virginity."27

Now let us dry our tears. Let us attempt to break the spell of the "metaphysical pathos" of organization.²⁸ Before agreeing with Michels that Socialism underwent a moral and a counter-democratic degeneration because of the imperatives of Organization, let us attempt a more systematic canvass.

Below are listed ten changes which by Michels's account took place as the Socialist parties developed. Each will be discussed briefly for its broader theoretical implications.

(1) Mitigation of formal dictatorship. Genuine Socialist parties allegedly are, and some of the young Socialist parties allegedly were, corps of para-military combatants. Small, frail, ostentatiously seditious groups cannot afford the luxury of democratic procedures.²⁹ Socialist growth and development produced a new orientation, emphasizing legalism and electioneering. This marked a deviation from principle; it also facilitated and necessitated a measure of formal democratization.

In broader terms, Michels's analysis suggests that patterns of internal authority vary systematically according to associational aims and situations (or strategies) and sizes. Internal dictatorship is most likely to accompany revolutionary aims, extra-legal tactics, and smallness. Bigness necessitates allegiance, legalism, and a modicum of internal democracy. Each factor helps to explain and engender the others.

(2) Mitigation of informal dictatorship. "Every great class movement in history has arisen upon the instigation, with the co-operation, and under the leadership of men sprung from the very class against which the movement was directed." The Socialist movement allegedly consisted initially of two social strata: wage workers, or incipient proletarians, who in terms of "culture and of economic, physical and physiological conditions" are society's "weakest element"; and ex-bourgeois intellectuals, veritable "supermen," the "best instructed, most capable, and most adroit" products of society's most powerful class. Such a compo-

²⁸ Pp. 187-8.

²⁷ Pp. 187, 189, 371, 307, 401 (his capitals), 376. Some writers have suggested that Michels's Law of Oligarchy deals with the general subject of goal-reorientation as determined by internal group processes, rather than with the particular subject of democracy. For example, see Samuel Eldersveld, "American Interest Groups," in Interest Groups on Four Continents, ed. H. W. Ehrmann (University of Pittsburgh Press, 1958), p. 184. Philip Selznick relies heavily on Michels's contributions to understanding the "unanticipated consequences" of Organization and of circumstantial adaptation. See esp. Selznick's "An Approach to the Theory of Bureaucracy," American Sociological Review, Vol. 8 (1943), p. 1.

²⁸ See A. W. Gouldner, "Metaphysical Pathos and the Theory of Bureaucracy," this Review, Vol. 49 (1955), p. 3. Gouldner argues that Michels, Selznick (in TVA and the Grass Roots), and other modern theorists of group organization quite arbitrarily assume that the "unanticipated consequences" wrought by Organization will be deplorable.

²⁹ Part I, ch. 3, esp. pp. 41-3.

³⁰ P. 238.

³¹ Pp. 22, 237, 281.

sition is required because the workers, without help, are ignorant of their interests and their practical needs. It was "only when science placed itself at the service of the working class" that "the proletarian movement" became "a socialist movement." The men of "science" served at the head of the new movement. The early Socialist program was not a compromise between insight and ignorance; it was "a synthesis of the work of numerous learned men."32

Michels never claims the Socialist groups were democracies at inception. He claims rather, that they were democratic in conception in the goals they espoused (rather than the procedures employed), and in the Interests they 'objectively' represented (as contrasted with the cause they actually promoted). Thus, the socialist and revolutionary parties, . . . in respect of origin and of program, represent the negation of any such tendency [as oligarchy], and have actually come into existence out of opposition thereto. . . . In theory, the principle of the social and democratic parties is the struggle against oligarchy in all its forms.33

More generally, Michels suggests that history's great political movements must initially be internally oligarchic, even if their goals and results are democratic. Leaders of the great leveling movements descend from the upper echelons of society; followers are recruited from the most deprived strata. As the resources of leaders and followers become more equal, the drive for societal equalization loses momentum.

- (3) Social pluralism. Whereas the Socialist groups initially consisted of a bourgeois and a proletarian stratum, they rapidly became heterogeneous. Many processes contributed to this differentiation:
- (a) General social change. The social composition of the Socialist groups was differentiated in consequence of the general process which characterizes modern life—a process not of class polarization, à la Marx, but of "increasing differentiation."34
- (b) Secular social change. Worker-Socialists became additionally differentiated among themselves, and within the working class, in consequence of their various political activities. These contributed to "an even greater accentuation of the differentiation which the proletarian groupings already present...."35 (c) Proletarian enterprise. Some worker-

- Socialists were transformed into petty-bourgeois in consequence of Socialist Organization. Of these, some were forced into small business in consequence of industrial blacklisting, while others exploited commercial opportunities (such as tavern-keeping) which developed in consequence of Socialist activities.36
- (d) Bureaucratization. The advent of Socialist Organization enabled some worker-Socialists to become salaried officials. Organization served to "deproletarianize" workers, according to how "extensive" and "complicated" the "bureaucratic mechanism" of the Socialist movement became. 7
- (e) Immigration. Additional differentiation was produced by the influx of recruits drawn from various social strata. Such differentiation was facilitated by a number of factors and processes: formal accessibility of membership; the absence of repugnant slogans and policies: the increased availability of salaried posts and other vocational opportunities.38

In view of these changes, Michels suggests that bureaucratized associations in general, and politically sensitive associations in particular, cannot be (or long remain) socially homogeneous. Bureaucrats characteristically solicit new recruits, paying little attention to "quality." The "modern party, like the modern state, endeavors to give to its own organization the widest possible base," and to fortify the support attained by multiplying salaried posts.³⁹ Consequently, each mature Socialist party became, "from the social point of view," a "mixture of classes," being composed of elements fulfilling "diverse functions in the economic process."40

Such a social transformation might be deemed counter-democratic, from the standpoint of intra-group relations, if the transformation occurred in a once-homogeneous setting. In the Socialist case, as Michels portrays it, the change was from polarized dualism to horizontal and vertical pluralism.

(4) Petty-embourgeoisement. Whereas the authentic or early Socialist groups were dualistic and polarized, social change involved chiefly an enlargement of middle-ranking strata. This occurred through the attraction of pettybourgeois recruits and the "deproletarianiza-

³² P. 238; emphasis his.

²³ P. 11; emphasis added. Elsewhere (esp. ch. 2) Michels voices doubt that such a commitment has ever truly animated a particular social group.

⁸⁴ P. 40; also pp. 289-90.

⁸⁵ P. 295.

ss Pp. 283-8.

³⁷ Pp. 271-82.

³⁸ Pp. 265-70.

⁸⁹ Pp. 185-87.

⁴⁰ P. 387.

tion" of some worker-Socialists.

Michels summarizes this transformation as "the embourgeoisement of the working-class parties." However, his label is not accurate, unless it is meant as a psycho-moral judgment rather than a sociological description. A bourgeois element was present at the beginning, and this element persisted. Socio-economic distance was not created or increased by Socialist Organization; it was 'filled in.'

The Socialist case cannot be cited to show that Organization invariably 'de-polarizes' groups. The 'de-polarization' was conspicuous in the Socialist case because of a distinctive social origin. However, Michels does suggest unmistakably that Organization facilitates the maintenance and enlargement of society's middle strata.

Bureaucratic posts are middle-class in social status. These posts allegedly multiply faster than total populations. The proliferation of bureaucratic posts serves to counteract the effects of capital-concentration, effects which otherwise would drive bankrupt small businessmen into the ranks of the proletariat.⁴²

Various bureaucracies cater to various social strata. The modern state's bureaucracy caters particularly to the sons of "small manufacturers and traders, independent artisans, farmers, etc."—the sons of people who are particularly discontented and articulate, because they feel the squeeze of "expropriative capitalism" and organized labor. 43 The Catholic Church enables talented sons of petty-bourgeois and peasant families to attain middle-class professional status, whereas this status normally is unattainable because it requires long formal education at private expense. 44 Similarly,

For the German workers, the labor movement has an importance analogous to that of the Catholic Church for certain fractions of the petty bourgeoisie and of the rural population. In both cases we have an organization which furnishes opportunities for the most intelligent members of certain classes to secure a rise in the social scale.⁴⁵

In no instance does Michels argue that Organization polarizes society. He depicts Organization, rather, as a built-in antidote to the worst consequences of capitalism. The processes of production and exchange under capitalism supposedly spur the creation of two radically distant classes, each increasingly homogeneous. But these processes also spur Organization. The processes generated by Organization facilitate (a) a general, but uneven, improvement in the socio-economic status of the lower strata ('deproletarianization'); (b) the maintenance and enlargement of the middle strata; and (c) a kind of "social exchange" whereby some people move upward socio-economically while others move (in a non-socio-economic sense) downward.⁴⁶ Michels laments this process, because it is counter-revolutionary.

(5) Careers opened to talent. Throughout his book, Michels emphasizes that the individuals most directly and substantially benefited by Organization (in terms of socio-economic elevation), are society's most talented, most intelligent individuals. Organization provides "facility for ascent in the social scale" by such individuals.47 The peasants who attain middleclass status through the Church, the bourgeois who penetrate the Prussian nobility through the military corps, the workers who become petty-bourgeois through Socialist organizations, are not hacks. At one point, indeed, Michels declares that "democracy" (his fictional starting-point of Socialist development) "ends by undergoing transformation into a form of government by the best, into an aristocracy.48

Such a characterization of the men who attain bureaucratic eminence seems particularly remarkable in view of one of the meanings he assigned to democracy. Although he frequently identifies democracy with absolute equality, Michels also says that democracy "gives to each [citizen] the possibility of ascending to the top of the social scale... annulling... all privileges of birth, and desiring that in human society the struggle for preeminence should be decided in accordance with individual capacity." 49

On the other hand, Michels maintains that "the bureaucratic spirit corrupts character and engenders moral poverty." This accusation is closely identified with his major accusation: that in elevating talented workers (along ⁴⁶ Part IV, chs. 2, 3, 4. The downward movement involved in the "social exchange" is ideological and affiliational rather than socio-economic. Idealistic or opportunistic bourgeois join Socialist groups, usually as leaders.

⁴⁷ P. 279.

⁴⁸ P. 89.

⁴⁹ P. 1.

⁵⁰ P. 189.

⁴¹ P. 268.

⁴² P. 275f.

⁴³ Pp. 185-7.

⁴⁴ P. 278.

⁴⁵ Ibid.

with other workers), Organization forestalls revolution.

(6) Advent of diverse interests. Whereas the early Socialists allegedly were endowed with a singular Interest (social-democratic revolution), social differentiation allegedly produced a conflict of Interests. Especially debilitating was the emergence of full-time, professional leaders endowed with a singular "conservative" Interest which diverges from the Interest of the "mass."

The party is created as a means to secure an end. Having, however, become an end in itself, endowed with aims and interests of its own, it undergoes detachment, from the teleological point of view, from the class which its represents. In a party, it is far from obvious that the interests of the masses which have combined to form the party will coincide with the interests of the bureaucracy in which the party becomes personified. . . . By a universally applicable social law, every organ of the collectivity, brought into existence through the need for the division of labor, creates for itself, as soon as it becomes consolidated, interests peculiar to itself. The existence of these special interests involves a necessary conflict with the interests of the collectivity. Nay, more, social strata fulfilling peculiar functions tend to become isolated, to produce organs fitted for the defense of their own peculiar interests. In the long run they tend to undergo transformation into distinct classes.51

Michels rests his case for the oligarchical impact of Organization chiefly on the argument that the specialists' Interests clash with those of the "mass" and the specialists' powers are stronger. Thus the advent of "professional leadership" marks the beginning of democracy's end. This argument seems inapplicable to the generality of cases, including the Socialist cases, for these reasons:

In the first place, with regard to Socialism it is necessary to accept uncritically the assumption that initial class differences did not involve a conflict of Interests. Michels seemingly covers this eventuality by depicting the pioneer Socialist intellectuals as "ideologues" who transcended the Interest peculiar to their class status.⁵²

In the second place, the notion of a conflict of Interest between leaders and "mass" spuriously presupposes a homogeneous "mass." According to Michels's analysis, the advent of professional leadership coincides with the advent of a heterogeneous rank-and-file.

In the third place, the notion that a "conservative" Interest clashes with the Interest of the "mass" arbitrarily presupposes an innovatively oriented, revolutionary "mass." Only the proletariat, according to Michels's Marxian analysis, is objectively endowed with an unconscious Interest in revolution. But worker-Socialists are not fully proletarianised. And any other membership would be endowed with an 'objective' Interest which is not diametrically different from a "conservative" Interest.

In the fourth place, while a given caste of leaders might be endowed with an identical Interest, what is in the interest of one leader may contradict what is in the interest of another. Michels devotes a chapter on "The Struggle Among the Leaders Themselves," to this chronic situation. He indicates that the policies championed by various leaders will differ because each leader is striving competitively to solidify his own position.

Finally, identity between the Interests of leaders and electors is not self-evidently a requisite of democratic representation. If there is a need which can be expressed in the language of Interest, it is the need that the Interest of the leader be one which impels him to conform to the will(s) of his electors. As it happens, the "conservative" Interest ascribed by Michels to professional leaders seems to meet this requirement. The professional leader is "conservative" in the sense that he craves to maintain his status. To that end he is likely to conform to the wishes (rather than to the 'objective' Interests) of his electors, insofar as such behavior is the most efficacious or economical means of staying in office.

(7) Emasculation of unpopular doctrines. While the early Socialist program allegedly voiced the true "interests of the workers," many elements of this program proved to be inexpedient politically. They were inexpedient for the game of "mcdern" party politics, the game of "electoral agitation" to secure votes and "direct agitation" to secure recruits. In short, they were unpopular.

one from which to advocate the interests of the workers...so that the renunciation of this platform almost always involves the loss of opportunity for defending working-class interests" (p. 116).

⁶¹ P. 389. A very similar argument (omitting the "teleology" of "class" fidelity), is advanced by E. H. Carr in The New Society (1951) and is dissected by Langer, above, note 1, p. 263.

⁵² P. 280.

⁶⁴ P. 367.

Socialist and aristocratic party experience mutually demonstrated that "principles" are "often a stumbling block to a party whose main desire is to increase its membership; and to disregard principles may bring electoral advantage, if at the cost of honor."55 To "avoid alarming" potential "adherents" and "sympathizers" who are "still outside the ideal world of socialism or democracy, the pursuit of a policy based on strict principle is shunned. ... "56 Similarly, since the aristocrat "recognizes" that in this "democratic epoch" he "stands alone" with his unpopular "principle," he "dissembles his true thoughts, and howls with the democratic wolves in order to secure the coveted majority."57

The efficient cause of this doctrinal emasculation, as of all the other changes besetting the Socialist movement, is alleged to be Organization. With increments of scale and complexity, "every struggle on behalf of ideas within the limits of the organization is necessarily regarded as an obstacle to the realization of its ends"—the ends, that is, of the bureaucrats, who yearn for recruits and safety.⁵⁸

(8) Renunciation of unpopular policies. Let us examine two examples.

(a) Legalism. The old Socialist determination "to demolish the existing state" was supplanted "by the new aim, to permeate the state with the men and ideas of the party." This change allegedly was realistic, in the sense that it marked a response to the fact that "the forces of the party, however well-developed, are altogether inferior and subordinate to the forces of the government." The realism was prompted, however, by Organization, which created thousands of livelihoods which would be jeopardized by governmental suppression. Socialist experience demonstrates the general and ironic fact that "the party becomes increasingly inert as the strength of its organization grows." Numerical and financial affluence does not breed audacity. It produces a "need for tranquillity." Thus "the last link in the long chain of phenomena which confer a profoundly conservative character upon the intimate essence of the political party" is the problem of gaining governmental indulgence. So However, Michels acknowledges that the advent of Socialist legalism was consistent with widespread popular sentiments. He also acknowledges that the laws which the Socialists came to obey were the laws of formally democratic states.

- (b) Patriotism. In response to World War I, most of the Socialist leaders in Western Europe renounced policies which seemed consistent with their avowed principle of "proletarian internationalism." This change allegedly proved conclusively that the "oligarchical tendencies" infesting "modern political parties" impose a "regressive evolution": the "external form of the party, its bureaucratic organization, definitely gains the upper hand over its soul, its doctrinal and theoretical content." Be that as it may, Michels readily acknowledges that the leaders who opted for patriotism were conforming to prevailing rank-and-file sentiment. "Throughout the proletarian mass there has not been reported a single instance of moral rebellion" against the patriotic stance.64
- (9) Emergence of 'representative' Whereas the ex-bourgeois intellectuals allegedly expressed the Interests of the proletarian "mass" without belonging to that stratum, the second-generation Socialist leaders allegedly conformed more closely to the values and attitudes of their electors. The new leaders came up from the ranks. Michels emphasizes the psychological transformation which must accompany a change in status. But his conception of a psychological transformation pertains to Interests, or underlying motivations. rather than to attitudes and values. As to the latter, he portrays a close correspondence between those of workers and those of exworker-bureaucrats.

The leaders who have themselves been manual workers...are more closely allied with the masses in their mode of thought, understand the workers better, experience the same needs as these, and are animated by the same desires....

⁵⁵ Pp. 398-9.

⁵⁶ P. 367.

⁵⁷ P. 6.

⁵⁸ P. 367.

⁵⁹ P. 374.

⁶⁰ P. 394; also pp. 367-74. Michels amended this assumption in the light of the Bolshevik and Fascist triumphs. He acknowledged the prowess of elitist-insurrectionary (non-"mass") parties during crisis periods. He also suggested that these parties alone can maintain a moral and social integrity, since they do not need to emasculate their doctrines for the sake of pluralistic electoral support. R. Michels, "Some Reflections on the Sociological Character of Political Parties," this Review, Vol. 21 (Nov. 1927), p. 3.

⁶¹ P. 371.

⁶² P. 374.

⁶³ P. 367.

⁶⁴ P. 393-5.

[They commonly possess] a more precise understanding of the psychology of the masses.... 65

The ex-proletarian Socialist leaders deviated from official or sacred Socialist principles, not from rank-and-file attitudes and values. The typical workman's "ideal" is "to become a petty bourgeois"; his attitudes are "optimistic," accommodative toward other classes, and "conservative." If the professional leader "continues to express reasonable opinions,' he may be sure of securing the praise of his opponents and (in most cases) the admiring gratitude of the crowd." From the same securing the praise of his opponents and (in most cases) the admiring gratitude of the crowd." From the same securing the praise of his opponents and (in most cases) the admiring gratitude of the crowd." From the same securing the praise of his opponents and (in most cases) the admiring gratitude of the crowd." From the same securing the professional leader "continues to express "cases" and "cases "cases" and "cases "cases

- (10) Advent of 'responsive' leaders. Whereas the early Socialist leaders allegedly responded to the Interests of a Collectivity, the secondgeneration leaders responded to the manifest will(s) of constituents. Michels castigates such behavior. The new leaders' "mania for promotion" found expression in "obsequiousness" toward employers, in "a semblance of obedience to the masses," and in "demagogy." Demagogues are "courtesans of the popular will. Instead of raising the masses to their own level, they debase themselves to the level of the masses."68 Such deplorable responsiveness exemplified the characteristic Interest of professional leaders (a yearning for status-maintenance) and the characteristic situation of professional leaders, a situation in which deviations from constituents' wishes entail relatively great risks. The situational imperatives include the following:
- (a) Financial dependence. "When the leaders ... are attached to the party organism as employees, their economic interest coincides as a rule with the interests of the party"; the "practice of paying for ... services rendered ... creates a bond"—a control which is not available in the case of non-salaried volunteers. "9"
- (b) Meager 'personal' resources. The professional leaders were relatively deficient in those non-technical resources which allegedly facilitate domination in the absence of tangible
- ⁶⁵ P. 297. The second-generation Socialist leaders, in addition to being psychologically and sociologically more representative than their predecessors, also were 'ethnically' more representative. The early leaders (and many followers) were bourgeois, militant, and Jewish. (pp. 258–63, 28, 324, 342)
 - 68 Pp. 289, 319, 171.
 - ⁶⁷ P. 306; emphasis added.
 - 68 Pp. 89, 165.
 - 69 Pp. 389, 114.

service. The principal "factors which secure the dominion of minorities over majorities" are "money and its equivalents (economic superiority), tradition and hereditary transmission (historical superiority)," and "formal instruction . . . (so-called intellectual superiority)."70 Also formidable are "prestige of celebrity," hypnotic eloquence, catonian self-righteousness, psycho-economic self-sufficiency, and "force of will which reduces to obedience less powerful wills."71 Compared with their pred-Socialist ecessors. the second-generation leaders were meagerly endowed with these resources. They were not suited to become "temporal divinities" in the eyes of idolatrous masses.72 Such idolatry, with all the authority it confers, is not likely to devolve upon "strict and prosaic" bureaucrats.73

(c) Alert constituents. Michels cites the "general immobility and passivity of the masses" as a major source of "oligarchy in the democratic parties." In such groups, drawn chiefly from the lower social strata, turnover among members is high and turnout for meetings is low. The "leaders, when compared with the masses, whose composition varies from moment to moment, constitute a more stable and constant element." The "gregarious idleness" of the rank-and-file facilitates "the influence of the leader over the masses" and the leaders' "independence" from the masses.74 This condition varies among groups not according to organizational scale or complexity. but according to social composition and concern with the affairs of a group. The advent of professional Socialist leadership coincided with. and facilitated, an influx of petty-bourgeois members, an elevation of the socio-economic status of worker-Socialists, and an enlargement of the personal, tangible significance of Socialist affiliations.

(d) Non-available 'official' resources. The advent of professional leadership coincided with the establishment of regular, 'official' treasuries, organs of communication, files, agendas, meeting dates, mailing lists, and patronage. Michels discusses with keen insight the way such resources may be used by leaders to disarm challengers. But he does not indicate that these resources become more formidable, more available, in proportion to the scale or complexity of organization. He does testify

⁷⁰ P. 80.

⁷¹ Pp. 71-2.

⁷² P. 67.

⁷⁸ P. 301.

⁷⁴ Pp. 400, 50-2, 79, 98.

that "decentralization" of authority occurred, and this presumably involved a dispersal of control over the official resources. He also testifies that Organization entails procedural formalization; this presumably involves specification of legitimate uses of official resources.

(e) Individual technical expendability. Michels argues that the "technical indispensability of leadership" proved to be "the principal cause of oligarchy in the democratic parties." This seemingly acknowledges that the leaders ultimately proved durable on account of their authentic utility to their followers, rather than their superiority in wealth, celebrity, oratory and other factors which promote obedience without necessarily rendering service. However, Michels's concept of "technical indispensability" is elusive; it merits an extended analysis.

In one sense, the "technical indispensability of leadership" signifies merely that a particular function, leadership, cannot be forsaken. 6 Since those who perform this function are likely to enjoy some advantage in one-to-one contests with challengers (the advantage, for example, of incumbency), there must be an element of Oligarchy in Organization. But this tells nothing about the relative advantages of leaders in various organizational and sociological contexts.

In another sense, Michels seemingly is suggesting that an individual's power (his freedom of action and security of station) depend ultimately upon the 'objective' utility of the skills at his disposal. One who is richly endowed with a skill which is rare and prized approaches technical indispensability. Such an endowment raises the problem of discretionary action. Gratitude for past service and diffidence toward current complexities may impel clients to grant their agents a broad range of discretion. Agents thought to possess rare skills may be retained even if they defy their clients' policy directives, on the expectation that in future the officials will prove to be technically adept and responsive.

On this subject Michels testifies that

This special competence, this expert knowledge, which the leader acquires in matters inaccessible, or almost inaccessible, to the mass, gives him a security of tenure which conflicts with the essential principles of democracy.

* * *

The democratic masses are . . . compelled to submit to a restriction of their own wills when they are forced to give to their leaders an authority which is in the long run destructive to the very principle of democracy. . . . The history of the working-class parties continually furnishes instances in which the leader has been in flagrant contradiction with the fundamental principles of the movement, but in which the rank and file have not [drawn] the logical consequences of this conflict, because they feel that they cannot get along without the leader, and cannot dispense with the qualities he has acquired in virtue of the very position to which they have themselves elevated him, and because they do not see their way to find an adequate substitute. Numerous are the . . . leaders who are in opposition to the rank and file at once theoretically and practically . . . [The rank and file] seldom dare to give [the] leaders their dismissal.77

If indeed the second-generation Socialist leaders could survive "practical" conflicts more readily than their predecessors, then one could not conclude that the new leaders were relatively responsive to the will(s) of their electors. But Michels does not systematically develop, or sustain, the charge that the new leaders could readily retain office in the face of "practical" conflicts (deviations from the policy-directives of their constituents). He confines himself almost exclusively to the charge that the new leaders persistently, and securely, retained office in spite of "theoretical" conflicts (deviations from the policies 'demanded' by Socialist doctrine).

That "practical" conflicts actually dwindled in the course of Socialist development seems evidenced by the nature of the changes in Socialist policies and by the growth of Socialist membership. The new leaders did the popular, rather than the theoretically 'correct,' thing.

That "practical" conflicts necessarily dwindled in the course of Socialist development—dwindled in consequence of Organization—ra "The mass per se is amorphous, and therefore needs division of labor, specialization, and guidance." This "incompetence" is "incurable." (p. 404). Sartori observes that what is rendered as "leadership" in the English translation of Political Parties appears as Führerstum and as sisterma di capi in the German and Italian editions. The latter terms allegedly connote "rulership," or "headship" or some sort of arrangement more sinister than what is conveyed by "leadership." Sartori, above, note 1, p. 110.

⁷⁵ P. 400.

⁷⁷ Pp. 83-83, 86.

seems likely in view of all the considerations advanced earlier in this article and in view of two more considerations.

First, Socialist Organization facilitated, and was accompanied by, material affluence. To that extent, the Socialist partisans acquired more resources with which they could search for agents who were technically qualified and psychologically disposed to be responsive.

Second, Socialist Organization involved taskspecialization, and task-specialization often involves task-simplification. "It must not be supposed that the technical competence of the leaders is necessarily profound. . . . "78 Moreover, the "epoch" of Organization also is a time when "science puts at every one's disposal" such "efficient means of instruction" that "even the youngest may speedily become thoroughly well-instructed." Thus there is "less need for accumulated personal experience of life. . . . Today everything is quickly acquired, even that experience in which formerly consisted the sole and genuine superiority of the old over the young." To that extent, the supply of qualified technicians grows more abundant as organization develops. Consequently, the risks involved in defying an employer's policy-directives become more substantial.

On this showing—on Michels's showing—political survival in large-scale, complex organizations would seem to require that officials gratify the wishes of those they are hired to serve, regardless of the Interests of the latter. The result may be denounced as "obsequiousness" and as infidelity to popular interests, or it may be described as democratization.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

Contrary to prevailing belief, then, Robert Michels actually provided a favorable account of the compatibility of Organization and democracy. While maintaining that Organization is incompatible with pure democracy, and that increments of Organization produce counter-democratic changes in associations which initially are pure democracies, he also suggested (in the case of European Socialism and in broader theoretical terms), that Organization can and frequently does accompany and facilitate a multitude of changes which constitute or facilitate democratization.

Among the conditions he linked to Organization are augmented formal rights and privileges, a general increase in social wealth, more prosperity and security and leisure and education and sophistication among the lower social strata, increased horizontal but not vertical social differentiation, enhanced opportunities for talented individuals to ascend socially, and the advent within public and private associations of leaders who are conspicuously qualified technically, disposed socio-psychologically, and obliged circumstantially to conform to the policy-preferences of their electors.

Far from being a pessimistic democrat, Michels was a pessimistic Romantic Revolutionist and a pessimistic Scientific Paternalist.

He denounced Organization for promoting the amelioration instead of the radical purification of society. He detested Organization for promoting the manifest wishes rather than the 'objective' Interests of the "masses."

Michels's solicitude for the welfare of the "masses" evidently was linked with a profound disdain for the judgment of the "masses." In the light of his values and his beliefs, it seems understandable that Michels accommodated himself to Fascism.

⁷⁸ P. 83n.

⁷⁹ P. 76.

CHRISTIAN THOMASIUS: ENLIGHTENMENT AND BUREAUCRACY¹

FREDERICK M. BARNARD University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon

The Thirty Years War, though essentially religious in origin, assumed towards its end a distinctly political complexion. It became a trial of strength between the major powers of Europe, resulting in the unquestioned supremacy of France and Austria, the establishment of Switzerland as a fully fledged sovereign state, and the extension of the dominion of Sweden and Denmark. Most, if not all, of these changes occurred at the expense of the territorial unity of the German Empire. At the same time the disruption of German Imperial unity brought in its wake the effective assertion of sovereignty on the part of some 360 German principalities. The political unity of 'Germany' became a legal fiction.

Under these changed circumstances the generally prevalent Roman Law, based as it was on the idea of strong central administration, was no longer in accordance with the political realities of Germany. Faced with the strains and stresses caused by particularist tendencies it increasingly had to come to terms with a mode of legal and political thinking that was preoccupied with specific local circumstances and contemporary needs rather than with the universal applicability of general laws. Henceforth the religious autonomy of the diverse German principalities came to entail also the right of the ruler to determine the scope and nature of legislation pertinent to the requirements—as he saw them—of his own domain. Henceforth, too, the search began for a German theory of law and politics. Indeed, it would not be wrong to say that political science as a distinct academic discipline took shape at the very time that Germany disintegrated as a political unit.2

¹ I wish to acknowledge my gratitude to the German Academic Exchange Service for two research fellowships which enabled me to spend extended periods of study in Germany in preparation of this article. I would also like to record my debt to Professor Isaiah Berlin (Oxford) for encouraging me to undertake this research as a follow-up to my studies on Herder's political thought, and to Professors Kurt Berger (Marburg) and Max Horkheimer (Frankfurt) for their help in making source material accessible to me.

² Benedict Carpzov (1595-1666) and Hermann Conring (1606-81) are two outstanding names among political jurists of this period anxious to formulate a theory of positive law in Germany.

Apart from the emergence of a school of positive law, however, this period is also marked by a renewed interest in Natural Law. Hugo Grotius's De jure belli ac pacis (1625) was the first systematic attempt to translate the hitherto individualistic and theological interpretation of Natural Law into a secular theory of international or inter-state relations. His work became the basis of a new appraisal of Natural Law in the law faculties of European universities. In Germany, however, Grotius's ideas encountered a distinctly hostile reception in view of the persisting domination of theology over all fields of learning, and over jurisprudence in particular. Samuel Pufendorf's De jure naturae et gentium (1672), in which he further developed Grotius's conception of Natural Law met with the same fate. Protestant, no less than Catholic orthodoxy was in arms, determined to protect the ecclesiastical authority over Natural Law against any inroads of secular thinking.

T

Within this theologically oriented atmosphere young Thomasius received his first legal and philosophical training in Leipzig.3 It is not surprising, therefore, that his first reactions to the writings of Grotius and Pufendorf were not favourable. Only after his departure from Leipzig for Frankfurt-on-the-Oder-where he came under the influence of one of the most famous jurists of the period, Samuel Stryk (1640-1710)—did Thomasius's thinking undergo a drastic change. And by the time he took his doctorate (1678) he had become one of the most enthusiastic supporters of Pufendorf's legal and political philosophy. Thomasius's subsequent friendship with Pufendorf was to prove the most abiding feature in his rather turbulent and changing personal relationships. Pufendorf, in turn, thought no less highly of his new disciple. "You have the courage," he wrote to him, "to put into print views which I wholly share, but which I did not have the nerve to express publicly."4

- ³ Christian Thomasius (1655-1728) was born in Leipzig, the son of a university professor. His father first introduced him to the writings of Grotius.
- ⁴ The letter is dated Berlin, February 25, 1688. See Emil Gigas, Briefe Samuel Pufendorfs an Christian Thomasius, 1687-1693 (München and Leipzig, 1897), p. 14.

After a brief sojourn in Holland Thomasius settled down in his native Leipzig to embark on a law career. But in spite of his success as an attorney he soon tired of the protracted mode of litigation characteristic of contemporary legal procedures. By 1686 he decided to follow in his father's footsteps and devote his life to university teaching. His fiery temperament coupled with his 'heretical' approach to law and philosophy, however, soon brought him into conflict with the orthodox theologians and his conservative colleagues. Estrangement was followed by hostility and open persecution. It soon became evident that to remain true to his convictions Thomasius had to leave Leipzig. With the help of Pufendorf and the Prussian Court Thomasius was invited to come in 1690 to Halle, which was then in the process of becoming a university. Although here again he could not entirely avoid conflict with his theological colleagues (including the Pietists in his later years), he nonetheless remained in Halle until his death.

The nature and extent of Thomasius's impact upon eighteenth-century thought in Germany may be gauged by the reputation his works enjoyed some time after his death. A. L. Schlözer, the great eighteenth-century publicist and historian, attributed to him an influence more widespread and beneficial than that of the Greek philosophers. Herder spoke of him as "a man such as his Age longed for."6 Gottsched, Lessing, Schiller and Goethe expressed similar sentiments.7 However more profoundly Leibniz's philosophy was to determine the intellectual orientation of the German Enlightenment on the one hand, and Pufendorf's legal doctrines the speculations of German political theorists on the other, it was to Thomasius that the emergence of a new critical temper of thought and of a new conception of the nature and functions of political rule owed its very existence. Whereas Leibniz addressed his ideas to the politically mighty and influential with whom he enjoyed considerable favour and respect, Thomasius appealed to all who were able and willing to read his writings or attend his lectures. Leibniz chose the methods of high-level diplomacy and the channels of scientific journals and learned societies, disregarding the as yet virtually inarticulate and politically ineffectual sphere of public opinion. Thomasius employed the weapons of wit and satire in his bold and occasionally aggressive attempts to arouse a critical public awareness through his popular monthlies. Yet, contrary to what one might expect, it was Thomasius who achieved the more tangible and socio-politically more significant results. The dissemination of culture. the dispersal of the fog of ignorance and superstition that was still enveloping the major part of contemporary mankind, the awakening of a more humane, open-minded and public-spirited attitude among all sections of the population: they were the fruit of his pioneering work.8

⁵ Cited in H. Luden, Christian Thomasius, nach seinen Schicksalen und Schriften (Berlin, 1805), p. 300.

⁶ Werke, ed. Suphan (33 vols., Berlin, 1877-1913), VIII, 234; see also V, 413; IX, 425; XIV, 323; XVI, 594; XVII, 205 and 274; XVIII, 128; and XXIII, 70, 466 and 493.

⁷ See Th. W. Danzel, Gottsched und seine Zeit (Leipzig, 1848), p. 330; Lessing, Werke, ed. Lachmann (Leipzig, 1900), vol. XV, pp. 292 and 382 and vol. XXII, p. 278; Gräf and Leitzmann, ed., Der Briefwechsel zwischen Schiller und Goethe (Leipzig, 1912), vol. II, p. 215.

II

Free enquiry was his first demand. The search for truth must not be impeded by reverence for authority or by established beliefs and prejudices.

Challenge prejudice as the prime source of all errors and mistakes. Never rely in the discovery of truth upon the authority of any one person whosoever he may be, if you yourself lack the inner conviction that what has hitherto been generally believed is founded upon principles of undoubted validity.⁹

⁸ For an interesting study of the points of contact and divergence between Leibniz and Thomasius, see Karl Biedermann, "Zwei berühmte Leipziger," Westermann's Monatshefte, Vol. 56 (1884), pp. 363-70.

9 Christian Thomasius, Ausübung der Vernunfft-Lehre (Halle, 1705), p. 16. (The translation of cited passages is mine.) In his own lectures Thomasius urged his students to think independently and not to accept anything blindly. "I ask you to give me a fair hearing, but I do not mean by this blind trust. I do not want you to believe everything I am telling you; . . . you will not displease me in the slightest by disagreeing with me. On the contrary, the stronger your doubts, the sharper your opposition, the more I shall like it. No one need to fear that he will thus cause me to become impatient." He also encouraged them to attend other lectures to hear diverse views. "Thus you will learn to doubt, and I shall feel indebted to you if as a result you will find errors in what I teach and thus help me to correct them." Summarischer Entwurff derer Grundlehren (Halle, 1699), paras. 34 and 48-56.

The individual mind must be free to accept or reject ideas irrespective of their source or sanction; it must be free to follow its own light, its own reason. Even theology must accept the challenge of free enquiry in the light of human reason: "The mysteries of God do indeed surpass the human understanding, but they are not incompatible with it."

Thomasius's second main aspiration as an Aufklärer was to break down the barriers that separated the world of learning from practical every-day life. Learning, he maintained, must serve the needs of society. It must cease to be regarded as the exclusive property of the few, for it is in the interest of civil society that anyone who can profit from education should have access to it, even women. But education must be oriented toward practical goals, and no one should deem himself educated if he does not succeed in putting his education to some practical use.11 The universities, therefore, Thomasius demanded, must turn out men who will make their mark "in vita civili," and for this reason show greater concern for the actual challenges of this world rather than for the more hypothetical cares of the next.12 To this end Thomasius put forward some radical proposals for the reform of university education. In particular he urged the teaching of Economics and Political Science as academic disciplines in their own right.13 He also decided, against accepted academic custom, to use German instead of Latin in most of his writings and lectures, thus removing the last vestige of medieval scholasticism. He justified his choice in these words:

Everybody uses his mother-tongue. After all, the Greek philosophers did not write in Hebrew, nor did the Roman philosophers write in Greek.¹⁴

Undoubtedly Thomasius's decision to use German, coupled with his determination to write in a manner intelligible to the layman, accounted for the popularity which his writings enjoyed. His works were republished in several editions and Thomasius was constantly urged by his publishers to write new books. Not since the days of Luther were the works of a German scholar so much in demand by people of all walks of life. 15 What is more, his deliberate cultivation of the German language helped to restore some sense of self-confidence and self-respect among the bourgeoisie vis à vis the "Frenchified courtiers and nobles" composing high society. 16 Thomasius accurately diagnosed the tendency to copy everything French (even French sins and diseases, as he mockingly remarks) as the most pathetic result of the Thirty Years War which, all the fearful material destruction apart, had fatally damaged the moral fibre of the German middle classes.

There can be no doubt... that if our ancestors, the old Germans were to rise and return to Germany, they would have not the slightest notion that they are back in their fatherland among their own countrymen... French clothes, French food, French furniture, French language, French customs, French sins, yes even French diseases are everywhere the fashion.¹⁷

At the same time he did not deny that there was much that the Germans could learn from their French neighbors. What they had to guard against was blind imitation. The first thing they ought to learn from the French was self-respect and pride in their own language and socio-cultural traditions. A foreign, and particularly a dead language, might well be suited for the analysis of well established notions and concepts, but scientific and literary development no less than its wider assimilation required the use of a living mother-tongue. 18

As a further means to help circulate his ideas Thomasius published in 1688 the first monthly journal in the German language. It was intended to be scholarly and entertaining at the same time. Above all, his Monatsgespräche aimed to forge a link between the academic world and the world of every-day affairs. With complete disregard for his personal ¹⁵ See Walther Bienert, Der Anbruch der christlichen deutschen Neuzeit dargestellt an Wissenschaft und Glauben des Christian Thomasius (Halle, 1934), p. 353; and the bibliography in Rolf Lieberwirth, Christian Thomasius, sein wissenschaftliches Lebenswerk (Weimar 1955).

¹⁶ Max v. Boehn, Modes and Manners (The Eighteenth Century), transl. Joan Joshua (London, 1935), vol. IV, p. 38.

17 Thomasius, Kleine Teutsche Schriften (Halle, 1701), "Christian Thomasius eröffnet der studierenden Jugend zu Leipzig in einem Discours, welcher Gestalt man denen Frantzosen in gemeinem Leben und Wandel nachahmen solle," p. 3.

¹⁸ Thomasius, Kleine Teutsche Schriften, op. cit., pp. 19-35.

¹⁰ Thomasius, Einleitung zu der Vernunftt-Lehre (Halle, 1691), p. 82.

¹¹ Ibid., pp. 84-8.

¹² Ibid., p. 2.

¹³ Thomasius, Historie der Weiszheit und Thorheit (Halle, 1693), pp. 1-59.

¹⁴ Thomasius, Einleitung zu der Vernunft-Lehre, op. cit., p. 16.

prestige and safety Thomasius attacked everything that he considered obsolete, pedantic, inhuman or intolerant. His chief campaign was directed against witch trials, religious persecution, and the use of torture to extract confessions. He even defended Jews (though he always felt he had better add that he had no friends among the Jews) and atheists against prevalent superstitions and libellous accusations.¹⁹

Thomasius's decision to use German in university lecturing has been hailed by an American scholar as an epoch-making event, of equal if not greater importance than the "revolution in England" that occurred in the same year. "The year 1688 is memorable for two revolutions—one in England, the other in Germany. In England a conspiracy—partly patriotic, partly rascally—dethroned the last Stuarts; in Germany a young Leipzig professor began giving lectures not in Latin but in German . . . A plausible argument might be made to show that of these two revolutions the act of the German professor was really the more important." 20

Be that as it may (though we must correct a factual error—Thomasius was not yet a professor at Leipzig), the year 1688 is significant also for quite another Thomasian event. Before 1688 Thomasius, following closely the Natural Law teachings of Grotius and Pufendorf, was an ethical rationalist, imbued with unlimited optimism regarding the rational powers of man. After 1688, chiefly as the result of such strangely contrasting influences as those of Pietism on the one hand, and those of Bayle and Locke on the other, Thomasius reveals a much more ambivalent attitude toward 'reason'

19 Thomasius, Freymüthige Lustige und Ernsthaffte jedoch Vernunft- und Gesetz-Mäßige Gedancken oder Monatsgespräche (Halle, 1690). See also Thomasius, Ernsthaffte, aber doch Muntere und Vernünfftige Thomasische Gedancken und Erinnerungen über allerhand auserlesene Juristische Händel (where many of the monthly articles are reprinted), (4 vols., Halle, 1720-21); see esp. I, 105-118 (on superstition and libel), 125 ff. (on torture), 223-5 (on suspecting Jews of ritual murder), and 197-206, as also II, 300-39, and III, 221-33 (on witch trials). See further Chr. Thomasius Erinnerung wegen seiner künfftigen Winter Lectionen (Halle, 1702), pp. 14-18 (on superstition, witch-trials and torture).

²⁰ Andrew Dickson White, Seven Great Statesmen in the Warfare of Humanity with Unreason (London, 1910), p. 113. This is the only work that so far has appeared in English which devotes more than a passing mention to Thomasius.

and a far less optimistic faith in its efficacy to achieve by itself man's secular redemption. He no longer held 'reason' to be equivalent to the traditional Cartesian 'ratio,' to be valued for its own sake as the supreme and infallible arbiter of truth. He now qualifies it by the adjective 'sound' (gesund) and makes its objective validity contingent upon conformity to empirical observation by sense perception.²¹ Without the latter, reason ceases to be "of use." Sense perception must not, therefore, be opposed to reason but considered as its essential complement.

Neither sense perception without reason, nor reason without sense perception, can be of use to man. He is therefore in need of both if he is to arrive at truth. Indeed, sense perception is the very basis for the functioning of reason for it forms, so to speak, the foundation upon which reason can construct its edifice.... It follows that none of the propositions derived from the operation of reason alone can be accepted as true if they conflict with knowledge gained from sense experience.²²

It would not be wrong to say that 'reason,' in Thomasius's use, approximates very closely to Locke's concept of 'reflexion,' except that Thomasius, in an attempt to reconcile Locke's Empiricism with Rationalist elements, stresses its partly a priori origins. Man, he says, would never be capable of forming ideas of numbers, of extension and time (ideae quantitatis), were it not for his a priori capacity for entering into pure processes of thought (actus purus der Gedanken). Indeed, man would not be man if he were able to reflect in response to sense perceptions alone but never independently of them.23 It is of historical interest that Thomasius was one of the first major thinkers to depart from the prevalent Cartesian mode of Rationalism and to introduce Locke's ideas into Germany.24

However, Thomasius's main concern was not

- ²¹ It should be noted, however, that Thomasius, even before he became familiar with Locke's philosophy, evidences empiricist tendencies: see his Institutiones jurisprudentiae divinae (Francofurti et Lipsiae, 1688), lib. I, cap. 1, para. 51, and cap. 2, para. 39.)
- ²² Thomasius, Versuch vom Wesen des Geistes (Halle, 1699), pp. 7-8; see also Einleitung zu der Vernunfft-Lehre, op. cit., pp. 139, 155 and 225f.
- ²³ Einleitung zu der Vernunfft-Lehre, op. cit., pp. 168-72.
- ²⁴ Leibniz's Nouveaux Essais, which also transmitted Locke's ideas to Germany, were not published until 1765.

with epistemology. His chief attention was focused on ethics or 'practical philosophy,' as he called it. Epistemology, logic and metaphysics had value for him only in so far as they assisted man in his practical life. Their function was the removal of "prejudices" and their sphere of application those problem areas which are within the grasp of the human understanding.25 In view of this preoccupation with the world of action, it is not surprising that ethics plays such a pivotal part in Thomasius's thought. What is surprising is that, whilst ethics is sharply distinguished from religion and theology, moral action is made contingent on man's faith in divine grace. The clue to this apparent paradox lies in Thomasius's doctrine of the human will.

Not 'understanding'-by which Thomasius means the operation of both reason and senseperception—but 'will' is held to be the driving power in human actions. It is quite wrong, Thomasius insists, to attribute to the understanding any initiating power, for only the will is capable of engendering actions or thoughts that aim at actions.26 Admittedly, it is the understanding which recognizes the distinction between good and evil, yet by itself it is quite powerless to determine the will in either direction.27 The will, on the other hand, Thomasius maintains, is by itself wholly oriented towards evil. It causes man to be the most wretched of all living creatures.28 Thomasius does not deny that man also has propensities toward kindness and benevolence, but these sentiments are in "daily combat" with the far superior power of the will and their only chance of success lies in divine intervention. Man by himself is incapable of conquering this "most evil principle of the world."29 The recognition of this inability leaves him no option but to seek aid from a higher power. Whilst he can have no certainty about enlisting God's aid, he cannot but entertain the belief in its possibility if he is not to despair.30 Faith in divine grace, therefore, is postulated by Thomasius as a psychological need. He does not specify any particular faith, nor does he base faith on revelation. But he is adamant in treating secular happiness as a matter of divine ordinance:

²⁵ Einleitung. . . , pp. 84-93, and 294.

God has not willed his creatures to lead a life of sadness or unhappiness, but one of happiness and joy. For happiness in this world, if it is different from that of the next, is so only in degree but not in kind.³¹

Two circumstances, then, combine to necessitate the postulate of religious belief: man's evil will and his helplessness to overcome it solely by his own efforts, on the one hand, and the conviction that it is his right and duty to promote his happiness on earth, on the other.

'Happiness' is equated by Thomasius to 'reasonable love.' He defines it formally as "that unique state of serenity or 'inner peace' in which man is imbued with the conviction that he can bring his will into harmony with what the understanding [i.e., his reason and his senses] recognizes as morally compelling."32 Thomasius stipulates further that man's attainment of this state must be a matter for each individual to pursue in his own fashion, free from any external compulsion.33 No theological dogma, no moral theory can teach man how to attain happiness, let alone any external secular or ecclesiastical 'authority.' Even reason can do no more than act as a practical guide.34 What is involved, according to Thomasius, is a somewhat tenuous and uneasy combination of faith (in a divinely ordained state of human felicity) and the realization that happiness is something that has to be struggled for since it is not 'given' by nature. If it were, all people would naturally be happy people and the state of nature would be in effect the morally most perfect form of human and social existence. But, patently enough, this is not so:

If we view our fellow human beings, indeed the rest of mankind—in so far as it is known to us—with a dispassionate eye, we have to admit that most men are the unhappiest of creatures, even if many of them would not care to admit it.²⁵

The existence of man's 'inner peace,' then, though a highly desirable condition for social life, can hardly be relied upon as its sufficient ²⁶ Thomasius, Versuch vom Wesen des Geistes, op. cit., p. 183.

²⁷ See his Fundamenta juris naturae et gentium (Halle, 1705), lib. I, cap. 1, para. 37: "Voluntas semper movet intellectum." See also Versuch, op. cit., p. 184.

²⁸ Ibid., pp. 187-8.

²⁹ Ibid., p. 189.

³⁰ Thomasius, Einleitung der Sitten-Lehre (Halle, 1692; edition here used, 1720), I, p. 8; see also his Ausübung der Sitten-Lehre (Halle, 1696), p. 95.

³¹ Thomasius, Summarischer Entwurff derer Grundlehren, op. cit., para. 61.

³² Thomasius, Einleitung der Sitten-Lehre, op. cit., IV, p. 187.

³³ Ibid., IX, p. 369.

³⁴ Thomasius, Ausübung der Sitten-Lehre, op. cit., p. 516.

³⁵ Ibid., pp. 4-5.

condition, if society is to attain any degree of permanence, or transcend the narrow confines of family relations. Thomasius does not wholly deny the existence of a social propensity in man—indeed he considers it as a corollary of 'reasonable love,'36 but he regards it as too frail, too precarious and uncertain to guarantee man's 'outer peace' which he deems essential for man's life in civil society.

Before we proceed to inquire what political inferences Thomasius draws from his conception of the psychological and moral nature of man, it would seem opportune at this point to reflect for a moment how it was possible to reconcile, let alone identify so pessimistic a view of human reason with a way of thought in which reason was held to be the key to all human progress and perfection. In posing this question we are at once brought face to face with what distinguished the German Enlightenment from its French and, to a lesser extent, its English counterparts. For whereas the former shared with the latter two the affirmation of the individual's right to question established truths and their sanction by external authority, this affirmation found manifold and diverse expression, and the belief in the supremacy of reason was by no means consistently maintained.37 With most of the Aufklärer even Christian Wolff-the challenge was primarily directed against religious orthodoxy, and it sprang, not from religious hostility or sceptical disbelief, but rather from a deeply felt concern for religious values in an age of religious disenchantment. Some of the most passionately religious thinkers of the era were engaged in the quest for such a religious reorientation. And since to many of these the aim of this re-orientation was almost identical with a return to what they considered to be the essence of the Lutheran creed, it can hardly be surprising that Thomasius's pessimistic, and in this respect essentially Lutheran, outlook seemed to them both revolutionary and traditionally congenial at one and the same time. Finally, it must be remembered that Thomasius was the first since the Reformation to challenge the religious and intellectual status quo in Germany in so bold a manner. To the young men of the German Enlightenment, Thomasius was above all the intrepid man of action, the professor who scorned academic pedantry, the prophet of a new dawn. His pessimistic doctrines did little to cloud the 'progressivist' image he had created in their minds.

III

Thomasius's political views, no less than his ethics, embody the fusion of traditionally held and challengingly novel ideas. Whilst his ethics deals with man's inner contentment and with activities the nature and value of which would be annihilated were they made subject to compulsion, his political works are concerned with those areas of human existence where external compulsion is the very hallmark. Whereas the 'inner peace' of the individual is legitimately his own personal affair, in which he may or may not wish to seek the guidance of the church, his 'outer peace'concerning his material welfare and securityis the responsibility, and the sole responsibility, of a body specifically instituted for that purpose and subject to no other law than that which it has itself created.38 Following Hobbes, Thomasius demanded the supremacy of secular law over ecclesiastical law in all matters affecting the external relations of citizens within a state. Only the law of the state is law proper. The so-called divine law and the Natural Law are only pseudo-laws, for they are devoid of physical sanction and hence not enforceable. Might is the sole effective source of right.39 Natural Law, therefore, has no binding or compelling force other than that of a moral precept.40 It is entirely for the individual to decide which, if any, natural laws he regards as morally binding in the light of his 'sound reason.'41 Unlike his immediate precursors Grotius and Pufendorf, Thomasius sharply distinguished Natural Law from divine law. Neither depends upon the other. Divine laws are those which the individual voluntarily accepts as guidance for his religious life. They too are of entirely subjective relevance and of purely individual concern. 42 Thus we find Thomasius in support of individualism in the moral and religious sphere and of absolutism in the ³⁹ Institutiones, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 1, para. 30. ⁴⁰ Fundamenta juris naturae et gentium, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 6, para. 21.

⁴¹ Institutiones, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 1, para. 3. ⁴² Ibid., lib. II, cap. I, para. 35. For a fuller treatment of Thomasius's legal theories, see Erik Wolf, Große Rechtsdenker (4th ed., Tübingen, 1963), pp. 379-414 to which I am in debt.

²⁶ Thomasius, Einleitung der Sitten-Lehre, op. cit., II, pp. 89-91.

³⁷ See Hans M. Wolff, Die Weltanschauung der deutschen Aufklärung (2d ed., Bern and München, 1963).

⁸⁸ Thomasius, Institutiones jurisprudentiae divinae, op. cit., lib. II, cap. 2, para. 7; see also his Der Politische Philosophus (Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1724), particularly the preface (Vorrede).

politico-legal sphere. In the final analysis, however, individual rights can only claim a conditional autonomy for they can only be exercised if backed by positive law. To be sure, Thomasius recognizes the existence of certain innate and inalienable rights—the iura connata -as distinct from those which have emerged in the course of positive legislation—the iura acquisita.43 But, again unlike Grotius and Pufendorf, he is not prepared to treat them as divinely ordained rights in the Christian tradition, by virtue of which the individual would be justified in certain circumstances to resist the command of the ruler. Such resistance is as categorically ruled out in Thomasius's political theory as it is in that of Hobbes.44

Yet in his account of man in the state of nature, Thomasius is almost as much at variance with Hobbes's image of a 'bellum omnium contra omnes' as with Grotius's hypothesis of an instinctive 'appetitus socialis.' There is no ground, Thomasius feels, for postulating either. Man in the state of nature is neither a social animal, nor a furious lupus. He is a weak, isolated, lonely creature, in constant fear of disasters, inclined by his evil will to appropriate more than his due share of such of the scarce things in life as he can come by. In so doing he is forever courting the danger of coming into conflict with his fellows. Whilst he is aware of an inner 'law' which bids him to respect the 'rights' of others, he is at the same time conscious of its insufficient authority and compelling power. The victim of conflicting impulses, he is a danger to himself and to others. Mutual fear and distrust are the inevitable result, making social intercourse precarious if not impossible.45

In effect, it is true, Thomasius arrives at the same position as Hobbes, but he arrives there by a slightly different route. His man of nature is a man of conflicts, inherently capable of social cooperation no less than of acts of inconsiderate selfishness. He is not necessarily 'at war' with his fellows. He is simply incapable of forming any lasting social links whatsoever, for he can see no common basis on which to maintain them. For Thomasius, therefore, human 'society' in any form or shape is inconceivable prior to the institution of civil society. Grotius's notion of a natural, biological 'community' has as little meaning for him as Pufendorf's idea of a natural society bound by common traditions and customs. Civil society

According to Thomasius the reason for the social contract is man's growing realization that the state of nature is an insufferable situation in that it miserably fails to safeguard, let alone promote, his individual interests.46 He therefore, as a primary step, concludes with other like-minded individuals (presumably in a flash of rationality or 'reasonable love') an agreement to form a permanent union.47 The contracting individuals or at least a majority of them, then issue a proclamation which embodies the constitution of their union and a decree which lays down the form that government is to assume.48 A second agreement thereupon empowers one man, or a number of men, to take on the functions of government. By virtue of this second compact each man not only gives up his natural freedom but also submits his will and his energies to the will and government of the ruler or rulers.49 The purpose of the government thus formed is the exercise of supreme and sovereign authority with a view to safeguarding the civil happiness of the statewhich Thomasius, following Hobbes, calls a 'commonwealth.' By 'civil happiness' Thomasius means the citizens' 'external peace,' that is, their welfare and safety and their protection from offences against, or attacks upon their property.50 'Welfare' is conceived, however, in a collective or public rather than a purely private sense, for the commonwealth is to enjoy complete economic autarchy in addition to, or rather, in support of, its political sovereignty. To ensure this, the individual citizen is expected to subordinate his private interests to the interests of the state (as interpreted by the government), irrespective of whether he believes these to conflict with his own or not.51

Thomasius is quite explicit regarding the does not evolve, it is the result of a conscious and deliberate political act. The social contract brings together individuals who prior to its existence were isolated atomistic units. But although Thomasius explains why the social contract comes into being and also describes the manner in which it is formed (here he follows traditional lines), he fails to give a plausible explanation of how it can come about in the first place under the conditions which he depicts. In this respect Thomasius is no more successful than other social contract theorists before and after him.

⁴³ Thomasius, Institutiones, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 1, para. 109, and his Fundamenta, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 5, para. 11.

⁴⁴ Institutiones, op. cit., lib. III, cap. 6, para. 63.

⁴⁵ Ibid., lib. III, cap. 6, para. 12.

⁴⁶ Ibid., lib. III, cap. 6, paras. 22-24.

⁴⁷ Ibid., para. 29.

⁴⁸ Ibid., para. 35.

⁴⁹ Ibid., para. 31.

⁵⁰ Ibid., para. 56.

⁵¹ Ibid., para. 23.

form of government which he prefers. He distinguishes between healthy and sick types of governments. Whilst he admits that any type of government may undergo crises owing to changing and frequently unforeseeable exigencies (including the varying quality of administrators), he insists that there are some types where political diseases are particularly endemic. Among these latter he includes all forms of mixed governments in which not only functions but even decision-making powers are shared between different, though coordinate, bodies.⁵² Healthy government, on the other hand, in Thomasius's view, requires the concentration of power in the hands of those whose responsibility it is to rule. Thomasius recognizes the need for persuasive power in addition to physical power. Indeed he considers the former-in the hands of educators in the widest sense—to be vitally important to the smooth running of the state. Nonetheless, the 'advisors' must be clearly distinguished from the 'rulers,' and the supreme authority of the latter must never be called in question. For the basis of sound government is effective government. And effective government is disturbed or made impossible if those who are not willing to heed advice are left in any doubt or ambiguity about the source of the law and the enforceable sanctions at the disposal of the law-giver.53 Whereas in the state of nature each individual is in a position to enforce his will by having recourse to physical force and thus wage 'war' upon his fellow, in civil society it is only the ruler who can use force in order to punish the legal offender. The citizen is merely entitled to bring an action before the courts (actio), not to mete out punishment (poena). There can, therefore, never be a 'right' (in the legal and hence, for Thomasius, in the only proper sense) which the subject can invoke to justify the use of force in place of an actio, or even in support of one, if the aggrieved citizen feels that the poena fails to meet the crime committed against him. And this applies equally to actions brought against other citizens as well as to those directed against the State.54

But having made the legal and theoretical position clear, Thomasius then goes on to warn the ruler or rulers that 'politics' does not mean the same thing as 'legalistics.' There is, he says, almost as little connection between the lawyer and the politician as between the politician and the medical man.⁵⁵ The ruler will be no less foolish to claim a divine right to rule arbitrarily than to ignore the citizen's innate right to own property or to hold beliefs of his own choosing. even if such innate 'rights' are not strictly enforceable. Whilst as a ruler he is legally not subject to Natural Law, he is morally bound by it in the same manner as his subjects. And the latter's consent and support is politically as vital to him as are his protection and tolerance to them. 56 Thomasius does not reveal, however, how, in practice—the original Contract apart popular consent (let alone support) is to be elicited. Yet even Locke, who does maintain the citizen's right to revolt and on that account is commonly regarded as a radical or democrat, is not very informative on this point.57

Historically speaking, Thomasius was primarily concerned with the secularization of politics and with establishing it as an autonomous activity in clearly specified fields. He was as adamant in maintaining the absolute and supreme power of positive law, in theory, as he was in circumscribing its political application in practice. He had no wish to eliminate 'honestum' and 'decorum' in favour of the enforceable 'justum,' but he aimed to discourage false hopes in their potency as a political basis for maintaining law and order both within states and in the relations between states. Above all he sought to impress his countrymen that politics is not something that can be left to the jurist or to the well-meaning, though politically inept theologian or philosopher. 58 He believed that the modern state required a professional class of politically trained administrators. He had as little use for the myth of divinely ordained kings as he had for the no less traditionally held Platonic belief in the wisdom of philosopherkings. The task of the modern administrator was different from that of Cicero; it also had little to do with the Laws of Moses.59

⁵² Ibid., para. 39.

⁵³ Fundamenta, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 4, para. 77, and Institutiones, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 1, para. 104.

⁵⁴ Institutiones, op. cit., lib. I, cap. 1, para. 104.

⁵⁵ Der Politische Philosophus, op. cit., preface.

⁵⁶ Thomasius, Das Recht evangelischer Fürsten in theologischen Streitigkeiten (Halle, 1696, 4th ed., 1699), p. 12.

⁵⁷ Locke certainly nowhere suggests that he subscribes to a theory of universal suffrage. For discussion of this question, see Martin Seliger, "Locke's Theory of Revolutionary Action," The Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 16 (1963), pp. 548-68.

⁵⁸ Thomasius, Erimerung wegen zweyer Collegiorum über den anderen Theil seiner Grund-Lehren (Halle, 1702), p. 32. Thomasius considers it "one of the oldest errors in Christendom... that the zealots of good morals attempt to talk the Christian princes into enforcing Christianity by legislation." (ibid.)

⁵⁹ Ibid., pp. 34-5.

IV

Thomasius's conception of government as a device for achieving limited and clearly defined ends became the accepted political philosophy of the leading political writers in Germanythe Cameralists, as they came to be calledduring the first half of the eighteenth century. Some of them were university professors, such as Gasser (1676-1745) and Dithmar (1678-1737); others were professional administrators. such as Hornigke (1638-1712) and F. K. Moser (1723-98); a few were both, such as Justi (1720-71) for example. They favoured highly centralized absolutism, not principally, as Gierke has suggested, to provide a rationale for the political status quo,60 but because it afforded in their view the best chance of carrying out effective and efficient government without the risk of interference by the non-professional outsider. Their ethos may have been paternalistic and, by modern democratic standards, arrogant, but they were sincere in their belief that a well constructed bureaucratic organization, operating within a framework of fixed rules, could not but further the well-being of the subjects. A number of them also believed that by perfecting the administrative machine as a system of strictly specialized functions they were minimizing the risk of arbitrariness due to personal forces, and thus ensuring fair and impersonal government.61

Whilst it would plainly be an overstatement of the case to say that these writers and followers of Thomasius were thinking of the administrative apparatus as a device for restraining the absolute power of the ruler—for he was commonly envisaged as a power outside and above the governmental 'machine'—they were certainly more interested in strengthening the power of the bureaucracy than in buttressing

⁶⁰ O. Gierke, Natural Law and the Theory of Society, transl. E. Barker (Cambridge, 1934), vol. I, p. 144.

⁶¹ For a detailed account of these administrative theories, see Albion W. Small, The Cameralists (Chicago, 1909); see also Geraint Parry, "Enlightened Government and its Critics in Eighteenth-Century Germany," The Historical Journal, Vol. 6 (1963), pp. 178–192.

the position of the monarch. Their monolithic and mechanistic conception of government was undoubtedly inadequate as a political theory in that it failed to take account of the complexity and many-sidedness of socio-political life. But in their emphasis upon administrative organization, public finance and political expertness, the Cameralists correctly anticipated, as Thomasius did before them, the growing role which bureaucracy was to play in the modern state.

It was no accident that the Prussia of Frederick II was by far the most enlightened of the absolutist states in eighteenth-century Europe. For it was during the decisive years of the transition from semi-feudal government to absolutist regimes that the Prussian administration drew its recruits from a university (Halle) which was the first in Germany to institute chairs of Politics and Economics and which, within a decade of Thomasius's teaching, rose to become one of the leading and most forward-looking universities of the time.⁶²

No less impressive was Thomasius's achievement as a legal reformer. In 1728, the year of his death, Prussia witnessed the last witch trial, and just over a decade later (1740) Frederick II, publicly acknowledging Thomasius's services to the European Enlightenment, 68 decreed the abolition of the practice of torture.

If we take as the basic criteria of liberalism the ideas that the liberty of the individual must be safeguarded by the limitation of governmental power and that, in order to be limited, political power must be shared, then Thomasius can scarcely be regarded as a liberal. But if other, less formal, standards are applied, Thomasius surely qualifies in the history of ideas as a thinker in the liberal tradition. He was undoubtedly perspicacious in suggesting that a politically trained bureaucracy, far from endangering individual liberties, could in fact constitute one of the safeguards against their infringement by arbitrary rulers.

⁶² See Dernburg, Thomasius und die Stiftung der Universität Halle (Halle, 1865), p. 4, and Schmoller, "Preußischer Beamtenstand unter Friedrich Wilhelm I.", Preußische Jahrbücher, Vol. 26 (1870), p. 148 f.

63 Frederic II, Oeuvres (Berlin, 1789), vol. I, p. 376.

COMMUNICATIONS

ON CONSTITUTIONALISM

TO THE EDITOR:

There is a great deal in Professor Sartori's article, "Constitutionalism: a preliminary discussion" (this Review, December 1962), with which I find myself in enthusiastic accord. I would suggest, however, that in two respects his case may be overstated.

1. The fifth thesis of the summary (p. 863) states that "either the term [constitution] is used in its specific garantiste meaning, or it is a meaningless (and deceiving) duplicate of terms such as organization, structure, form, pattern, political system and the like." The difficulty here is that the sharpness of distinction he calls for seems more than the substance of the matter will bear. The garantiste meaning is not sufficiently specific in itself; nor is it so easily separable from at least some of the other terms mentioned.

In the first place, let us take the "unambiguous" meaning offered at p. 855: "a fundamental law, or a fundamental set of principles, and a correlative institutional arrangement, which would restrict arbitrary power and ensure 'limited government'." How "unambiguous" is this? "Fundamental" is a matter of degree and "limited government" has more than one meaning. The footnote 10 at this point already admits some difficulty: "Of course the query, 'What do the guarantees include?' (e.g., a certain technique of allocation of power, a bill of rights, the rule of law, judicial review, etc.) receives different, complex and changing answers." Just so; there are several routes to the restriction of arbitrary power, and one of these lies along the way of rules as to who is to do what, i.e., "allocation of power." In other words, garantisme need not necessarily be secured by a "bill of rights" technique; it can be reached through certain kinds of "frame of government."

In the second place, "rules" too are a matter of degree and kind. (Admitting that differences are of degree does not entail saying that they do not matter.) "'Rules' applies to any kind of rule—including the rule of leadership" (p. 854); by this we are invited to believe that when the British say "we have rules" they are saying nothing. The Wheare and Jennings definitions are described as "formal" and it is said that they "can be filled with any content whatever" (p. 856). But, to begin with, these definitions are not exhaustive; they are introductory to examination of what the rules in Britain are. Again, insofar as they do indeed speak of "rules which govern the government" (Wheare) or "rules determining the creation and operation of governmental institutions" (Jennings), their purely "formal" nature cannot safely be stressed; it would scarcely be true that "they can be filled with any content whatever," since such definitions would hardly apply to a regime where the government itself simply decides the rules. "Even games have 'rules' " (p. 856), but we would think it strange if we learnt of a game where one side made the rules as it went along. In other words, the regularity which the term "rules" implies is itself hostile to arbitrariness.

Third, and closely related to the above, there is the problem of Aristotle's meaning. In order to support the sharpness of the distinction between the garantiste use and all meaningless use of 'constitution,' Sartori suggests (p. 860) that Aristotle cannot be called as a witness to the contrary and that the view that he might be rests on a mistranslation or misunderstanding of politeia. "To speak of a Greek 'constitutionalism" is found "quite absurd," while it is said that "nothing resembling this concept [i.e., that of "a frame of political society, organised through and by the law, for the purpose of restraining arbitrary power"] was in the mind of Aristotle." Now the difficulty in translating politeía must be admitted. But much of the difficulty surely comes from the several different ways in which Aristotle uses the term. It appears too sweeping to say that Aristotle gives it one sole meaning: "politeia only conveys the idea of the way in which a polity is patterned." While this could conceivably be a way of expressing the element common to the usage in 1274 b and 1276 b, it overlooks other meanings. These include (as Sartori concedes) that contained in the "passages . . . in which the term politeia specifically refers to the way in which the polis magistracies are ordained," such as 1278 b, 1289 \bar{a} , and 1290 a; it is open to debate whether in these cases "this meaning appears in passing" as Sartori alleges. Further, there is, of course, the use of politeia to denote a particular form of government-e.g., 1279 a. Here Aristotle is saying that since constitution implies order and arrangement, it is appropriate to label that government constitutional in which matters are well ordered. But above all there is the notable passage, 1292 a, in which Aristotle firmly connects the idea of constitution to the whole discussion of the rule of law in Book III: speaking of a kind of democracy in which demagogues sway the multitude and the decrees of the assembly override the law, he writes that "it would seem reasonable to object that this kind of democracy is not a constitution at all, on the ground that where laws do not rule there is no constitution" (1292 a, R. Robinson, ed., Aristotle's Politics Books III and IV, Oxford, 1963).

Of course, there can also be uncertainty about the meaning of "laws," but I have taken it (e.g., in my "The Emergent Countries" in Political Quarterly, July, 1963) that Aristotle can be interpreted, with the least forcing of meaning, as saying that while all political societies, so long as they are stable enough to be said to exist at all, are bound to be regarded as having "constitutions" (i.e., arrangements of their parts), the differences between the extremes of the range are great. At one end are states which are so poorly composed, so irregularly conducted, as to be scarcely deserving of the name; they are liable by disintegration to fall, so to speak, off the end of the range altogether. At the other end are others which are firmly composed, secure, well constituted; and their being well constituted is expressed in their being constitutional (i.e., under the rule of law). In other words, the two senses of constitution are present in his mind and he is feeling his way toward a connection between them, that connection being that an adequately patterned political society is one which has developed or established firm rules controlling the use of power.

I conclude that we have here a conceptual continuum. The garantiste meaning of constitution is a development of the "rule of law" meaning and that in turn is a development of the "arrangement of parts" meaning. These important relations should not be obscured by forcing excessively sharp distinctions.

2. The second thesis of the summary states that despite "the complexity of the original model (the English constitution)" and "a somewhat polemic isolationism of the British scholars," "the idea of limit is basic to the English prototype just as much as to the American and the French subsequent models." While his annoyance with the isolationism is understandable, it will not do to suggest that the British approach to constitutionalism differs from that of the Americans and French only because its expositors are polemic isolationists displaying "coquetry" and "unhelpfulness." For this would be to ignore an important strand in British political thought. Bentham can best stand as its representative and he can be heard expressing the relevant point in Chapter IV of the Fragment on Government and in the 1789 postscript to the Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation. He is scornful as regards attempts to formulate the limits of state or governmental action by reference either to "laws of nature" or to fundamental natural rights listed in a constitutional document. He agrees, and indeed insists, that there are important differences between "free" and "despotic" governments, but he holds that these are neither to be expressed in terms of metaphysics (i.e., "consent" vs. "coercion," "in accordance with the laws of nature" vs. "contrary to the laws of nature") nor to be achieved by the preparation of formal lists of (impracticable) do's and dont's. In a free state as in a despotism, there is sovereignty: "the field of the [sovereign's] authority must unavoidably, I think, unless where limited by express convention, be allowed to be indefinite." (The qualification here is of course important, and the footnote at this point interesting.) "Wherein is it then that the difference exists?," he asks. In his answer (para 24 of that Chapter) Bentham points to what may be called the realities (or real conditions) of political life. He mentions, for instance, liberty of the press and association and machinery for rendering governments accountable and replaceable. What this all contributes to is a (distinctively British?) garantisme of a peculiar kind in which constitutional form matters less than political habits. This is not, of course, to say that Bentham was an anti-constitutionalist; only that in some of his writing he expresses a hostility to certain forms of garantisme, that this hostility has remained a feature of British writing about the subject, and that it accounts for some of the "isolationism" which is found so unwarranted and distressing.

The ways in which "limits" on arbitrary power are achieved in practice in different countries differ no more than the ways in which the ideas about the nature of these limits are expressed. To say that "the idea of limit is basic" to several traditions is true; it is equally true that the ideas about limits are interestingly and significantly different among these same traditions. British scholars are, very properly, making this clear.

W. H. Morris-Jones

University of Durham, England Visiting Professor, University of California Berkeley, 1964–1965

A REJOINDER

TO THE EDITOR:

A "preliminary discussion" is also an invitation to a further discussion. Therefore I am most grateful to Professor Morris-Jones for his penetrating and perceptive critique of my article, in which the other side of the case is brilliantly stated. My first temptation would be to bow to his witty criticism and concede that his arguments are indeed convincing. In fact, if I followed the approach he takes, in most cases I could only reply: I agree. If I nevertheless stop short of such a conclusion, this is mainly because our disagreement presupposes a methodological issue which deserves to be discussed.

The issue boils down to this question: Why do I find other people guilty of "understatement," and why am I now, in my turn, found guilty of "overstatement"? The explanation, I think, was clearly suggested by Kant in his Critique of Pure Reason when he made the point that reason follows two methods, or principles: "homogeneity" and "specification" (Cf. ch. III, Appendix to Transcendental Dialectics). Consequently "in one thinker it is the interest for multiplicity that prevails (following the principle of specification), while in another thinker it is the interest for unity that prevails (according to the principle of aggregation)." And Kant made it very clear that neither principle has, in itself, a superior claim. Both are only "regulative maxims" that express a "different interest of reason" which is, in turn, "the cause of the diversity in method." Therefore when Morris-Jones finds my distinctions "too sharp" he is actually uncovering the fact that I follow the method of "specificity." And this is in turn the reason why I find some of his distinctions too soft.

Does this conclusion imply that we are both right and wrong or, better said, that we are neither right nor wrong? Logically this seems to follow, for either method, in principle, is correct. Nonetheless we need not be content merely with taking stock of the fact that we have reached a stalemate. Logically, or in the abstract, both methods are correct, but historically, i.e., concretely, there are times when one method is more justified or more necessary than the other.

The historical growth of the tree of knowledge is oscillatory and somewhat cyclical. To put it picturesquely, the development of thought follows a pattern that I would call the cycle of the cupboard. Some generations labor under the illusion of storing and ordering ideas and information into a system of cupboards. When they have done so, subsequent generations open the cupboards and tear everything apart. The generations that follow inherit chaos and have to start again ordering the world of knowledge into new cupboards-and so on. The timely question, therefore, is: should we now still pursue the destruction of the cupboards, or is it not high time to engage in their reconstruction? I take the latter view, that the balance between flux and stabilization of knowledge should be restored by trying to rebuild a filing system. And this is why I am more unhappy than Morris-Jones with diffuse thinking, with the advice that we should avoid logical polarizations, with the current abuse of the formula that everything is a matter of degree—and the like. In sum, I believe we have gone too far along the path of "homogeneity" and that the time has come to concentrate on "specificity." Perhaps Morris-Jones does not share that feeling. Yet from the point of view of the cupboard theory of knowledge-if I may call it so-we need not conclude that we are faced with a methodological deadlock, and the way has been cleared for a better mutual understanding.

First point: the garantiste meaning of the term constitution. Morris-Jones points out that this meaning "is not sufficiently specific in itself; nor is it so easily separable from at least some of the other terms mentioned." Quite so. But is this a reason for declaring inseparable what appears difficult to separate? According to my approach, it is not. And the "substance of the matter" has little, if anything, to do with this issue because there is nothing in re, in the nature of things, which can decide a "regulative" matter. To say that the garantiste meaning is not sufficiently specific "in itself" is only to say that previous thinkers have blurred it, or that nobody has yet specified it; in either case we are dealing with mental products which abide by man-made decisions.

The general definition of the garantiste meaning that I have suggested is "ambiguous" in that it is general; but perhaps it is an advance vis à vis current ambiguities and consequently is "unambiguous" in this relative sense (even though, I grant, still inadequately so). I could hardly deny that "'fundamental' is a matter of degree and [that] 'limited government' has more than one meaning." Here again, however, my question is: Is this a reason for saying that we cannot draw a line between fundamental and secondary, or between limited and limitless government? Morris-Jones rightly asserts that "there are several routes to the restriction of arbitrary power" and that "garantisme need not necessarily be secured by a 'bill of rights' technique." I could not agree more, provided that one is not satisfied with leaving the argument there, as it is—unfinished.

Second point: the meaning of "rules." On this I cannot agree with Morris-Jones, and particularly with his concluding statement that "the regularity which the term 'rules' implies is itself hostile to arbitrariness." This view only testifies to what extent we have lost sight of what constitutionalism is for, and fail to appreciate what it provides. Logically, if there is a rule there is a "regularity"—this is a tautology. But constitutionally it is a small consolation. Princeps legibus solutus est, and regis voluntas suprema lex are rules. But they are not "hostile to arbitrariness." They are precisely rules which allow the power-holder to make decrees, to change them, or to dispense with them, as he goes along. In fact, they are the rules of dictatorships and have been the rules of absolutism. Therefore if "regularity" is all that is required from constitutional rules, we may as well bid farewell to constitutionalism and resign ourselves to the loss of the constitutional State.

Maybe I have been unfair to Wheare and Jennings in taking out of their context definitions which are "introductory to an examination of what the rules in Britain are." Yet the fact remains that the definitions in question are purely "formal"; and I do not quite see why their books should be introduced by missing the point, that is, missing the specificity of those rules which are of a constitutional nature. Description (what the rules in Britain are) and conceptualization (what is the nature of constitutional rules) do not belong in separate watertight compartments. Therefore I submit that if Wheare and Jennings are satisfied—conceptually—with providing a merely formal definition of rules, the most likely explanation is that they are concerned with constitutions but hardly with constitutionalism. And if this is true, it is a sombre symptom.

Third point: Aristotle. Morris-Jones is quite right in saying that my way of dealing with Aristotle was "too sweeping." His analysis is acute, and I only wish to inject a further caution in the discussion. Granted that "much of the difficulty... comes from the several different ways in which Aristotle uses the term," there is an additional difficulty, namely, that generally we do not quote Aristotle but the translators of Aristotle. I have at hand several translations of the Politics (both because my Greek is rusty and because the experiment is amusing), and each translation conveys a rather different idea of what Aristotle had in mind. In the Robinson edition cited by Morris-

Jones the crucial passage of 1292 a reads "where laws do not rule there is no constitution"; but in the classic Italian translation of V. Costanzi (Laterza, Bari, 1925) the same passage reads "where laws do not rule there is no political regime" (my italies). Since Costanzi often does translate politeia as "constitution," why is it that in this case he uses a more comprehensive and uncommitted term? Possibly because he feels that, in 1291 a, Aristotle's focus is not on the notion of politeia but rather on the notion of democracy. Actually his subsequent and concluding sentence ("the kind of arrangement in which everything is decided by the decrees of a popular assembly is not even a democracy in the proper sense of the term") lends weight to the interpretation that politeia is the definiens (the expression used to define), that demokratia is the definiendum (the expression to be defined), and therefore that the gist of his argument was to say that where the mob rules instead of the laws, all political institutions collapse—this is no polity, no "arrangement of parts" (as Morris-Jones so well puts it) and therefore this is not even a democracy.

We need not, however, open Pandora's box by entering an exegetical discussion. Whatever was in the mind of Aristotle, let it be suggested that gross misinterpretations are inevitable unless we approach him by subtraction, that is, by taking away from the Greek vision of the world all the discoveries of the mind that were added later. And this is why I said that I find it "absurd" to speak of a Greek "constitutionalism" (just as I find it absurd to speak of a Greek "state"). The thesis of my article was, in fact, that "constitution" is both a modern word and a modern concept, and that when the term was conceived at the end of the Eighteenth century it was given a specific, substantive meaning. Therefore to speak of a Greek constitutionalism is, to begin with, a falsification of the past, for in doing so we inevitably project a modern frame of reference into a very distant and different world, flying as it were over the head of more than twenty centuries.1

Morris-Jones concludes his discussion on Aristotle by saying that "we have here a conceptual continuum," in the sense that the "garantiste meaning of constitution is a development of the 'rule of law' meaning and that in turn is a development of the 'arrangement of parts' meaning." But I cannot follow him along his continuum. It seems to me that Morris-Jones builds his continuum paralogistically, that is, upon two different meanings of "rule of law": one a generic way of saying, and the other a more technical meaning. Technically, rule of law does not simply mean that it is the laws and not men that rule. Therefore Aristotle did not use the proposition "where the laws rule" in the sense which Morris-Jones seems to suggest—perhaps too sweepingly. At least, I have taken it (in my Democratic Theory, 1965 ed., Praeger, New York, pp. 288-291) that the Greek approach to the problem of "liberty under the law" was an anticipation of the legislative conception of law, rather than of the English rule of law conception of law. As Jhering and Bryce long ago pointed out, the rule of law in its technical sense originates with Roman jurisprudence. Hence I find a discontinuity where Morris-Jones sees an ideal continuity. It is very true that the garantiste features of the British constitution are founded on, and derived from, the rule of law (this, incidentally, is why the English did not need a bill of rights); but from the English-type rule of law, not from the Greek concept of law, and even less from Aristotle's meanings of politeia.

¹ See Francis D. Wormuth, "Aristotle on Law," in Milton R. Konvitz, and Arthur E. Murphy, eds., Essays in Political Theory presented to George H. Sabine (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1948), pp. 45-61; and Wormuth's The Origins of Modern Constitutionalism (New York, Harper, 1949).

Fourth point: what is peculiar and distinctively British about present-day English constitutionalism. If my article conveyed the impression that my passes at the English passion for "understatements" or at their "polemic isolationism" were meant to be an exhaustive explanation, Morris-Jones fills the gap very well. Where I had detected a style of "saying less," Morris-Jones points to something which is both more important and more serious: a strand of "hostility to certain forms of garantisme" which becomes, from Bentham onwards, "a feature of British writing about the subject." This clarification is indeed an illuminating addition to the topic. Yet my query remains: is it really true that British scholars are "making clear" whatever there is that needs to be clarified? I wonder.

Why is it, for instance, that the British can afford to have an unwritten constitution? Morris-Jones supports the view that "constitutional form matters less than political habits." I would argue, however, that this statement is unwarranted unless one goes on to show that it is the "habit" that creates the "form"; otherwise why should the latter "matter less"? Moreover, the statement omits to state (understates?) an essential qualification: that it applies to the British people only because they happen to have the right political habits (i.e., habits which are both cause and consequence of the constitutionalization of politics). The next question is: how were these habits formed? It will not do, I think, to explain habits with habits and to ground everything on the cake of custom. Most British scholars, however, do leave the argument at this obscure point.

To cite another instance to warrant my complaints, let me return to the crucial question: what do the English mean when they say "rule of law"? The latest definition in my files (by John Strachey in his latest Encounter pamphlet) reads that the rule of law is the principle that "a man or a woman is free to do anything which is not specifically forbidden by the laws of his or her community." I submit that Strachey largely missed the target, for if this were all, any despotism—and the more totalitarian the better-could easily manage to abide by the rule of law. Granted that Strachey was not an authority on the subject, what strikes me is that any Englishman would know better if he was taught better—that is, if British scholars did make things clear. Dicey went too far when he said that "in England the law of the constitution is little else than a generalization of the rights which the courts secure to individuals" (The Law of the Constitution, 10th ed., Macmillan, London, 1960, p. 200); yet he came close to the mark when he noted that "the constitution is pervaded by the rule of law" (p. 195) in the sense that it "is a judge-made constitution" (p. 196). Granted that this is only one part of the picture, the interesting point is that Dicey's commentators have generally been more concerned with showing where he was wrong than with improving on him where he was almost right.

The fact is, then, that English scholars seldom, if ever, lay the stress on the crux of the matter, namely, that the rule of law is first and foremost a conception of the law (apart from its having several particular meanings), and specifically that conception according to which law is not State-willed law, is not legislated law. (This, incidentally, is why the British tradition could safely afford to stress the omnipotence of parliament). As I have put it in Democratic Theory, the "rule of law" is the opposite of the "rule of legislators," and the more the latter replaces the former, the less even the English may ultimately rely on a rule-of-law type of guarantees. Perhaps this development helps to explain why British scholars appear reluctant when they are asked to unveil the "mistery" of their rule of law, when they are asked what the essence of rule of law is. At any rate, my point is that they are not making it clear.

Morris-Jones will forgive me, I hope, if I have taken his remark about the English tradition of "hostility" (toward the non-British forms of garantisme) so seriously as to suggest—pushing the argument a step further—that this hostility is becoming outdated, that it may be unsafe to envisage the future as if the rule of law foundations of the English constitution were not weakening, and therefore that it may be wiser to realize that Western constitution—alism as a whole is ever more faced with similar problems and with a common challenge. My plea was, and remains, that the British oracle should become more helpful.

GIOVANNI SARTORI

University of Florence, Italy Visiting Professor, Harvard University (Fall term 1964–1965)

A NOTE ON THE EVALUATION OF ERROR AND TRANSFORMATION IN DATA ANALYSIS

TO THE EDITOR:

Researchers continually have to confront two practical problems-how to allocate limited resources in the implicit bargain between data refinement and analysis, and how to produce serviceable data within a time in which they remain relevant. A recent review in this journal of a volume by me and other members of the Yale Political Data Program¹ raises several fundamental points about these research problems that deserve careful attention. Let me begin with a comment on accuracy, directed to the reviewer's lament over the frequency of transcription errors in Table 9. Certainly there are more errors in that table than we would have hoped for, and their presence is the cause of real chagrin. Yet, even in what at first sight may seem so gross an instance, it is essential to have a fairly precise idea of the magnitude of the error and the magnitude of its effects on analysis.

Aside from noting a couple of particular caveats,² the important point to be made is that the total error alluded to amounts to only one per cent of the variance in the table. Thus the corrected table is correlated .993 with the unrevised one. For some purposes this might indeed still have serious effects, but if the object is primarily to see the direction and strength of the relationship between this variable and another, the conclusions should in no important way be affected; because of other problems of reliability, assumptions about "sampling," etc., differences of a single percentage point in squared correlation coefficients are meaningless. Now I can hardly be sure that there are no errors in the other 74 tables of Part A of the Handbook, though for a variety of reasons I am confident Table 9 is not typical. But for the sake of a simple illustration let us assume the worst-that in every other table there is a magnitude and type of error corresponding to that in Table 9.

¹ Bruce M. Russett and Hayward R. Alker, Jr., Karl W. Deutsch, and Harold D. Lasswell, World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven, Conn., Yale University Press, 1964), reviewed by Arthur S. Banks in this Review, Vol. 59 (March, 1965), pp. 144-146.

² Two cases asserted to be in error can be shown to be correct, though, as may occur elsewhere, the reasons (comparability adjustments we made in the figures published in our sources) may not be obvious. Furthermore, two kinds of error should be distinguished. One is erroneous data, the other is erroneous footnoting of correct data. For example, two instances of the latter occurred when superscript references to sources were omitted and the reference thus seemed to be to the general source listed for the table. The data, correct, are to be found in others of the works given at the foot of page 53. An erratum sheet is available on request from the Yale Political Data Program, 89 Trumbull Street, New Haven, Connecticut 06520.

The first thing to note is that it is random error, not correlated with income, political system, or any other variable. The effect of random error is to lower the correlation between variables. This can be shown, and its magnitude assessed, by an experiment which I performed. I deliberately introduced error, of the same amount and type in Table 9, into the data for eight other variables (Tables 1, 8, 31, 41, 43, 44, 51, 64), computed the correlation of each with every other, and compared them with the correlations produced by the data as given in the Handbook. The average difference in the r^2 produced by the two versions of each table was less than .03; in most of the cases the variables with the random error had lower correlations than those without.3 Thus the

³ Highly skewed distributions should of course be subjected to a logarithmic or other transformation before correlation coefficients are computed. For this computation the data were transformed precisely as were those in the Handbook for the analysis given in Part B. The correlations reported here and below will be only those staeffect on substantive conclusions would seldom be great, though in a few instances of rather low correlation it might mistakenly result in acceptance of the null hypothesis that two variables were not related. And this is where error is introduced into both variables, not just

For the other kind of mistaken conclusion the unwarranted rejection of the hypothesis of no relationship—non-random or systematic error is more often responsible. This type of error is most likely to stem from deliberate or semi-deliberate distortion by the reporting countries themselves, and its effect can be suggested by another example. Into the same eight Handbook tables I deliberately introduced systematic error, meaning that particular types of countries regularly had their values changed in the same direction. I raised the values for all East European countries and again computed the matrix of correlations and compared it with the original one. Here the damage was even less serious; the average difference in r^2 was under .02, although most of the new correlations were higher than with the original data. Both types should be considered in the light of the other problems of data reliability and comparability discussed in the text of the Handbook. For most variables these are likely to be appreciably greater than transcribing error, and we attempted to indicate, at least in an appropriate way, their likely magnitude.

We can pursue this subject further, to the discussion of the effect on correlations produced by the decision whether to transform a variable before using it in computations, and, if so, what type of transformation to employ. Banks makes the excellent suggestion that in doubtful cases several different transformations be tried, and that the transformation finally used be specified and the Chi-Square value for the distribution be given. He then shows that four of the tables (nos. 8, 9, 51, 64) not transformed in the Handbook might have been so treated, and indicates what transformations would improve the approximation to normality.⁴ tistically significant at the .01 level with a one-tailed test. It would be misleading to report all correlations, however trivial, because with very low correlations small changes can produce substantial variation in the r (for example from .20 to .30) without affecting what one may be most interested in, the r^2 , by nearly as much (i.e., from .04 to .09). Such low correlations are likely to occur by chance in any case. For a discussion of the relevance of "statistical significance" in this situation, however, see the Handbook, p. 263.

4 The review also emphasizes the inappropriate-

But again the magnitude of effect is highly relevant. In a procedure analogous to that above, I made the transformations suggested and compared the resulting r^2 with those produced by the transformed variables. The difference was .09. Under some circumstances, where the degree of skewness was greater or where there was more coincidence among the outliers in different tables, the effect would have been greater. But though in the cases suggested less than 10 per cent of the variance was actually affected, the difference is the greatest found so far and should teach care when correlating skewed distributions.

Even this could be contrasted with another common type of transformation, the dichotomization of a variable into high or low, or more or less, where the researcher feels unsure of the accuracy of any finer distinctions in his data. All of us employ this method at one time or another. For comparative purposes I took eight tables and dichotomized the data according to the criteria which had been found useful in another study and matched the results against those obtained from the data as employed in the Handbook correlations, either logarithmically transformed or used in their raw form. The difference was greater than that produced by any of the influences discussed above—the ness of applying a logarithmic transformation to a left-skewed distribution and perhaps leaves the impression that we erroneously did so. This is not the case—there are only two left-skewed distributions in the book, and neither was transformed.

⁵ One measure of skewness is that suggested in the Handbook, where skewness = $3(\overline{X}-Md/\sigma)$ and \overline{X} = the mean, Md = the median, and σ = the standard deviation. By this measure the degree of skewness in the four distributions ranges from .18 to .79. For those distributions in the Handbook that we did transform the mean value for skewness was 1.36.

⁶ Except for Tables 9 and 51 the variables employed in the preceding analysis were included in Arthur S. Banks and Robert B. Textor, A Cross-Polity Survey (Cambridge, Mass., M.I.T. Press, 1963), as dichotomized variables. I substituted table 40, which has a counter-part in the Survey, in the following analysis. In my review of Banks and Textor ["Strategies for Comparing Nations," Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 9 (June 1964), pp. 166-70] I suggested some regrettable consequences of the decision to dichotomize, but there are also weighty arguments in its support. My own "The Calculus of Deterrence," ivid., Vol. 8 (June 1963), pp. 97-109, looked for association between dichotomized variables.

mean difference in the r^2 was .20.7 Moreover, in virtually every case the result was a drop in r^2 . With dichotomized data one would be much more likely to accept the null hypothesis of no association than when the data are used in their original interval form without the loss of information produced by dichotomization.

The examination of the effects of error, and of various kinds of transformations, needs to be pushed much farther than has been possible here. These illustrations do not substitute for an adequate mathematical consideration, though a number of important contributions in fact exist in the literature of statistics and econometrics. But perhaps this discussion has suggested some criteria for dealing with a common kind of research problem.

⁷ Though it is not a common practice to compute r for dichotomized data it is permissible so long as the n for either side of the dichotomy is not seriously disproportionte and so long as one is not concerned with significance tests.

BRUCE M. RUSSETT

Yale University

⁸ For a useful piece by a political scientist, however, see the forthcoming article by Rudoph Rummel, "Dimensions of Error in Cross-National Data."

ON THEORIZING IN COMPARATIVE STUDIES

TO THE EDITOR:

We cannot allow to pass unchallenged two inaccurate statements by Gabriel Almond in his review of Political Power: USA/USSR in your December 1964 issue.

First, Almond argues that when we attack the so-called convergence theory—which holds that the United States and the Soviet Union are becoming more alike—we are attacking a "'straw man' . . . which few students of politics would advance with any seriousness. . . ." Maybe Almond's students do not advance this theory, but many learned scholars, leading intellectuals, and influential statesmen do. Walt W. Rostow calls communism a "disease of the transition" to a highly industralized society and predicts that "Communism is likely to wither in the age of high mass-consumption" which the Soviet Union is now approaching. George Kennan states that the changes in the Soviet Union since Stalin represent "an essential alteration of the nature of the regime" toward a "new form of parliamentarianism". "In the main," he says, "the goals and trends of Russian communism lie along the same path as those of Western liberalindustrialism. . . . It is probable that the progress already made is in the direction of our own institutions."2 Walter Lippmann has stated that the leaders of the Kremlin "are finding ... what Western society found 200 years ago . . . that if you are going to have an industrial society, you have to have liberty. . . . " Khrushchev, Lippmann argued, "wants more liberty," and the Russians, he concluded, are "becoming more like us" and "less like the Chinese."3 Clark Kerr and his associates predict that the social and political differences among industrial countries will decrease as they all move toward the "uniformity" of "pluralistic industralism".4 Philip Slater and Warren Bennis argue at length that democracy is the only efficient form of government for an industrial society, that "autocracy is beginning to decay in the Soviet Union," and that there is an "inevitable Soviet drift toward a more democratic structure...."5 Nor are these views limited to, or even primarily found among, Americans. In five months of travel through the Eastern Hemisphere from Tokyo to London in 1962-1963, we heard similar views expressed by at least seventy-five per cent of the intellectuals and political leaders with whom we talked. Perhaps the most articulate and impressive case for convergence was made by Jawaharlal Nehru, who argued at length that the Soviet Union was becoming "liberal" and "bourgeois". Are all these gentlemen—Lippmann, Kennan, Rostow, Kerr, Nehru, and the rest-straw men? Or is their theory one which,

³ CBS television interview with Charles Collingwood, May 1, 1963, printed in Washington Post, May 3, 1963, p. A-12.

⁴ Clark Kerr, John T. Dunlop, Frederick Harbison, Charles A. Myers, Industrialism and Industrial Men (Harvard University Press, 1960), ch. 10, esp. pp. 288-296.

⁵ "Democracy Is Inevitable," Harvard Business Review, Vol. 42 (March-April 1964), pp. 51-59.

¹ The Stages of Economic Growth (Cambridge University Press, 1960), pp. 133, 162.

² In Raymond Aron, ed., World Technology and Human Destiny (University of Michigan Press, 1963), pp. 77, 79, 89-90.

although erroneous, is both intellectually respectable and politically influential?

Second, Almond claims that, while we correctly reject ideological models, we "offer no analytical models to take their place." "It is surprising," he concludes, "that in a decade marked by a proliferation of political typologies they use none of these and offer none of their own...." In response to this criticism. we can only point out that his review deals chiefly with the introduction, conclusion, and table of contents. His preoccupation with convergence is preoccupation with a subject which is treated explicitly only in the introduction and conclusion. He does not mention, much less discuss, any of our substantive findings. All his principal comments are directed to points made either in the introduction or conclusion. When he does refer to the other nine chapters which constitute ninety per cent of the book he is almost invariably wrong. "The authors," he says, for example, "provide us with four comparative case studies of politics and policy-making in the two countries." In fact, there are six comparative case studies presented in five different chapters. In the other four chapters in the first half of the book we develop a variety of categories and typologies which we utilize in the analysis of the two political systems. Among other things, we explicitly draw distinctions between: ideological and instrumental political systems; political socialization and politization; political ideologies and political beliefs; bureaucratic and electoral recruitment systems; social forces, interest groups, and policy groups; and the phases of initiation, persuasion, decision, and implementation in the policy-making process. With these and other categories we try to develop generalizations about the similarities and differences in political behavior and attitudes in the United States and the Soviet Union. Some of the categories and typologies we use in this analysis we borrowed from other scholars; others we developed ourselves. Our comparative approach may or may not be successful, but to claim that we ignore the work of others and that we offer no framework of our own is simply inaccurate. Perhaps the problem is that we did make use of categories and concepts from Dahl, Easton, Etzioni, Hyman, Kornhauser, Lasswell, Lindblom, Lipset. March, and Simon, but that we did not find relevant or useful any of the many typologies "proliferated" by others!

SAMUEL P. HUNTINGTON

Harvard University

ZBIGNIEW BRZEZINSKI

Columbia University

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to reply briefly to the letter of Professors Huntington and Brzezinski which takes issue with some of the criticism which I made in my review of their Political Power: USA/USSR.

I want to reaffirm the evaluation in my review, both in its positive and negative aspects. My criticism took the form of an expression of disappointment. I had the feeling then, as I do now, that Huntington and Brzezinski became faint-hearted when confronting the implications of their own imaginative and often brilliant analysis. Instead of going forward to discuss the intersection of characteristics of the Soviet and American political systems (an intersection which is more than implicit in their own formulation), they drew back and set up a "straw man" conception of "convergence" to refute.

I read the book with some care and with great reward. I read the introduction and the conclusion with even greater care, since the formulation of the problem and the drawing of conclusions are very important parts of an analytical effort. I did not intend to depreciate their analytical inventiveness and the categories which they have drawn from other theorists or have developed themselves. I simply felt it was remarkable that they did not try to present their conclusions about the general characteristics of the Soviet and American political systems in the context of political system typologies such as the ones resented by Apter. Shils. Tucker, and Coleman. Without such a political system typology, it is very difficult to confront the question of degree of convergence, extent of intersection, or similarity—dissimilarity.

Finally, let me express again my conviction that this is an original and important work, and my apologies for having miscounted the number of case studies presented in the body of the work.

GABRIEL A. ALMOND

Stanford University

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

REVIEWS OF BOOKS
Anderson, Man's Quest for Political Knowledge—The Study and Teaching of Politics in Ancient Times. Arnold Brecht	449
Doctor, Anarchist Thought in India. Myron Weiner	451
Friedrich, ed., Nomos VII: Rational Decision. RICHARD E. FLATHMAN	452
Overstreet, The Strange Tactics of Extremism. Thomas H. Kuchel	454
Riggs, Administration in Developing Countries—The Theory of Prismatic Society. LUCIAN W. PYE	456
Schramm, Mass Media and National Development: The Role of Information in the Developing Countries. Joseph LaPalombara	457
Somit and Tanenhaus, American Political Science: A Profile of a Discipline. VERNON VAN DYKE	459
Tinder, The Crisis of Political Imagination. JOSEPH S. MURPHY	460
LeVine, The Cameroons from Mandate to Independence. Aristide R. Zolberg	462
Post, The New States of West Africa. MARGARET L. BATES	463
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY
Political Theory, History of Political Thought, and Methodology	465
American Government and Politics	478
Comparative Government and Cross-National Research	497
Comparative Public Administration	5 19
International Politics, Law, and Organization	520
Other Books Received	538

BOOK REVIEWS

Man's Quest for Political Knowledge—The Study and Teaching of Politics in Ancient Times. By WILLIAM ANDERSON. (Minneapolis: The University of Minnesota Press, 1964. Pp. viii, 381. $8.00.)

Not entirely satisfied with the often-told stories of political events and of political ideas, Dr. Anderson concentrates on the neglected question when, where, and why the quest for political knowledge arose and to what extent and through what people it was activated in studying, teaching and writing about politics. He devotes more than half of the book to Mesopotamia, Egypt, the Israelites and, in Greece. to the Delphic Oracles, the pre-Socratic writers and Socrates' contemporaries before turning to the classical giants. Relatively little space is given to the Romans, with the last chapter covering the six hundred years from Augustus to Justinian on only twenty pages. A second volume is to carry the story through the middle ages to our day.

Knowing in what totally different fields Dr. Anderson has conducted research in his busy life one wonders how he could have undertaken the present work, which seems to presuppose a profound knowledge of history in various sections of the ancient world. He frankly disclaims particular competence but, seeing a gap in literature and no one else around to close it, he decided to do it himself. He set a dozen graduate assistants to examining available literature for material pertinent to the project, and then went to work. Far from being merely a secondrate compilation, as I would have expected from these beginnings, the outcome has been a major contribution because Dr. Anderson has applied his mature knowledge of things political, his discerning mind, his great analytical power, and his own considerable reading knowledge of at least the Greek literature to his selfappointed task.

Although ancient Mesopotamia and Egypt developed remarkably successful administrations there are few indications of a study of government in secular or comparative terms. Egypt had no generic terms for "state," "government," or "politics." There certainly was a remarkable in-service training and an elaborate education of scribes ("it is writing that makes people remember" is Egyptian wisdom) and even some good psychological advice on public relations, such as this Egyptian one: "A petitioner likes attention to his words better than the fulfilling of that for which he came . . . a good hearing is socthing to the heart." But critical research on government would not have been tolerated. The king either had the support of the gods (Mesopotamia) or was recognized as a god himself (Egypt)—that was all the people needed to know. Nevertheless some contributions to political studies were forthcoming, such as the application of writing in government and administration, enlargement of political units. in-service training, and eventually a beginning separation of politics from theology. Dr. Anderson holds that especially the Mesopotamian record should be "studied very carefully for evidences of political inventions, discoveries, and thought, before the Greeks."

Turning to Israel, this is one of the rare books in political science that try to do justice to the contributions made by the ancient Jews. Moses' father-in-law, Jethro, pointed out to him the incompetence of his methods of earthly rule, "one of the speediest governmental surveys on record," and taught him the first important lessons in efficient organization. Jethro put emphasis also upon ability and honesty for officials in the public service. Deuteronomy recommended central consultation with the local people on the qualifications of those to be appointed as local administrators and judges. Prophetic warnings were often based on a realistic appraisal of consequences and risks, such as Samuel's discussion of the risks of kingship (1 Samuel 8) and the parable of the contest of the trees (Judges 9:7): if competent men shirk public responsibilities, there will at the end always be some "bramble" to assume power. Princes were frequently given good advice. Anderson rightly complains of the prevailing tendency to emphasize the religious and ethical messages and to ignore the political and administrative passages of the bible. (He does not seem to know Eric Voegelin's three volumes Order and History, the first of which is excellent on political Israel). Anyway, he concedes that the Israelites did not "really mark out the field of politics as something distinct from religion," and that this limited their achievements in the study of secular political matters.

The Greeks had three advantages. With their country organized in many independent city states, Greek students had within easy reach a number of states for comparative studies, historical accounts, intensive "case studies," and philosophical-ethical studies of politics. Having an inquiring turn of mind, they were not diverted from research by the belief in one all-powerful God, and their institutions left them more freedom for critical appraisals.

The predictions and counsels of the Delphic oracle must have been based on some serious study of politics. But as an institution clouded in mystery, blending knowledge and religion, the Delphic establishment made no contribution of lasting value to the study of politics. Neither did Homer, who was not much interested in political matters as a subject for description and analysis. More so was Hesiod, who developed the principle of government according to law. But even to him the chief decisions were made by the gods. Solon, however, was a student of politics in a "truly modern sense." He assumed a "basically humanistic and secular point of view," recognizing man's role in the making of political decisions. The gods are there, but they refrain from action, leaving it to human beings to govern themselves. Solon applied the laws of cause and effect to the political field. Injustices set up reactions among the sufferers who then revolt and destroy their oppressors. People were themselves responsible for the good government of their communities. "Religion and politics he definitely distinguished if not separated. This was the great shift in point of view....

Of other pre-Socratics Anderson deals with Thales, Xenophanes, Heraclitus, Pythagoras and the Pythagoreans. As regards Socrates' contemporaries the author has little taste for abstract logical paradoxes. He dismisses Zeno's famous demonstrations that Achilles could not overtake a tortoise with the remark, which does little justice to the intricacy of the logical problem, that a simple experiment of pitting any good runner against a tortoise would have been enough to destroy Zeno's argument. But he looks carefully for contributions to the study of politics in the works of Alemaeon, the Eleatics, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Archelaus and Leucippus. Democritus, who outlined a system of government based upon democracy, education, freedom of speech, and the election of public officials, harmony of the social classes and the need for justice, seems to Anderson an important enough man to deserve a thorough modern study of his contributions to politics. Archytas (about 380 B.C.) was remarkable for the stress on the importance of reason in politics. "A correct calculation of consequences prevents the commission of crime." His approach was as secular and free from religious slanting as Solon's.

The sophists contributed little to the study of politics, Anderson holds, because their teachings were largely based on opinion rather than research. He acknowledges, however, that Protagoras established the idea—over Socrates' objections—that politics can be taught and learned by teaching. Hippias, too, was a "fairly important student of politics," but in the theoretical rather than descriptive and historical sense.

In general two ideas stood in the way of a direct study of politics—the notion that political virtue could not be taught and that men could not trust their senses. It was the historians, Herodotus and Thucydides, rather than the sophists, who broke through these barriers by comparing various forms of government and by collecting facts. Thucydides deserves credit also for having brought international relations into the field. By his reporting the speeches of various statesmen, he supplied the "first book of readings on political theories." Almost equally important were the dramatists, Aeschylus, Sophocles, Euripides and Aristophanes, because of their discussions of unwritten human rights, higher laws, relative merits of monarchy and democracy, and (Euripides) equality of rights and of sexes. Aristophanes was, through his plays, in fact a teacher in current politics, a "hard hitting and influential political propagandist." Among the statesmen, Pericles, like Solon not expecting the gods to intervene, taught the Athenians the lesson of individual and collective responsibility. Anderson regrets that over his great funeral speech his two other excellent speeches reported by Thucydides have been neglected.

It should be clear by now that what the author means by research and teaching refers primarily to scientia transmissibilis, especially to the empirical approach, as distinct from mere "thought" if ever so deep. This limitation of focus-which he should have explicitly stated and defended at the outset-leads him eventually to a considerable downgrading of Socrates and even more so of Plato. It was not Socrates, but historians like Herodotus, Xenophon and Thucydides who were studying human affairs broadly by the direct observation of men's actions at home and abroad and by interviews with them. Outside of Athens, Socrates made no direct observations. He often remained ambiguous; few of the dialogues presented by Plato seem to Anderson to come to any clear conclusion. Plato himself "sailed off on the wings of his Utopian schemes" instead of applying his outstanding critical intelligence to realistic political analyses. Anderson keeps speaking of Plato's "anti-politics" and challenges modern students to write studies on the empirical material in Plato (of which there is plenty) rather than on his Utopian and semi-Utopian plans. The very remoteness from actual politics of Plato's Academy seems to explain the fact that it was saved from destruction for eight hundred years while Aristotle's Lycee did not reach the first centenary. Students, not in all respects of the first rank, like Isocrates and Demosthenes, made more important contributions to political science than Plato, Anderson says. Isocrates was a typical political science professor in the modern sense. He concentrated on this field more than did Aristotle, who had much broader interests. Demosthenes "failed, but grandly." The proper hero of Anderson's story is Aristotle, of course, whose merits he extols in a beautifully written summary. Aristotle's Lycee was a "well-organized research center with a definite program," four divisions, and library. His Politics was the first real text on the subject. The second part of his Constitution of Athens is to Anderson the non plus ultra of a study on local government, political theory and analysis. But Aristotle, too, had shortcomings. Anderson mentions his failure to understand the trend toward units larger than cities, his doctrine that there was a general purpose moving toward the good, and his undervaluing the role of economic welfare.

The book's account of political science in Rome, although not lacking in pertinent remarks, is silent on the manner in which political experience and wisdom were being passed on within the leading families and hierarchies of offices. I have missed also a reference to the excellent monograph on Polybius and his theory of mixed government by Kurt von Fritz (The Theory of the Mixed Constitution in Antiquity, A Critical Analysis of Polybius' Political Ideas, New York, 1954).

These are minor objections. Adoring greatness of human thought wherever it has appeared in the course of history, as it did in Socrates and Plato, this reviewer nonetheless agrees with Professor Anderson that to write a separate story of the empirical approach to politics is an enterprise as legitimate as it is necessary. Anderson has blazed a trail.

ARNOLD BRECHT

New York City

Anarchist Thought in India. By Adi H. Doctor. (Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1964. Pp. 120.)

This slender volume is by far the most persuasive philosophical critique of the political thought of Gandhi and his supporters I have read. Adi Doctor, a Lecturer in Politics at Marathwada University in India, begins by effectively arguing that Gandhi's rejection of the state is not an outgrowth of classical Indian thought but is essentially a twentieth century Indian view. Unfortunately, the author weakens this argument by appearing to accept the notion that there is a single classical tradition against which Gandhian thought can be tested, when what is essential to the critique is not the philosophical connections between Gandhi's views and the Indian "tradition" but the fact that Gandhians turn to the tradition to provide a justification for what is in any event a contemporary view. Nonetheless, by demonstrating that important strands of Sanskritic thought are contrary to Gandhi's anarchist position, Doctor successfully turns our attention to the question of whether such a philosophical position is tenable for contemporary India.

The relevance of so-called traditional patterns of political behavior, political institutions and political philosophy to modern Asia and Africa is an issue in most of the developing nations. It is often argued that modern "western" political institutions are inappropriate and that one must therefore turn to more "traditional" patterns of government as if there were a single relevant tradition. Such an argument is based upon what Bert Hoselitz aptly called an ideology of "traditionalism," which attempts to justify and sanctify contemporary actions by reference to real or imagined traditions.

Doctor's tightly reasoned volume is a sharp corrective to traditionalist thought for he does what any modern political and social analyst must do-relate normative judgments to the limits imposed by the real world and relate philosophical principles to philosophical ends. After briefly analyzing the political ideas of several ancient texts, especially the Epics, the Manusamhita, the Dharmasastras and the Arthasastra, Doctor turns to the contemporary writings of Gandhi and his most prominent disciples, Vinoba Bhave and Jayaprakash Narayan. Doctor quite rightly suggests that Gandhi's attack against centralized governments, political parties, coercive legislation and majority rule itself represents an assault upon India's parliamentary system, not only a traditionalist protest against modernization. In practice the Gandhian critique urges Indians to direct their attention not toward the problem of how to make a parliamentary system work more effectively, but toward its replacement by weak central government and self-sufficient villages in which there are neither parties nor elections but government by consensus. It turns Indians away from the central political problems—not how to eliminate conflicts, but how to manage them; not how to eliminate private ambitions, but how to reconcile these with the ambitions and interests of others; not how to eliminate central authority, but how to make it more effective; not how to establish a village "consensus" (often a guise for the tyranny of a village oligarchy), but how to channel village rivalries into constructive channels.

Doctor's critique of the utopian assumptions underlying Gandhian thought, and his demonstration that the Gandhian proposals would not accomplish what they purport to achieve, namely a society without conflict or coercion, are familiar points to students of political philosophy. His contribution lies in intelligently applying them to the foremost utopian ideology in the developing world.

Myron Weiner

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Nomos VII: Rational Decision. EDITED BY CARL J. FRIEDRICH. (New York: Atherton Press, 1964. Pp. viii, 228. $6.50).

The question common to most of the essays in this volume concerns the degree of relevance of reason or rationality to legal and political decision-making. The volume does not include a representative sample of all the views current concerning this subject, but it presents a considerable range of positions, and considers a number of the important issues.

A surprising feature of the volume is the slim representation of the view, which comes down to us from Hobbes and Hume, that reason is able to function only with respect to "matters of fact" and "relations between ideas" (Hume), that it is powerless in the realm of values or ends. In the latter areas, reason is the "scout" (Hobbes) or the "slave" (Hume) of the a-rational agents called the passions. This position is represented by the brief comment of Felix Oppenheim. Oppenheim contends that "Intrinsic valuations are a matter of subjective commitment, not of objective truth." Hence they are neither rational nor irrational, but "non-rational" (p. 219). On this view, reason is relevant to politics solely as an aid in calculating means-ends relationships. This is perhaps the most widely held position in contemporary political science. It has also been popular in Anglo-American philosophy since Hume, and it dominated that philosophy for a considerable period in our century. More recently, however, serious questions have been raised concerning it, and at present it has few adherents among Anglo-American philosophers. This is reflected in the papers by philosophers in the present volume.

The starting point of much recent criticism of the Humean view is the observation that our language allows us intelligibly to ask for reasons in support of value decisions, and that we regularly do so. That is, we regularly utilize the English word "reason" and its cognates to request presentation of the grounds on which value choices rest, and to describe or categorize responses to such requests. Given this empirical fact, the philosophical assertion that reason is irrelevant to value decisions generates a paradox. Unless it is assumed that use of "reason" and its cognates in discourse concerning value decisions rests upon a misunderstanding of those words, that is unless it is assumed that no communication takes place in such discourse, the philosophical assertion has the force of insisting that men cannot do what they regularly do as a matter of course. Since a glance at the dictionary falsifies the assumption, the philosopher is in the untenable position of dictating to ordinary language. If this line of argument is correct, it is false to say that reason is irrelevant to intrinsic value decisions. It is demonstrated to be false by the fact that the English word "reason" is employed in discourse concerning value. For this employment demonstrates that the non-linguistic referent of "reason" is in fact used in making such decisions.

It will properly be objected, however, that philosophical disputes concerning problems of value cannot be adjudicated by the simple device of consulting ordinary language. But if linguistic evidence cannot conclusively resolve philosophical disputes, it directs us to the source of the differences between the philosopher and the common sense views reflected in ordinary usage. These differences trace, to adapt John Ladd's argument slightly, to an "obsession [on the part of the Humean] with science and with scientific models of reasoning ... and the assumption that there is only one kind of rationality, namely, that represented by formal logic and the scientific method" (p. 127). Or, in Aristotelian language, to "the reduction of practical thinking to some form or other of theoretical thinking" (ibid.). Aristotle insisted that the exactness of theoretical science was unattainable in practical discourse. Yet he regarded man as capable of making defensible decisions in that sphere and held that this capacity distinguished man from other animated beings. Conceding, in other words, that moral decisions cannot be entailed or validated in the sense required of conclusions in theoretical discourse, he nevertheless held that some decisions could be shown to be rationally preferable to others. Ordinary language reflects a similar view.² The Humean, on the other hand, while admitting that value decisions can be made to turn in part on questions of fact and relations between ideas, and hence that reason has an ancillary role to play in making them, insists that "ultimately" they depend upon commitments to which reasons are irrelevant.

¹ See the essays in V. C. Chappell, ed., Ordinary Language (Prentice-Hall, 1964).

The dispute would appear to be in part terminological. Hume uses "reason" in one way, Aristotle, a number of other philosophers, and most speakers of the English language, use it in another. But matters of substance hinge upon the differences in terminology. The Aristotelian view, to take but one example, prompts investigation of value questions as they arise in various contexts, seeking constantly to maximize practical rationality. "While our present theory is thus necessarily inexact, we must do what we can to help it out."3 The Humean, by contrast, takes it as settled that nothing of a rational sort can be said concerning intrinsic value decisions. His motto might be said to be "Our present theory is entirely exact and there is nothing we can do to help it out." The Humean view, therefore, underlies the widely accepted position that scientific analysis of moral and political life has no concern with value decisions, while the Aristotelian position sees such decisions as a central concern of moral and political analysis. Hence the dispute is of more than terminological significance.

The view just summarized, drawn primarily from the papers of Frankena, Freund, and Ladd, is also relevant to the very different approaches of other essays in the volume. Harvey Mansfield, Jr. prefaces his closely argued interpretation of Burke's Bristol Speech with a distinction between reason and "true reason." "All men, or at least all normal men, are rational because they speak, giving reasons. But only a few men know true reasons, and only to a limited degree. Yet a reason is in the highest sense not a reason unless it is a true reason" (p. 199). Further, true reasons lead to "correct decisions"—not merely to decisions—and "in the highest sense, only a correct decision is truly a decision." Leaving aside the identification of speech and (inexact) reason, the question is raised as to the differences between reason and "reason in the highest sense" or "true reason."

² Note the extent to which Aristotle's Nico-machean Ethics is taken up with analysis of ordinary language.

Mansfield's use of "true," "correct," and "exact" as modifiers for "reason" and "decision" recalls Oppenheim's "objective truth." It suggests not a continuum moving from more to less inexact reasoning within the category of practical reasoning, but a sharp dichotomy between inexact and truly exact reasoning leading, respectively, to a "compromise of opinions" (p. 197) and "truly correct decisions." Mansfield would seem to agree with Oppenheim and his positivistic cohorts that "exact" conclusions or decisions are the only ones that truly deserve to be called rational, but to disagree with their view that such conclusions are unavailable in the realm of value decisions.

If this interpretation of Mansfield's distinction is correct, and it should be admitted that there are some suggestions of another view, there are obvious conflicts, both linguistic and philosophical, between it and the view summarized above. Mansfield appears to be sensitive to the possibility of linguistic difficulties with his argument since he troubles to claim the support of language for his view. He asserts that "The meaning of 'decision' tends in the direction of 'correct decision,' just as the meaning of 'rational' tends in the direction of 'true'." Passing by the question of the evidence on which these assertions rest, the reader is left to discover the force of the verb "tends" for himself. That uses of "rational" range from "arguable" to "true" can be discovered from the dictionary. But if Mansfield's argument is to be supported by linguistic evidence, that evidence must show not merely that "rational" is sometimes used in the sense of "true," but that this is the sense in which it is used (or to which it "tends") in discourse concerning the value-laden decisions of political life. It is on this point, which he ignores, that Mansfield's argument conflicts with a fundamental aspect of the position summarized above.

Mansfield departs less sharply from ordinary usage than does Oppenheim. We do use "true" as a modifier for "reason" and "rationality," and it cannot be said that we never do so in discussion of values. If the foregoing arguments are viable, however, when such usage is challenged ("what precisely do you mean by 'true'?"), it must be withdrawn or equated with "more rational than the alternatives" or a related locution. Escape from these alternatives is possible only if philosophical arguments are offered which define the nature and demonstrate the possibility of "true" or "exact" conclusions in the realm of values. Mansfield neither presents nor cites any such arguments. Hence his formulation is misleading in that it suggests (unintentionally if I understand his comments concerning Hobbes) an equivalence between practical and theoretical discourse, or simply puzzling in that we do not know how to interpret "true." In conceptual analysis, ordinary language is not the be-all or end-all, but it is the begin-all.5

³ Nicomachean Ethics, II, 2. (Wheelwright translation.) Several of the essays in the present volume, particularly those by Pennock, Freund, Ladd, and Mavrinac, are solid albeit brief efforts in this direction.

RICHARD E. FLATHMAN

University of Chicago

The Strange Tactics of Extremism. By HARRY AND BONARO OVERSTREET. (New York: W. W. Norton & Co., Inc., 1964. Pp. 315. $4.50.)

Harry and Bonaro Overstreet's The Strange Tactics of Extremism is a needed, perceptive, and readable book. It is a needed book because American society is once again under attack as it has been at various times in our historyby a small, dedicated handful of zealots, in whose breasts flames the most virulent of hatreds, who would advance their own distorted views of public policy and their own thirst for personal power by playing on the fears of, as well as seeking to intimidate, some of their fellow citizens. The Know-Nothings, the Ku Klux Klan, the Communists, and now the multiple front elements of the radical right: all have had, and some continue to have, their moments on the American scene. Public awareness of their real aims, and an aroused recognition of the danger have meant, and hopefully, will always mean, their sure demise.

It is a perceptive book because the Overstreets are not strangers to the strategies and tactics of those whose anachronistic views of the world about them leads them to jeer at almost anyone who seeks progress in this age

- ⁴ The discussion of Mansfield's paper is relevant to Gottfried Dietze's argument concerning "absolute" rationality and to Heinz Eulau's construction of a "model" of rationality as well.
- ⁵ I have of course ignored the many difficulties with this argument. Some of them are dealt with in the essays summarized above. The reviewer is attempting to deal with aspects of these problems as they relate to politics, in a forthcoming work entitled The Public Interest, An Essay in the Logic of the Normative Discourse of Politics.

of science and space. Three books and years of research on Communism and the tactics of Marxism-Leninism provide an excellent background to analyze and explore the tactics of the radical rightist movement.

It is a readable book because the Overstreets are the Overstreets and they seek to communicate their thought and their findings to the many rather than to the select few. They write not merely for the professional students of radical groups but for the laymen in cities and towns across America who, if they are to help preserve our nation, must be provided with the intellectual tools which will expose the fallacies in the thinking of those on both the far left and the far right.

The Overstreets are biased. So am I, for they believe, as I believe, in the concept of a democracy in a republic. They believe, as I believe, in the values of free and decent discussion. They have faith, as I have faith, that an American people, given the "facts," will, in the long run, come to grips with the problem and make the right decision. Most Americans I think, share this bias. The current problem is: what must we as Americans do to preserve a system of free discussion when it is undermined by radicals on both ends of the political spectrum.

Before one can act with wisdom, one must understand. The Overstreets assist in providing that understanding, as they take you through the labyrinth of ideology and tactics as practiced by Robert Welch and the John Birch Society, Dan Smoot in his Report, Carl McIntire and his 20th Century Reformation Hour, Myers G. Lowman and his Circuit Riders, Edgar C. Bundy and his Church League of America, and Billy James Hargis and his Christian Crusade.

Professor Revilo P. Oliver, associate editor of the John Birch Society magazine, American Opinion, believes, according to the Overstreets, that President John F. Kennedy was assassinated because he was falling behind in "delivering the assigned quota of conspiratorial gain" (p. 239). Is this view too far removed from Robert Welch's incredible statement that Dwight D. Eisenhower, the last Republican President, was "a conscious agent of the Communist conspiracy"? Of course not.

The Overstreets note early in the book (p. 17) that both Lenin and Hitler set down their aims and tactics for all the world to see, but few paid attention until acts were committed, and by that time it was almost too late. The Overstreets want us to begin our homework on the radical right now, and note that "the materials we need to read are being published in our midst every day of the week. The problem we have to cope with is that of our own unawareness of the need to learn." (p. 18) They state that while the John Birch Society "is in the American scene, it is not of it: certainly not in the relationship it defines between leader and led." (p. 26) To its leader, Mr. Welch, democracy is "a perennial fraud." (p. 36) As my colleague, Senator Milton Young (R-North Dakota) noted when he revealed some of the activities of the John Birch Society, a high percentage of those whom Mr. Welch attacks are "middle-of-the-road, and even conservative, Republicans." (p. 42)

The Overstreets ask what is the worst that men can say of extremism? Their tentative answer is in accord with the values of Western Man which have slowly been attained over the ages and that is that "extremism...pronounces a death sentence upon honest communication." (p. 54) They analyze the nature of the extremist communication and skillfully reveal the illogic of its structure and the misleading innuendo which is drawn from the irrelevant fact. In this regard, perhaps the understatement of the book is that "one key to Welch's success is his remarkable power to use the tools of scholarship without letting them cramp his style." (p. 85)

The tactics of the far right are similar to those of the far left: the reading rooms, the periodicals, the radio and TV programs, speakers' bureau, all serve to indoctrinate the faithful; the letter-writing and petition-passing serve to keep them busy, and the "fronts" to confuse the opposition and attract the willing dupes. The radical right is against, rather than for something. Thus, they oppose the United Nations, NATO, the income tax, civil rights, the Supreme Court, Radio Free Europe, and the Peace Corps, and so on. They deal in stereotypes rather than problems. (p. 123) Perhaps the radical rightist's basic disservice is, as the authors note, that he treats the term Communism as a spacious container that can be made to hold all the religious, social, political, and economic attitudes and policies of which he disapproves." (p. 191)

The Overstreets correctly make it clear that conservatism should not be equated with radicalism of the right, any more than liberalism should be equated with Communism. They say "at the risk of being repetitious, we would stress again that not everyone who sees danger in the growth of centralized government or who opposes federal housing and aid to education is thereby proved to be an extremist. What counts is the manner in which these issues are interpreted. . . ." (p. 212)

The radical rightist is against any area of agreement between America's two great political parties, he seeks to "politicalize" every aspect of life as does the totalitarian, he seeks to infect related groups in society and create intolerance to all who oppose his aims, he believes in secrecy, and also in a double-standard of conduct. (pp. 224-225) The Overstreets urge conservatives to learn what the radical right can do as the liberals were educated to what the radical left could do in the 1930's and 1940's. What is the best way to do this? Ask the radical rightists "to substantiate every charge they make and . . . then (give) the fullest possible publicity . . . to their responses." (p. 249) The authors note that the schools, the PTA's, the mental health movement, and the public libraries have long been particular right-wing targets. (pp. 266-267) To protect these institutions from the onslaught of the extremists, and to expose the contradictory nature of extremist beliefs, the Overstreets advocate full and free discussions. They note that labeling the radical right as "fascist" or "anarchic" is not only emotional. but incorrect. If any label can be applied to these extremists it is that of "anarchic totalitarianism." (p. 268) The radical rightist line, conclude the authors, "is not underwritten by any coherent theory. It is a product of anger, not of thought; of anger, and of a will to be on top of some heap. It expresses a determination to climb up and to bull down." (p. 268)

While noting that the strength of the nation is in its "liberal-conservative" or "conservative-liberal" center, perhaps the authors place too great a stress here and there on the "liberal" or the "conservative" in American society. Such labels even though we admit their lack of preciseness connote an emphasis on and commitment to ideology which I do not believe exists. I hope also that the authors will some day undertake a further work dealing with extremism in cur society and attempt to determine the causes of the frustrations which have provided the material upon which such groups thrive.

Of particular interest to educators, and a sentiment with which this reviewer concurs, is the Overstreets' admonition to those in charge of our schools that perhaps our young people should have more familiarity with "the great words of our tradition so that they will have, all their lives, the supportive companionship of these words when they need them." (p. 296) The authors are thinking of the Declaration of Independence and the Gettysburg Address. While such a plea might sound "corny" to some who have devoted their lives to the fine points of analyzing the governmental processes and dealing with the sophisticated methodologies of the behavioral sciences, it is time all of us realized that there is more to government in a free society than the analysis of particular issues or the statistical predictability of particular decision-makers. There is a spirit of freedom which must be conveyed in terms of our past if we are to keep faith with the future. That is the challenge of the Overstreets, not only to their fellow Americans, but to all who seek, through service and through instruction, to set an example for the young men and women of our land.

The radical reactionary right in the United States poses a danger for our country. It is constantly seeking to undermine faith in government and in public servants. Anyone who disagrees with its fanatical beliefs is in danger of false and venomous attack and abuse. The time for all decent, reasonable citizens to stand up against radicals, left and right, is certainly here. The Overstreets have shown how this stand can be intelligently, responsibly and patriotically taken.

THOMAS H. KUCHEL

United States Senate

Administration in Developing Countries—The Theory of Prismatic Society. By Fred W. Riggs. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1964. Pp. xvi, 477. $7.95.)

As chairman of the Comparative Administration Group of the American Society for Public Administration and as one of the most imaginative and prolific theorists of political development, Fred Riggs has measurably reshaped the thinking of both practitioners and pedants of public administration in the new states. He was in the forefront of those who insisted that the principles of American public administration cannot be directly applied to transitional societies and that new models and concepts must be designed both to explain what goes on in such societies and to facilitate substantive programs of development. The measure of Riggs' influence is not how many people use such terms of his as "prismatic society," "sala," or "clects," but rather the large number of people who are following him in trying to find some patterned order in the otherwise strange behavior of officials and bureaucrats in the new states.

During the last few years it has not been easy to lay one's hands upon much of Riggs' writing, for as an extraordinarily cosmopolitan scholar he has generously published in numerous out-of-the-way journals. Now, however, he has done us the service of bringing together many of his widely scattered articles and organized them as the chapters of this new book. This work is therefore not a systematic exposition of his theory of a "prismatic society," something which we still await. It is instead a fascinating introduction to the restless searchings of an amazingly wide-ranging mind. Riggs is always uninhibited in sharing his readings and his ruminations. As a theorist he is intrigued with words, their definitions and their nuances of meaning. He is constantly breaking the flow of his analysis to elaborate on the need for a new word, on the inadequacies of conventional terminologies, on the need to make more refined distinctions than the mind of man usually feels comfortable with.

But it would be grossly wrong to dismiss Riggs as one who would tell us more about verbal distinctions than we want or need to know. Although at places in this book it is hard to understand why Riggs is so enthusiastic in laboring points which appear hardly to deserve footnote status, in truth the sum effect of his efforts is a substantial advance in both our knowledge of transitional societies and the state of social science theory in general. And this is true for two very specific reasons. First, in spite of his penchant for abstractions. Riggs is in fact above all a realist whose speculative mind is sparked by visions of exactly what happens in particular settings and not by the formulations of other theorists. Second, in seeking his level of description and analysis Riggs has gone further than anyone else in shattering the traditional disciplinary boundaries and finding a new level for integrating, in particular, economic and political behavior and thus suggesting a modern, behavioral version of the old-fashioned field of political economy.

Intellectually Riggs began his theoretical studies of the underdeveloped countries with the dichotomous models of "traditional" and "modern," which were evolved in the writings of Maine, Toennies, Durkheim, Weber, and Parsons; and he once saw the underdeveloped countries as "transitional" or mixed systems in a condition of unstable equilibrium between the two ideal types. Like most other contemporary scholars he was, however, soon dissatisfied with these categories and with all the compromising or euphemistic terms which have been invented for labeling the phenomena. It is true that Riggs has come up with a new terminology, and certainly only a very few scholars will feel that the basic problems of classification have been solved by his invention of calling traditional systems "fused" as is light before striking a prism, modern societies

"diffracted" as is a beam of light after passing through a prism, and transitional systems "prismatic" for the state of light within a prism. Tastes differ and analogies that are illuminating to one may seem only gross and clumsy to others. But it is not the terms that are important, as much as Riggs would belabor them; what is important is that Riggs has gone further than any other social theorist in taking the transitional societies as they really are and seeing them as much in a state of equilibrium as any "traditional" or "modern" system. In his theory of the "prismatic society" Riggs singles out patterns of behavior which have an internal logic of their own, and which do not merely represent imperfect incorporation of modern practices in societies in which traditional ways are being disrupted. In noting precisely what goes on in these societies he does not try to rationalize away or dismiss as transitory phenomena practices which might seem deviant in either traditional or modern settings.

Let is be clear that Riggs is not advocating the Pollyanna view that apparently strange behavior in transitional societies "makes sense" if one only "understands their values." Nor is he saying that given time alone changes in behavior can be expected. What he is trying to do is to create a general utility model in which economic wealth, political power and social status considerations can be treated in the same matrix, and with respect to which, given the resource parameters of prismatic societies, the behavior of actors represents the hard-headed and clear-eyed judgments of men who are striving to optimize their total selfinterest. The implication of Riggs' analysis is that people do what they commonly do in transitional societies because that is where the payoffs lie for them and not because of any lingering "hold of tradition." Thus, "development" toward "modernization" cannot be expected as long as people, who can do something about it, will be hurt more than helped by such "development."

All this represents a significant advance in the boldness of theory building. Unfortunately it cannot be said that Riggs has been fully successful in expounding this model in the book under review. We must await the time when he will attempt a full exposition of his theories. In the meantime, however, he has given us a rich and provocative harvest of ideas.

LUCIAN W. PYE

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Mass Media and National Development: The Role of Information in the Developing Countries. By Wilbur Schramm. (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1964. Pp. xiv, 333. $7.50.)

For better or for worse, it is now widely assumed that social science can be useful to policy makers, and particularly that careful attention to our storehouse of knowledge can make the processes of bringing about change or "development" less chancy, socially painful and politically unpredictable than was true in the past. Exactly how the contemporary leaders of the West or of the New Nations find their way through the theoretical and conceptual jungle of national economic, political and social development is an intriguing mystery. Whether they can derive any coherent meaning from the babel of hunches, insights, hypotheses, theories, "laws," findings and speculations that social science has produced in this area in recent years is itself a subject that might be rewardingly researched.

One great merit of Wilbur Schramm's volume is that it is in part a self-conscious effort at intellectual stock-taking. His central premise is that the process of economic and social development (the "terrible ascent" from traditionality to modernity) can be greatly facilitated through the intelligent and systematic use of modern communications technology -particularly the mass media of radio and television. In support of this premise, he assembles a striking amount of data on the distribution of information and informationproducing facilities around the world; he summarizes much of what we believe we know about the dynamics of change; and he provides a number of summary examples of the role of communications in facilitating change, drawing in some detail on the works of Lerner, Doob, Holmberg and Rao. Few will quarrel with his contention that those who would speed up the industrial response to the "revolution of rising expectations" would do well to understand the importance of communications in this process.

Schramm's data clearly indicate that the task of achieving the goal he desires is formidable. Arresting statistics are produced to show that to be underdeveloped means, among other things, to be radically deprived on every dimension relating to the production and dissemination of information. Foreign news coverage in the world's newspapers, for example, centers overwhelmingly on the affairs of France, Britain, the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. A relative trickle of news emanates from the rest of the world, both because the less developed countries do little to transmit local information and because the foreign dispatches of the five world news services (owned by the same four countries noted above) concentrate on the affairs of each other. When these world news services do report on the affairs of Asia or other less developed parts of the world, the emphasis is often on the spectacular or the bizarre. This distortion and lack of balance is a problem worth considerable reflection.

The pattern of severe inequality in the flow of information remains unchanged when one examines such media as mail, telephone and telegraph messages, radio and television. Most of the world remains a considerable distance from achieving the modest level of communications development established by UNESCO as a minimally acceptable standard. For the many reasons Schramm cites, the serious lack of mass media facilities is not significantly counterbalanced by the two-step communications flow whereby information is diffused from urban centers to the countryside and from a few literates to a larger mass of illiterates. Moreover, he also argues quite cogently that economic development—and especially political development-will require the existence of not one but many channels of information diffusion. A rational handling of this problem necessitates not merely more schools and newspapers but, in addition, greatly increased use of radio and television.

Schramm is judicious in differentiating the kinds of things the mass media can accomplish in the complex field of development. As "watchmen," he feels the media acting alone can do much to broaden human horizons, disseminate knowledge of economic alternatives and raise the level of human aspirations. In the area of changing values, attitudes and social customs, he suggests that the mass media must work through other structures by seeking to have an impact on opinion leaders and by imparting such necessary things as status and technical information to those who might in turn influence others. As "teachers" he concludes that the role of the mass media must be essentially auxiliary, reinforcing and perhaps extending the capability of existing human resources. His hope is that the mass media in the vital area of education can grow from the use of first and second generation materials (e.g., charts, maps, chalkboards, books) to the utilization of third and fourth generation devices (e.g., films and film strips, radio, television, programmed instruction and computers). It is these new media which "represent the great hope of the developing countries for supplying education at the rate and of the quality required."

Despite the author's frequent caveats about well known obstacles to change, there is both a strikingly sanguine attitude toward the efficacy of the mass media and a distressing tendency to slide over several perplexing issues. For example, one would surely want to question Schramm's implicit assumption that a relatively high level of economic modernity can be brought in the foreseeable future to that portion of the world he calls the "band of scarcity." Some of his own data depicting the extremely modest improvements growing out of planned economic inputs clearly suggest how staggering this problem is and how little change one can expect in a period of several generations. If this is so, one is led to wonder just how much added information is consistent with keeping the "rising frustration" level at something below the point of serious eruption. The author himself at one point observes that change must be balanced (e.g., literacy and technical skills should not outrun jobs), but he does not go on to specify that this concept—in some places and under certain conditions-may very well imply slowing down rather than accelerating the communications revolution.

The author also raises the ethical question about using information technology to overcome traditional resistances to change. He concludes that "the developing countries have decided to change" (which raises the question of who this is) and that, other things being equal, knowledge is better than ignorance, health better than disease, eating better than going hungry, a comfortable living standard better than poverty, and political participation better than isolation from the polity.

As an abstract statement of a democratic ethic, such a roll call of preferences is certainly laudable. But as an implied prediction about what is likely to emerge in the developing world, the rationale seems curiously removed from the conditions and patterns that currently prevail there. The realities of Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America indicate that mass communications in part are utilized quite deliberately by indigenous elites to achieve and maintain control of political systems, often at the expense of the very values that are important to the author. In Schramm's scheme of values (illustrated by the criteria for drawing up a national communications statute prepared by Fernand Terrou), information should be free, strongly protected by legal institutions and used as an instrument of human liberation. That, as a matter of empirical practice, it may and often is used as a device for enslaving man receives less treatment than one might expect.

Finally, there is something unrealistic about Schramm's repeated assertion that in the developing countries demands for budgetary outlays for communications development should not be viewed as part of the normal competition for funds that obtains among administrative departments. Because communications are essential to all governmental activities, its claims should be accorded a privileged position. Quite apart from the query whether communications, inherently a part of all functional administrative units or divisions, warrant separate operational status in a cabinet or ministerial structure, it seems of great importance that those who would increase budgetary outlays in this sector should be made to compete with the champions of more roads, better health, public housing, expanded educational facilities, industrialization and other activities associated with modernization. How limited resources are in fact allocated in any system is the essence of politics, and it seems unlikely that a formula can be found that will take the field of communications outside this sphere.

Schramm's treatment is a cogent and often brilliant brief for the thesis that communications are central to-perhaps even the touchstone of—economic, social and political development. As such, it represents an important contribution to the growing published output in the communications field, of which Schramm is a leading figure. Those who read this volume with care will be rewarded by its combination of rich detail and illuminating insights. Many will feel, however, that the case for the kind of attention to mass communications that the author suggests suffers from the great gaps that remain in our knowledge about the dynamics of change. Schramm's lucid analysis will certainly help us to identify the kinds of problems that require further scholarly attention, both on the dimension he treats so competently and on others of equal relevance to the difficult subject treated by this volume.

Joseph LaPalombara

Yale University

American Political Science: A Profile of a Discipline. By Albert Somit and Joseph Tanenhaus. (New York: Atherton Press, 1964. Pp. xiv, 173. $5.75.)

Somit and Tanenhaus accept some rather narrow limits in this book. They are not concerned with what we as political scientists do, nor with how or how well we do it. Rather they ask what attitudes or beliefs we have about a series of matters: behavioralism, the adequacy of our profession, the existence and influence of an Establishment in the APSA, the quality of doctoral programs, the significance of the work being done in various fields, the composition of our "hall of fame," the factors making for professional success, the prestige-value of publication in various journals, and career satisfaction. They get at our beliefs through a questionnaire sent to a representative sample of the members of the APSA and through computer-assisted multivariate analyses of the responses (N = 431).

One of the main parts of the questionnaire, Part B, consists of 26 statements, respondents being invited to check "agree strongly," "agree," "disagree strongly," or "can't say." The statements are taken from the literature and are of the kind that we all repeatedly hear. Yet they are vague and ambiguous, most of them in more than one respect. For example, "A substantial part of the intellectual conflict in American political science is rooted in issues that are methodological in character." What is the meaning of substantial? Suppose that I think that a "substantial" part is so rooted, and that another "substantial" part is not. How should I respond? Whatever my response, am I reacting to a factual statement or to a criticism? If it is a factual statement, what is the point in responding "strongly?" Should I agree "strongly" that it is three o'clock? Another of the 26 statements illustrates similar difficulties: "The really significant problems of political life cannot be successfully attacked by the behavioral approach." How should I respond if I think (as I do) that some can be and that others can't be, and further that even when it is possible to adopt a behavioral approach it may or may not be sensible to do so? (I will not ask the tired question—though I might, for it is relevant—whether we all agree on the definition of "behavioral approach.")

One of the conclusions that Somit and Tanenhaus reach is that "political scientists consider behavioralism the single most important issue facing the discipline." But obviously the finding is limited by the fact that they checked only on some selected issues of an intra-disciplinary sort, not on issues relating directly togovernment and international affairs.

A colleague skilled in factor analysis, Samuel C. Patterson, is from a technical point of view quite respectful of the methods that Somit and Tanenhaus employ. On the negative side he points to the claim that factors concerning "behavioralism" and the "adequacy of the profession" are independent of each other and says that the alleged finding was in fact postulated in the method employed—that the orthogonal rotation of the factors precluded any finding that they were related. On the positive side he points particularly to the sophisticated and ingenious analyses relating to the "havenots" and to "career satisfaction."

The most striking of the findings emerge from Part C of the questionnaire. Respondents were asked to name the political scientists who have made the most significant contributions to the discipline. As Somit and Tanenhaus note. the item revealed a "curious lack of consensus." A mention by 2.9% or more of the respondents sufficed to get a name among the "greats," 18 being included for the pre-1945 period and 19 for the post-1945 period. To add to the curious aspects of the situation, we might note that of the 33 on the combined list (four appear twice), 19 have been elected to the Presidency of the APSA, but only 4 are among the 25 authors whose books have received the Woodrow Wilson prize since it was first awarded in 1947. The most notable fact is that almost all of the "greats" are the Ph.D. products of a very few departments. To put it differently, most departments—even most of the top eleven as determined by Hughes in 1925, Keniston in 1957, and Somit and Tanenhaus in 1963have failed to produce a single "great." We can wonder what the effect would have been if a slightly different question had been put, e.g., if the respondents had been instructed to name a designated number of persons, or if they had been instructed to render judgment only in their own major field of interest.

In the chapter dealing with the "greats," Somit and Tanenhaus attempt to identify the elements of eminence—the factors that seem to account for the presence of the various names on the list. In the following chapter their concern is with "the road to success." But "success" apparently has nothing to do with eminence. Somit and Tanenhaus choose, for their purposes, to equate it with "the ability to get offers from other schools," and they comment on the "realism" with which respondents rated the contribution of various factors, e.g., the view that the quantity of publications contributes more than their quality. But again the responses raise questions. How would the results have differed if the respondents had been asked about the actual receipt of offers rather than the ability to get them? How would they have differed if a distinction had been made between offers from Harvard University and Harding College? How would they have differed if respondents had confined themselves to explaining offers they themselves had received or extended rather than explaining those received by the other fellow?

In sum, judgments of the book can well be mixed. It is elegantly written, and much of it is interesting. But when people—even professors are asked vague and ambiguous questions to which they can respond only on an impressionistic or intuitive basis, how much importance should we attach to the findings? If similar but clearer questions were asked not of a subgroup comprising a representative sample of the profession but of a subgroup consisting of persons commanding very special respect, how much would the results differ and in what ways? And with regard to the departments that have produced the "greats," what do they have that the rest lack? Or should we ask what they once had that the rest then lacked?

VERNON VAN DYKE

The University of Iowa

The Crisis of Political Imagination. By GLENN TINDER. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1964. Pp. 373. $7.50).

One criterion applicable to a book whose topic is ostensibly political theory is the fruitfulness of the genre in which it is written. Professor Tinder's essay is a study in political metaphysics. Its chief theme is the alleged failure of political theory to do away once and for all with all the world's ills and to rectify the tragedy of the human condition. According to Tinder, modern political thought has managed to create a "bifurcation of spirit and society," and has then refused to recognize this schism as the critical question confronting modern political thought. Consistent with this genre of analysis, the condition of mankind is deduced from principles which are assumed to be axiomatic and, consequently, beyond systematically acquired empirical data.

The axiom in question is the alienation and estrangement of man, "the dread of his personal existence," the separateness of his life, and the decline of the traditional social and community institutions which in the past provided the conditions for a more productive, secure and happier existence. This axiom is, as axioms must be, self-evident. Thus anchored, Tinder proceeds to an analysis of how alienation or estrangement has manifested itself in our culture. The symptoms of mass disintegration are everywhere (indeed, no area of personal or social life escapes): the loss of rural assets (e.g., an open, unpolluted sky, the breezes of the open country); the high divorce rate; the dislocations of industrial society; the decay of fraternalism in trade unions, lodges and neighborhoods; neuroses and psychoses; a loss of warmth in human relations (including an end to the esprit of the slums (sic); deadening conformity; the private political impotence engendered by mass democracy.

Estrangement and alienation are enforced not only by social and historical circumstances, but are expressed in cultural institutions as well. Religion, science, art, and philosophy, earlier sources of unity and social and psychological integration, have each contributed to this dislocation. In rejecting religion, despite those respects in which skepticism constitutes a victory of rationality and enlightenment (p. 43), the relationship of man to the universe established "through the great myths of Christianity" has been largely lost (p. 44). Science, chiefly physics, in its mechanistic or Newtonian stage, made it possible for man to "master a portion of reality . . . became an obstacle to apprehension of the whole range of being." (p. 44) Modern physics, on the other hand, is incomprehensible to the layman and, therefore, a source of bewilderment, hence estrangement, rather than security. In philosophy, Descartes, Kant (whose philosophy is "in some ways one of the most depressing ever formulated" [p. 46]), Hegel, and the existentialists have made the world unknowable and absurd. Recent art communicates the personal eccentricity rather than, as in the classical past, the universality of the human experience. Above all, politics has failed to offer a philosophy of community or a policy for furthering community. Liberalism, with laissez faire capitalism, and mass democracy have issued in a decline of political authority and thus of community.

Where must we look, what must we seek to do, to extricate ourselves from this oppressive and dehumanized condition? Tinder replies:

... the first task of social thought in our time is to regain the posture, if not of religious faith, at least of religious openness and inquiry. During most of Western history, theology and political theory have, despite some exceptional periods and figures, been close allies. What seems to be called for by the present failure of political imagination is above all a restoration of this ancient coalition. (p. 241)

At this point Tinder explicitly formulates the theological premises of his argument, stating that "the demand of our time—which can be ignored only at the ultimate price of the continued decay of Western civilization—is that society be reconstituted on the foundations of revelation, faith, and vision." (p. 272)

Now, the words "alienation" and "estrangement" are exceptives which serve, like the concept "neurosis" or the concept "selfish" to denote systems of behavior which are characteristically different from other kinds of behavior. It would be senseless to say that everyone, everywhere and always, is neurotic or selfish. The logic of the concept "neurosis" requires, if the word is to be meaningfully used, that non-neurotic behavior is possible. "Alienation" is a concept of the same sort. Its utility as a descriptive concept depends upon the possibility of nonalienated existence. Anyone may, of course, use the concept in whatever fashion he wishes, but if it is employed in a general and undiscriminating way, we are simply left without a word to denote the phenomenon in question. Certainly the young Marx recognized this characteristic of the concept alienation and used it to describe a narrow and unique phenomenor-viz., the alienation of the proletariat from the products of their labor. The extension of the theory of alienation to all aspects of life diminishes its fruitfulness and renders it innocuous and banal. The etiology of this error appears to go something like this: despite his increased control over nature, chiefly since the industrial revolution, man is nonetheless lonely and unfulfilled in a universe which he does not comprehend and which appears to offer neither solace nor encouragement. This condition is thought to stem from a breakdown in traditional norms of community. (Cause and symptom are systematically confused by Tinder. Men, it is thought, could not always have lived this way. And, like Jeremiah and the prophets, Tinder urges us to look to the past and consider the conditions of life lived by those who were less anxiety ridden, less neurotic, less existentially lonely and estranged. Who then? The Athenian in the agora? The village smith under the spreading chestnut tree? The medieval vassal? The Jew of the ghetto? It is not clear—but somewhere in the past, before political and religious institutions were torn asunder, life allegedly was better: stable, orderly, happy-a veritable Golden Age of Fulfillment.

The Crisis of Political Imagination is not a crisis in political imagination at all. It is a catalogue of clichés (with a cliché for a solution) which does not add up to an argument. There may well be a painful, tormented and lonely dimension of life which has nothing whatever to do with politics. Private feelings of estrangement may, as well, be a luxury for those who at this point in industrial civilization need no longer expend their time, energy and effort in acquiring the basic necessities of life.

Finally, there is, as Tinder himself observes, a kind of pretentiousness in supposing that our times and our problems are greater or that they are uniquely different from those of the past. But it is sheer folly to suppose that a possible solution to these problems lies in the resurrection of ancient and well interred religious institutions. Political theorists ought to be among those most keenly aware of the torment and effort expended by mankind in getting politics clear of the religious rubric. Whatever price is paid in the "disintegration of community" (if indeed this infelicitous expression has any meaning at all) it is a small one if the conditions of political community require the reemergence of religion in political life.

JOSEPH S. MURPHY

Brandeis University

The Cameroons from Mandate to Independence. By Victor T. Levine. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1964. Pp. 329, $7.50.)

It has become commonplace to stress at the beginning of a political study devoted to a particular African country that the area under consideration is culturally heterogeneous. In the case of the Cameroun Federal Republic, such an assertion is fully justified not only because the republic's people belong to three major African culture areas (according to the late Melville Herskovits's classification) but also because the country has been a meeting ground for three major European cultures: German, French, and English. What was originally the German protectorate of Kamerun was divided into two mandated areas administered by France and Britain respectively. The French "Cameroun" became independent on January 1, 1960; two regions that constituted the British "Cameroons," administered as part of Nigeria, chose different fates by means of a referendum: the Northern part was integrated with Nigeria, and the Southern part joined its French-speaking neighbor to constitute the present Federal Republic on October 1, 1961. This new state thus shares with the Somali Republic the rare distinction of being a country in which units administered by different colonial powers came together at the time of independence. As the only political history of the area, Mr. LeVine's book is a useful addition to the relatively short list of serious country monographs on Africa.

The focus of this study is on the lesser-known of the two components, French-speaking East Cameroun. More than half of the text is devoted to background factors and pre-World War II institutional and political history but contains several items that are particularly well handled and contribute significantly to an understanding of later political development

The first of these is LeVine's interesting discussion of the German colonial experience in Kamerun which, in spite of its harshness, became an extremely important factor shaping nationalism in the area: "The German experience remains, for many Cameroonians, at once a political touchstone and a potent symbol of a half-mythical golden age when the Cameroons were one." (p. 38) This is more than a footnote to colonial history: it indicates how rapidly the boundaries drawn during the African scramble became symbolic referents for nationalist ideologues. Given the importance of the German factor, however, one wonders why there are no traces of African reactions to the German conquest of Western Europe which are known to have occurred in such disparate areas as Northern Mali, the Congo, Kenya, and Madagascar, where the event was associated with hopes for African liberation and led to political effervescence.

Another item of particular interest is Le-Vine's treatment of ethnic tensions among the Bassa and Bamileke of the south in the chapter on westernization and social change. This is of the utmost importance for an understanding of recent politics in the area because these groups have provided the nucleus of support for the Union des Populations du Cameroun, an organization founded in 1948 and originally affiliated with the French West African Rassemblement Démocratique Africain; when the latter adopted a meliorist strategy, the UPC remained militant and eventually became an underground terrorist movement whose persistence throughout the past decade has affected the entire political system. Although it is not completely clear from LeVine's discussion why such social tensions, common to numerous other ethnic groups in similar situations, should have resulted in this particular political outcome, he has provided at least the beginnings of a case study which hopefully will lead others to attempt a comparative examination of a dramatic but hitherto poorly understood aspect of the political process in Africa.

Since the author has already published in compendia edited by others much of his material on recent political parties and groups, as well as on institutional arrangements within the Federal Republic, the chapters he devotes to the post-World War II period constitute primarily a chronicle of groups, personalities, and events, with relatively little stress on political structure and process. This is somewhat unfortunate because it deprives the present book of what might have been a more unified format. It is indeed difficult to find our bearings when the author reaches the end of the line—except that it is 1961 and the ride is over. There is very little conceptual clarity in the terminal discussion of what is, after all, a very interesting problem of integration. Similarly, among his conclusions, LeVine states that "Admittedly, a nation . . . does not need a vigorous party system in order to be a nation. The Soviet Union, Communist China, and Yugoslavia are no less nations for having single-party systems." (pp. 220-221) What is the relevance of this remark? He goes on to argue that since both East and West Camerouns have chosen democratically-oriented systems, however, "The stability of the Camerouns' party system becomes, therefore, a crucial element in building a Cameroun nation as Camerounians themselves would like it to be." The author then summarizes "the gradual collapse of multipartyism" (covered in detail in his other publications), the emergence of a one-party state, and concludes that "The East Cameroun has, for all practical purposes, ceased to have a 'party system'. . . . " He then ends with further remarks on stability and democracy.

The shift in the level of discussion from regime to system, the confusion between modernization and democracy, the lack of clarity in the relation of both of these with some undefined state labeled "stability" is unfortunately characteristic of much current work in comparative politics. While he does not achieve conceptual elegance, however, LeVine has demonstrated soundness of judgment and empirical flair by forging out of disparate materials a useful political study.

ARISTIDE R. ZOLBERG
The University of Chicago

The New States of West Africa. By Ken Post. Penguin African Library AP14, 1964. 206 pages. $1.25.

In this interesting and able book Mr. Post, a British political scientist who has worked particularly in Nigeria, surveys the new world created since so many West African countries gained their independence in the period 1957-1961. He is interested, he notes, in formulating a "preliminary set of generalizations" about the political systems operating there, but he is not model-building at a high level of abstraction. He suggests that too much attention has been paid to outward forms in looking at modern West Africa; he is more concerned to describe political reality than political forms. To this extent his book does not deal in the terms of political sociology which David Apter and others have previously applied to West Africa, but belongs rather to the British school of narrative and dissection.

Mr. Post deals first with the manner in which the various West African states achieved independence. His account is not ∈lementary, and readers without some familiarity with West African names and parties may find it complicated to follow. He then considers the role of the African elites to whom the colonial powers transferred authority, the political institutions which they attempted to transfer, and the problems of creating national unity and national consensus. This is the real focus of his work, and its most informative and useful section. The differences among the various national elites and their relations with traditional structures of authority are thus described, as well as the heritage of political ideas left by the British and the French. Mr. Post concludes that the difference in political attitude of these two powers is still to be seen in West Africa: indeed, he really uses "French" as a synonym for ideological, and "British" as a synonym for pragmatic. He notes that the political system in Ghana does not fit into either category and that the special conditions of federalism explain many developments in Nigeria. Nevertheless, this single antithesis seems incomplete as an analysis of the differences among West African political systems, and Mr. Post tries to make it explain too much. In his opinion, incidentally, both British and French policies were failures in West Africa, for the French failed to transcend territorial boundaries to build a French West Africa, and the British concept of parliamentary government has not taken root.

In discussing current institutions and problems Mr. Post devotes a chapter to what Mamadou Dia called "the indispensable symbiosis of party and government". Here he considers not so much the structure of a oneparty state, as its real impact on policy and development at local levels, in other words how it affects the ordinary citizen. He notes with interest recent trends in Senegal and Guinea which seem to point toward a rebuilding of local administrative cadres and their insulation from direct party influence, although party structures still handle the making of policy. On problems of national unity he discusses the lack of distinction so far made by African leaders among such terms as "state", "nation", and "country", to which Leopold Senghor has added "fatherland". He makes clear the turning inward of the new political units, even to the point of xenophobia, as well as the role (or lack of it, at present) of agencies of dissent: competing parties, trade unions, youth groups, the church. Mr. Post is not sanguine about the dangers which the call for unity and uniformity may create, when an opposition has no method

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

The Adams Papers: Diary and Autobiography of John Adams. Edited by L. H. Butterfield. (New York: Atheneum, 1964. Boxed in four paper volumes. Vol. I, Pp. xcviii, 365. Vol. II, Pp. x, 458. Vol. III, Pp. xiii, 449. Vol. IV, Pp. x, 403. $2.65 each volume.)

When these first four volumes of The Adams Papers were originally published in 1961 it marked an event of such historical significance that President John F. Kennedy was called upon to review them for the American Historical Review. For these first four volumes are but the beginning of a mammoth publishing undertaking, sponsored by the cooperative endeavors of Life, Harvard University Press, the Massachusetts Historical Society and the Adams family, to bring forth an anticipated one hundred volume record of the writings of three generations of the Adams family. This monumental project, which commences in 1755 when John Adams started his Diary, will cover some thirteen decades of Adams' writing, up to 1889, which the editors have chosen as the cut-off year because it was the year in which the last survivor of the "third generation," died. Scholars will thus have for the first time an accessible record of the major literary accomplishments, reflections, observtions and comments of what assuredly was the most historically conscious family in the formative years of our history.

In the attractive paper-back edition of the Diary and Autobiography of John Adams, the Diary, spanning the years 1755 to 1804, runs to two and a half volumes; the Autobiography, composed of three large fragments of manuscript which ends in midsentence in 1780, covers approximately a volume and a half. The last one hundred pages of volume four are devoted to an exceptionally copious and informative index to the four volumes.

While these volumes cast little new light upon political history, they are quite revealing of the temperament and personality of their author. What emerges from this remarkable record, in much fuller flavor than found in its previous partial publication in the Works of John Adams edited by Charles Francis Adams (1850–1856), is an intensely sensitive, vain, warm, introspective, humorous and occasionally earthy human being. Here is the contrite and Puritanical Adams who could write in his twenty-first year, "Oh! That I could wear out of my mind every mean and base affectation, conquer my natural Pride and Self Conceit, expect no more deference from my fellows than I deserve, acquire that meekness, and humility, which are the sure marks and Characters of a great and generous Soul, and subdue every unworthy Passion and treat all men as I wish to be treated by all." Here is the ambitious and self-pitying youthful Adams: "I long to be a master of Greek and Latin. I long to prosecute the mathematical and philosophical Sciences. I long to know a little of Ethicks and moral Philosophy. But I have no Books, no Time, no Friends. I must therefore be contented to live and die an ignorant, obscure fellow." Yet here also is the omnivorous reader, Adams, devouring every work he can lay his hands upon in law, history and philosophy, in Latin and Greek as well as French and English and dutifully recording each achievement along with his conjectures in his diary. "Would the State of Nature be a State of War or Peace?", he considers upon reading Montesquieu. "Hobbes thinks, that Men like Cattle, if in a state of Nature, would mutually desire and strive for the Mastery, and I think Secondat's Argument from the Complexity of the Idea of Dominion, is not a Refutation of Hobbes's Hypothesis, for Cattle fight for Dominion, and Men in the State of Nature may be supposed to have as clear an Idea of Dominion as the Cattle have." And here also is the maturing "mixed government" theorist, recollecting in his Autobiography his opinions of Thomas Paine's Common Sense. "The Arguments in favour of Independence I liked very well: but one third of the Book was filled with Arguments from the old Testament . . . and another Third, in planning a form of Government, for the separate States in One Assembly, and for the United States, in a Congress. His Arguments from the old Testament, were ridiculous. . . . The other third part relative to a form of Government I considered as flowing from simple Ignorance, and a mere desire to please the democratic Party in Philadelphia. . . ."

It is interesting if not surprising to find that in composing his Autobiography Adams did not bother to consult his Diary to refresh his memory. As a result events remembered in the Autobiography do not always occur in precisely the same fashion as those recorded in the Diary.

L. H. Butterfield, editor of The Adams Papers, and Leonard C. Faber and Wendell D. Garrett, assistant editors, deserve especial praise for the manner in which they have joined the miscellany of manuscript into a coherent whole. Their judicious use of informative notes, which reveal a tremendous amount of painstaking research on their part, enlighten the reader to names, places and events which otherwise might remain either confusing or obscure. John Adams once wrote in his Diary, "... I never shall shine, till some animating Occasion calls forth all my Powers. I find that the Mind must be agitated with some Passion, either Love, Fear, Hope, etc. before she will do her best," These four volumes are the record of a mind passionately active in the making of our history.—Alan P. Grimes, Michigan State University.

Mill and Liberalism. By MAURICE COWLING. (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1964. Pp. xvii, 161. $5.00.)

Cowling's essay on John Stuart Mill is of a piece with his Nature and Limits of Political Science (reviewed in this REVIEW by Dwight Waldo, LVIII, 403, June, 1964), and it is probably the most severe attack on Mill since James Fitzjames Stephen published his Liberty, Equality, Fraternity in 1873. In the Nature and Limits Cowling argues that political science has become pretentious and sterile, or at least fallen into a state of confusion, through its failure to sever explanation on the one hand from persuasion and practice on the other. Dwight Waldo is probably correct: most of us will find Cowling's general thesis "perverse and precious" and be repelled by his advocacy of "Science for Science's Sake" and "Philosophy for Philosophy's Sake"; yet from the vantage point of this frame of reference Cowling is able in this essay on Mill to highlight some of the confusions in Mill's work and to show he is something less than the liberal he is usually held

Cowling believes it bad enough to move from explanation to prescription, but he finds completely "intolerable" the sin of using the former as a "cover" for justifying or dignifying the latter. And Mill has sinned beyond redemption. He could be forgiven, Cowling says, if he had done what one expects of a politician, if he had offered practical advice and then supported it with "rhetorical gesturing"; but when one finds a philosopher has allowed his practical interests "to dominate, and deflect, the structure of his explanation" and has justified persuasion to moral revolution on the basis of philosophical authority, "then one must say that philosophy has been corrupted." (p. 113)

Nor can it be otherwise: Mill places all hope for the moral and political reconstruction of modern society in the very group that Cowling feels must divorce itself completely from practical matters-Cowling's academia (the scientist and the philosopher) apparently corresponds very closely with Mill's "clerisy" (the literati and the intellectuals). In Cowling's estimate Mill believed Christianity had served its purpose of providing an ordering principle during the Middle Ages, but Christianity was inadequate for the developing age of science, an age that demanded an all-encompassing Truth in place of the partial truth to which the inflexible Christian intolerantly clung. Moreover, Christianity was negative, emphasizing "Abstinence from Evil, rather than energetic pursuit of Good." (p. 13) A new fount of moral doctrine was needed, the clergy were to be replaced by the clerisy; and then, freed from the shackles of convention, eventually all men would, through their intellect and under the guidance (and indoctrination) of the clerisy, be able to arrive at a consensus about the way the empirical world functions (Mill's Sociology). Moreover, through the sense-knowledge obtained in the Science of Sociology man would be able to arrive at moral agreement (Mill's Ethology). Apparently this latter consensus will come when man rises to a level of intellectual cultivation where through self-examination he can achieve a "disinterestedness," a state enabling him to see that his own interests are best served by the serving of the best interests of all. (A "natural-harmony-ofinterests" postulate makes an easy bridge between is and ought.)

On the methodological dimension Cowling is . asking the impossible or belaboring the obvious: while he would insist on the impossible requirement that the scientist should have no bias from the very beginning of his investigation, his insistence harmlessly serves to remind us that the scientist must take every precaution to eliminate his prejudices when possible or to minimize them when it is not-or at the very least to lay them bare before his audience. Far more interesting to Mill scholars will be the substantive judgments, the firm denials that Mill was the Great Liberal. For Cowling argues most persuasively (if at inordinate length) that Mill finds individuality no more an end than liberty; they are but instruments to permit the clerisy to unburden themselves of convention and lead us into the light, according to Mill.—Theodore B. Fleming, Jr., Wayne State University.

Plato's Republic: A Philosophical Commentary. By R. C. Cross and A. D. Woozley. (New York: St. Martin's Press Inc., 1964. Pp. xv, 295. $5.00.)

This work, admirable in many of its aspects, is the result of the collaboration of two professors in the Scottish Universities of Aberdeen and St. Andrews. They have written this commentary for the benefit of British students whose introductory course in philosophy is based upon a reading of the Republic. They aim to provide the reader with an appreciation of Plato's views, with an explanation of the structure of his arguments, of the philosophical problems involved and also to provide an introduction to philosophy as the authors understand the term. Their approach to philosophy, however, and Plato's conception of philosophy differ in many respects so that their attempt to conjoin an introduction to modern philosophy to an exegesis of the Republic does not have a wholly felicitous result. One part of their enterprise, the introduction to modern philosophy is well realized, and though their exegesis is not equally successful, it is still eminently worthwhile.

The structure of the Republic lends itself to an introduction to philosophy, since the dialogue itself is, among other things, a propaedeutics to philosophy. The authors analyze the initial arguments with special care; they show the alternative lines of enquiry that remain unexplored; the occasional errors in argumentation are pointed out and we see that some of Plato's arguments are indeed quite bad. At the same time as we follow the argument we become acquainted with the various kinds of definition (the authors reject Aristotle's real definition as too narrow) and with the dangers of ambiguous terms.

As the argument moves forward we become aware of the complex of ideas enveloped in the term justice; social, moral, epistemological and ontological dimensions appear, and the wide range of topics and materials requires the commentators to become selective. They choose to disregard the educational theories and to restrict themselves to brief observations on politics of which two are of special interest. The authorsargue rather convincingly that no social contract theory is to be found in the Republic since Glaucon's argument contains no idea of political obligation. The authors also call attention to Plato's shift from economic classes in the first and second city to political classes as the basis of organization in third city. This change of organizational principle occurs without any emphasis, so that there remains a moot question whether Plato was unaware of the shift or decided to accomplish it without awakening the reader's attention.

The main stress of the commentary is laid upon purely philosophical topics. Better than a third of the work is devoted to discussion of Republic 474 to 535 (end of V, VI and VII) where problems of epistemology and ontology are treated extensively. Here, as throughout the whole commentary, the discussion is penetrating and lucid, the comments incisive, and the presentation of the various strands of argument is a marvel of clarity. But here also it becomes evident that the authors' aim to furnish simultaneously a philosophical propaedeutics and an exegesis of the Republic cannot be wholly realized.

The distinction of episteme and doxa is analyzed in terms of the difference between knowledge and belief. As Messrs. Cross and Woozley point out neither English term, though customarily used as translation, does quite convey the meaning of the Greek. It is necessary to add, moreover, that in our usage the word belief contains an element of subjectivity, not present in Plato's notion of doxa. The authors' procedure to elucidate Plato's doctrine through an analysis of the meaning of belief and knowledge and examination of their linguistic function, though very interesting and informative, rather tends to obscure Plato's teachings. Plato's epistemology, its constitution of differing objects of knowledge coordinated to the different modes of knowing, is open to objection. But the authors' criticism based on their discussion of knowledge and belief miss their mark. The distinction between doxa and episteme is fundamental to Plato's ontology, but as the authors have been misled by their own interpretation of knowledge and belief they are not compelled to give an exhaustive account of the ontological characteristics of the Forms (ideas). Their attention is focused mainly upon the functions of the Forms as basis of necessary (a priori) propositions and as universals. There is a masterly account of the functions of the Forms in Plato's system from which the student will derive a better understanding of the structure of Platonism. The account of Plato's philosophy of mathematics is also very interesting. The suggestion that the mathematicals are the Forms seen in isolation, while the highest level of knowledge is the perception of the Forms in their connection with the Form of the Good is thoughtprovoking.

The commentary concludes with a chapter on Plato's philosophy of art and a very brief discussion of the final myth. The brevity of the last section indicates that Mssrs. Cross and Woozley consider the myth largely irrelevant. No doubt, most modern philosophers would esteem it little. But, since the device of the myth is often used by Plato at decisive points, relegating the myth of Er to unimportance will give the uninformed reader an erroneous impression of the role of myths in Plato.

As an explication of Plato's teaching his work is highly provocative, always thoughtful and full of valuable insights but not in all respects authoritative. Considered as an introduction to philosophy for British students this work is excellent. The parochial nature of the audience for whom this commentary is intended may explain the paucity of American authors cited and the absence of any literature in a foreign language.

Despite the various shortcomings noted, the authors have greatly enriched the Platonic literature and their work should be read by every student of the Republic. It would be well, however, if all those readers who wish to grasp Plato's intent would at the same time consult Jaeger's Paideia, Wild's Plato's Theory of Man and Voegelin's Plato and Aristotle, none of which are mentioned in the bibliography.—ULRICH S. ALLERS, Georgetown University.

John Dewey and Arthur F. Bentley: A Philosophical Correspondence, 1932-1951. Selected and Edited by Sidney Ratner and Jules Altman with James E. Wheeler as Associate Editor. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1964. Pp. 737. $12.50.)

This volume is a fascinating record of the intellectual exchanges between the late Professor John Dewey and Arthur F. Bentley. The record begins with a letter from Bentley, dated November 15, 1932, in which he states that he is sending a copy of his recently published Linguistic Analysis of Mathematics to Professor Dewey. He remarks that some of the views expounded in the book owed much to some of Professor Dewey's early lectures. The second letter is Professor Dewey's reply, dated May 22, 1935. He doubts that he acknowledged the receipt of the volume when it was received, and he adds that he has recently read it. "It has given me more enlightenment and intellectual help than any book that I have read for a very long time. . . . "

The next to the last letter in the volume, 595 pages later, begins "Dear A. F.," dated April 9, 1951. The last letter is dated December 6, 1951, and it begins "Dear John." In the intervening pages may be found comments on almost all problems of philosophy and scientific method and also the steps by which the formal salutations of 1932 and 1935 became the informal salutations of 1951. The story is told through the correspondence of the two men. The editors have noted and corrected the mistakes the writers make in their letters and occasionally have added a note to clarify the transaction that is going on between the two men. These editorial insertions are major aids to the reader in following the intellectual controversies. The issues and problems come alive as these two men strive to make clear the notions that they are developing. It is a great pleasure to follow the fully documented account of their agreements and disagreements.

An introductory essay by Sidney Ratner provides a biographical sketch of each man and an excellent summary of the philosophical mileu in which the correspondence occurred. The volume contains two previously unprinted essays by Dewey and two appendices. One of the latter gives a brief but useful bibliography, and the other a brief biography of the persons that are referred to in the letters. Both are very useful features of the book.

The correspondence that is reproduced covers a period long after the publication of The Process of Government. There are a few brief references to the Process book and some casual remarks about a few political scientists. The major topics in the letters are the notions that are developed in the essays published by Dewey and Bentley under the title Knowing and the Known (1949). Both authors published other works in the period covered by the letters.

The book will be most helpful to those who are interested in the problems of scientific method, for there are elaborate commentaries on most of the major contributors to philosophy in this century. The reader will find himself titillated by the vigor and informality of the correspondence and he will be impressed by the seriousness of purpose that pervades the search for firm statements about the human condition. The volume is a substantial contribution to the intellectual history of the first half of the 20th century.— Charles B. Hagan, University of Illinois.

Patriotism and Nationalism: Their Psychological Foundations. By Leonard W. Doob. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1964. Pp. 297. $6.75.)

Professor Doob is a psychologist with a remarkable facility for relating psychological research to problems of political importance. In the past he has performed this task in relation to the problem of the change in beliefs, values, and behavior associated with the process of "becoming more civilized" and the problem of the boundaries of communications systems. This earlier work was based on extensive field work in Africa. The current book, which extends the earlier research, is based on field work in another area where problems of community and nation building are important—the German speaking South Tyrolean section of Italy. And here the main concern is with patriotism and nationalism.

Patriotism, in Doob's useful definition, is "the more or less conscious conviction of a person that his own welfare and that of the significant groups to which he belongs are dependent upon the preservation or expansion (or both) of the power and culture of his society." Nationalism is the set of demands for action arising from patriotism that incline people to sacrifice on behalf of their government's aims. Patriotism is thus intimately related to the general political problem of nation building. And nationalism—which used to be a political problem in the international sphere as a source of potential conflict among nations-is, as Doob defines it, closely related to problems of economic and political development. The nationstate is the institution that mobilizes resources for development and coordinates developmental activities. Economic development and social change have always been related to appropriate motivation—be it the Protestant ethic or high achievement motivation-but in a context where the state is the focus of development, nationalism becomes a prime motivating set of beliefs. Nationalism becomes a way of motivating people to work for social change and of harnessing their energies into cooperative and coordinated activities.

Patriotism and nationalism are related to commitment on lower or higher levels—to local attachments and to international attachments. Thus economic and social development that depends upon commitment to the nation-state has important implications for both parochial commitments to the family, community, ethnic group, and region and for commitment beyond the nation-state to internationalism. Here Doob returns to the great questions about nationalism that have usually been the focus of concern—its role in generating international tensions and in blocking international cooperation.

Doob has many interesting things to say here upon these subjects from his psychological perspective, largely because his particular psychological perspective is an extremely sensible one. He does not look at nationalism as a way in which personal psychoses play themselves out on the political stage. Though he considers the psychological functions of nationalism, it is not considered a pathological manifestation. He deals with the ways in which political events are interpreted by those involved in them and how these interpretations in turn lead to further action. This provides a useful psychological approach to history-as a set of interpretations of events and reactions to them. In this way, history becomes intimately connected with the contemporary culture of a nation.

One of the most interesting sections of the book deals with the objects of patriotic and nationalistic commitment. One rarely loves one's country in the abstract sense of the term, but rather, some observable manifestation of the country—its land, its people, its culture, its symbols—and the discussion of the variety of possible objects of attachment is particularly enlightening.

The book opens with the important question of what the psychological study of nationalism can add to our understanding of the political problem of nationalism. The question is dealt with from a variety of perspectives in the book—the psychologists' tools are brought to bear on the problem of the sources of patriotism and nationalism, and on the problems of causal inference and of measurement. And many fascinating ideas are suggested. But perhaps because the subject is so intriguing, because Doob has so many interesting ideas to develop, because his skills are so apt for the task, and, perhaps, most of all, because this reviewer had such high expectations based on his experience with Doob's earlier books on Africa, the present volume is somewhat disappointing.

Doob's previous work on Africa has employed data gathered in the most uncongerial circumstances to deal with complex and important problems. The present book in contrast is rather thin in new material. One might have hoped for more material from Doob's new studies in the South Tyrol and more comparisons with the results of his African studies. Much of the book is a speculative essay on nationalism based on a mixed bag of psychological, historical and philosophical works (though good speculation, it is true). And lastly, the book makes clear how important it is that the psychological study of nationalism be merged with studies of nationalism from the organizational point of view. Further information on the organization of South Tyrolean nationalism would have added greatly to our understanding of the role of nationalistic beliefs.

But this is perhaps to ask too much. The present volume remains a stimulating discussion of a vital topic—a discussion that is psychologically wise and politically pertinent.—Sidney Verba, Stanford University.

Administrative Decision-Making: A Heuristic Model. By William J. Gore. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1964. Pp. viii, 191. $5.00.)

This book is a major contribution to organization theory. Professor Gore subjects the process of decision-making to closer scrutiny than has been done heretofore, and he comes up with some highly original observations, not only concerning decisions, but as to the nature of organization.

He begins by constructing a detailed model of decision-making based on successive empirical studies and then draws theoretical conclusions. The model provides insights into the decision-making process and into the way the problems are perceived, evaluated, weighed in terms of consequences, and support obtained for an agreed course of action. He traces the organizational actions and varied reactions in each of these phases.

Decision-making has become a most popular subject in public administration in recent years. As Gore wryly points out, it has become the latest in "a succession of widely held enthusiasms for some particular dimension as the key to effective administration." (p. 2)

But from Gore's material the decision-making process as usually described does not conform to administrative reality. "Classical theory sets decision-making off as a sequence of independent choices made by executives with formally designated powers. Acting in the name of the organization with the assistance of top staff and through consultation with their subordinates, these men were said to carry out decision-making functions. They do this through the rational process of defining a problem, identifying the alternatives, selecting the most appropriate and acceptable alternatives, translating it into a course of action, and initiating the implementing activities. . . . We do not have one case history that shows an executive making the decision through a formal mechanism. The procedure described by the classical theory is the means used to formalize and proclaim the decision, not to cast it." (pp. 132-133)

Actually, Gore concludes, administrative decision-making cannot be separated from the full stream of organizational behavior "Though some distinctly choice-making behaviors can be separated from the full scope of forming a collective response, it does not seem profitable to attempt to break down organizational behavior in terms of a choice-making, non-choice making dichotomy. Decision-making seems to serve as an orienting device by means of which a response is first given direction and then appropriate content." (p. 133)

More clearly than any theorist before him Gore analyzes the organization as an enormously complicated pattern of inter-acting behaviors in a somewhat precarious equilibrium. The executives (or as he calls them, "power-holders") are not the persons who choose satisficing alternatives most appropriate to achieve agreed ends, nor who perform a specified technical operations; "they are the power-holders in a large, indigenous social system, who have the political skills and the character traits that lead them to strive for and pay the price of maintaining a position in an inherently unstable, often untenable power structure." (p. 134)

In his studies of the organization as an interacting system Gore is acutely aware that, even in the simplest organization, the goals pursued by the various participants (including clientele groups) are never unified and often clashing. It is fortunate that his illustrations are drawn from a small town fire department which most people assume to be a single purpose unitary organization. He effectively shows that such is not the case.

I think Professor Gore is unduly modest in his claims for this work. He calls his analysis "a decision theory fragment." It is certainly more than that. It casts new lights on many aspects of organization. Perhaps most significant about Gore's analysis is its implications for total political systems. If his generalizations are true for simple organizations they describe as well the operations of the larger political system. He also makes possible an understanding of the dynamics of change and the way it effects (is incorporated into or rejected by) organizations.

